

Il Libro pubblico Genova

SHARPE'S
LONDON JOURNAL

OF

ENTERTAINMENT AND INSTRUCTION

FOR GENERAL READING.

With Elegant Steel Engravings.

VOL. XV.

LONDON:
VIRTUE, HALL, & VIRTUE, 25, PATERNOSTER ROW.

LONDON:

PRINTED BY RICHARD CLAY,

BREAD STREET HILL.

Ottawa Public Library

Acq. No. 31534 Date 07-04-04

31287

01.06.04

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE Fifteenth Half-Yearly Volume of SHARPE'S LONDON MAGAZINE being completed, custom makes it necessary to accompany it by a few prefatory remarks.

Its Subscribers will have seen that a change in the management of the Work has already commenced ; hereafter it will be placed more directly under the conduct of Mrs. S. C. HALL ; and, in announcing this arrangement, the Publishers feel assured that the accomplished lady, whose writings have been so eminently useful, and who is so greatly popular among readers of all classes, will give to this Magazine a high character among the Periodical Publications of the age and country.

Several marked improvements will be introduced into future Parts : the articles will be more skilfully arranged ; the work will be printed from new type, upon better paper than heretofore ; and the Publishers express their anxious wish to sustain the efforts of the Editor in the endeavour to give to the London Magazine a more enlarged sphere of usefulness, by increasing its circulation.

25, PATERNOSTER ROW,
June 1, 1852.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

Subject.	Painter.	Engraver.	Page.
THE MOUNTAIN TORRENT	W. PURSER	E. GOODALL	26
TRIC-TRAC	D. TENIERS	W. HADDON	41
VENUS AND THE BOAR	R. WESTALL, R.A.	T. HOLLIS	93
CHEPSTOW CASTLE AND BRIDGE	W. H. BARTLETT	E. BRADFORD	106
HENRY IV. AND GABRIELLE D'ESTREES	R. WESTALL, R. A.	R. STAINES	139
ROSTREVR	T. CRESWICK, R.A.	J. HINGELIFF	176
THE GREEK MOTHER	H. CORBOULD	H. ROLLS	226
GLENGARIFF	T. CRESWICK, R.A.	R. WALLIS	250
THE COAST OF GENOA	J. R.	J. C. ARMATAGE	288
THE FRIENDS	J. W. WRIGHT	W. FIDLEN	300
EGYPTIAN DANCING-GIRLS	H. WARREN	S. FISHER	350
THE MAIDEN'S TOWER, CONSTANTINOPLE	G. R. MANWARING	S. FISHER	373

SHARPE'S LONDON JOURNAL.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF ANDREW MARVELL.

ANDREW MARVELL, the incorruptiblest of men and senators in an age when nearly all men and senators were corrupt, was in his lifetime a person much esteemed for his wisdom and his wit; and for his character and conduct has been since considered worthy of an honourable remembrance, being, indeed, now generally regarded as one of those true and faithful spirits that are born for the benefit and ornament of the world. As it is presumable that the acts and qualities of such a man are still possessed of interest, it shall be our present effort to show what manner of man he was, and to represent, in so far as present limits will admit, something of his actual life and conversation. The delineation will be necessarily imperfect, but such as it is it shall be accurate, and, if possible, entertaining.

Be it known, then, to all such as do not already know it, that Andrew Marvell was born at Kingston-upon-Hull, in these days of abbreviation commonly called Hull, on the 15th of November, 1620. His father, also called Andrew, was master of the Grammar School, and lecturer at the church of the Holy Trinity in that town. Fuller mentions him as being remarkable for his facetiousness, and says further, that "he was a most excellent preacher, who never broached what he had new brewed, but preached what he had pre-studied some competent time before, inasmuch as he was wont to say, that he would cross the common proverb which called Saturday the working day, and Monday the holiday of preachers." But if his preaching was thus excellent, his life was not the less so; indeed, there seems reason to believe that he very much resembled the "Good Parson" drawn by Chaucer:—

"Rich he was in holy thought and work;
And thereto a right learned man. * * *
The lore of Christ, and his apostles twelve
He taught; but first he follow'd it himselfe."

Of young Andrew's early years there is nothing particular related. A bold imagination may figure him as a frank and joyous boy, with probably a tinge of pensiveness, studying the Latin grammar under his father at the Grammar School, and spending his leisure time in such youthful recreations as were common to his age and country. Having given sufficient indications of ability, and obtained "an exhibition from his native town," he was sent, when hardly fifteen years of age, to Trinity College, Cambridge.

VOL. XV.

Here he was presently ensnared by the proselytizing cunning of the Jesuits, who induced him to quit his studies and run away to London, but with what specific object is not distinctly stated. Thither, however, his father traced him, and after considerable searching and inquiry, discovered him accidentally in a book-seller's shop. He was restored to the university, and for the two succeeding years he pursued his studies with becoming diligence and success.

While yet at College, Andrew lost his father, under circumstances peculiarly sudden and affecting. It appears that among his intimate acquaintances there was a lady, residing on the other side of the Humber, and who had an only, interesting daughter, endeared to all who knew her, and by her mother so idolized and passionately beloved, that she was scarcely ever permitted to pass an hour out of her presence. On one occasion; however, in compliance with the solicitations of Mr. Marvell, she was allowed to cross over to Hull to be present at the baptism of one of his children. The day after the ceremony the young lady was to return. The weather was unusually tempestuous, and on reaching the river side, accompanied by her reverend friend, the boatmen endeavoured to dissuade her from passing over. Afraid of alarming her mother by her prolonged absence she unhappily persisted. Mr. Marvell, seconding the representations of the boatmen, urged the danger of the undertaking; but finding her resolved to go, he told her that as she had incurred the impending peril to oblige him, he felt "bound in honour and conscience" not to desert her; and having at length prevailed on some of the boatmen to hazard the passage, they embarked. As they were putting off, he flung his cane on shore, telling the bystanders that, in case he should never return, it was to be given to his son, with the injunction "to remember his father." His apprehensions were very shortly realized: the boat was upset, and both were lost.

Great was the grief of the bereaved mother, but when she had a little recovered from its first impressions, she sent for young Marvell, and signified a disposition to aid him in completing his education; and at her death, some time afterwards, she left him the whole of her possessions. Meanwhile, having taken his bachelor's degree, in or about 1638, he appears to have been admitted to a scholarship. This, however, he does not seem to have retained long. A lively, and perhaps riotous temperament exposed him to a variety of temptations, into some of which he evidently fell; for we learn that he became "negligent of his studies," and absented himself from certain "exerccises," which rendered him amenable to discipline. The result of these irregularities was rather serious, inasmuch as on the 21st September, 1641, he was adjudged by the masters and seniors to be unworthy of receiving "any further benefit from the college," unless he should show cause to the contrary within the space of three months; a gracious reservation, of which he does not appear to have availed himself. For that default he had, of course, to quit the university, and he accordingly girded up his loins for adventures in the open world.

It seemed to Andrew that perhaps the best thing he could do was to "set out on his travels." He therefore departed, probably about the beginning of 1642, and journeyed over a great part of Europe. On reaching Rome he fell in with his countryman John Milton, and here, it is believed, began their well-known and life-long friendship. It would be a pleasant accession to the biography of both, could one recover out of the depths of forgetfulness some of those brilliant and stirring conversations in which they no doubt frequently engaged; but as there was no ready-writing Boswell there to do them such a service, this portion of their history remains, and will remain, extremely indistinct. The most of what we learn of them is this: that both being men of intrepidity, with a strain of the Puritan in their constitutions, they openly argued against the superstitions of the Roman church, within the very precincts of the Vatican; and, what was hardly to have been expected, came off scathless. It would seem, however, that there was a certain kind of tolerance in the popish authorities of the times, and that they could very well afford to let a pair of hot-tempered and noble-spirited strangers speak their minds.

It was at Rome that Marvell began to try his hand at authorship; the "heir of his invention" being a lampoon on Richard Flecknoe. It is now pretty well forgotten, or remembered mainly as having suggested Dryden's famous satire on Laureate Shadwell. Going afterwards to Paris, Marvell made another satirical effort, designing thereby to bring into contempt a certain Abbe Manibou, who, after the manner of our present "graphiologists," professed to interpret the characters and indicate the fortunes of individuals by an inspection of their handwritings. His piece was written in Latin, and in point of merit it is considered about equal to his first performance. What impression it made on the public has not been very certainly ascertained.

For some years after this, Marvell's history is in great part a blank. We find, however, that having been "four years abroad, in Holland, France, Italy, and Spain," he was sometime subsequently engaged in the household of Lord Fairfax, for the purpose of giving "instructions in the languages" to the daughter of that nobleman. How long he remained in this employment is nowise clear or certain. In 1652 he offered himself as a candidate for the office of Assistant Latin Secretary to the existing government. In a letter of Milton's, dated the 21st of February in that year, and addressed to John Bradshaw, Marvell is described as a man of "singular desert," and as being in point of learning and ability well qualified for the appointment he was then soliciting. The letter concludes in these terms: "This, my lord, I write sincerely, without any other end than to perform my duty to the public in helping them to an humble servant; laying aside those jealousies and that emulation which mine own condition might suggest to me, by bringing in such a condutor." Though thus strongly recommended, Marvell was unsuccessful in his application, and did not obtain the office till five years afterwards.

The powers in high places seem nevertheless to have been well disposed to serve him: for in 1653 he was appointed tutor to Cromwell's nephew, Mr. Dutton. Marvell's mode of proceeding towards his pupil appears to have been distinguished by great sense and conscientiousness, and even by a touch of Yorkshire caution. "I have taken care," says he, in a letter to the Protector, "to examine him several times in the presence of Mr. Oxenbridge, as those who weigh and tell over money before some witness ere they take charge of it, for I thought there might be possibly some lightness in the coin, or error in the telling, which hereafter I should be bound to make good." He adds further: "He is of gentle and waxen disposition; and God be praised, I cannot say he hath brought with him any evil impression, and I shall hope to set nothing into his spirit but what may be of a good sculpture." How Marvell succeeded in building up the inner man of Mr. Dutton, or for what length of time he was so engaged, cannot here be certified, owing to the scantiness of the materials relating to this part of his life. But there seems reason to believe that, in whatsoever way employed, he remained connected with the person and family of Cromwell for a considerable period, as on the publication of Milton's "Second Defence of the People of England," he was commissioned to present the work to the Protector, and in 1657 was promoted to the Assistant Secretaryship which he had formerly solicited.

In 1658 Cromwell died, and we hear no more of Marvell till the opening of the parliament in 1660. To that parliament he was returned for his native town of Hull. He was one of the last members of the House of Commons that received scages from their constituents, and the duties which he performed were perhaps on that account more onerous than those of ordinary senators. He appears to have carried on a regular correspondence with the Hull electors, giving them full particulars of the parliamentary proceedings, and of the part which he himself took in them. A great number of his letters are still preserved, and are valuable for the proofs which they afford of the writer's diligence and fidelity, and in some respects also as throwing light on certain points of parliamentary history and usage. A few passages from these letters, intermingled with certain portions of his private correspondence, may serve perhaps to illustrate the character of Marvell's patriotism, and to show the unsparing criticism which he applied to the public transactions of the times.

It is matter of notoriety that the court and administration of Charles II. were extremely unscrupulous and corrupt: it may not, however, be uninteresting to some to see a little of what Marvell noted close at hand. In a letter to a friend in Persia, he says: "The king having, upon pretence of the great preparations of his neighbours, demanded 300,000*l.* for his navy, (though in conclusion he hath not set out any,) and that the parliament should pay his debts (which the ministers would never particularize to the House of Commons,) our House gave several bills. You see how far things were stretched, though beyond reason, there being no satisfaction how those debts were contracted, and all men foreseeing that what was given would not be applied to discharge the debts, which I hear are at this day risen to four millions; but diverted as formerly. Nevertheless, such was the number of the constant courtiers increased by the apostate patriots, who were bought off for that turn, some at six, others ten, one at fifteen thousand pounds in money, besides what offices, lands, and reversions to others, that it is a mercy they gave not away the whole land and liberty of England." In the same letter he adds: "They have signed and sealed ten thousand pounds a-year more to the Duchess of Cleveland, who has likewise near ten thousand pounds a-year out of the new farm of the country excise of beer and ale, five thousand a-year out of the Post-office, and they say the reversion of all the king's leases, the reversion of all places in the Custom House, the green wax, and indeed what not? All promotions, spiritual and temporal, pass under her cognisance."¹

Of the king's unconstitutional visits to the House of Peers, Marvell gives the following account:—"Being sat, he told them it was a privilege he claimed from his ancestors to be present at their deliberations. That therefore they should not for his coming, interrupt their debates, but proceed, and be covered. They did so. It is true that this has been done long ago: but it is now so old that it is new, and so disused, that at any other but so bewitched a time as this, it would have been looked on as a high usurpation and breach of privilege. He indeed sat still, for the most part, and interposed very little . . . After three or four days' continuance, the lords were very well used to the king's presence, and sent the lord steward and lord chamberlain to him, to know when they might wait as a house on him, to render their humble thanks for the honour he did them. The hour was appointed them; and they thanked him; and he took it well. So this matter, of such importance on all great occasions, seems riveted to them and us for the future, and to all posterity . . . The king has ever since continued his session among them, and says it is better than going to a play."² his faults, Charles II. was a pleasant fellow. Of another kind of pleasantry, arising out of the peculiar relations between members of Parliament and their constituencies, we obtain some curious glimpses from these letters. On more than one occasion it appears that members had sued their constituents for arrears of pay; and that others had threatened to do the like, unless the said constituents would agree to re-elect them at the next election. "To-day," says Marvell (in a letter dated March 3, 1676-7), "Sir Harbottle Grimston, Master of the Rolls, moved for a bill to be brought in, to indemnify all counties, cities, and boroughs, for the wages due to their members for the time past, which was introduced by him upon very good reason, both because of the poverty of many people not able to supply so long an arrear, especially new taxes now coming upon them, and also because Sir John Shaw, the Recorder of Colchester, had sued the town for his wages; several other members also having, it seems, threatened their boroughs to do the same, unless they should choose them upon another election to Parliament." We gather further that electors of those days did not pride themselves very much upon the suffrage, and that there were even instances of unpatriotic boroughs begging to be disfranchised, to escape the burdensome honour of sending representatives!

From this one can perceive that, whatever might be

In such a state of things, it was hardly to be expected that the attendance of members should be very prompt or punctual. Such, indeed, was the difficulty of obtaining a "full House," that it was deemed advisable at various times to threaten severe penalties against the absentees. In one of these letters we are told—"The House was called yesterday, and gave defaulters a fortnight's time, by which if they do not come up they may expect the greatest severity." In another—"The House of Commons was taken up for the most part yesterday in calling over their House, and having ordered a letter to be drawn up from the Speaker to every place for which there is any defaulter, to signify the absence of their members; and a solemn letter is accordingly preparing, to be signed by the Speaker. This is thought a sufficient punishment for any modest man; nevertheless, if they shall not come up hereupon, there is a further severity reserved." These reserved severities, however, could be rarely put in practice, so that the absenteeism of honourable gentlemen was for a long time more or less a standing hindrance to legislation.

Among the other unpleasant perplexities incident to the House of Commons in those days, were the frequent disputes into which they were in the habit of falling with the House of Lords. The following is an amusing complication of their relations, and must have been extremely difficult of adjustment. "I have no more time than to tell you that the Lords having judged and fined the East India Company, as we think illegally, upon the petition of one Skynner, a merchant, and they petitioning us for redress, we have imprisoned him that petitioned them, and they have imprisoned several of those that petitioned us." "It is," adds Marvell, "a business of high and dangerous consequence," as indeed it manifestly was, though nothing very serious resulted.

(1) Marvell's Letters, pp. 405, 400.

(2) Ibid. pp. 417-419.

As a curious example of the odd accidents on which important events may sometimes depend, the following singular anecdote may be cited. Sir G. Carteret had been charged with embezzlement of public money. "The House," says Marvell, "dividing upon the question, the ayes went out, and wondered why they were kept out so extraordinary a time; the ayes proved 138, and the noes 129; and the reason of the long stay then appeared. The tellers for the ayes chanced to be very ill reckoners, so that they were forced to tell several times over in the house; and when at last the tellers for the ayes would have agreed the noes to be 142, the noes would needs say that they were 143; whereupon those for the ayes would tell once more, and then found the noes to be indeed but 129, and the ayes then coming in proved to be 138; whereas if the noes had been content with the first error of the tellers, Sir George had been quit upon that observation."¹

It appears there is no evidence that Marvell ever spoke in Parliament. He was nearly twenty years a member, and all the time a silent one. His influence in the House, nevertheless, seems to have been more than usually considerable. The strong and decided views which he took on public affairs, the severe, satirical things which he was constantly uttering in conversation, or publishing in pamphlets and addresses, and the steadfast and well-known integrity by which his entire conduct was distinguished, rendered him a formidable opponent to the government, and even gained for him the secret respect of some of the court party. Prince Rupert honoured him with his friendship, and is said to have remained attached to him when "the rest of the party had honoured him by their hatred," and to have occasionally visited him at his lodgings. When he voted on Marvell's side of the House, as not unfrequently happened, it used to be said that he had been closeted "with his tutor." Our patriot, however, was nowise without his enemies—as indeed every good man necessarily lives in antagonism with the bad; and there are no relations hitherto discovered under which they can with any permanence be amicably associated. We find it said that on more than one occasion, Marvell was threatened with assassination; so that in spite of conscious virtue he had need of walking guardedly, and with the strictest circumspection.

Of his severe probity, his utter inaccessibility to bribery, and the manifold forms of flattery and temptation which the governing powers employed against him, there are many substantial evidences. The account of his memorable interview with the Lord Treasurer Danby, though it has often been repeated, and is, perhaps, generally familiar to historical readers, cannot properly be omitted in any relation having reference to Marvell's acts and chaacter. It appears that he once spent an evening at Court, and very highly delighted the "merry monarch" by his wit and other personal accomplishments. In this there is nothing to astonish us; as it is known that Charles enjoyed wit and lively conversation almost more than anything. To his excessive admiration of wit and drollery he was indeed continually sacrificing his royal dignity. However, one morning after the above-mentioned interview, he sent Danby to wait on our patriot with a special message of regard. Charles perhaps might think that with a fellow of such humour it would not be impossible to come to an understanding. His lordship had some difficulty in finding Marvell's residence, but at last discovered it on a second floor, in a dark court communicating with the Strand. It is said, that in groping up the narrow staircase, he stumbled against the door of the apartment, which, flying open, revealed to him the patriot writing at his desk. A little surprised, Marvell asked his lordship, with a smile, if he had not missed his way. "No," said Danby, in courtly phraseology; "No; not since I have succeeded in finding Mr. Marvell." He then proceeded to inform him that he came with a message from the king, who was impressed with a deep sense of his merits, and was anxious to serve him. Marvell replied, pleasantly, "that his majesty had it not in his power to serve him." As Danby pressed him seriously, he told his lordship at length that he knew well enough that he who accepts court favours is naturally expected to vote in conformity with its interests. On his lordship's saying "that his majesty only desired to know whether there was any place at court which he would accept," the patriot replied, "that he could accept nothing with honour, for either he must treat the king with ingratitude by refusing compliance with court measures, or be a traitor to his country by yielding to them." The only favour, therefore, he begged of his majesty, was to esteem him as a loyal subject, and truer to his actual interests in refusing his offers than he could be by accepting them. His lordship having exhausted this species of persuasion, had recourse to what he probably considered more formidable logic, and told him that his majesty requested his acceptance of a thousand pounds. But this too was firmly and respectfully rejected, though, as it is related, soon after Danby left him, Marvell was compelled to borrow a guinea from a friend, to meet his immediate expenses.

It has been already hinted, that though no orator in Parliament, Marvell was moderately ready with his pen; and there can be no one at all acquainted with English literature, who does not know that he was one of the most popular writers of his age. Most of his works, however, were written for temporary purposes, and have accordingly in great part passed out of mind with the circumstances that occasioned them. The production on which his fame as an author may be said principally to rest, is the Rehearsal Transposed—a piece written in a controversy with Dr. Samuel Parker, afterwards Bishop of Oxford, a splendid impersonation of the High-Church militant. Parker, in a preface to a posthumous work of Archbishop Bramhall's, which appeared in 1673, had displayed an excessive zeal against the Nonconformists, and with the fiercest acrimony and the uttermost extravagance, had urged those abominable maxims of ecclesiastical tyranny, which were fashionable among the rampant churchmen of the age. The preface was anonymous, but the author was not on that account unknown—his style, perhaps, exposing him. As a champion for tolerance, Marvell took the matter up; and as his adversary persecuted himself without a name, he facetiously dubbed him "Mr. Bayes," the name under which the Duke of Buckingham had lately ridiculed Dryden in the famous play of the Rehearsal. The title of Marvell's book was, indeed, suggested by a scene in the same play—that in which Bayes states the manner in which he manufactured his dramatic pieces. The passage is as follows:—

(1) Letters, pp. 125, 126.

"Bayes.—Why, sir, my first rule is the rule of transversion, or regula duplex,—changing verse into prose, or prose into verse, alternatiôe as you please."

"Smith.—Well, but how is this done by rule, sir?"

"Bayes.—Why thus, sir; nothing so easy when understood. I take a book in my hand, either at home or elsewhere, for that is all one: if there be any wit in it (as there is no book but has some), I transverse it; that is, if it be prose, put it into verse, (but that takes up some time,) and if it be verse, put it into prose."

"Johnson.—Methinks, Mr. Bayes, that putting verse into prose shall be called transprosing."

"Bayes.—By my troth, sir, 'tis a very good notion, and hereafter it shall be so."

Seizing upon this conceit, Marvell called his work the Rehearsal Transposed; and the ridicule which he heaped on Parker was so unsparing and complete, that it is said even the king and his courtiers could not help laughing at him. The success of the work was signal, immediate, and universal. Bishop Burnet says, in allusion to it, with an evident enjoyment of the humiliation of the victim, "After Parker had for some years entertained the nation with several virulent books, he was attacked by the liveliest droll of the age, who wrote in a burlesque strain, but with so peculiar and entertaining a conduct, that, from the king down to the tradesman, his books were read with pleasure; that not only humbled Parker, but the whole party; for the author of the Rehearsal Transposed had all the men of wit (or, as the French phrase it, all the laughers) on his side." To give a faint notion of the ridiculous light in which Marvell exhibited his adversary, and for the reader's entertainment, we may here insert some few sentences from the book. He says:—

"This gentleman, as I have heard, after he had read Don Quixote, and the Bible, besides such school-books as were necessary for his age, was sent early to the university; and there studied hard, and in a short time became a competent rhetorician, and no ill disputant. He had learned how to erect a thesis, and to defend it pro and con, with a serviceable distinction

. . . . And so, thinking himself now ripe, and qualified for the greatest undertakings and highest fortune, he therefore exchanged the narrowness of the university for the town; but coming out of the confinement of the square cap and the quadrangle into the open air, the world began to turn round with him, which he imagined, though it were his own giddiness, to be nothing less than the quadrature of the circle. This accident concurring so happily to increase the good opinion which he naturally had of himself, he thenceforward applied to gain a like reputation with others. He followed the town life, haunted the best companies; and to polish himself from any pedantic roughness, he read and saw the plays with much care, and more proficiency than most of the auditory. But all this while he forgot not the main chance; but hearing of a vacancy with a nobleman, he clapped in, and easily obtained to be his chaplain: from that day you may take the date of his preferments and his ruin; for having soon wrought himself dexterously into his patron's favour, by short graces and sermons, and a mimical way of drolling upon the Puritans, which he knew would take both at chapel and at table, he gained a great authority likewise among all the domestics. They all listened to him as an oracle; and they allowed him, by common consent, to have not only all the divinity, but more wit, too, than all the rest of the family put together. . . . Nothing now must serve him, but he must be a madman in print, and write a book of Ecclesiastical Policy. There he distributes all the territories of conscience into the Prince's province, and makes the Hierarchy to be but Bishops of the air; and talks at such an extravagant rate in things of higher concernment, that the reader will avow that in the whole discourse he had not one lucid interval."

The Rehearsal soon elicited several replies; some of them written in awkward imitation of Marvell's style of banter, and all now deservedly forgotten. Parker himself remained for a long while silent, but at length came forth with a Reproof of the Rehearsal Transposed, wherein he urged the Government to crush Marvell as a "pestilent wit," and stigmatized him as "the servant of Cromwell, and the friend of Milton." It was but natural that Marvell should retort, and he accordingly wrote and published what is called the "second part" of the Rehearsal. He was, moreover, constrained to i. by a pithy anonymous epistle, signed "T. G.," left for him at a friend's house, and concluding with these words,—"If thou darest to print any lie or libel against Dr. Parker, by the eternal God, I will cut thy throat!" A man of Marvell's boldness was not to be intimidated, and he straightway printed this pleasant document in the title-page of his reply. To this publication Parker attempted no rejoinder. Anthony Wood informs us that the said Parker "judged it more prudent to lay down the cudgels, than to enter the lists again with an untowardly combatant, so hugely well versed and experienced in the then newly-refined art, though much in mode and fashion ever since, of sporting and jeering buffoonery. It was generally thought, however, by many of those who were otherwise favourers of Parker's cause, that the victory lay on Marvell's side, and it wrought this good effect on Parker, that for ever after it took down his great spirit." Burnet tells us further, that he "withdrew from the town, and ceased writing for some years."

No adequate notion of this the most considerable and curious of Marvell's writings, could be given by any such selection of extracts as could be inserted in these pages. Indeed it would be very difficult, even with the most copious quotations, to convey anything like the impression which the work itself must have originally produced. As a writer in the Edinburgh Review has said, "The allusions are often so obscure—the wit of one page is so dependent on that of another—the humour and pleasantry are so continuous—and the character of the work from its very nature is so excursive, that its merits can be fully appreciated only on a regular perusal." There are other reasons also why any lengthened citations cannot be given. "The work has faults which would, in innumerable cases, disguise its real merits from modern readers, or rather altogether deter them from giving it a reading. It is characterised by much of the coarseness which was so prevalent in that age, and from which Marvell was by no means free; though his spirit was far from partaking of the malevolence of ordinary satirists."¹ It is not to be inferred, however, that the merit of the Rehearsal Transposed consists solely in wit and banter. Amidst all its ludicrous levities, there is, as D'Israeli has remarked, "a vehemence of solemn reproof, and an eloquence of invective, that awes one with the spirit of the modern Junius;" and, as the critic above quoted subjoins, "there are many passages of very powerful reasoning, in advocacy of truths then but ill understood, and of rights which had been shamefully violated."

About three years after the publication of the second part of the Rehearsal, Marvell's "chivalrous love of justice" impelled him into another controversy. In 1675, Dr. Croft, Bishop of Hereford, had published a work entitled, "The Naked Truth; or, the true state of the Primitive Church; by a humble Moderator." This work enjoined on all religious parties the unwelcome duties of charity and forbearance; but as it especially exposed the danger and folly of enforcing a minute uniformity, such as was then so generally demanded by the High-Church intolérants, it could not be suffered to pass unchallenged by the leaders and guides of that trenchant faction. It was accordingly attacked, with a considerable display of petulance, by Dr. Francis Turner, Master of St. John's College, Cambridge, in a pamphlet entitled, "Animadversions on the Naked Truth." Provoked by the unfairness and asperity of this production, our satirist replied to it in another pamphlet, which he entitled, "Mr. Smirke; or, the Divine in Mode." He here fits the object of his banter with a character out of Etherege's

"Man in Mode," as he had before fitted Parker with one from Buckingham's "Rehearsal." The merits and defects of this performance are considered to be of much the same order as those of his former work, though it is, perhaps, somewhat less disfigured by vehemence and coarseness. On Dr. Croft's pamphlet he has one remark which beautifully expresses his admiration of the work, and indicates a feeling of which many persons must have been conscious, when perusing other works of eminent superiority. "It is a book of that kind," says he, "that no Christian can peruse without wishing himself to have been the author, and almost imagining that he is so: the conceptions therein being of so eternal an idea, that every man finds it to be but a copy of the original in his own mind."

Two years after the appearance of the "Divine in Mode,"—namely, in 1677,—Marvell published his last controversial piece, elicited, like the rest, by his disinterested love of fairness. It was a defence of the celebrated John Howe, whose conciliatory tract on the "Divine Prescience," had been rudely assailed by three several antagonists. This little volume is not included in any edition of Marvell's works, and is now extremely scarce, it being, presumably, unknown to any of his biographers. We are indebted to the writer in the "Edinburgh" before quoted for drawing attention to its existence.

Marvell's latest work of any extent was entitled, "An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England." This appeared in 1678. It was construed by the Government into a "libel," and a reward was offered for the discovery of the author. Marvell, however, does not appear to have been alarmed by these proceedings, nor to have been any way called to account for the publication. He thus humorously alludes to the subject in a private letter, written some months after the work was published:—"There came out about Christmas last, here, a large book concerning the growth of Popery and arbitrary Government. There have been great rewards offered in private, and considerable in the Gazette, to any one who could inform of the author or printer, but not yet discovered. Three or four printed books since have described, as near as it was proper to go, (the man being a Member of Parliament,) Mr. Marvell to have been the author; but, if he had, surely he should not have escaped being questioned in Parliament or some other place."

During the latter years of his life, Marvell published several other political pamphlets, which, though now forgotten, are considered to have been influential at the time in unmasking corruption, and rousing the nation to a consciousness of its political degradation. Among these is a clever parody on the speeches of Charles II., in which the flippancy and easy impudence of those singular specimens of royal eloquence are said to be happily mimicked, and scarcely, if in any degree, caricatured. Let us, for a few sentences, hear the witty Charles, as our caustic author represents him speaking:—

(1) Ed. Rev. No. 159.

"I told you at our last meeting, the winter was the fittest time for business; and truly I thought so, till my lord-treasurer assured me the spring was the best season for salads and subsidies . . . Some of you, perhaps, will think it dangerous to make me too rich; but I do not fear it, for I promise you faithfully, whatever you give me, I will always want; and although in other things my word may be thought a slender authority, yet in that, you may rely on, I will never break it. . . . I can bear my straits with patience; but my lord-treasurer does protest to me, that the revenue, as it now stands, will not serve him and me too. One of us must pinch for it, if you do not help me. . . . What shall we do for ships then? I hint this to you, it being your business, not mine. I know by experience I can live without ships. I lived ten years abroad without, and never had my health better in my life; but how you will be without, I will leave to yourselves to judge, and therefore hint this only hy-tho-by. I don't insist upon it. There is another thing I must press more earnestly, and that is this:—it seems a good part of my revenue will expire in two or three years, except you will be pleased to continue it. I have to say for it,—Pray, why did you give me so much as you have done, unless you resolve to give on as fast as I call for it? The nation hates you already for giving so much, and I will hate you too, if you do not give me more. So that, if you do not stick to me, you will not have a friend in England. . . . Therefore, look to it, and take notice, that if you do not make me rich enough to undo you, it shall lie at your door. For my part, I wash my hands on it. . . . I have converted my natural sons from Popery. . . . 'Twould do one's heart good to hear how prettily George can read already in the Psalter. They are all fine children, God bless 'em, and so like me in their understandings! But, as I was saying, I have, to please you, given a pension to your favourite, my Lord Lauderdale, not so much that I thought he wanted it, as that you would take it kindly. . . . I know not, for my part, what factious men would have, but this I am sure of, my predecessors never did anything like this, to gain the good-will of their subjects. So much for your religion; and now for your property. . . . I must now acquaint you, that by my lord-treasurer's advice, I have made a considerable retrenchment upon my expenses in candles and charcoal, and do not intend to stop, but will, with your help, look into the late embezzlements of my dripping-pans and kitchen-stuff, of which, by the way, upon my conscience, neither my lord-treasurer nor my Lord Lauderdale are guilty."

All this is very pleasant and facetious. But it seems Marvell's intrepid patriotism and witty writings rendered him extremely odious to the court, and especially to James, Duke of York, and heir presumptive to the crown. As already mentioned, he was frequently compelled to conceal himself out of dread of assassination. He died, however, to all appearance, peaceably in his bed, on the 16th August, 1678—the year in which his obnoxious work on the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government was published; but as he was in vigorous health immediately before, strong suspicions have been entertained that he was poisoned. We know of no evidence in support of these suspicions, so that, probably, there were no grounds for them, as we are all aware that strong and vigorous men have not unseldom died suddenly.

Aubrey describes Marvell as being in person "of a middling stature, pretty strong-set, roundish-faced, cherry-cheeked, hazel-eyed, brown-haired,"—the very figure of a jolly Yorkshireman. He adds, that in conversation he was modest and of very few words; and was wont to say, "he would not drink high or freely with any one with whom he could not trust his life." Who would? Of his collected works, we believe there is no complete edition. Cooke's edition, published in 1726, contains only his poems and some of his private letters. That of Captain Thompson, in three volumes quarto, published in 1776, is not considered quite complete, and is very indifferently edited. There may be other editions, but if so, they are unknown to the present writer. The "Life of Andrew Marvell, with Extracts from his Prose and Poetical Works, by John Dove," (1832), is, we believe, the fullest and most recent account we have of this distinguished patriot; and, perhaps, the passages selected will, to ordinary readers, prove the most interesting and agreeable portions of his writings.

"The characteristic attribute of Marvell's genius," says the Edinburgh critic already quoted, "was unquestionably wit, in all the attributes of which—brief sententious sarcasm, fierce invective, light railery, grave irony, and broad laughing humour—he seems to have been by nature almost equally fitted to excel. To say that he has equally excelled in all would be untrue, though striking examples of each might easily be selected from his writings. The activity with which his mind suggests ludicrous images and analogies is astonishing. He often absolutely startles us by the remoteness and oddity of the sources from which they are supplied, and by the unexpected ingenuity and felicity of his repartees. His forte, however, appears to be a grave ironical banter, which he often pursues at such a length, that there seems no limit to his fertility of invention. In his endless accumulation of ludicrous images and allusions, the untiring exhaustive ridicule with which he will play upon the same topics, he is unique; yet this peculiarity not seldom leads him to drain the generous wine even to the dregs, to spoil a series of felicitous raileries by some far-fetched conceit or unpardonable extravagance."

But whoever supposes Marvell to have been nothing but a wit, simply on account of the predominance of that quality, will do him great injustice. As the same writer remarks:—"It is the common lot of such men, in whom some one faculty is found on a great scale, to fail of part of the admiration due to other endowments; possessed in more moderate degree, indeed, but still in a degree far from ordinary. We are subject to the same illusion in gazing on mountain scenery. Fixing our eye on some solitary peak, which towers far above the rest, the groups of surrounding hills look positively diminutive, though they may, in fact, be all of great magnitude." Though wit was his most predominating endowment, the rest of Marvell's talents were all of a high order of development. His judgment was remarkably clear and sound, his logic ingenious and adroit, his sagacity in practical affairs admirable, his talents for business apparently of the first order, and his industry in whatever he undertook steady and indefatigable. He had all the qualities which would have enabled him to succeed in almost any department of exertion; while in regard to candour, strict integrity, and all the solid merits which render a man honourable and worthy, he was not surpassed by any man of his generation.

(1) Marvell's Works, vol. i. pp. 428, 429, as quoted in Ed. Rev. No. 159.

Marvell has some, though not very considerable reputation as a poet. His poems are, for the most part, quaint, fantastic, unsmooth in rhythm; but there are a few pieces which display both beauty of thought, and no indifferent elegance of expression. The "Emigrants in Bermudas," a "Dialogue between Body and Soul," "The Nymph complaining for the Death of her Fawn," and a "Dialogue between the Resolved Soul and Created Pleasure," though all more or less unequal, contain nevertheless many sweet and pleasant lines. Besides these, there are some satirical pieces, which though largely disfigured by the characteristic defects of the age, are upon the whole highly felicitous and amusing. A few lines from a whimsical Satire on Holland may not be unacceptable, by way of enlivening the growing dullness of the present paper:—

"Holland, that scarce deserves the name of land,
As but the off-scouring of the British sand;
And so much earth as was contributed
By English pilots when they heaved the lead;
Or what by th' ocean's slow alluvion fell,
Of shipwreck'd cockle and the muscle-shell;
This indigested vomit of the sea
Fell to the Dutch by just propriety.
Glad then, as miners who have found the ore,
They, with mad labour fish'd the land to shore;
And dived as desperately for each piece
Of earth, as if it had been of ambergrease,
Collecting anxiously small loads of clay,
Less than what building swallows bear away;

For as with pigmies, who best kills the crane,
Among the hungry he that treasures grain,
Among the blind the one-eyed blinkard reigns,
So rules among the drowned he that drains.
Not who first sees the rising sun commands:
But who could first discern the rising lands."

Though Marvell's works are now but little read, and are not unlikely to be by-and-by forgotten, there can be no question that they considerably modified the character of his own generation. With his keen weapons of satire, he did manful service in the cause of virtue, by assailing, and to some extent subduing various principalities and powers of despicability and corruption. By exposing and rendering contemptible the false, he vindicated and did honour to the True. Thus, he did not live his life in vain; nor did the influence of his activity or of his example, cease when his own existence terminated. Though dead, and imperfectly remembered, he nevertheless speaketh through that transmitted and ever-present power which belongs inseparably to goodness. The uttered word may cease to be repeated, but the spirit of truth, whose manifestation and embodiment it was, departs not out of the world, but like an invisible electric current, circulates with an enduring efficacy throughout the whole development of humanity.

Personally, Marvell is memorable mainly for his high integrity and moral worth. It is this which attracts, and will continue to attract the admiration of posterity, more than anything which he actually accomplished by means of his particular endowments. His steadfast and inflexible abidance by an individual uprightness and sincerity, when all the rewards and enticements of life thronged round him like syren shapes to beguile him into apostasy, is a grand and striking spectacle, the rarity and the beauty whereof will never fail to command the earnest homage of mankind. Admiring men have called him the "British Aristides," and certainly no other man connected with our history can be mentioned who has more honestly deserved the honour thus attributed.

THY WILL BE DONE.¹

BY GENERAL GEORGE P. MORRIS.

I.

SEARCHER of Hearts!—from mine crase
All thoughts that should not be,
And in its deep recesses trace
My gratitude to Thee!

II.

Hearer of Prayer!—oh, guide aright
Each word and deed of mine;
Life's battle teach me how to fight,
And be the victory Thine.

III.

Giver of All!—for every good
In the Redeemer came:—
For raiment, shelter, and for food,
I thank Thee in His name.

IV.

Father and Son and Holy Ghost!
Thou glorious Three in One!
Thou knowest best what I need most,
And let Thy will be done.

(1) This beautiful hymn was written by the author of the popular song, "Woodman, spare that tree." He presented it to Miss Catherine Hayes, by whom it has been sung at her recent concert in Boston, U. S.

NELLY NOWLAN'S EXPERIENCE IN SERVICE AND OTHER MATTERS.

COMMUNICATED BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"It's asy talking with you, so it is, Aunt Peggy; it's asy talking with you that had never the experience but of one sweetheart in ye'r born days—and he a bocher."

"He was no bocher, Nelly Nowlan," interrupted "Aunt Peggy;" "He was no bocher—he had the use of his limbs as well as yerself has the use of ye'r tongue; and that's limber and active enough for anything, I'm thinking."

"Well, it was blind he was, any way," said the caucy girl, laughing.

"Only of one eye, Nelly."

"And that was the eye always next you when you war courting—wasn't it?"

"I never courted, Miss Nelly Nowlan—I defy any man to say that I ever showed him favour or affection from one gale day to another. I defy any man to say whether I had black or blue eyes, for I never looked off my knitting or my straw plait, when a boy was in the place, but kept myself to myself, clane, dacent, and respectable—to be what I am."

And Aunt Peggy drew herself up, and looked even more demure than usual.

"To be what you are,—an ould maid that nobody cares for," said her niece, spitefully enough.

"That no onc cares for!" repeated poor Peggy, bending as closely over the grey worsted stocking she was knitting, as if she had dropped a stitch—"that nobody cares for, Nelly?—well—may be so!" There was a deep pathetic tone in her voice, and in another minute something very like a tear was glittering on the needles she plied with such unceasing industry.

Nelly, rosy and pouting, sat opposite her aunt; the half-twisted thread had fallen from her fingers, and her foot rested upon the step of her idle wheel. The wilful and the affectionate feelings of her bright, yet capricious nature, had but a short struggle; for before the quarter round of stitches were off the needle, she had flung her arms round her aunt's neck, and entreated forgiveness.

"And it's I that should not say the like of that to you, my own darling Auntie," exclaimed the repentant girl, "who took me from my dead mother's bosom, and slaved to rear me in decency and honesty, when my father never did a hand's turn to save me from starving. Oh, deelish-a-vooneen, forgive me!—I don't know what's come over me, that I'm grown so fractious and vicious in myself; I'm sure I do my best against it; I've fasted harder than ever this Lent, and sure enough it was asier fasting, than feasting on the potatoes, that have water enough in their hearts to bile themselves! I've been to the Priest's kneec, when as his Reverence knows the thrille of sin wasn't worth listening to—I double my prayers night and morning, and bite my tongue twenty times a-day, striving to keep it quiet. I lent my pumps to my cousin Anty, just that I mightn't be able to go to the hop at Larry Lacey's, because you said against it; and I found myself covering the buckle in my stocking-vamps, as if there never was a pump in the world!—Oh, Aunt Peggy!" added the young girl earnestly—"Aunt Peggy, a-coushla, it isn't me that's in it at all, or I could not have said that hard word to the only friend I have in the world!"

"The only friend?" repeated her aunt. "Why don't you marry Tom, at once, and have two friends: you'll never get such another chance, a clean likely boy—steady."

"Very steady," said Nell, relapsing.

"He ought to be steady at thirty."

"He'll never see the sunny side of thirty-five."

"With a farm of ten acres."

"Half bog, the other half mountain," interrupted the incorrigible Ellen.

"Two cows, a stone house, with fittings and furnishings as good as the priest's—the cleanest and finest pigs in the country, and"—

"A widow-man, with three soft children!" concluded Nelly.

"And what are you, to object to a widow-man, I wonder!" said her Aunt.

"I'm your own darling Nell!" was the reply, and then drawing herself up with an enormous increase of self-esteem, she added—"And if ye come to that, I'm good enough wife for any boy in the parish—though I don't think I'm very like the mother of three roaring, red-headed bog-trotters, the eldest almost as big as myself."

"Nelly, ma courneen gra, ye'll sup sorrow before ye'll be wise; ye'r mother was wilful, and your father was wild, and never kept in his own country."

"Well, Aunt," interrupted the girl, "the truth is, I'll never settle 'till I've seen something of the world; and before I marry Tom, if ever I do marry him, I'll just take a summer or two out of myself in England. I'll go as servant, lady's-maid, or house-maid, in some great family, where they give great wages, and come home like a queen, with money and means. I'll have more knowledge then, you know, to—to manage the—three children!" she added with a merry laugh.

Aunt Peggy stared, and Aunt Peggy wept; she had, in her humble way, high expectations of Ellen, like most Irish women.

She was a bad reasoner, but a fervent declaimer. She knew that Nelly had a brave bright spirit, which nothing could intimidate, and yet she pictured England in the way the poor Irish are taught to regard it, and the more dangerous she made it seem, the firmer became her niece's determination to seek her fortune, like some of the heroes she had read of in her story-books. She had a cousin married to a tradesman in Newcastle, and as many ladies in the neighbourhood had wooed Nelly to go to service, knowing how well she spun, and knit, and stitcheed, and made butter, and that every one invited her to assist at great bakings, and brewings, and "big washes," Ellen Nowlan entertained no doubt of finding it easy to obtain service in England, and by this means free herself from her aunt's importunities on the score of her marrying "Tom," a very kind worthy person, but who certainly had not touched either Nelly's heart, or Nelly's imagination. So after some delay, and many tears, she bade adieu to Ballincollig, and was kindly received by her cousin at Newcastle. The following letters are so characteristic of her acute and sunny nature, of her own prejudices and the prejudices she had to encounter, and her quick observance, that they are worth transcribing as a portion of poor Nelly's experience. She was no mean scholar, as will appear when she speaks for herself:—

"Newcastle, July.

"MY DEAR AUNT PEGGY, AND DEAR FRIENDS,
—I have been three months in this mighty grand place, which isn't a castle at all, but a town, dirty below, and grand above, which you will understand when I tell you that the streets are gravelled with coal-dust, and the houses stiff and stately above it, and there's no air in it at all at all—to call air—only smook; but, to be sure, as the craythurs don't know the differ, it makes no great matter. Sure it's they would get voices if they could have a blast of the Almighty's fresh wind, that comes over the mountain with the rising sun into our cabin door; it's that would teach them to spake good English, and take the suffocation away that burs like a bumble-bee in their throats. Oh! wisha, Aunt dear, but they are a discontented, thankless people, as you'll understand if you give me time to tell. I heard a great deal on the vessel about the 'strike' at Newcastle, and how bad and dangerous it was, and all to that, and, Lord have mercy on us (I said to myself), is it war they are going to with France or Amiracy? but I didn't like to ask, knowing that the English are so fond of calling us 'ignorant Irish.' Well, when I got to my cousin's, she was as glad as anything to see me. The next day she took me out with her to buy her bits of things; and as we went along, I thought I had never seen so many idle men together, barring at a 'Repale' Meeting, when, what with one thing and the other, the boys were always off their work for a week any way, though peaceable and quiet; but Aunt dear, to see these fine, big, well-fed men, well-dressed too, from head to foot, and they standing in twentys and thirtys, surprised me; and I asked what they were after, and Grace said, they were on 'the strike.'

"Oh, then, what hypocrites they are!" I says, 'just look at them, without sense or motion, and they so vicious in their minds, looking peaceable and innocent as lambs.'

"The strike,' she says, 'means that they'd no work.' 'Well,' I thought, 'that's not an Irish strike.' But, 'Why not?' I says, and she makes answer, 'Because they'r not paid enough.'

"Oh, murder," says I, 'and we that have idleness so often thrown in our faces, only complain when we can't get paid at all.'

"But what do you think they call bad pay?—

from eleven to sixteen shillings a-week, for seven hours' work for five days, with a house rent and tax free, a rale house with glass windows, and grates, and ovens that would delight your heart, in it, and a garden, and coal enough to roast meat for the wedding of a priest's niece, all for nothing! Think of that,—and more than that,—Grace says, though they say they have but eleven shillings a-week, they can make eighteen or twenty, and plenty of employ for their boys. Well, every word in my head was knoe't down my throat, with thinking of (if it was the Lord's will!) how unequally the world is divided! Twenty shillings a-week is fifty-two pounds a-year, and the house, garden, and coal to the back of it. Oh, yah wisha oge! bedad, many a minister, to say nothing of a priest, hasn't as much for teaching the right way, according to his knowledge; many a young squire sits on a hunter, and follows every man's hounds, with not the quarter as much; and hundreds of young ladies toss their heads, and expect the pick of the young men in the country, because of their being 'grate fortunes,' just on the remembrance that there was such a property in their family—once. They're a greedy people, and extravagant, the parish supports all their poor relations, and they eat meat every day. Oh, Aunt, think of our poor labouring men having fifty pounds a-year! If they didn't turn into gentlemen at once, and leave off work on the strength of the house rent-free, and the washings of coal, how thankful, and loving, and peaceable they'd be, and supporting all their poor relations, and the priest's dues, and the shilling now and again, to redeem their country, and the first at a Station, and powers of 'white eyes,' or the finest of 'kidneys' with herrings in Lent, and a bit of salt pork on Sundays, and turning out to first mass with their children, and plenty of 'em; but when I said this, that unnatural erythtur, Grace, made answer, 'it was our being so asily contint made the Irish such slaves.' I could not help saying that those who ever and always keep on worrying themselves about niceties, are slaves to a worse and a meaner thing than the patience that keeps hope in a neighbour by a cheerful countenance, and their own hope by waiting on the Lord's goodness. Sure, dear, it's a blessed thing to live one's life trusting in that which is all we have to take a grip of when the breath is laving us! But what bre ks my heart entirely, is the talk they keep on with about the Irish being extravagant. Wisha! at the very time that they say they can't live on as much in a week as a poor Paddy could earn by the slavery of his body and bones, heart and soul, in six, they'll talk of 'Irish extravagance.' Good luck to them! it would be a new thing for us to have anything to be extravagant with.

"They say we waste our time! I'll own to that. We do 'waste' our time, because we've nothing else to do with it. It hangs like a millstone round our necks, days and weeks and months crawling away with our lives. Crawl, crawl! and nothing to do. Give us anything to do, and we'll not waste our time.

"Oh, yah! but it's as I heard one say that knows; they let us get on with our faults, and then they punish us for them. To be sure.

"When I came to look at it, it came mighty sweet from Gracey's husband, to up with that, to poor Irish labourers, who have eightpence, tenpence, or in some places a shilling a-day, only in the sunny season, or when a landlord that hasn't enough to take him abroad, stops at home, and goes on with his improvements in the dead time of the year, when men are glad to work twelve hours for eightpence! Save out of that! and feed and clothe the wife and the grawleens out of it! no way of employing the children, nor even money to keep the wife's needles or wheel moving! Only forced to stop at home, tho gay, sprightly little colleen turned into the heart-broken wife. Oh, then, women are mad that marry, to see the man they loved above all, as I've known many, ould and crushed before his summer was come, and gone to his grave while his years were few in number, but heavy with sorrow and heart-broken; while the bit of dry potato sticks in his throat that he hasn't strength to swallow, and giving the rest of it to his children he strives to smile in the face he loves, and tells her he isn't hungry! I think more of them things than I used, and am thankfuller than ever to you, dear Aunt, for the good rearing you gave me, and all you taught me, and I'm not at all dispirited at being looked down upon by the ignorant because 'I'm Irish;' they have as quare ways here as anywhere else, only somehow when people get used to themselves, they can't see anything quare in what they do. Now isn't it mighty unnatural to wash clothes by the stone weight, as they do at Newcastle, and to calculate (great rich people) the bit you eat into your keep, setting the wages on one side, and the cost, ay, of a farthing, at the other side, to put on at the end. And isn't it quare to see a son siting fair and easy and comfortable with his pound a-week, by the fire, drinking his tea and eating his white bread and fresh butter, and his parents in a Union workhouse? And talking of blunders,—sure if ever there was a blunder that is one, to call the place a Union, where everything is disunited that the Almighty joins together. But though I'm not going to say they have no good in them, and though I'll own that they have all manner and kinds of headness and great knowledge, yet Aunt, agra! they need not be so fond of looking down upon everything only because it's not English. I've had my share of trials, looking for a place and able and willing to work, and with a character that's as bright as a diamond, and a heart that's as honest as the light and as clear as the water of a holy well, ready to give love, let alone gratitude, for employment. I haven't got a situation yet. Written characters won't be taken,—now isn't that quare, as if a body wouldn't rather spake a lie, than write it where it could be brought as evidence against ye at the day of judgement? I laid down my character as bright as a diamond in seven recommendations from the quality of our own place that knew me, as I could the lady, from the time I was the size of a turf. And seemingly not having much to do, she read them every one, and then fowlding them up very mannerly, she said, 'she didn't know the writers.' So I answered, 'I didn't think you did, ma'am, but you might if you'd just step over to Ballinacolly. Sorra a one of them that wouldn't be proud to see you.' I couldn't do less than that.

"And she said again, 'You wouldn't suit us.' And I felt my heart sink, and made bould to inquire why. And she said, 'Because you are Irish;' them was the words. My heart got up as high at that, as it had got low before; and for all her word was so hard, she was a fine countenanced woman, and had a power of amiability in her face. And so for the honour of old Ireland I made bould again, and says I, curtsying, 'I'm sorry not so much for myself, ma'am, as that you should have such a bad opinion of my country, and more than sorry that you have suffered by the Irish.'

"No," she says, 'I never suffered by them, for I never had any of them under my roof.'

"Well, a load went off me that minute."

"Thank God! my lady, that none of them ever disgraced their country with you, and it's better to be accused wrongfully than rightfully; the sin lies on those who deal unjustly, and those, ma'am, who gave you a hard notion of us mightn't judge as yerself would if ye tried us. I'll never deny my country, for I'm not ashamed of it, and I hope it will have no cause to be ashamed of me.' Well, she looked very earnest at me and not any way angry, for she is a rare gentlewoman, living as good as a mile out of the thickness of the place, and she says, 'The truth is, I am very particular, and my friends have had dirty and untidy Irish servants so often, that I do not like to venture.'

"And," I says, 'ma'am, have you never had any English with the same faults?' I don't know what made me so strong in myself, but it was Ireland's glory I was thinking of. So she answers open and honourable, with a smile like a sunbeam on her face, 'I can't say but I have,—very dirty, and very untidy.'

"You know that, my lady, of them," I says, curtsying again to make up for my freedom—"You know that of them, but you only heard it of us."

"Well, she smiled again, and an English smile has a dale of truth in it.

"It is unjust," she says, speaking again, as if to herself; and her eyes flew round the room from one to the other of the most useless bits of chayney you ever see,—unnatural animals of all sortings, that she had planked upon little daws by bits of tables that looked for all the world like a rickety babby that could not stand alone. And then she turned her eye at me, as well as to say, 'I wonder could you keep them clean?' 'It's a housemaid I want,' she says, doubting; and there are bright stoves. Did you ever clean bright stoves?'

"I've cleaned things as bright, ma'am," I said; for I thought of the beautiful shine I got on Mrs. Mulchay's fender, with oil and brick-dust, to say nothing of the gridiron I made as good as new.

"And these ornaments," she said, pointing to the chany.

"Oh, it isn't such trifles as them would make me fear my work, ma'am," I answered; "I can get over as much as any one, washing coorse and fine, butter making, and baking, dusting, sweeping, and scouring. I'd soon bring them yellow bits of chance to a colour, with silver-sand out of a running strame."

"Well, she smiled at this, but that smile wasn't like the last, for she said again, that she thought I would not do; but as for her chance, she always looked after that, herself. I told her I'd be sorry a mistress of mine should have the trouble of looking after anything. And in return she observed, that I seemed ready and willing, but I had a deal to learn; and says she, 'The only thing for you is to go as under housemaid or with a working mistress, who would teach you the English ways; it will not do to rub foreign china with silver-sand.'

"I thought the scuse would leave me at the iday of going under a servant. I had heard that an English lady is often kind to an Irish girl; but the English of her own sort take cruel jealousy in their heads against them, so I said nothing,—only wished her good morning.

"It would hurt you, Aunt dear, if I told you how often my country is thrown in my teeth, by those who know nothing about it,—who take up the cry, just as one dog barks, because another dog began it; even when they advertise for servants, they say at the end, 'No Irish need apply.'

"I have been for many a ten hours, around and about, willing to work for half wages—for no wages almost, if I could get a place; and if it wasn't for the pride, which I don't mind owning to you, who understands it, I'd have gone home long ago—the pride, and the desire I have to learn. Though we are above owning it, we like to learn. It is now about eight days since I was asking at a grocer's where Grace deals for her quarter of sugar and two ounceys of tea, if they knew of a situation, when a respectable, responsible looking ould gentelwoman inquired also, if they were acquainted with any stout, strong, brave, able young woman, tall and active, who could help her to wait on a lady that had an accident. 'I'm nurse to her,' she said, 'but I'm not able to lift or turn her, and she can't help herself—I'd want her to do all that—and sit up—and wake me to give the medicine; one that wouldn't mind a little fever, if it should come, which the doctor says is likely.'

"'Would I do?' I says, 'I'm five feet seven in my stocking-feet—I'm never sick, sad, or sorry,—and as I never took "the fever," though I've seen many through it, praise be to God! I've no need to fear it.' Well, she took to me at once—and the quare-looking grocer's wife, that never in her born days gave me a civil answer, now spoke for me like a Christian.—

"'I'll ensure her being ready for work—civil and good tempered,' she said, 'and as to her country—of course we'd all be born in England if we could; but she's as quiet and peaceable as if she'd never been in Ireland.' So I thanked her, for she meant it kindly, but it was on the top of my tongue, to say, I wouldn't be born anywhere but just in the little cabin I was, and to ask her, if she thought Irish women went about the world with shillalas ready for a 'strike'; but I held my whislt, for she meant nothing but compliment and kindness, and the English always think it's the highest compliment they can pay you, to say you'r like themselves,—and dear, it's best to take people as we find 'em, and to remember that though the Lord did not make us all alike, there's some of Himself in every one that bears His image through this world of trial.

"So I thanked the grocer, and the nurse and her had some colloging together, and I heard the shop-keeper say—'It's too little to offer any one that stands on two legs,—honesty is honesty, and fair is fair, Mrs. Jones; but I'd have gone for anything sooner than keep on as I was, for the Irish here and the Irish at home ain't quite the same. If they'd stick together here, they'd carry the world before them; but they don't, and I'm sorry to say, there's some of them like any music better than the voice of a countrywoman, and so, I agreed with a blessing to every thing. And who do you think the lady was, that met with the accident? The very same that smiled so brightly, and took an objection to the Irish, and to my claining the foreign chayney with the silver-sand!

"Oh, then, it was weary for her to be laying there with none but Mrs. Jones to speak to—that hadn't a word in her—and a doctor all black, and diamond pins, tending her once a day! feeling her pulse, and telling her to 'keep quiet,' the lone cry-thur, that couldn't stir! And when the poor thing spoke to me, nurse grew jealous, and wouldn't let me in the room, barring she was asleep, or wanted for what she could not do herself;—and I'd have had no consolation, if it hadn't been dusting and fixing the bits of chayne, and keeping an old divil of a contrary parrot quiet, and combing a lap-dog, that is as knowledgeable as a Christian,—and, sure it's asy to lift the crathur about.

"She's like a feather, (the lady;) and seeing that hardly any one calls on her, barring a carriage that leaves a bit of pasteboard at the door, just to show it's tittle. I asked the cook—(that hasn't done a hand's-turn since I came to the house, but what I've done for her)—had Miss Durhan (that's her name) no people?—It was ever so long before she understood I meant relations—and what do you think?—the unnatural erythur, that's eat her bread, and been warmed by her fire, and sheltered by her roof, these three years, if she didn't tell me, that she neither knew nor cared! She has a fine place, and lashings of money, and everything the world can give; and yet, somehow, there doesn't seem any heart in the neighbours towards her; but dear, people live next door to each other, and meet every day in this place, and yet are no neighbours,—now isn't that quare?"

"I've a dale more to tell, though I can't tell it now;—the nurse was quite surprised to find I could write—and the cook works me hard, with her love-letters to a banksman, who can't afford to marry her until he gets more than eighteen shillings a-week!—tell that to James Coyne, who married the widow Nolan, because she had three shillings, and he wanted them! I may be turned away to-morrow, though I'm certain sure it wouldn't be by Miss Durham, who told me yesterday, with a smile on her face, that looked for all the world like a Christmas sunbeam, so weak and pale it was,—not to scrub the chayneys with silver-sand. Poor thing!—she little thinks the hard time I have of it, or the things I see: all I can do, is my duty, putting my trust in the Lord above! And don't let on that I've had my own troubles and heart-scalds to any one, particularly to Tom, or his people—poor Tom! We'll, anyhow, when the trouble is heaviest on me, I remember I'm not tied to it for life, and if I'd been tied to him, the grass would have been green on my grave now—and what harm if it had? Sure, it's where the soul is, not the poor dust and ashes, that makes the matter!

"And now, may the blessing of the Almighty be about you night and day! May the Lord's grace soften sorrow, and his mercy turn all displeasure from your door! Think of me in the strange land, when on ye'r bended knees! If I suffer hardship, it's my own fault. I'm tould that there's fine air in some parts; and when the poor gentlewoman can be moved, they talk of finding her better air. I don't know anything that's before me, only death, that's before us all, though we so seldom think of it; and it's hard to think of leaving this world, and the faces that have the sunshine of kindness!—but I'll say no more; for my heart's full, sonchaw, and I want more courage to end my letter than I did to begin it. Good-bye!

"Mavourneen gra! and the bracket-hen; don't forget the black pepper rowled in a taste of fresh butter, if she has any return of the pip; the young turkeys have got their red heads before this, so they're safe—and the poor ould pusheen cat! don't forget the sup of sweet milk for her—and take care of yourself, darling, for you're all I have to love in earnest, or that loves me, in the big world; and if any one asks after me, say I'm making thousands, which I will be, please God, soon! and that Newcastle flogs Ireland for beauty—but no, don't say that; say, that for all I've seen, Ireland, God bless her! flogs the world; and poor Tom! tell him I wish him a good wife, and a good mother for his children. I'll have something to say in my next will surprise you.

"Whisht!—the nurse is fast asleep, and so I'll go sit by the mistress's door for fear she'd want anything. Oh then, to think of a lady that could, breakfast on crown-pieces, if they'd do her any good, trusting to such watching as mine! there isn't an eye waking this blessed minute in the house, but hers and mine; and the ould nurse goes mad if she thinks I give her a drink, unless she bids me!

"The Lord be about you, once more; the goodbye must come to all things, as well as the end of a letter! and it's the hardest word I've written this week, but there it is again,—

"Good-bye in earnest. So no more at present from "Your loving and dutiful Niece,

"ELLEN NOWLAN.

"Widow Leary has a fine chance of Tom now. She said the strangers would crush my heart, but I'm not crushed—I'll be a bright girl yet, please God; so don't fret about me, even if my heart was breaking. There's not a woman in the place knows how many cuts should go to a dozen of spun flax, and they've no taste in quilting and knitting.—Whisht!—I must go now."

(To be continued.)

MADEMOISELLE RACHEL AND MISS CUSHMAN.

BY MADAME DE MARGUERITES.

It is impossible, in witnessing the performance of Charlotte Cushman, not to be reminded of Rachel; and, though in many things they are dissimilar, yet the effect of their appearance is the same—riveting the attention and interesting the mind from the first moment they come before you. The influence of that earnest and steady glance they both possess, lushes at once to silence every trivial thought: then the deep tones, conveying a meaning in each syllable, arouse the elevated instincts of our nature; an awe, far above that felt for earthly potentates, comes over us; unconsciously the memory of heroic deeds, lifting us far above the dross of the wearing world, fills our soul. With eye uplifted, heart expanded, nerved to generous impulses alone, we feel, we recognise that we are in the presence of genius—genius that came from heaven, but now rarely seen in a world possessed by a small, well-educated and self-satisfied array of petty talent. Not that genius does not visit the earth; but like the ermine, rushing all eager from her lair, it shrinks from the mire through which it must wade to reach celebrity. From this genius turns in sadness to its home—there, deep in its heart, burying its powers and aspirations, communing only with the heaven to which it tends, in solemn calm and silence there it dies.

Both Rachel and Cushman, endowed with a strong will, as well as high genius, have obtained the place they hold by long and arduous struggles. Neither possesses the one element to woman's celebrity, personal beauty; so that in describing them to one who has never seen either, a negative is the answer to almost every question usually asked about an actress; the public having got out of the habit of expecting anything put prettiness and grace in the mere conventional representatives of the dramatic poet's inspiration.

As a whole, perhaps, Rachel and Miss Cushman would not act a play alike—they are of different countries, have different educations, different associations; but there are touches of the same passions which, though in different dramas, are so much alike as to be almost miraculous. In vain the Atlantic divides and countries differ; genius knows no limits and but one language—that of truth and inspiration.

There is a play in which Miss Cushman rarely appears, and perhaps for many reasons. As a whole, the play is unsuited to her. This play is "Love." There are real home touches of truth and genius in this, which none have perhaps taken the trouble to analyse, which would, if noticed, have revealed the exquisite delicacy of the conception and delineation. In the scene where the Countess reveals her love to Ilou, Miss Cushman attains the very highest and most refined range of art. That our feelings are not outraged, our habitual associations shocked, but that, on the contrary, all our sympathies are aroused, our respect and pity enlisted for this woman who oversteps the modesty of nature, is owing to the thorough sweetness and truth of the actress, to the tender delicacy she infuses into this one cry of a passion long pent up in a proud and bustling heart. So in Phèdre, the revolting character of the scene where she reveals her passion to Hippolytus, is lost in the struggling feelings of latent modesty and rising remorse which Rachel infuses into the bold declaration which, almost in spite of a better nature, seems to fall from her lips.

Phèdre was a heathen heroine, and intended by Euripides and Racine to appeal to all our compassion as a victim of the vengeance of the gods; therefore Rachel has profoundly studied tradition and history in showing the struggle between the woman and the relentless fate which urges her on; though she has entirely swerved from stage tradition (that which has clogged and crushed so many aspirations) in not making this scene from end to end one whirlwind of passion. Here again Charlotte Cushman has had the same inspiration, though it assumes a different form. Pride—the pride of woman and of high birth—combines to make the tender avowal difficult. Miss Cushman's reserve of manner—almost entire absence of gesture, while her words are warm and gushing—the utter shame which bids her, when she ceases, bury her woman's blushes in her hands—are all such minute yet masterly touches, which render the conception of the scene one of the great proofs of her genius and her versatility. That the mind which could conceive the fierce heroism of Meg Merrilies, and make the audience quail beneath her wild fury, should conceive, trace and impersonate the holiest and gentlest, yet the tenderest of woman's sentiments, is even in the annals of the gifted, remarkable. But people now-a-days go to see a play to learn the plot, to wait for one or two grand points and effects; not to follow closely each delineation of the passions before them, as all contributing and leading to the catastrophe, and testing and displaying the profound study and genius of the artist.

In this has Rachel had less to contend with than the American actress. She appeals to an audience in whom, from the highest to the lowest, the dramatic taste is inherent; an impulsive, imaginative and passionate people—ever ready to identify themselves with the drama, and capable of concentrating their attention exclusively on the characters and scenes before them. She acts, too, before an audience educated to attach importance to dramatic art, as perpetuating the memory of glorious deeds, cultivating poetry and eloquence by rendering the flowers of language familiar, and rousing the better feelings of our nature, (which the dross and dust of the world would so often scar over,) by appealing to our sensibilities, our intellect, and our hearts. She, too, plays to critics deep-learned in history, deep-skilled in metaphysical analysis—critics who have studied art and are there to guide or to restrain—critics whose art has a mission as high and distinguished as that of the artist himself—never making it a trade animated only by the sound of tinkling metal, which on every superlative sets a price.

But Charlotte Cushman, though she knows that but the louder tones of her voice will reach the masses, plays as though the whole artistic world were listening.

Led on by genius, she loses sight of others' approval, and plays as she is inspired. Both Rachel and Charlotte Cushman have left tradition far behind them—for often they have found tradition at variance with feeling and truth. The world has changed since majestic princes and princesses stalked on the scene in flowing robes and talked of griefs too high for human sympathy. Heroines no longer need to tear their hair or dash them to the earth to rouse our dormant griefs. Now, in these stirring times, the drama sits at our hearth, the passions germinate in our teeming brain, breathe in our beating hearts; it wants not sock nor buskin to move us now. The sad, deep tones of despondency, the occasional outburst of grief, the impulsive but natural gesture, the simple and solemn language of truth, now find their way to move our natures, even when but retracing the commonplace occurrences of every-day life, now become both fatal and dramatic by the effects of a civilization which has found the material world unprepared for its gigantic strides.

To follow both Rachel and Charlotte Cushman through all their impersonations would be too long an indulgence. One more example of the resemblance of their instincts, and we have done. Again the example is in Phèdre—the dying scene as contrasted with that of Katharine of Aragon, in "Henry VIII."—and the scene is the most impressive of both plays—the death-scene. Katharine the Queen, oppressed by persecution, worn by slow malady, the lines of age and death marked on every feature of her face, is slowly borne into our presence. Those who have stood beside the death-bed of a beloved parent, and watched the slow approach of that crisis which is for ever to end all sufferings, will instantly recall that hour when they watched the expiring Queen before them. The languid head, seeking the support of the pillow, the husky voice, the uneasy movements of the hands, the pale and hollow cheek, are all true, too true, to nature. Thus Rachel in "Phédre," arrested, in the full force of youth and health, by the poison which circulates in her veins, her eye already glazing, her cheek pallid, her voice all changed, with faltering step is led on to die. Both the christian and the heathen queen have done with the world—that they have to say to those around is but a last duty in which they take no part—but one thought, at last, recalls the past to both. With the holy and resigned christian woman, whose duties and affections had united, it is the remembrance of her child which animates the worn-out frame; a smile like a mild moonbeam once more plays over those features, and the voice, though plaintive, is yet sweet and clear. Yet 'tis but for a moment, and then she returns her thoughts to heaven, her mind to eternal rest. So Phédre, exhausted by passion, tortured by bodily pain, falters out slowly, word by word, the confession of her passion and her crime; but as she speaks, her thoughts recur to that time when, sheltered by deep woods, she watched the swift car of Hypolitus flying before her admiring gaze; then, with this passion which has been her fate, again the eye kindles, again the voice grows firm and loud, her strength returns; and following still her visions, with extended arm, nostrils dilated, and glance of fire, she rises from her chair. But the vision fades, the fictitious powers vanish, and she falls exhausted back to her place in agony and despair, to give to the infernal gods her unquiet spirit.

How like, and yet how different, is the same thought which, moulded to the fashion of the character and circumstance, inspired both these women of genius! Time will scarcely mar any of the qualities of either of these great actresses. Europe has not tired of Rachel, and both America and Europe are always ready to welcome Miss Cushman: but when years and years are gone by, they will still be remembered—because the impression, on seeing both, is like an event of one's life—and as such will be related by the old to the younger, and thus their genius will live for ever.

Chronicle of Ethelfled.

IN SIX BOOKS.

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE.

[THE authenticity of this Chronicle, which we have only collated with that of Asser, is highly questionable; and we do not hold ourselves responsible for its correspondence with any other monkish manuscript. Doubts have been raised concerning the genuineness even of Asser's work, from which we derive nearly all the information we possess, and are accustomed to believe, of our glorious king; the reader must, therefore, take both of these authors on their own merits, and believe as much or as little of them as he chooses, since we have neither time nor occasion for the question. . . . There seemed no reason why the Chronicle of our good abbess should not be rendered into the modern vernacular, save in the occasional use of an archaistic expression which had 'no incongruity nor unnatural strangeness,' when sanctioned by her own evident use of a Saxonism badly Latinized.]

BOOK FIRST.

FORASMUCH as sundry persons have taken in hand, whether with or without reason, to set forth in order the notable things which in divers times and places have happened, it seems good also to me, Ethelfleda, Abbess of this poor house of St. Audrey, to record certain events, for causes that will in fit season appear.

I Ethelfled, second daughter of Athelred, surnamed Mucil, Earl of the Gainsi,¹ was born in the year of our Lord's incarnation 858. My sister Ethelswitha was by five years my elder. Now it came to pass, about a week after her first coming into this naughty world, that my mother had a dream concerning her, somewhat after the fashion of the patriarch Joseph, to the effect that the child newly born should eventually be set up on high, and that her father, mother, and kindred should do homage to her, which in due time came to pass. And this gives me occasion to think that dreams are not always mere phantasies of the brain, but that on occasions suited for the discernible action of a superior intelligence, visions of forthcoming events are sometimes disclosed to the inward and spiritual sight.

By reason of the frequent incursions of the pagans, who laid hands alike on live stock, arms, chests of plate, and noble damsels, my father was fain to commit my sister and me to the care of an aunt, who was Superior of one of the very few religious houses left in Mercia for the refuge of holy and highborn virgins. This was about the time of the good King Ethelbert's death. Ethelred his brother then reigned over West Saxony in his stead. That was in the days of our King Buhred. It mattered very little to my sister and me who reigned, as long as mother Gundred let us see her hive the bees and take the honey. Ethelswitha was fairer and more facetious than I, therefore the greater favourite; and being by so many years my elder, had many pleasures and indulgences which I had not; but, on the other hand, I had many pleasures too, all to myself. For instance,—fabling certain flowers to talk to one another and to me, and to tell of their how and about. Also fancying certain trees and patches of chalk on the hill-side into images of dragons and ghosts until I was sore ydrad, and yet feeling a strange mixture of pleasure and trepidation in going up to the dragon's mouth with a handful of grass, and saying, "Dragon, will you bite me?" and then running away. There were certain peep-holes through the oak-pulings, and dark corners among the tree-roots, that I should have been sorry if any had wist of except myself. Once, lying under a hollow oak, I seemed to feel the faeries pulling at my hair, that they might get withinside of it. One of my peep-holes looked into our burial-ground. I knew defunct persons lay there, their faces all turned upward; and my aunt the Abbess told me their souls went to heaven. I thought if I kept a sharp look-out, I should see some of them going there, on a starry night, if any of the nuns would but die.

There was a sister who, I think, was as learned as Leobgitha, the correspondent of Boniface. She was always making enigmas and poring over manuscripts.

(1) Gainsborough.

Of her I acquired my facility of writing, which the king says is remarkable; but, in regard of its neatness, I am always at the mercy of my pen:—however, I now always have a good one.

About the year 869, my sister and I were sent home. Thenceforth, my father, mother, and Ethelswitha were much at court; but, by reason of my tender years, I went not. After one of these their visits, it was currently reported among us that Alfred, Prince of the West Saxons, whose sister had married our king, would shortly come to see our chase. The best tablecloth was washed, and many dishes were cooked; howbeit, he came not. The fewer, the better cheer; and I was less disappointed than was Ethelswitha. This time, she told me so many fine things about the court, that when they all returned to it, which they shortly did, I felt for the first time lonely. They had made a pretty clear larder before they went, and I was left nominal mistress of the household, both servile and freed, but with very little to do, except to see a stag now and then put his head out of the forest. They might have been gone three hours, and I was eating bread and honey, when there winds me a horn at the gate, and, lo you, Prince Alfred come by himself, and nobody to receive him. Eadwulf took his horse and his spear, and Urfried washed his feet; but what could we do? The best tablecloth in the buck-basket, no fresh meat in the larder, nor had I even the key of the cellar. There were eels in the dike; and a goose hung by the wall, if he would have waited to have it boiled: howbeit, he made light of all, said bread and honey was fit for a king, especially when the bread was warm and the honey fresh from the comb; and Adam's wine was better than mead or metheglin for a water-drinker like himself, who slummed wine and eyder like John the Baptist. I was glad to find him so easy to please; indeed, had never lighted on so cheerful and winsome a young gentleman; and, having seen but few gentlemen before, whether young or otherwise, by reason of our retired living, I shortly lost all fear, forgot he was a prince, and made him welcome to what we had, as freely as if I had known him twelve years, that is to say, my whole life. He asked me how I came to be so small for my age. But I could not tell. He asked me if I could read, if I said my prayers, if I loved bread and honey, and if I were afraid of him. To the three first, I said yes, to the last, no. He said that was right, and arose pushing aside the yldestan-setl, and bade me good speed, and bear in mind King Solomon's saying, "To eat much honey is not good;" and so departed. But, when he had mounted, his horse reared at our white owl that suddenly flew out of its hole, and threw the prince, whom we picked up with his bright hair all dabbled with blood, and brought into the house. He did not seem to regard it much, but gave his orders to one and the other with wonderful precision; and, being laid on a double sett, Urfried and I washed and bound up his wound as we best could, and two of our freed-men rode off to advertise the king, and bring back my father and mother. Hereabouts, I Ethelfled must relate that Urfried's fear of approaching the blood royal had at first been so oppressive and unwise-like, that she had thrust me forward into office more cowardly than a woman of her years needed to have been; but, as soon as she found the prince affable, would have made my tender age a reason for setting me aside and stepping into my place. Howbeit, his grace settled it by desiring she should instantly make him a dish of frumenty, and stir it herself all the while it boiled; and then he bade me sit over-against him on a tripod stool, keep an eye to his bandages, and nurse him the best I could; observing that he always found himself the better for a great deal of attention.

And hereupon ensued a discourse, wherewith I have frequently recreated my nuns by repeating it to them. Poor maids! they sometimes get a little dull, specially between Whitsuntide and Christmas, when there are no great festivals; and I find nothing sooner brings all things straight than a little innocent conversation, chiefly in the infirmary, where a good many find themselves in the fruit and pulse season, and a good many more contrive to be nurses. We should never forget we were once young ourselves.

After I had held my peace a good while, the prince asked me if I could tell him a story. Thereupon I put it to him whether he would have Morvidus and the dragon, or Corineus and the great giant Goëmagot. In reply he said, that when he had heard both, he would make his choice. So I told him first one, and then the other, and proceeded to ask him whether he thought there had ever been a dragon. He said, yes, there was one always going about, seeking whom it could devour. I said I hoped it would never come my way. He said, oh yes, it would, sooner or later; I must mind what I did, or even thought, or he would swallow me at a snap. So then I found who he meant.

I asked him whether he would not like to see a fairy. He said he had seen one once: he was riding one day, all alone, through a dark, glooming wood, when he came upon a bright, green glade; and there, very much to his surprise, he saw a fairy. I could not help drawing a little nearer to him on this, to ask him what the fairy was like. He said, like a woman, only a very small one, with a lily skin, and long silky hair, and dressed in blue. I said I thought they always wore green. He replied, "Why, they do say so, but this one had a cyrtle just like yours, with a little darn in the hanging sleeves, from her leaning on her elbows." So then I said, Oh . . . ! and was a little ashamed; for I found he meant me.

He asked me what I would give to see a giant. I said, a good deal. He said, that was no answer at all—would I give the next handsome present I expected to have, whatever it might be? After some thought, I said yes, provided I were out of harm's way. He said, Ah, he had been thinking of giving me something very costly, in return for my civility to him, but now he would keep it for himself, and take me with him to fight the Danes, for he understood they had just landed a giant as big as Goliath, very fond of human flesh, especially when young and tender; whose fist was heavier than a hundred sledge-hammers, and his foot as large as this . . . here he drew the outline of a foot about a yard long in the air; his cloak was fringed with kings' beards and ladies' tresses; and there was a yard or so of fringe yet wanting. He should like to go out against him like David the son of Jesse, and bring him down with a pebble. He'd teach giants to come to England!

I said, I marvelled that the Dances dared intrude on us as they did. He said, "Why, I suppose you know we are only intruders ourselves. What fellowship have we with the old Britons whom we have hunted into the Cambrian dens and fastnesses? Surely you have heard of wicked Vortigern, king of the Britons, who first invited us over, under Hengist and Horsa; and how, when the pagan Hengist, (for we were all pagans then,) came into his Christian presence, he said, 'I regret your ungodliness, but am glad of your coming.' King Vortigern ought to have known better, but he was much given to drinking and sleeping, whereas our Hengist, pagan though he was, was a brave and fine fellow, standing seven feet high, as I have been told by one who never saw him. But Vortigern was nidering, and deserved the end he had, which was to be smothered with smoke in his fastness, like a wasp in his nest."

After some farther parley on this and that, he called for another story. I said, I have told you two, you must now tell me one. He said, "Two? you have told me a hundred!" I said, "How can that be?" and, just then, my father and mother came in, somewhat to my regret; they having met some one on the road who told them of Prince Alfred's visit, which caused them to turn back. They fell to condoling and excusing; and the prince said there was no need; he had been so deftly tended by the handiest little chamber-boy he had ever met with in all his life. Thereupon my mother looked grave, saying I had commonly been accounted silent; which indeed was true enough, and I wist not how my tongue had on this occasion become loosed. But there was something about him, methinks, that thawed all hearts. My mother applied all-heel and wound-wort to his head; and I kept near him all I could; but Ethelswitha approached him not, only questioned me straitly at bed-time, of all he had said, so that we spent half the night in talking.

It was Ethelswitha's wont to take me on her knee, and with her silver comb to comb out my hair, which was not nearly equal, in length, to her own; her locks being, indeed, as long and yellow as Queen Guinever's. Seeing me hold something fast in my hand, she sayeth, "What have you there?" I laughed, and would make her guess; at length, said, "Some of the prince's hair which we cut off to wash his wound." "His hair?" then-cries she, "what are you going to do with it?" I said, "Make a ball of it." "Oh, silly, silly child," she then cries, "forsooth you must give it me, I will find a better use for it." But I closed my fingers fast on it, and said, "What shall you, then, do with it?"

After a pause, she said, "Use it in place of gold thread, to embroider a kerchief for the Virgin." So I gave her all but one long, pale brown curl, which I have even now, (for it is not every one can show a lock of the hair of King Alfred,) but, in truth, Ethelswitha kept not her vow, for the Virgin's kerchief has never been embroidered from that day to this.

Next morning, I was summoned to my mother, who was sitting surrounded by her maids. "Child," says she, "Urfried tells me there was a bare larder yesterday, which I partly apprehended, though enough went down from the hall, I should have thought, to have kept you for a week. However, twice-warmed meats are not for a royal table: and yet his grace informed me over-night, you had feasted him like a king! What am I to believe?"

My heart smote me when I bethought me of the havock we two had made, and I cried hastily, "In troth, mother, 'twas he emptied the honey-pot rather than I, he laid it on so thickly; and I dared not say him nay!" My mother could not forbear smiling; saying, as she tapped me on the cheek, "Well, you seem to have saved the credit of the house."

Before noon, that day, there was a dinner prepared that might have been set on King Arthur's round table. I peeped through a chink, and saw Ethelswitha present the basin, and my father carve the venison, and my mother kiss the cup. Howbeit, the prince only touched it with his lips; so demand was made for spring-water, which, amid so many sweet and spiced beverages, had never been provided; and, every hand being busy, Urfried gave me a pitcher, and bade me run down to the spring, which I gladly did. By the spring sate an old man, tuning a harp. I bade him make way, because I was in haste for water for Alfred the prince. He said, "Is Prince Alfred here?—then I will into earshot of him, for he loves the sound of a harp . . ." and, following me up to the house, he commenced playing at the gate, and was soon let in. In truth, the afternoon proving rainy, and the prince drinking no wine, nor playing at tæfel, scaccorum, nor any game of hazard, this old harper's arrival was very opportune, for he went on, from one ballad to another, as if his head were lined with them, and Alfred the prince was hugely pleased; in special with one that told how Baldulf got into King Arthur's camp, disguised as a glee-man, and, while he was harping, learned all he wanted to know, without ever being found out. He called it a good stratagem.

At length the prince asked the harper if he had ever heard of the song of Cwædmon. "That have I, my prince," returned the minstrel; "and can sing it, too: how that some of the angels kept not their first estate, but fell into perdition, because they would have shared glory with the Highest; and how He made for those perfidious an exiled home. Sweet as honey is that stave describing their first bliss:—

"They were very happy,—
Sin they knew not,
Nor to frame crimes;
But they in peace lived.

Also, how the earth and stars came to be created out of nothing; and how the first man and woman, beautiful as angels, dwelt in Eden-garden: 'tis a song-o'-Sunday!"

"Sing me as much as you can of it," says the prince, "and I will presently give you this gold bracelet."

"I dare say your glory knows," pursued the harper, (who was a Cornish man; his name was Timme:) "how holy Aldhelm availed himself of this our vocation to instruct the lower sort, and took his stand on the public bridge, like a common harper, to win the ears of the foot-passengers by intermingling gay and grave matters." . . .

"Aye! believe ye," interrupted the prince; "I have heard all about him a hundred times; but now begin your song, or you will not conclude till midnight."

* * * *

The following year, (568,) there befel a grievous murrain among all cattle; and after the murrain, a famine throughout the land; and after the famine, a pestilence; so that the hand of the Lord was heavy upon man and beast. It was lamentable to see the dead bodies left by the way-side, with none to cover them out of the reach of birds and dogs. The poor people might be seen ravening on half-putrid flesh, and eagerly devouring the cresses and ramps that grew in the ditches; which unwholesome diet was enough of itself, my mother thought, to account for the pestilence. But the failure of the crops was a manifest visitation of God; and as He foreknew that the scarcity of wholesome diet must needs drive the people to eat that which was pernicious and unclean, the sickness, to my mind, was an indirect chastisement from him too. We gat much to our knees in prayer; and Ethelswitha, who was very soft-hearted, prayed my mother to let her have all the bones, scraps, and broken food from our table, to seethe into pottage for the poor, and dispense at our own gate, which my mother willingly did, and thereby drew down on our house many a poor soul's blessing. And it befel that, one forenoon, Ethelswitha and I, having provided a larger mess than usual, and carrying it forth to the folk at the gate, steaming, and very savoury, there appears Alfred the prince standing among the rest, looking fixedly upon Ethelswitha, who at first marked him not; and presently, without more ado, he steps up, and kisses her before all; an unfair thing, for even a king's son to do, seeing she could not defend herself by reason of the full bicker. And the people, with one accord, set up a shout, as if it were the jolliest sight eyes ever saw, to the great shame of Ethelswitha.

The prince dined and supped with us, and told us of many things he had seen in Rome when he was a knicht;¹ and talked, and harped, and sang, and did more to entertain us than we could do to entertain him: in special, as Ethelswitha was quite dull all the afternoon. But I was full blythe, and at last he fell to talking with me more than any: only, it befel, that while we were cracking and eating some nuts, he paused of a sudden, and I looked up and saw his lips quite white, or rather blue, and a cold, grey shadow on his brow. I cried, "Oh, mother!" and she arose in haste, saying, "What ails you, sweet prince?" And commenced rubbing his hands. But, presently, he smiled, and said, "This prick at the heart is passing off . . . it is all for my good!" Howbeit, there was no more merry-making that afternoon, but we sat closer and quieter, and looked more earnestly at one another, and talked of prayers, and saints, and penances, and heavenly chastenings, and earthly probations, and celestial refreshings; and I think the latter end of that day was better than the beginning. He spent two days with us; and on the evening of the second day, he took my father aside, and had long speech of him: we concluded, concerning the pagans, who seemed drawing together in Northumbria, upon some mischief. It may, or may not, have been so; howbeit, my father came forth from the conference with a strange mixture of care and elation on his brow; and the prince was much flushed, and sprang on his horse, that had long been pawing the ground at the gate. As he rode off, he cried, laughing:—

"I am now one of your family by the law of the land, for I have slept two nights under your roof; and, if I do any wrong on the king's highway, you will be answerable for it!"

"That be my care, sweet prince!" returns my father, cheerily: "May I never have a more dangerous *cuman*² under my roof! Return when you will, whether in company or scorchless."

He was out of sight before one could say Ave. To bed we went, but not to sleep: as for myself, I lay awake, thinking over all the brave things I had heard, and ejaculating inwardly, "Happy they who hold thy stirrup and water thy horse! happier they that carve before thee at table and hear thy pleasant voice!" As for Ethelswitha, though we were in the dark, and she lay long quite still, I had an impression that she was weeping; so, to make sure, I kissed her, and found her face quite wet. I asked her why she wept; she answered, she could not tell me, because she did not know herself. So there was an end, only I took care not to worry her by my own wakefulness, and lay a musing of P nee Alfred in the streets of Rome, till somehow, or ever I was ware, I fell on sleep.

I must now mix public affairs with private, because of those pagans, the Danes, whom the East Anglians having with great pusillanimity received and set on horseback, with less anxiety for the general welfare than for their own particular safety, they had established themselves in Northumbria. The news now came that the invaders, not content with having seized the city of York, were advancing upon us Mercians; and, indeed, they followed so closely on the heels of the news, that before we well wist they were on the move, they had taken possession of Nottingham, which the Romans well called "the house of caves." For the town is sheltered by a huge rock, perforated with numerous caverns and passages, some of which pierce it even to the summit, doubtless wormed in it by the people of some obscure age, whom, in these modern times, we have altogether lost sight of; and there is a spring of water above as well as below, which makes this rock a notable stronghold in time of war, and doubtless will continue to do so while the world lasts. Now it fell, that so soon as the pagans had seized Nottingham, we were all in a sore strait; and King Buhred sent to my father to wit what he should do, and my father's counsel was, that he should ask succour of Ethelred, and King Buhred said no one was so fit to ask or so likely to obtain it as my father; so he sent my father to the West Saxon court, and King Ethelred gave ear unto him, and promised to come with Alfred the prince, and the Earl of Berks, and a great army to assist the Mercians. Now, the pagans kept close quarters all the winter; but so soon as ever the rivers unfroze, and the roads were practicable, or ere there was a bud on the bushes, or a bird on the tree, we all rose to arms. I say we, albe I Ethelfled only looked on with other women and children, for we all had a pretty strong interest in the issue; and there were troops of men tramping past our gates daily, and glad of water and bread, and anything they could get. It was an expensive season to my father and mother, for King Ethelred, Prince Alfred, the Earl of Berks, and Osric his brother, came and went to and from us all the time of the siege; but it was losing something to save all, and I am sure we never grudged them our best; besides which, as there was always something going on, they made the house very pleasant. Howbeit, the pagans had entrenched themselves so strongly in Nottingham castle, that there was no dislodging them. So peace was made with them, sorely against our wills, and the West Saxons drew off their forces with King Buhred's consent, seeing he could not get them to stay any longer.

(1) A little boy: a lad.

(2) Come-one: guest.

At this time, every tongue spoke in praise of Alfred the prince, now in his twentieth year, who was the darling of all hearts, and certainly of mine. This, I was going to say, was all in an innocent way; but I may rather assert that it was more than that, and did me much good; for it is of infinite value to young persons to be admirers of some living excellence; and as to any vain imagination of being brought into nearer conjunction to him than I was already, I no more thought of it than of being married to the north star; chiefly applying my mind to the reconsideration of whatever fell from his lips, which, young as he was, had mostly something wiselike and far-sighted in it. These cogitations I was well able to pursue while my hands were busy at the loom and spindle, and their effect was to wean me very much from puerile things, and make me thoughtful and womanish. Howbeit, my appearance was still that of what in truth I was, a mere child. How amazed was I to hear that there was a treaty of marriage on foot between Alfred the prince and Ethelswitha! Of some things, I was, from a child, very observant, and reflected much on them; of others, not at all. Hence it came that had I not been told of this projected alliance, a long time might have ensued before any of its signals had warned me of its coming. As it was, the surprise and joy stunned me, like the falling of a great weight on my head, so that I believe I showed not myself so gladdened as in truth I was; especially as the thought of losing Ethelswitha, when it dawned upon me, dissolved me in a shower of tears. But she consoled me all she could, by dilating on the blessedness of continually consorting with such a companion as Prince Alfred, and promising to have me much with her in the royal city of Reading. On my mother's side, as is well known, we are of royal descent; therefore Ethelswitha was no ill match for a king's younger brother; and as there was no reason for delay, the betrothal took place speedily. The Earl of Berks was one of the Prince's sponsors; and the transaction, to my mind, was very interesting and imposing. The foster-lean was settled, and the morgen-gift agreed on, which was to consist of sundry large parcels of land for three lives, with men and horses thereunto belonging; and so much more land for Ethelswitha to bestow on her nearest and dearest of her own free choice, for the term of her life and after it; always providing that if she were widowed, she should for a twelvemonth keep herself in the peace of God and of the king, before she married again.

My father, not to be outdone, promised to give with her two thousand swine, which was thought a good deal of by those whom Alfred the prince called "the spinning-side," i.e. the female part of the house. Since, as every one must see, this was adding gift unto gift, and enriching that which was already of infinite worth; and our Saxon laws most wisely provide that presents shall universally come from the other, that is, the brydema's side, where there is anything to bestow, if it be but a hen; since a man must think a wife little worth the having if he will not pay pretty handsomely for her, and think her a good bargain too!

However, Alfred the prince was not to be excelled in generosity even by my father; and to the morgen-gift he added, over and above the men, horses, and land, presents worth the two thousand swine once and again: to wit,—rings, bracelets, necklaces,—one of them curiously twisted like a serpent—crosses, circlets, buckles, a golden brooch shaped like a fly; wimples, tunics, cyrtles of silk and samite; fine linen, mentels, cuffian and binden,¹ a mirror; a hand-bell; a golden foot-stool; a silver foot-bath; fringed coverings for seats and high-settles; wall-hangings worked with the Siego of Troy; a bed-curtain presenting the Landing of King Brute; a coverlet woven with golden flowers; another, for winter, of dressed skins, wondrous light and pleasant; gold and silver and glass cups; pouches, purses, curling-irons,—in fine, everything a royal lady could need or wish.

(1) Cuffs and ribbons.

(2) Head-settle.

Now, though the morgen-gift was not due till the day after the wedding, many of these valuables arrived beforehand, in large corded chests, to the great delectation of the "spinning-side;" and I, among the rest, had the oversight and the handling of them, which, to a girl of such tender years, was no small privilege. When the prince came a courting, the Earl of Berks was oftentimes in attendance on him; but, still oftener, he came by himself, when least expected, (save that we were always expecting him in our own hearts,) and sometimes he would find Ethelswitha and me walking together in the chase, and would come springing towards us as fleetly as any hart in the forest. But, though he would come up to us as blythe as blythe lark, it almost always befel that before we had been long together, he would become as serious as an apostle, and talk of graver matters than one would have expected from so young a man. But whatever fell from his lips was pleasant to Ethelswitha, and to me Ethelfred. The wedding-day now drew nigh; and people were drawing together from various parts, to be present at the festivity; and there was great mustering of men, both servile and freed, to beat the woods for boars and wild deer; and snares were laid for smaller game and fowls; and pits were dug to bake the meats that were not broiled nor sodden; and hampers of pears and apples were brought from the orchards, and eels from the dike, besides haddocks, skates, lampreys, lobsters, and oysters, from the seas and rivers; and sacks of fine flour, and systers of honey; for there was much people to be filled.

In due course came the royal purveyors, to see if there were enow for all; and the head purveyor said unto my mother, "You have enough and to spare of everything, if so be that your mead run not short." But my mother said, "We have enough of mead, morat, and methglin."

Now, by reason of the report of the wedding spreading far and wide, joculars of all sorts, or as we say, glee-men, began to assemble; some with bears, some with dancing dogs, and other-some with jugglers' balls and instruments of music. These began, beforehand, to set up their booths and stages round the green, under the skirts of the forest; by reason of whom, our chase, that was of late so retired, became rather unsafe walking. My mother would not have me go forth, unless under the care of Eadwulf the freedman, who was brave, faithful, and good-natured. I remember, one day taking the air with him in the woods, we came upon a ceorl cruelly maltreating a cnicht of our household, who by reason of his burthen could not requite him as he deserved. Eadwulf, without more ado, took and bound the ceorl hand and foot with his girdle, and laid him at length on the ground. Having thus made him feel his masterdom, he stood over him leisurely, and, with a stern look which he knew very well how to put on, said "There thou lies: now then, what shall be my will of thee? If I blind thy thief's eyes, I must fine forty shillings;

if I lame thy clumsy feet, I must fine thirty; if I deafen thee, twenty-five; if I break thy thumb, twenty; if I crop thine ears, twelve; if I take thy little finger, eleven; if thy great toe, ten; if a slice of thy Dane's nose, nine; if thy fore-finger, eight; if I break thy jaw-bone, six; if one of thy ribs, three; if I knock out one of thy teeth, a shilling. 'Go to! thou's not worth a shilling unto me, the whole bundle of thee!—the cnicht's beyond thy reach now, so go thy ways, and ne'er deal the like with a poor harmless fellow again.'

So saying, he undid the girdle, and let him go free; when the ceorl, bounding out of arms' length, shook his fist at him, and grinning horribly, cried, "Thou's bound a ceorl unsinning; and, by the law of the land, shouldst fine not one shilling, but ten, an' I could catch an' keep thee!" And so went off, reviling; leaving Eadwulf laughing at his impotent anger. Alfred the prince was amused at the transaction when I told him of it, and, the next time he saw Eadwulf, gave him a mancus.

To proceed, however, to the wedding, which, if I were to spin out this chapter to the length of Gildas's epistle, I must come to at last.

LOVE IN THE NORTH.

BY D. F.

THE grouse shooting had commenced a few days. The steamers on the Caledonian Canal were crowded with sportsmen and tourists. The inns at Fort William and Benevie were nightly besieged by wild troops of hungry Sassenachs. Eley's cartridges and Black's hand-books rose to a premium in the provincial markets; and the Highlands resounded with the joy of the stranger. The Gael gladly reaped, in expectation, the anticipated harvest, while the breast of every mother palpitated with pleasurable excitement as she fixed one eye on the list of arrivals in the Grouseshire Courier, and the other on her red-haired daughters. Meanwhile, the said nymphs were deciding on their dresses for the northern meeting, and thumbing The Red Book for the genealogy of every new-comer. In fact, gaily reigned in the North, except in the case of a few unfortunate tourists who found themselves at Inverness, and, having visited Macbeth's castle and the Field of Culloden, were at a loss how to employ themselves.

In one of the many country-houses famed for Celtic hospitality, a very merry party was met. There were grouse-shooters and Highland belles. The host and three other chieftains, who rejoiced in the names of The McDum, Kill-devil, Devil hit, and Kill-bogle—there is a run on satanic nomenclature in the North, such as would drive a Yezidi to distraction—two or three English visitors made up the party of gentlemen. Of ladies, there were the daughters of the houses of McDum and Kill-devil, with many other of the neighbouring damsels, all, of course, closely related to each other.

The mornings were devoted by the gentlemen, as in duty bound, to the game. In the afternoons they, perhaps, competed as Toxophilites with the ladies, or assisted them in adorning their albums with caricatures of the face of nature. In the evenings, dancing, music, and flirtation, prevented the most ardent sportsmen from becoming totally brutalized.

Of all the young ladies assembled beneath the roof of McDum, the one most renowned for desperate flirtation was Miss Clementina Kill-Loon. She was a young lady of great animal spirits. She was handsome, had a tolerable figure, and her ankles were not much larger than an Englishman's. She could ride, shoot, fish, dance a reel against any number of consecutive Sassenaclis, and was altogether a great accession to a country-house. Yet she remained unmarried, and her twenty-seventh year was drawing on. But the reason was, the gentlemen said, she was so very affectionate. Every one was frightened at her readiness to catch at an offer; besides, she so soon changed from one to another. There were Smith and Jones—they came one Wednesday. On Thursday Smith nearly capitulated, when she got hold of his hand in the conservatory, and would keep it; but on Friday, coming unexpectedly into the dining-room, he found her on her knees before Jones, rubbing his left arm, which was rheumatically given—Jones looking rather sheepish. Smith fled from the spot, and refused to return. This season she had determined to make a victim of some unconscious Southerner. The natives, she knew, were too shrewd to be caught; besides, they none of them had anything to live upon but the proceeds of their shootings and fishings. So she laid her plans accordingly. At the last northern meeting she had met a Lieutenant Spooner, then on recruiting service in the vicinity. He saw—admired—danced as often with her as propriety would permit,—(and they do not think much of propriety beyond the Highland line, as long as a lady has a "lang pedigree,")—and was encouraged by her kind behaviour to say more than he had ever dared to utter before; for he was a timid youth and inexperienced in the ways of the world. Therefore, when he had replied to the question, of "How do you like the North, Mr. Spooner?" by answering, "I wish I could always remain where I am now,"—she was lovingly squeezing him up into a corner of the sofa—he blushed violently and almost repented his audacity. However, her glances and squeezes of the hand restored his courage, and before he left the ball-room he was desperately in love. He told his passion in confidence to a friend, who, of course, told his friends, and so the tale came, not undiminished, to the ears of Miss Clementina.

A year's absence had almost effaced her image from his mind, for he had been suddenly called on duty; but the lady could not divine this, and, therefore, when she heard he was coming to pay The McDum a visit, she naturally concluded he was irresistibly drawn thither by her charms; of course, he came to seek her consent to make him the happiest man on earth. Full of this idea, on the morning of his arrival, she held a council of the ladies, and expounded to them the state of the case.

"But, you know, he is so shy," she said to her sympathising friends.

"Well, Clementina, we will do all we can for you; you are quite sure he wishes to propose?"

"Oh, yes! I know he only wants an opportunity. The dear creature—how pale and interesting he is looking!"

"Listen, ladies all," said Miss McDum. "This evening, after dinner, we will slip out of the room and leave them alone—then he is sure to speak."

So it was settled. The gentlemen entered readily into the plan, each one delighted to find the fair Clementina was not after him. Meanwhile the unconscious Spooner was deliberately preparing for dinner, quite unaware of their kind intentions towards him.

Of course, he handed Clementina down from the drawing-room, and the tender speeches and affectionate glances she bestowed upon him during dinner-time recalled many of his last year's feelings towards her. Indeed, he would have been still more subdued had not his timidity led him into a mistake, the confusion arising from which banished all thoughts of love from his breast. Not thinking himself sufficiently intimate with the chief to call him simply "McDum," he actually addressed him as Mr. McDum! The head of the clan looked like an insulted lion, and an embarrassing silence rebuked the trembling offender. He had scarcely recovered by the time when the gentlemen resought the drawing-room, and he was glad enough to seek for consolation from the charming Clementina, who allowed him to nestle close by her in a curtained recess. Engrossed by her conversation, he scarcely remarked the departure of most of the company from the room; but, at last aroused by the silence, he looked up just in time to catch a glimpse of the last couple as they disappeared through the doorway, and he and Clementina were the only occupants of the room. He felt the awkwardness of the position, and suggested to her that they should follow the others.

"Why should we, Mr. Spooner? Do you wish to go away?"

"Oh dear, no!—only I thought—they are all gone somewhere," gasped Mr. Spooner.

"Dear me! so they are; but I dare say they will soon be back; but pray go if you wish; don't let me detain you."

What could Mr. Spooner do? He balanced himself on the right foot, then on the left, and then sat down again, but at the other end of the sofa. A pause ensued; he felt very like a schoolboy for whom the master has sent—something was evidently coming. There was music on the chair close by. Clementina took up a song, "Oh! had I but one loving friend."

"Can you love me as a friend, Mr. Spooner?" she said, with a sweet glance.

"Oh yes, I dare say I can, if you wish it, Miss Kill-Loon," replied the unhappy man, clasping his moist hands together, and feeling as if he would have given the world for a thunderbolt to fall in the room. "What is she going to say next?" he thought. He looked at the door; if it had been open, he would have fled. It was shut—she would catch him before he could get it open. An involuntary sigh escaped from his lips.

"Why that sigh?" she whispered. "Is there any grief upon your mind?"

He determined to make an effort.

"Really, my dear Miss Kill-Loon, if you will excuse me —"

"Oh, Mr. Spooner!"

She blushed and turned her head.

"Now is the time to bolt," he thought, rising from the sofa.

"He is going to fall on his knees," she thought.

"If you will excuse me for a few minutes," he began.

She turned her head back again. She seized his hand.

"I know it all," she said. "You have come here on purpose to see me —"

"Hear me one moment, Miss Kill-Loon!"

He would have given the world to cry for help.

"On purpose to see me—to tell me all; but papa will never hear of it—but, oh! my heart," sobbing, "my heart has long been yours."

"What will become of me?" thought the unfortunate Spooner. It must be a dream. It was too horrible to be true. No—she held him firmly by the hand—there was no mistake about it.

"Take this," at last she said, placing a ring on his limp, passive finger, and abstracting his, the most valuable of his goods, in exchange, "these shall be the tokens of our mutual affection."

She paused awhile; and then, as he seemed incapable of doing or saying anything, she left him standing alone, and disappeared.

The company returned. Mr. Spooner pleaded indisposition, and retired to his bedroom. In that night his whiskers became prematurely grey. Before breakfast time he was on the mail with his face towards the South. At Carlisle he was laid up with a nervous attack, arising, as the doctor said, from some excessive mental agitation. On his recovery he returned the ring in a letter, the concocting of which cost him four days' incessant labour and a quarter's pay expended in stationery. Even then he did not think himself safe, and he seriously entertained a project of emigrating to some very distant settlement, when one morning in looking over the Times for vessels bound to California direct, his eye was caught by a paragraph—

"On December 3, at Loonty, Augustus Reginald Fitz-Stephen, only son of Timothy Stephen, Esq. of Camberwell, to Clementina Alexandrina, eldest daughter of Hector Kill-Loon, Esq. of Strathbogle, and niece of The McDum."

Mr. Spooner immediately gave up all intention of emigrating, and became calm; but always, to this day, shudders at the very name of Grouseshire.

FEMALE TRIALS IN THE BUSH.

BY MRS. TRAILL,

Author of "The Backwoods of Canada."

It has often been remarked how much more prone to discontent the wives of the emigrants are than their husbands; and it generally is the fact, but why is it so? A little reflection will show us the cause. It is generally allowed that woman is by nature and habit more strongly attached to home and all those domestic ties and associations that form her sources of happiness, than man. She is accustomed to limit her enjoyments within a narrow circle; she scarcely receives the same pleasure that man does, from travelling and change of place; her little world is home—it is, or should be, her sphere of action, her centre of enjoyment; the severing her at once and for ever from all that made it dear in her eyes causes her the severest pangs.

It is long before she forms a home of comfort to herself like that she has left behind her, in a country that is rough, hard, and strange; and though a sense of duty will and does operate upon the few to arm them with patience to bear and power to act, the larger proportion of emigrants' wives sink into a state of hopeless apathy or pining discontent, at least for a season, till time, that softener of all human woes, has smoothed in some measure the roughness of the colonist's path, and the spirit of conformity begins to dispose faithful wives to the endeavour of creating a new home of comfort within the forest solitudes.

There is another excuse for the unhappy despondency too frequently noticed among the females of the higher class of emigrants; and as, according to an old saying, "prevention is better than cure," I shall not hesitate to plead the cause of my sex, and point out the origin of the domestic misery to which I allude.

There is nothing more common than for a young settler of the better class, when he has been a year or two in the colony and made some little progress in clearing land and building, to go to England for a wife. He is not quite satisfied with the paucity of accomplishments and intellectual acquirements among the daughters of the Canadians, he is ambitious of bringing out a young lady fit to be the companion of a man of sense and taste, and thoughtlessly and selfishly induces some young person of delicate and refined habits to unite her fate to his. Misled by his sanguine description of his forest home, and his hopes of future independence, she listens with infinite satisfaction to his account of a large number of acres, which may be valuable or nearly worthless according to the local advantages they possess; of this she, of course, knows nothing, excepting from the impressions she receives from her lover.

He may in a general way tell her that as a Bush settler's wife she must expect to put up with some privations at first, and the absence of a few of those elegant refinements of life which she has been accustomed to enjoy; but these evils are often represented as temporary, for he has rarely the candour to tell her the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Deceived by her lover, and deceiving herself into the fond belief that her love for him will smooth every difficulty, she marries, and is launched upon a life for which she is totally unfitted by habits, education, and inclination, without due warning of the actual trials she is destined to encounter.

There is not only cruelty, but even want of worldly wisdom in such marriages. The wife finds she has been deceived, and becomes fretful, listless, and discontented; and the husband, when too late, discovers that he has transplanted a tender exotic to perish beneath the withering influence of an ungenial atmosphere without benefiting by its sweetness or beauty. I need hardly dwell upon the domestic evils arising from this state of things, but I would hold such marriages up as a warning to both parties.

Some will say, But are these things so? and is the change really so striking between a life in England and one in the Colonies? I speak that which I have seen, and testify that which I do know. Even under the fairest and most favourable circumstances the difference must necessarily be great between a rich fertile country, full of resources and the refinements of civilization, and one where all has to be created or supplied at the expense of time and money. But I speak more especially of those, who, living in the less cultivated and populous portions of the Colony, are, of course, exposed to greater privations and disadvantages, as settlers in the Bush must be. In towns and populous districts these hardships are less remarkable.

I remember, among many instances that have fallen under my notice, one somewhat remarkable for the energetic traits of female fortitude that were called forth by a train of circumstances most adverse, and unexpected.

A young man residing in our neighbourhood, of sanguine disposition and slender property, had contrived by means of credit and a little money to start a large concern, a saw-mill, a store tavern, and other buildings, which were to form the germs of a large village. Full of hopes of the most extravagant kind, if he deceived others I believe he also deceived himself into the vain belief, that all his various castles were destined to make his individual fortune, and confer a lasting benefit on the country where they were situated. Under this delusion, and finding, moreover, that it was absolutely necessary to raise resources for carrying on his schemes, he went home, and was not long in forming an acquaintance with an accomplished young lady of some fortune. She was an orphan, and, charmed with the novelty of the life he described, consented to marry him and become the queen of the village of which he gave her so glowing a picture. Perhaps at that period he was not fully aware of the fact that the property of the young lady was under the control of trustees, and that the interest only was at her own command; and fortunate it was for her that the guardians of the property were inflexible in their principles, and resisted every solicitation to resign any part of the capital.

The young bride, accustomed to the domestic beauties and comforts of the mother country, beheld with dismay the long tract of gloomy pinewood through which she journeyed to her forest home, and the still more unseemly fields blackened by charred pine and cedar stumps, in the midst of which rose the village, whose new and half-finished buildings failed to excite any feeling in her breast but bitter disappointment and aversion; and she wept and sighed for all that was fair and beautiful in her own beloved country, rendered now ten times more lovely by the contrast with all she beheld around her; yet, though she was miserable and discontented, she clung with passionate love to her husband, and with womanly fondness made every sort of excuse for him, even to herself, and always to others. It was this love which, as it increased, upheld her when the sad reality of ruin arrived. Misfortune, as an armed man, came fast upon the devoted pair—every fair and flattering prospect vanished. Unable to provide for the satisfaction of his importunate creditors, as he had expected to do from his wife's property, they would no longer be put off, and he became a perfect prisoner in his own house. The land, buildings, all faded as it were from his grasp; even the yearly income arising from her money had been forestalled; and all her costly clothing went by degrees, all her pretty ornaments and little household luxuries were disposed of piecemeal to supply their daily wants. All—all were gone; but with fresh trials, fresh privations, came unwonted courage, and energy to do and to bear. She was now a mother, and the trials of maternity were added to her other arduous duties. She often lamented her want of knowledge and ability in the management of her infant, for she had been totally unaccustomed to the trouble of young children. To add to her sorrows, sickness seized her husband; he who had been used to a life of activity and bustle, scarcely caring to rest within doors, unless at meal-times, now sunk under the effects of confinement, chagrin, and altered diet, and a long and obstinate intermittent ensued.

Though to some persons it might seem a trifling evil, there was nothing in all her sad reverse of condition that seemed so much to annoy my poor young friend as the discolouring of her beautiful hands; she would often sigh as she looked down upon them, and say, "I used to be so vain of them, and never thought to employ them in menial offices such as necessity has driven me to."

Poor thing! she had not been trained to such servile tasks as I have seen her occupied in, and I pitied her the more because I saw her bearing up so bravely under such overwhelming trials; she who had come out, not two years before, to our woods as a bride, a proud and fastidious woman, unable and unwilling to take part in the least household labour—who would sit on the side of her bed while a servant drew the silk stockings and satin slippers on her tiny white feet, and dressed her from head to foot—who despised the best fare that could be set before her by any of her neighbours—who must despatch a messenger almost daily to the distant town for fresh meat and biscuits, and new white bread, was now compelled to clothe herself and her babe, to eat the coarsest fare, black tea unsweetened and only softened with milk instead of rich cream, which she walked twice or thrice a-week to fetch from my house or that of my sister-in-law, bearing her stone pitcher in one hand, with the additional weight of her baby on her arm.

So strange a thing is woman's love, that she, whom I had been wont to consider as decidedly selfish, now showed a generous and heroic devotion towards the man whose thoughtlessness had reduced her to this state of poverty and privation, that seemed to make her regardless of herself. What personal sacrifices did she not make, what fatigues undergo! I have met her coming from a small field where oats had been sown, with a sheaf on her back, which she had cut with her own fair hands to feed an old bullock, the only remnant of stock that had escaped the creditors, and which was destined to supply the household with beef for the ensuing fall. Yet she was quite cheerful, and almost laughed at her unusual occupation. There was a poor Irish girl who stayed with her to the last, and never forsook her in her adverse fortune; but she had been kind and considerate to her, when many mistresses would have turned her out of their house, and now she stayed with her and helped her in her time of need.

One day I came to visit her, fearing from her unusual absence that something was amiss with the child or herself. I found her lying on a rude sort of sofa which she had very ingeniously made by nailing some boards together, and covering with chintz after she had stuffed it with hay, for she was full of contrivances; "they amused her and kept her from thinking of her troubles," she said. She looked very pale, her fair hair was neglected, and there was an air of great languor and fatigue visible in her frame.

But when I expressed my apprehension that she too had fallen a prey to the ague or fever, she eagerly replied, "Oh no, I am only dreadfully tired. Do you know, I was wandering in the woods a great part of the night."

"On what errand?" I inquired in some surprise; on which she related her adventures in these words:—

"I had reason to suppose there were English letters in the post-office of some consequence, and as I had no one to send down for them to whom I dared trust them, I made up my mind yesterday morning to walk down for them myself. I left my little boy to the care of Jane and his father, for carrying him a distance of so many miles and through such roads was quite beyond my strength. Well, I got my letters and a few necessary articles that I wanted, at the store, but what with my long walk and the delay one always meets with in town, it was nearly sunset before I began to turn my steps homeward.

I then found, to my great distress, that I had lost my faithful 'Nelson,' (a great Newfoundland dog that accompanied her wherever she went.) "I lingered a good while in the hope that my brave dog would find me out, but concluding at last that he had been shut up in one of the stores, I hurried on, afraid of the moon setting before I should be out of the dark wood. I thought, too, of my boy, and wondered if his father would waken and attend to him if he cried or wanted feeding. My mind was full of busy and anxious thoughts as I pursued my solitary way through those still lonely woods, where everything was so death-like in its solemn silence that I could hear my own footsteps or the fall of a withered leaf as it parted from the little boughs above my head, and dropped on the path before me. I was so deeply absorbed with my own perplexing thoughts that I did not at first notice that I had reached a spot where two paths branched off in nearly parallel directions, so that I was greatly puzzled which of the two was my road. When I had walked a few yards down one, my mind misgave me that I was wrong, and I retraced my steps without being at all satisfied that the other was the right one. At last I decided upon the wrong, as it afterwards turned out, and I now hurried on, hoping to make up by renewed speed for the time I had lost by my indecision. The increasing gloom of the road thickly shaded with hemlocks and cedars now convinced me I was drawing near swampy ground, which I did not remember to have traversed in my morning walk. My heart thrilled with terror, for I heard the long-drawn yell of wolves, as I imagined, in the distance. My first impulse was to turn and flee for my life, but my strength suddenly failed, and I was compelled to sit down upon a pine-log by the side of the path to recover myself. 'Alas! alas!' said I, half aloud, 'alone, lost in these lonely woods, perhaps to perish miserably, to be torn by wild beasts or starved with hunger and cold, as many have been in this savage country. O my God, forsake me not, but look upon the poor wanderer with the eyes of thy mercy!' Such was my prayer when I heard the rapid gallop of some animal fast approaching—the sudden crashing of the dry boughs, as the creature forced his way through them, convinced me it was too near for escape to be possible. All I could do was to start to my feet, and I stood straining my eyes in the direction of the sound, while my heart beat so audibly that I seemed to hear nothing else.

"You may judge of the heartfelt relief I experienced when I beheld my dear old dog, my faithful Nelson, rush bounding to my side, almost as breathless as his poor terror-stricken mistress.

"You know that I do not often indulge in tears, even when overwhelmed with trouble, but this time I actually cried for joy, and lifted up my heart in fervent thankfulness to Him who had guided my dumb protector through the tangled bush to my side that night. 'Come, Nelson,' I said aloud, 'you have made a man of me,—'Richard's himself again:' dear fellow, I shall fear neither wolf nor bear while you are with me.' I then fastened my bundle about his neck, for my arm ached with carrying it, and on we trudged. At first I thought it would be wisest to retrace my steps; but I fancied I saw light like a clearing breaking through the trees, and conjectured that this by-road led, in all likelihood, to some of the bush farms or lumberers' shanties. I resolved to pursue my way straight onwards; nor was I mistaken, for some minutes after brought me to the edge of a newly-burnt fallow, and I heard the baying of dogs, which, no doubt, were the same sounds I in my fright had taken for wolves.

"The moon was now nearly set, and I judged it must be between one and two o'clock. I peeped into the curtainless window of the shanty. The glimmering light, from a few burning brands and the red embers of the huge back log in the wide clay-built chimney, showed the inmates were all asleep, and, as the barking and growling of the dogs, who, frightened by Nelson's great size, had retreated to a respectful distance, had failed to rouse them, I took bush-leave, opened the door, and stepped in without further ceremony. On a rude bed of cedar-sticks slept two females, the elder of whom was not undressed, but lay sleeping on the outside of the coverlet, and it was with great difficulty that I managed to rouse her to a consciousness of my presence and my request for a guide to the mills. 'Och! Och! Och! my dear crayer,' she said, raising herself at last on her brawny arm and eyeing me from under her black and tangled locks with a cunning and curious look, 'what should a young thing like yourself be doing up and abroad at such a time of night as this?'

"'Good mother,' I said, 'I have lost my way in the Bush, and want a lad or some one to show me the way to the Mills.'

"'Sure,' said the old woman, 'this is not a time to be asking the boys to leave their beds; but sit down there, and I will speak wid the master:' she then pushed a rude seat in front of the fire, and roused up the logs with a huge handspike which she wielded with a strength of arm that proved she was no stranger to the work of closing in log heaps, and even chopping, and then proceeded to waken her partner, who with three or four big boys occupied another bed at the furthest end of the shanty.

"After some parleying with the man it was agreed that at day-break one of the elder boys should be sent to guide me home, but not sooner. 'There, mistress,' said the man, 'you may just lie down on my old woman's bed; the girl has the ague, but she is as quiet as a lamb, and will not disturb you.' I preferred sitting on my rude seat before the now blazing fire, to sharing the sick girl's couch, and as to a refreshment of field-pork and potatoes, which my hostess offered to get ready for me, I had no appetite for it, and was glad when my host of the shanty and his partner retired to bed and left me to my own cogitations and the mute companionship of Nelson.

"One feeling was uppermost in my mind,—gratitude to God for my present shelter, rude as it was. The novelty of my situation almost amused me, and then graver thoughts came over me, as I cast my eyes curiously around upon the smoke-stained walls and unbarked rafters, from whence long draperies of moss and grey lichens waved in a sort of fanciful drapery above my head. I thought of my former life of pride and luxury. What a singular contrast did it present to my situation at that moment. The red flashing glare of the now fiercely burning logs illumined every corner of the shanty, and showed the faces of the sleepers on their humble beds. There lay close beside me on her rude pallet the poor sick girl, whose pale visage and labouring breath excited my commiseration, for what comfort could she have, either mental or bodily, I asked myself.

"The chinking in many parts had been displaced, and the spaces had been stuffed with rags, straw, moss, wool, and a mass of heterogeneous matter, that would have plainly told from what part of the world the inmates had come, if their strong South of Ireland brogue had not declared it past all disputing. Few and scanty were the articles of furniture and convenience. Two or three unplanned pine-wood shelves, on which were arranged some tinware and a little coarse delf, a block of wood sawn from the butt-end of a large timber tree, and a rude rickety table with a pork and flour-barrel, some implements of husbandry, among which gleamed brightly the Irish spade, an instrument peculiar to the Irish labourer's cabin, and a gun, which was supported against the log walls by two carved wooden hooks, or rests,—such was the interior of the shanty. I amused myself with making a sort of mental inventory of its internal economy, till by degrees weariness overcame me, and leaning my back against the frame of the poor sick girl's bed, I fell sound asleep, and might have slept till broad day, had not my slumbers been suddenly broken by the rolling of one of the big logs on the hearth, and looking up I almost started at the sight of the small sinister-looking eyes of my host, which were bent upon me with so penetrating a glance that I involuntarily shrunk from before them. In good truth, more stout-hearted persons might have been justified in the indulgence of a cowardly feeling, if they had been placed in a similar situation, so utterly helpless, and alone; but my courage quickly returned; I thought it wisest to show no distrust, and addressed the uncouth looking personage before me with a cheerful air, laughing at his having caught me napping. Yet I remember the time, when I was a youthful romance reader, I should have fancied myself into a heroine, and my old Irishman into a brigand; but in my intercourse with the lower class of Irish emigrants, I have learned that there is in reality little cause for fear. Their wild passions are often roused to a fearful degree of violence by insult, either against their religion or their nation to acts of vengeance; but such a thing as murdering or robbing a helpless unoffending stranger, seeking the hospitable shelter of their roofs, I never yet heard of, nor do I believe them capable of an act of covetousness and cruelty so unprovoked. While I thought on these things my confidence returned, so that I would not have hesitated taking the man for my guide through the lone woods I had to pass, trusting to this impression of the Irish character, which with many defects has also many virtues, and that of hospitality is certainly one of the most prominent.

"The first streak of light saw the old woman stirring to prepare the morning meal of pork and potatoes, of which I was glad to partake. One by one came stealing sleepily from their nests four ragged urohins, whose garments I verily believe were never removed for weeks, either by day or by night. They all had the same peculiar smoke-dried complexion, a sort of dusky greyish tint, grey eyes, with thick black lashes, and broad black eye-brows, with a squareness of head and a length of chin which I have not unfrequently noticed as a characteristic feature in the less comely inhabitants of the Irish cabins. The boys stole looks of wonder and curiosity at me, but no one spoke or ventured to ask a question; however, they bestowed great marks of attention on Nelson, and many were the bits of meat and potatoes with which they strove to seduce him from my feet.

"When our meal was ended, I gave the old woman a small piece of silver; and accompanied by Master Michael, the biggest boy, I gladly left the shanty, and was glad enough to reach my own home, and find all as well as when I had left them, though some anxiety had been felt for my unusual absence."

Such was the adventure of her midnight wanderings in the bush. She used often to say to me, "I think if you were writing another book on Canada, some of my troubles might be of use to you in illustrating female trials in the bush."

It is now many years ago since she returned to her native country. I had a letter from her after she was quietly and comfortably settled in her new home, in which she says, "I can now look back upon my Canadian struggles with very different feelings to what I did formerly; almost with satisfaction, for they proved to me that I possessed more energy of character than I was aware of." And after making many inquiries after persons who had shown her kindness in her time of adversity, she adds by way of postscript to her letter, "I often think of the night we parted, and wonder if ever we are destined to meet again in this world," and then says, "I often smile now at the trouble I had with that abominable old breachy ox. Do you remember how often I had to cut oats for him with my own hands, because we dared not let him roam at large?"

It must not be supposed, that because I have dwelt with some earnestness on the injury done to young females of the higher class, in bringing them out to the colony unarmed because unwarned of the change that awaits them, that my strictures extend to those young couples who embark upon a new and untried mode of life, resolving mutually to share its trials and its advantages together; and still less to those who, feeling the necessity of emigrating for the benefit of their families, naturally expect to be accompanied by the wife of their bosom, who has sworn to take them for better and for worse, for richer and for poorer, and faithfully to cleave to them even as Ruth, the Moabitish damsel, cleave to her mother-in-law, the Hebrew Naomi.

It is only to warn young men against the cruelty they are guilty of, in using any sort of deception, and practising any want of candour to one whom they may render for years unhappy, miserable beings; for it is not every one that can exert the degree of mental courage that was displayed by the lady whose adventures I have been narrating.

THE MOUNTAIN TORRENT.

(WITH AN ENGRAVING.)

I.

"My family, by the paternal side, was originally of Berne, in Switzerland, whence a branch of it removed to the Milanese, to improve its fortunes. The name of Reding—well known in the Cantons—was sustained with credit by my father. He inherited a thriving mill and farm, about a quarter of a league from the straggling village and venerable castle of St. Michael, within sight of the Tyrolese Alps. Travelling to Zurich, where he had distant connexions, he returned with a companion who weaned him from the desire of wandering any more.

The Castle of St. Michael, with the estate on which our little property was situated, belonged to an Austrian noble, who managed it by deputy, and lived in courtly splendour at Vienna. Count Mansfeldt was equitably represented by his steward, Engel; and under him, our house enjoyed prosperity from the days of my grandsire.

I had but one sister; my mother was the sole superintendent of her education; she thought the feminine mind, so susceptible of impressions, should never be spontaneously consigned to foreign culture. Katherine was worthy of her preceptress. It is not for me to dilate upon her excellence—a portrait by my hand might be deemed the glowing creation of a brother's fondness. It is enough to mention the strength of our attachment. I was two years her senior; and when her age qualified her for sharing in childish pastimes, she was the welcome partner of all my amusements. I showered into her lap the first flowers of spring, and brought her the wild strawberry from heights where few would venture. In her friendship, I reposed the confidence of ripening boyhood—frequently were the overflows of a sanguine temperament repressed by her mildness. With innocent wiles she endeavoured to veil my errors from parental eyes: when I did incur displeasure, her accustomed gaiety was gone, and the voice that recalled her truant smile, was ever that which pardoned the offender.

II.

I was entering my twentieth year, when our situation underwent an important change. Our landlord was gathered to his ancestors, having bequeathed his Lombardy estate to his second son, Count Rainer. Engel, the good old steward, was soon after dismissed from office, and retired, with the fruits of faithful service, to his native town in Carniola.

Count Rainer was a captain in the imperial army. He was with his regiment at Pavia when informed of his father's death. Devolving his authority on an emancipated sergeant of hussars, the purveyor of his libertine pleasures, he despatched him to St. Michael to wring money from the tenantry, and prepare for his reception.

Ludolf was a swaggering bravo, emulous, at middle age, of the vices of profligate youth. On his arrival, he circulated a pompous intimation that he came vested with full powers to treat with the vassals of the Count, and renew their engagements.

My sister had gone to the village to make purchases, and I left the mill at vesper chime with the intention of meeting her. The path was abrupt, and little frequented. I was cherishing discontent at the husbandman's unvaried existence, when I was roused by the distant accents of a female in distress. They were clearly distinguishable, and I rushed to the quarter whence they proceeded. In a corner of an open spot, backed by a deep ditch, fenced with luxuriant underwood, Katherine was keeping a man, unknown to me, at bay: he was above the middle size, and in his beard and costume affected the fashion of the military. He faced me as I approached, and my sister, with disordered dress and agitated frame, flew to my side. Defenceless as I was, my first impulse was to chastise the ruffian, though he wore a sabre; but consideration for the terrified girl, who clung to me imploringly, induced me to forego my purpose. We had not receded many paces, when Katherine relinquished her hold, and uttered a warning cry.—the hand of violence was already at my throat; and a harsh voice, unsteady from rage or intemperance, demanded why a contemptible slave dared to interfere with the representative of Count Rainer.

Unequal to my opponent in bulk and inert force, I was far above him in activity and the resources of a vigorous constitution. A sudden jerk freed me from his hold, and a well-applied push sent him reeling to the verge of the ditch. He drew his weapon with a rapidity on which I had not calculated: Katherine's coolness saved my life: she arrested his arm in its sweep. Ere he could disengage himself, I collected all my energy for one buffet, and laid him supine in the reservoir of mud.

III.

Count Rainer was greeted at St. Michael with the show of rustic rejoicing usual on the appearance of a new master. He was accompanied by a train of riotous associates. The roar of bacchanalian merriment shook the dusky halls of his patrimonial fabric, which, in the blaze of unwonted festivity, seemed to have renewed its youth. Nought, from the evening of the rencounter, had we heard or seen of Ludolf. His rudeness might have originated in the coarse jocularity of a soldier, stimulated by too fervid an application to the bottle. Prudence required that I should abstain from needlessly irritating a man whose enmity might mar my father's arrangements with his lord: I therefore avoided the chance of collision.

I was strolling about the fields with my gun on my shoulder, when a pet pigeon of Katherine's whirred past me, pursued by a hawk. I fired at the bird of prey, which dropped in an adjoining meadow. Springing across the intervening hedge, I found myself in the presence of a group of mounted sportsmen and their attendants. One of the horsemen was examining the dead hawk; his attention was directed towards me by a retainer, in whose brawny proportions, husky voice, and ferocious moustachios, I recognised my adversary, Ludolf.

My gun was demanded, in the name of Count Rainer: I refused to surrender it. The party formed a circle around, pinioned me, and wrested it from me, ere I could attempt resistance. "Mr. Steward," said the Count, "you may now acquaint your friend with the consequences of destroying a nobleman's falcon." The ready villain and his servile followers, dragged me to the earth; they profaned my person by stripes. When they left me in my abasement, the air felt pestilent with their brutal laughter.

I lay with my face to the greensward long after their departure. My brain was eddying in a hell-whirl. I could have welcomed the return of chaos, that the circumstance of my shame might be obliterated in the clash of contending elements. Had the sun been blotted from the heavens, and the summer earth turned to blackness and desolation, I should have thought them fit and natural occurrences. I raised my burning brow; but the orb of day was rising high in his glory, and the meadow grass and wild flowers were fresh and fragrant as if they had not witnessed the act of degradation. I discovered that a stranger had been regarding me with a vigilant eye. I confronted him, and darted at him a devouring glance; his firm, contemplative look remained unaltered. Placing a hand on my shoulder, he said, "Albert Reding, consider me your friend."

"I know you not," I answered, "nor care to know you." He smiled benevolently: "Young man, I am no Austrian. I shall be with you to-morrow."

IV.

The stranger kept his word—on the ensuing day he came to our dwelling. Making, he said, a tour through the north of Italy, the picturesque scenery tempted him to prolong his sojourn at St. Michael. In his excursions, he had chanced to hold random converse with my father, whom he professed to value as the worthy descendant of an independent and intelligent people.

I had forbore to grieve my family by the story of my disgrace, nor had it yet been detailed to them by the officious communicativeness of pretended friends.

Our visitor made no allusion to it, but expatiated very agreeably on topics of general interest. He described the passes of the Alps with the accuracy of a mountaineer, and displayed an intimacy with the localities of the Cantons that filled my parents with pleasure and surprise. In pursuit of knowledge, he had traversed the most remarkable sections of the globe; and his observations, affluent in instruction, proved that his wanderings had been of a different order from the capricious migrations of sight-seeking wealth.

The warmth with which I seconded some of his sentiments appeared to please him. He complimented my father on my education; adding, that the judgment with which I developed its resources designated me for a wider sphere of action than belonged to a tiller of the soil of Lombardy. I had been vain enough to entertain the same opinion; and its confirmation by a competent authority was balm to my spirit. Gladly I acceded to his request, of guiding him to the Baron's Font, a romantic cascade, where, to use his own language, he sighed to offer allegiance to Nature.

My companion noted the peculiarities of the route, and committed to writing the information I furnished respecting the district. We rested on the summit of a steep, skirted by the foaming stream of the cascade, beyond which rose wooded grounds in bold acclivity, mellowing, with their dusky greenness, the gloomy grandeur of a mouldering tower.

The stranger abruptly adverted to the hateful humiliation of the preceding day. He descanted on the contumely I had suffered, with a vehement bitterness that chafed my young blood to flame. I denounced endless hostility against the Count and his minions. He calmly commented on the futility of the threat. In the frenzy of exasperation, I insinuated the possibility of resorting to the darkest means of accomplishing revenge. He replied, that in cooler moments I would spurn the idea of Italian vengeance. Requiring a pledge of secrecy, he proceeded to point out an honourable mode of lowering the crest of the oppressor.

"My name," he said, "is Philippon—my profession, a military engineer, in the service of the French Republic. The armies of Liberty only await the capture of Toulon to sever the chains of Italy. I am terminating a secret journey of observation through Piedmont and the Milanese. Come with me to Paris, and join the standard of Freedom. In France, no parchment barrier excludes untitled youth from fame and fortune; draw a blade in her cause, and relieve the place of your nativity from the thralldom of its petty tyrant. These brutal and stolid Austrians must be driven to their laud of hereditary bondage—justice demands it. The time has gone by for insulted and injured Humanity to shed tears in secret. Five dreary years I pined in the dismal solitudes of the Bastille—I saw it fall, amidst the curses of my countrymen; and never shall the spirit of a liberated nation taste repose, until every stronghold of remorseless power is patent to the winds of heaven as yon grim old fortress, where the Count Rainers of the past outraged with impunity the natural equality of man!"

The majesty of generous indignation irradiated his brow: the eloquent thunders of the Roman forum seemed to roll around me.—I agreed to attend him to the capital of the young Republic.

V.

Bent on entering the field of martial adventure, I anticipated much difficulty in obtaining the concurrence of my father. A lover of tranquillity, he had sickened at the sanguinary measures that had crimsoned the cradle of the French Revolution. Yielding also to age and infirmity, he had been accustomed to the prospect of resigning to me the chief management of our affairs. The narrative of my shame, however, which led him to tremble for the consequences, determined him against opposing my departure. Of my military project, and the pursuits of my patron, I made no disclosure—I barely stated the fact, that he had promised to provide for me at Paris, and proposed, in the mean time, giving me employment as an amanuensis.

Sorrow and joy are twin daughters of affection. Notwithstanding the excitement of curiosity and ambition, reluctantly and despondingly I crossed our humble threshold. I went away at night, and this added to the melancholy character of the separation. My mother was unwell, and at her bedside I received her blessing. The features of my gentle-natured sister gave dim and pallid testimony to the fulness of her affliction. When I had parted with my parents, she escorted me to the extremity of the orchard. "Oh, Albert!" were the only words she had power to utter; and her face looked so mournful—so heart-appealing, in the moonlight—that to desert her smote me as a sin. One embrace, and I bounded off like a chamois—then paused, till weeping relieved my soul—Katherine! Katherine!

VI.

I remained about a year at Paris in the house of my patron. Toulon had fallen, and the army of Italy had commenced operations by a successful movement on the Sardinian frontier. Profiting by the opportunity I possessed of studying the theory of the military art, I was rewarded with a commission in a regiment of the line—one of those destined for the invasion of the Milanese. I received, with alacrity, the order to proceed to Nice. I was shocked and disgusted by the dreary spectacle of civil broil, and I thirsted for distinction. The memory of wrong also rankled in my bosom, and in my dreams I planted the revolutionary banner on the battlements of St. Michael, and heard myself hailed in the halls of the insolent Austrian with the acclamations due to a hero.

I joined my regiment; but a government weakened by vacillations in its form, and dissensions in the capital, permitted the army, with which my hopes were associated, to languish ill-appointed and inactive. Instead of running a career of glory, it was forced to content with the most depressing privations. In my despondency, a long-delayed letter arrived from my father. Its contents were almost limited to the earnest request, that I would immediately hasten home.

Its emphatic urgency, unaccompanied by explanation, assured me that all went not well. I would fain have obeyed the summons, but it was impracticable. The Directory, established in authority, ordered the army of Italy to the field. General Bonaparte, an officer in his twenty-sixth year, marshalled the way to the Alps.

Napoleon's campaigns in 1796 are familiar to all Europe. It was my fortune to be present in the most remarkable engagements, and to escape without a wound. When Wurmser, after repeated defeats, succeeded in recruiting his forces in the Tyrol, a strong body of our troops, headed by the Commander-in-chief, advanced against a division of 20,000 Austrians stationed at Roveredo. Our line of march lay through the district of my birth. A few hours before we were in motion I was summoned to the quarters of the General. It was the well-known characteristic of this extraordinary man scrupulously to ascertain the extent of his resources, even to the qualifications of an individual soldier.

Aware of my knowledge of the country he was about to penetrate, he wished to make it subservient to his purpose. He questioned me as to the correctness of some local information, which I perceived had been derived from the documents of Philippon. Satisfied on these points, he sportively inquired, if I had any dislike to act as his herald to my old neighbours. I related my obligations to our German superior, and he promised me ample powers for discharging them in full.

We were evidently unexpected. No artificial obstacle opposed our progress, and we proceeded with unexampled celerity. Our advanced posts were only separated from St. Michael by a few miles of broken ground, when I was despatched with a detachment to surprise it. The troops halted in a chestnut grove, about half a league from the mill, while I, grasping a fowling-piece, assuming a light hunting-cap, and covering my uniform with an ordinary cloak, went forth to reconnoitre the place, and to provide for the safety of my relatives.

I skirted round the village and castle, which I found were occupied by a company of Hungarian infantry under Count Rainer. Not anticipating the irruption of an enemy into their secluded fastness, camp indulgences had relaxed order. My informer, a poor peasant, seemed afraid of confiding to a stranger his opinion of the Count and his followers. I asked concerning my family, but with the name of Reding he was unacquainted.

It was the beginning of September. There had been a continuance of unusually sultry weather, and the melting of the mountain snows had swelled the stream at St. Michael to an impetuous torrent. Twilight was approaching when I reached a sheltered position on the bank opposite the castle. The waters dashed furiously against the base of the building, and the crazy supports of the antiquated bridge quivered like a harpstring.

I resolved on a nocturnal attack, and was about to seek a passing interview with the dear domestic circle, when, looking towards the castle, I saw what stayed my step. A female ran wildly to the stream, pursued by some menials, in the rear of whom, on horseback, came the Count their master. The fugitive cleared the bridge just as her pursuers gained it. At that moment the centre of the infirm structure gave way to the torrent. Concealed among the trees, I perceived the female on bended knees, distractedly blessing God for her deliverance; and I knew that it was Katherine, my only—my beloved sister!

I fired a shot at him who had been foremost in the chase—the infamous Ludolf—as he clambered up a remnant of the shattered bridge. He stood unhurt amidst the group that surveyed me, while I sheltered the dove of my boyhood in my bosom. In the confusion I exposed my uniform; the alarm was given, and every instant became precious. I supported Katherine until out of sight of the foe. “Fly!” I cried, “fly to our parents, dear sister! tell them I shall bring glad tidings in the morning!”

I counselled in vain. The sense of injury had unsettled her mind—she hung helplessly upon me—her lips moved, but I could distinguish nothing of what she spoke, save the repetition of the words, “Home! I have no home!”—Oh God! she was sadly altered!

A bugle echoed among the cliffs. I bore her to a cavern, the discovery of my youth, and wrapt her in my cloak. Hurrying, by familiar paths, with a speed I had never before exerted, I rejoined my associates.

VII.

An intricate and circuitous track brought us at midnight to the isolated church of St. Michael, commanding the village and the narrow road to the castle. We crouched in the churchyard, until every sound ceased, and the lights that had blazed in different directions were no longer visible. Leaving part of my force to intercept the communication with the village, I led the remainder to a point of the fortress which I had scaled in my youthful rambles.

The pacing of the sentinels, and the noisy vigils of the Count and his guests, were clearly audible as I descended the ivied wall. My party followed, one by one, and our success would have been signally complete, but for the accidental discharge of a musket. This was answered by a volley from the guard, the din of arms, and the hasty gathering of a tumultuous body of defenders. Ordering my men to keep close and follow me, we pressed forward to a private door that opened into the body of the pile.

This barrier was quickly shattered by a shower of balls, and in a second the great hall resounded with the groans of the dying and the shouts of the triumphant. In that arena of slaughter I was collected as I am now. Once had Rainer's bloated visage confronted me in the fray, but the baleful meteor vanished, and bootless to me was the issue of the conflict, until blade or bullet did its work on him and his subordinate.

The hall gave indications of a carousal. The red wine streaming from flagons overturned in the struggle, mingled with the life-drops of the wassailers. Death derived a more appalling aspect from the relics of recent revelry. Some intoxicated wretches had been bayonnetted with the goblets in their hands. One had fallen backwards on the hearth above the burning embers; he was mortally wounded, and the blood gushed freely in the flames. I stooped to raise him from his bed of torture. The streaks of gore did not disguise the lineaments of Ludolf. The reprobate had closed his reckoning with mortality.

Victory was ours, but discipline was at an end; I could with difficulty muster sentinels for the night; the cellars were ransacked, and weariness and intemperance soon produced their effects. Sending confidential messengers to attend to my sister's safety, and convey intelligence to my father, I prepared to await the dawn of morning.

Feverish from anxiety, I felt no inclination to grant my wearied limbs repose. My brain was racked with the thought of Katherine, and apprehension for my parents. I had seen enough to convince me that Rainer had done his worst.—What confederate demon had enabled him to escape me?

I paced from post to post, execrating the sluggish march of time. Leaning over an eminence near the broken bridge, I listened to the turbulent music of the waters. A subterraneous opening cut in the rocky soil below communicated with the vaults of the castle. Hearing the echo of a foot-fall, I bent cautiously over the outlet. A lamp glimmered beneath. A muffled figure raised it aloft to guide its egress, then extinguished it hastily. The light fell on the face of the Count.

I grasped his cloak as he emerged, but, slipping it from his shoulders, he retreated towards a shelving wood-walk on the margin of the stream. Had he gained it, the darkness must have saved him. Both my pistols missed fire. I outstripped in the race, and bore him back to the very edge of the ravine. He made a thrust at me with his sword. I neither paused for a trial of skill, nor attempted to ward off the weapon; the butt-end of a pistol found its way to his forehead; not a sound passed his lips; down he went—down—down—passively bounding over the jagged declivity, till a heavy plash told that he was whirling with the torrent.

Vengeance was satisfied: I recoiled involuntarily from the scene of the encounter. Suddenly arose an explosion, as if a volcano had torn up the foundation of the castle: I was felled to the earth ere I could speculate upon the cause.

VIII.

My campaigns were over. Rainer had laid a train, and fired the powder magazine of his captured hold. The bravest of my men perished; and I, crushed beneath a fragment of the topping towers, lived to curse the art that returned me, mutilated and miserable, to a world in which I was henceforth to have no portion.

I left the hospital a phantom, and set forth on a pilgrimage, the performance of which was the only business that remained to me in life. The tide of battle had ebbed from St. Michael, when I crawled up its steep—the church and castle were blackened ruins—the habitations of the villagers roofless and deserted—the mill a shapeless mass of timber and stones. Our orchard was unfolding the buds of spring—I fancied that the hoary apple-trees wore the aspect of friends—the voice of singing floated on my ear, as I neared the dwelling of my infancy, and the fountain of my heart re-opened.

Close to the spot where our pretty porch once stood, a matron, in the garb of extreme penury, was bending over the trampled remains of a plot of flowers. Her features were only partially revealed, but the mountain melody she sang could not be mistaken—I fell at my mother's feet! Shading back the hair from my scarred temples, she asked me if I had come from her children!

Mersey was vouchsafed to her and to me. She soon slumbered with the clods of the valley. My father had died, ere my departure from France; and the story of our injuries from the Austrian lightened the burden of remorse for the shedding of blood. I have discovered no trace of Katherine since I quitted her at the cave.

FOOTSTEPS OF OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

It is one of the happy characteristics of our age, that the spirit of inquiry is general. Thus, while mathematicians are inventing new formulæ, chemists exhibiting new elements, and engineers unimagined powers of mechanical combinations, classical criticism, and antiquarian research, are carried on with no less zeal; while the geologist triumphs when his newest discovery makes the world appear more ancient than it is. The same variety may be seen in geographical research. While new countries or provinces reward the zeal of discoverers, the soil beneath the surface of which lie the relics of empires is sifted as if every grain was so much of pure gold, for the treasure-house of history. Even where no extraordinary discovery can be expected, the cautious temper of our best travellers becomes every day more conspicuous. The results are, in many cases, of a highly interesting character. Popular errors are corrected: the more valuable kinds of tradition are rendered more reasonable, and therefore more credible; and the traveller thus becomes a fair guide to the inquirer, who, though at home in the body, may possibly be one of those who, by a remarkable but real instinct, possessed by some men, contemplate distant countries with the most sagacious observation.

(1) "Footsteps of Our Lord and His Apostles, in Syria, Greece, and Italy. A succession of Visits to the scenes of New Testament narrative, by W. H. Bartlett." London: Arthur Hall, Virtue & Co.

Many books have been written descriptive of Palestine; some by travellers, some by mere scholars; some are of very ancient, others are of modern date. But there is ample room for more. However ably one set of writers may describe such a country, others, if endowed with the necessary intelligence, will bring to view traits of the natural landscape, or probabilities of history, unnoticed by their fellow-travellers. True it is, such minuteness of description may be as wearisome as useless, except in some few cases; but Palestine is one of the few, in which interests of the highest kind are served by exact and varied information.

We should have a most excellent and conversable circle of friends, could we assemble around us the principal travellers and pilgrims in the Holy Land. Conspicuous among them would be the mother of Constantine, who would doubtless tell us many things that would silence a score of our later guides. And there would be the eloquent Gregory Thaumaturgus, and Cyril of Jerusalem, and the stern Hieronymus, men who knew every inch of ground in the most famous localities of the land. Two or three centuries later, and when the light of primitive Christianity was failing, another set of our supposed companions began their pilgrimage. They had neither the learning, nor, perhaps, the acuteness of their predecessors; but they were not so ignorant as modern presumption would represent. They did not walk quite in the dark, as some writers would make us believe; they could at any time have told their right hand from their left. A great, but common mistake, indeed, is committed in respect to the monkish travellers of the middle ages. If we had them to converse with, they could and would, we are persuaded, give us much valuable information. But in order to elicit intelligence from such men, we would not question them as sceptics but as believers; and though, in the latter capacity, we certainly should not credit all they told us, we should learn what aspect Palestine bore in times of which we can really know nothing, if we despise our informants.

But among the earliest guides to Palestine, we should find some, whose observations and acuteness would not be shamed by the best of modern wits. We question, indeed, whether any book has ever been written, considering the advantages or disadvantages of the author's age, superior to the Guide Book of the fourth century, the "Itinéraire de Bordeaux à Jérusalem." This remarkable production describes, with great care, all the most important objects on the pilgrim's route through the fairest provinces of Europe and the East. The distances are measured by careful reference to official authorities. No available historical information is neglected; and there can be little doubt, that the pilgrim who made adequate use of the help thus afforded him, must have arrived in Jerusalem with a mind well exercised in the best science of a traveller.

It is well worth notice, that the means of information which existed even in the dark ages, were quite sufficient to direct any really earnest traveller to the main points of interest in his journey through the Holy Land. A careful comparison, a comparison which should have somewhat of a psychological character about it, of the records of early pilgrimages with those of later periods, would be valuable in many respects. Superstition would be made to indicate the depth at which truth lies beneath the surface; and it might be found, after all, that as the sands of the deserts have saved many a precious column or torso from destruction, so the old monkish traditions have preserved relics of true history. Worthless, indeed, as the sand are such traditions in themselves; but carefully examined, they might reward the search of the most sceptical inquirers.

One passage in Mr. Bartlett's book is of especial interest as illustrative of the above remarks. "When we consider the amazing number of revolutions that have swept Jerusalem as with the besom of destruction, there needs no other evidence of the credulity or fraud which would seek to identify the houses of Lazarus and Dives, the place where the cock crew when Peter denied his Lord, and the many other spots where New Testament incidents are said to have occurred, even if the very monuments, by the modern style of their architecture, did not prove the absurdity of the tale. But, all allowance made for these changes, it is not altogether improbable, to say the least, that the streets may yet retain much of their original direction. In a city of such limited size as Jerusalem, and, moreover, so strongly marked as to site, nothing is more likely, as we see at the present day in oriental cities, than that the houses should be rebuilt very much upon the line which convenience or necessity originally dictated."—P. 170.

It is in the spirit of these observations that Mr. Bartlett pursues his route from one station to another in Jerusalem, and throughout the Holy Land. Praise of no ordinary kind is due to him for the judgment which he has thus displayed. While, in common with the greater number of English travellers, he naturally scorns imposture in the garb of holiness, he has the patience to ask, after he has had his laugh, whether it may not be as well to consider, that the streets of Jerusalem "may yet retain much of their original direction." Undoubtedly they may, and most probably they do; and in this probability is involved a principle of vital interest to the cause of both historic and religious truth.

Mr. Bartlett's narrative abounds in passages which, viewed in this light, give an unusual value to his work. But we should be very unfair both to the author and the public, if anything we said should lead to the idea that its principal merit is of a critical or controversial character. It is, on the contrary, just the book which we should read to one whom we wished to carry with us, on winter evenings, or summer afternoons, in an imaginary pilgrimage through the countries described. We have spoken only of the part which relates to Palestine; but a considerable portion of the work is occupied with an account of cities and provinces rendered famous as scenes of Apostolic labours. These are described with great vigour; and the anecdotes of personal adventure, the expression of feeling, always earnest and kindly, throw a pleasant pathos over the whole, and add, in no slight degree, to the charm of a very charming, as well as very useful book.

It would not be difficult for any one, however slightly instructed, to find reasons for questioning this or that passage, in a narrative which embraces so large and so sacred a field. But though it has been our lot to examine many works on the scenes here described, we have no hesitation in saying, that we should be very dissatisfied, indeed, were we set upon the task of finding a book of the kind containing more information, generally useful, or written in a more agreeable and attractive style. We abhor the title by which it is advertised: "Mr. Bartlett's Gift Book." A gift-horse, which the author of the advertisement must have had in his mind, is certainly nothing like this beautiful volume; but much as we spurn the name, we think that the book itself would probably be as acceptable a gift as any which friends could bestow on friends at this season of the year.

THE POACHER.

CHAPTER II.

A NIGHT IN THE FOREST.

AFTER having with some little difficulty passed the borders of the wood, which were lined with brambles and other small bushes, we arrived at the old forest. I was involuntarily struck with the grandeur of those noble trees, whose thousand arches of foliage were intermingled like the roof of a Moorish palace, and whose mossy trunks formed verdant colonnades. Here solitude did not appear to court the poetic muse, as it had done in the wood I traversed with Marcella in the morning, but invited rather to a hazardous and manly life. Animated by the fresh air, attracted and interested by the ever-varying and numberless prospects which opened on all sides, enjoying the pleasure of walking on a thick carpet of leaves, it was no difficult matter to understand the mania which about the twelfth century took possession of the whole of the nobility, and led them to the forest in the midst of horses, hounds, and the shouts of the huntsmen. At that time the woods, like a rising tide, invaded fields and villages. In Normandy, a single gentleman removed thirty-two parishes to make a chase; at Gavre the flood of verdure had, in like manner, banished man, and laws were necessary to preserve the nobles from the seductions of hunting. I, in my turn, experienced the irresistible attraction of the forest. The further I penetrated, the more pleasure I felt, and the more was I induced to proceed. I experienced an intoxicating ardour which made me willing to adopt the favourite device of America.

The poacher, to whom I attempted to describe my feelings, declared that when out of the forest he was but half-alive. Being the son of a boisier at Camore, he had been born and bred in the forest. It was to him what the sea is to the sailor; he loved its sounds and its shades, and was acquainted with all its secrets. After following the foot-path for a few minutes, he passed through several openings, where the broken branches testified that the wild boars had already taken the same track. In the midst of the numberless thickets which intersperse the forest, and from whose inextricable labyrinth it seems utterly impossible to make an escape, he walked stright forward without looking on either side, as though led by some invisible guide. In proportion as we advanced the prospect became more and more wild. At length all trace of man's handiwork disappeared. We were now in the midst of a chaos of trees of every size, a phalanx of vegetation in which the weaker clung to the stronger, which sheltered and nourished it. Here and there huge oaks destroyed by time supported their crumbling skeletons against the robust trunks of their successors; the creepers, in search of the sun, had twined themselves round the noble trees until they reached the summit, when casting themselves from branch to branch they formed innumerable suspension bridges, much frequented by the squirrels. The soil itself, formerly disturbed by some terrible convulsion, was separated by ravines, from whose sides projected rocks thick set with briars and small bushes. Occasionally there was an opening in this medley of stones, rocks and verdure, through which appeared ponds embroidered with water-lilies. Above were seen large flights of wood-pigeons, whilst the halcyon passed rapidly close above the osier plots, and the heron, perched on the dried branches of the willow, inclined its head to the tranquil waters like the patient fisherman.

We were following the banks of one of these solitary lakes, when suddenly a general movement was made around us. The frogs which had been croaking on the edge, precipitated themselves to the bottom of the waters, the music of the foliage was hushed, and the birds descended hastily to the foot of the trees. At the same moment the silvery surface of the pond was darkened by two large wings, and I perceived a sea-eagle apparently floating in the azure of the sky. After hovering in the air for some minutes, the eagle descended like a dart into the thicket, whence he soon returned, holding his prey in his beak. I then saw him fly towards a large oak, at the top of which Bon-Affût showed me his nest. The sea-bird was as large as a shepherd's hut, and seemed too great a burden for the tree he had selected, which appeared to tremble under his weight. My guide informed me that the eagles were very numerous in the forest, and that they even extended their ravages to the poultry-yards of the neighbouring villages. It seemed, indeed, that by their audacity they encouraged the less powerful, and I learnt that the raven who attempted to imitate the eagle was no allegory, but melancholy reality. These cheese-stealers here are so bold as to fasten themselves on the young lambs, and attempt to pluck out their eyes.

We had reached the centre of the forest and found ourselves in a glade, a large portion of which was occupied by a piece of water, so tranquil and limpid that the sky was there reflected in all its beauty, with the lovely azure and the light fleecy clouds. On arriving at this spot, the poacher slackened his pace, and looked around him most complacently with the air of a proprietor entering his domains. He began to answer the song of every bird, by a note of such extraordinary resemblance, that the deceived bird hopped down from branch to branch and stood still at a few feet from us, inclining its head in order to hear more distinctly. The squirrels approached at his cry; the water-fowls came from the rushes to pick up the grain he scattered on the side of the lake; the hares which were playing under the heath, stopped and looked at us almost with an air of effrontery. The poacher smiled at my astonishment.

"These are my friends and neighbours," said he; "for a long time we have lived happily together without the slightest difference, and as no one ever comes to this part, they have not been taught to fear."

"Then you never set traps for them?"

"Never; that would be betraying their confidence. But I do not see the serpent; she is generally the first to greet me."

He approached the water and began to hiss in a particular manner; soon a similar hiss replied, and the triangular head of an enormous adder rose from the rushes. I involuntarily started back.

"Do not be alarmed," said Bon-Affût, quietly; "this is an old comrade; she has recognised me—look!"

The adder had, in fact, issued from the reeds and was swimming towards us, with head erect, and hissing with her forked tongue. Her long body, of a green hue, marked with dark spots, left the trace of its passage on the still waters; she reached the bank with a single bound, and drawing herself up to her full height gained the poacher's waist. He extended his arm, around which she rapidly twined herself, and thus reached his breast, in which she nestled.

"You are astonished at my boldness, sir," said Bon-Affût, remarking my expression of disgust and alarm, "but this is quite harmless, it is a water-aspid. When one passes long weeks alone in the woods, you see, one becomes less difficult to please in the choice of company; one is happy to find anything that lives and knows one. Thus, when I cannot go to the Magdeleine to have a chat with Louisa, and Bruno is away travelling, I come here to amuse myself, and God's creatures are my only companions."

He added many singular remarks on the animals of the forest. He had composed for himself a natural history, a union of prejudice and observation, in which it appeared to me very difficult to distinguish truth from error. The lesser animals had been classed by him into friends or enemies of man, and he pretended to be able to recognise their nature according as they were sensible or not of the human voice; tradition ascribes this division to the first days of the world. At that time man and the lion were disputing for the possession of the earth; the animals took part in the quarrel according to their own inclinations. All those who were of open hearts and submissive tempers ranged themselves on Adam's side, whilst the violent and stupid took the part of the lion. Man gained the victory; but he was shortly afterwards driven from the paradise he inhabited, and thus lost the crown of the world. Since then the animals who fought against him, have ever remained the enemies of those who supported his cause. Unfortunately, the men of our time have forgotten the past, and, as the treaty of alliance between their fathers and the animals of the terrestrial paradise was lost in the deluge, they no longer remember their former friendship; but when one knows all this, one has only to show oneself, and certain animals, such as deer and goats, who were formerly the soldiers of Adam, instantly remember it. During these explanations we had left the thicket, and were now at the entrance of a large ravine. We there met Bruno, who was seated at the side of the road, peeling the branches of a black alder. On perceiving the poacher who first issued from the wood, he made a sign of recognition, which was, however, interrupted and disguised as far as he was able on seeing me. Bon-Affût glanced rapidly down the avenues. "Well," said he, placing himself before the youth, who had resumed his work, "you are preparing baskets for us, eh, my boy?"

VOL. XV.

"Pardon me, this is for the cage-maker at Rozet," replied Bruno, without raising his eyes.

"It is rather late to think of preparing prisons for the little birds when they have already got all their feathers," observed the poacher; "and you are not usually so diligent, for you do not generally attempt to whiten your sticks until the sun has shut one eye."

"The day is not so long as one would wish it to be," replied Bruno.

"And do you intend to take your merchandise to Rozet to-night?"

"No," replied the youth, raising his head and looking at Bon-Affût,—"the road on the side of the boisiers is too bad;—look."

He pointed to the muddy soil, which was marked with deep wheel-ruts and the traces of recent footsteps. The poacher appeared particularly struck with the latter, which he doubtless recognised, for I saw him exchange looks with Bruno, and after hesitating a minute, he said hastily,—

"You will not need my services any more, sir; you have only to follow the ravine, and you will reach the boisiers' huts; if you like to walk fast, you may arrive there before evening."

I perceived that there was some motive for this determination which I was not intended to know, and which it was consequently useless to attempt to discover; I therefore took leave of my guide without further delay, and commenced my solitary journey through the long avenue. The dense foliage intercepted the last rays of the sun in such a manner that a kind of semi-obscurity prevailed; but now and then, the evening breeze opened the verdant roof, and a ray of the setting sun penetrated the shade and appeared to disperse into a thousand luminous spots. When I turned round, I perceived the immense avenue unrolled behind me like a subterranean vault, at the end of which appeared the azure sky already bespangled with silvery stars. The first hamlet of the boisiers which I met with was composed only of a few huts; I passed by it without stopping, and proceeded until I reached the principal encampment. I saw here and there, in the twilight, groups of cabins in the immense glade, like a network of forest villages. All the huts were round, and built with branches, the interstices of which were filled up with turf and moss, the whole being re-covered with a roof of chips and shavings. When I passed the doors, which were formed of hurdles, only half the height of the entrances, the wolf-dogs rose from before the hearth where they were lying down, and approached me barking, the half-naked children hastened to the threshold and looked at me with surprise and curiosity. By the light of the heath fires, on which the evening meal was preparing, I was enabled to distinguish the contents of the cabins. A large fire-place occupied the side opposite the entrance; press-beds were placed round the hut, with a few other indispensable articles of furniture; whilst in the centre stood the common table, of which the men and women made equal use.

I learned at a later period that these scattered huts were inhabited by nearly four hundred boisiers, who never quitted the forest. To them the world extended not beyond the trees by which they were sheltered and nourished. Nevertheless, in this limited circle of obscure individuals was found all that agitates the external world: hopes deceived or fulfilled, affections returned or repulsed, family joys or griefs, and above all, that dreaded sword which is ever suspended over the banquet of mankind—want. For the time it was happily absent; but its visits were remembered, and the women described many of them to me. Frequently the sale of the wood had failed, the price of corn had risen, and the distressed boisiers had been compelled to live, like the wild beasts, on what they could find in the forest. Driven by hunger, they had sought for assistance in the neighbouring villages; but poverty had closed the doors which friendship alone could have opened, and, to the labourer living out of the forest, the boisier is a stranger. No bond of union connects the open country with the forest, no common custom unites them; there is, besides, an old difference which renders the former mistrustful of the latter, and which the rude and hurried accent, the mean garments and savage look of the forester, do not tend in the smallest degree to diminish. Tradition narrates that formerly the boiseries were the asylum of desperadoes, who made incursions into the villages to obtain possession of the women or the crops; and although these evil practices have long since ceased, the remembrance of them has not perished.

I found at the principal encampment, as I had been informed, that there was one hut larger than the rest, which was converted into a kind of public-house, and in which several persons were already assembled. I perceived Moser at supper in a corner with his two guards, and hastened to join them. In the centre of the cabin, round a large fire, whose smoke escaped through a kind of funnel formed of turf and hurdles, sat several women. From the singular appearance of the place, I might have imagined myself in the wigwam of a red Indian, had it not been for the noisy conversation of the spinners assembled round the hearth. The name of Marcella, which was frequently pronounced, attracted my attention; and I soon discovered that in point of scandal the forest had no need of instruction from the town. The attractive boisière was evidently out of favour with every body, yet they could not agree as to her faults. Some accused her of being too haughty, others of being too familiar; some abused her for thinking only of making her fortune, others for ruining herself in order to have fine clothes; one declared that she had no wit, another that she had too much; there was unanimity only in slander. When all remarks had been made, a young girl whose muddy complexion and red hair were sufficient excuse for her jealousy, inquired why Marcella was not with them that evening.

"Sweet innocent!" exclaimed a second spinner, of a bitter-sweet countenance, "don't you know that when the youths are at supper, you are sure to find them at home?"

"Well, what of that?" asked the other tartly.

"Why, my jewel, Marcella chooses her time," continued the malicious peasant, "and is at this moment going from hut to hut to show her white cap."

"You think so, eh! Landry?" interrupted a voice, suddenly.

The boisière appeared at the entrance of the cabin, apparently in haste and out of breath.

"She has been listening!" exclaimed the astonished spinners.

"I do not wear enough dirty caps to be obliged to show them when they are white," resumed Marcella, casting a significant glance at Landry's red cotton night-cap, "and I have not yet visited a single soul since I came here."

"You are, however, very warm, my good creature," observed the spinner with a viper-like air.

"Because I have run all across the glade on account of what Bruno told me," said the boisière.

"Ho! ho! so you run away from the honey-seeker now, do you?" resumed Landry, ironically; "when you used to meet him on the high road it was he who took flight, but I suppose you have made him bold."

"Be quiet with your would-be innocence," exclaimed Marcella, angrily; "it was not Bruno who frightened me, but what he told me, and I dare say you would not have been more courageous, if you had heard what he said."

"And pray what did he say that could make you as red as a berry of holly?" inquired the most venerable of the spianers.

"What did he say, goody Lolette?" replied the boisière, in an under tone; "well! he told me that he had just met, near the thicket of the Dead Man, the Spectre Huntsman."

At these words there was a general movement; all conversation was suddenly interrupted.

"And Bruno saw him?" inquired several voices at the same time.

"As plainly as I see you," returned the boisière; "he was holding the chain of his dog, and appeared to be looking for footsteps on the ground. At first Bruno thought it was a forester; but when the 'Forerunner of Sorrow' turned towards him, he saw his eyes flash fire, and heard him pronounce his terrible words:—

"Beasts of the forest
And fowls of the air,
Make way for souls condemn'd."

Then he disappeared in the plantation, withering all the leaves as he passed."

The women had ceased spinning, the men looked at each other, the guards themselves appeared seized with fear. Moser inquired what that meant. One of them replied with a little embarrassment that, according to the tradition of the forest, the appearance of the Spectre Huntsman announced the "hunt of the evil spirits."

"And can Christians believe such tales?" asked Moser, indignantly. A murmur arose amongst the boisiers.

"Christians believe what their ears hear," observed an old man; "all those who are here have heard the trumpet of the 'Forerunner of Evil,' and your people themselves can bear witness to it."

The guards acknowledged, with a little hesitation, that such was the case.

"Then you have heard the horn in the forest without seeking the hunters?" inquired the Alsatian.

"If they had sought the hunters they would have met with their death," replied the boisier who had already spoken: "the arrival of the Spectre Huntsman is always a bad sign; but he who attempts to witness the chase may as well prepare his coffin first, for his hours are numbered."

"Well, I shall take the chance of it," said Moser, "and the devil take me if I don't compel your evil spirits to give up their arms."

A simultaneous exclamation arose from the bystanders; the old man bowed his head. "We must not trifle with the dead," said he; "God has allotted to all their time; he has given the day to man, and the night to evil spirits. It is a sign of a proud heart to act against his will, and if you have a good patron in heaven, he will keep you from this act."

"I expect, on the contrary, that he will assist me in it," replied Moser. "For fifteen years I have lived in the forest, and have only seen poachers belonging to this world: I should be glad to see some from the other world; but you will find the chase will be put off—the devil will find us too much on the alert to permit the Spectre Huntsman to sound his horn."

No one replied; a pause ensued: The silence that reigned in and around the hut was uninterrupted save by the whistling of the wind and the murmur of the water. Suddenly a horn was heard; the sound rushed through the ravine, becoming every moment louder and louder, until at length it reached the door of the cabin, when it was almost overpowering. The effect was terrible and sudden. Both men and women rose hastily. Moser looked at me with surprise; there was a short silence, then the sound of the horn was again heard more distinctly, and at a less distance.

"It is he! It is he!" murmured all the voices.

The forester rose: "It is clear that some one is amusing himself at our expense," said he, impatiently; "it remains, however, to be proved who will be the one to laugh at last."

Then, turning towards his two companions, he added: "Now, get ready: the Spectre Huntsman seems to me rather hoarse; let us see if we can clear his voice for him."

The guards, who had risen, looked at each other with anxiety; the horn continued to sound with ever-increasing force; all the boisiers were assembled round the fire-place, where they carried on their conversation in an under-tone. Moser was awaiting his companions near the door, and examining his gun. At length the two men joined him, but in a manner that betrayed their uneasiness. The Alsatian asked if they were afraid.

"People may well be afraid of what they do not understand," said the elder one, sullenly; "and for my part, I should very much like to know what we are going to do in the forest at this time of night."

"Your duty," replied Moser, sternly; "do you know what is concealed under this absurd joke, by which some one is trying to frighten us? Are you sure that it is not intended to serve the purposes of some poacher or another? The wood is confided to our care, we ought to watch over it as our child. Do you wish me to take you for cowards? Come, advance, I tell you, and look to your guns."

The guards made no answer, and we directed our steps to the thicket. Moser turned towards the spot whence the sounds proceeded, which became more distinct at every step. The notes did not at all resemble contemporary hunting airs: they were long and plaintive sounds, interspersed with furious fanfaronades; their ancient rhythm reminded me of the old French airs. The Spectre Huntsman appeared to be taking a path parallel to that in which we were proceeding. In a short time the horn sounded at our right, and so close to us, that we seemed to be separated only by a few bushes. Moser turned rapidly to that side, but at the same moment we heard the note at our left. The surprised forester instantly changed his course; the whoop then sounded on the right, and more loudly than ever. This time, Moser himself appeared disconcerted, and asked the guards if there were any echoes in the forest. Both of them replied in the negative; they at the same time remarked that the horn had again changed its position, and was heard behind us. The Alsacian was about to turn back, when we distinguished it in front of us. The sound continued in this direction, which we followed for some time, but there were variations which frequently deceived us. At one time, the nocturnal hunter appeared only a few steps distant from us; at another, we might have fancied him at the other end of the forest. The two guards followed us tremblingly and panting from alarm. When, at length, we halted at a wild crossway, they began to look about them with undisguised terror.

"It is like going to meet misfortune," said the elder of the two, in an agitated voice; "the forester ought to know, that at this hour we have nothing to do with men,—common sense tells us we ought to go to our huts!"

Moser answered not. With his head inclined, and his ear open to all the sounds of the forest, he appeared to be paying particular attention to the note of the Spectre Huntsman; he at length turned towards us, saying:—"I have found the key of the enigma: the distant sounds are clearer and stronger than those nearer to us: it is neither the same musician nor the same instrument; there are evidently two horns, and we have been wasting our time for the last hour."

Probable as this explanation appeared, it did not suffice to convince our companions, who refused positively to explore one side of the forest while Moser and I took the other. The Alsacian was obliged to conduct them in one direction, and leave me to take the opposite road alone. One of the guards gave me his gun, and I entered a narrow path which conducted me to the most solitary part of the forest. I proceeded with difficulty over a marshy part, where my foot slipped at every step. The light of the stars imparted a fantastic appearance to the whole wood: sometimes streams of light, penetrating the foliage, danced before me on the grass like fairies; at others, withered and aged trees rose like phantoms, waving in the air their ivy dress; a thousand sounds were wafted on the evening breeze, nameless cries issued from holes under the roots, stifled sighs descended from the summit of the trees; an unknown and invisible world seemed to surround me. The horn had ceased to sound; but for some time I had heard the crackling of dead branches and acorns announcing footsteps, which gradually became more and more distinct. At length, at the entrance of a glade, I perceived a shadow holding a hunter's horn: like myself, it was emerging from the darkness, and entering an open space. At the slight exclamation which escaped me, it turned round, then darted to the centre of the glade, and disappeared behind a dark mass, which, at first, I took for a rock; but which, on approaching,

I found to be a gigantic oak, from whose decayed trunk had grown some thick leafy branches at a few feet from the ground. After having walked round the colossus, without being able to reach the flying shadow, I turned suddenly back, and found myself opposite to the bearer of the horn, who was no other than Bruno.

On recognising me, he appeared more surprised than alarmed; but I was angry with him for the joke which had caused me so much uneasiness, and seizing him by the collar, exclaimed: "By Jove! I've got the Spectre Huntsman now; and I'll take care to introduce him to the people of the forest."

"For love of heaven! do not do so, sir," interrupted the honey-seeker, in an agitated tone, "you would ruin me for life—and others with me!"

"Who besides?" inquired I.

He hesitated.

"Our music does not injure any one," returned he, avoiding my question, "we only wanted to make the people talk—"

The report of a gun interrupted him; he stopped short with a disconcerted air.

"That sound belies your words, master Bruno," replied I.

"It is the guards firing on their return," stammered the youth.

"The guards are in an opposite direction," returned I, "and I doubt not that those who know the sounds of the forest guns, would have little difficulty in recognising that of Bon-Affût."

Bruno looked at me.

"Some one must have told you this, sir," remarked he, "you would never have found it out by yourself.—But, sir, you would not, I am sure, wish to harm a poor man."

"More especially as I know for whom the chase is made," replied I.

I then related to him how I had heard the promise made to Louisa by the poacher, and informed him at the same time that Moser was in the forest with his guards.

Being alarmed for Bon-Affût, who deemed himself secure from pursuit on account of his stratagem, Bruno wished to go and warn him. I had lost my bearings across the marshes, and for fear of losing myself in the forest, I determined to follow him. The honey-seeker took neither the large avenues nor the narrow footpaths, but cut across towards the bed of a stream then dry, which we followed for some time, walking noiselessly over the damp leaves and flowers, and concealed by the hazel-trees. We thus reached a thickly wooded halting-place, where the poacher had just arrived with the roe.

Bruno rapidly explained to him our meeting and the presence of the guards in the forest. I indicated as clearly as I was able the direction I had seen them take, and the cross-road at which we had appointed to meet. Bruno observed that the direction they were taking would lead them away from us.

"If they follow it!" exclaimed Bon-Affût, "but, like this gentleman, they will have heard the report of my gun; by following the sound of it, they will come along the ravine of La Hublais, and in less than ten minutes we shall have them upon us. The most sensible plan will be to turn towards the heath, and to proceed by the Petite Fougeacé."

Upon this, without awaiting our reply, he took the roe, whose legs Bruno had fastened together, threw it over his shoulder, and set out. On issuing from the thicket a large shelterless heath opened before us, which we were obliged to traverse. All the stars had disappeared from the heavens; a cold wind had risen; through the night fog we could distinguish the edge of the forest encircling the heath with a yet darker border, from which proceeded the low murmur of the wind in the foliage. From time to time were heard the cries of famished wolves, to which the barkings of the village dogs responded like echoes. Bon-Affût at length re-entered the thicket, and having traversed a young plantation, turned towards the glade of La Fougeace. We began walking along the pond which encloses it on the left, when a great light suddenly appeared on the opposite side among the trees. Luminous vapours rose under the verdant roof, which were soon lost in volumes of white smoke.

"Fire! fire!" exclaimed Bon-Affût, "the wood is on fire!"

He ran with us towards the glade. We found that the conflagration had then only reached the borders. The fire was, however, gaining rapidly; it spread from shrub to shrub and soon gained some of the large trees, whose knotty trunks it affected but slightly. Bon-Affût stood leaning on his gun with both hands.

"It is some devil of a cow-keeper who has been setting fire to the brushwood again!" said he; "if we don't get rid of these idle scoundrels, we shall have no forest left soon."

"Besides which, it is we who are always accused of these things," remarked Bruno.

"The boy is right," exclaimed Bon-Affût, looking at me. "To-morrow the guards will swear that the poachers set fire to the thicket, as if people were in the habit of burning their own houses and fields." I doubted not that the Alsatian forester would regard the accident as some new trick of the Spectre Huntsman, and told them he would do well to avoid meeting Moser unless he wanted to spend a few weeks in the Savenay prison.

"Me in prison!" interrupted Bon-Affût, raising his gun in a menacing attitude; "that is impossible! The thicket is necessary to my existence. In prison! the devil take me if I would not tear away the walls with my nails! It is in the forest I have all my friends; I must be there. . . for the adder. . . and for others besides. . . But you are right, sir, nevertheless; it is no good stopping here; especially as we can do nothing to prevent the fire. If the wind remains in this quarter, there is no danger; the forest will be right enough. Only we must turn back, for we cannot pass by here, seeing we are enclosed by the fire and water."

We turned towards the entrance of the glade; but before we reached it, Bruno, who was in advance of us, turned back hastily.

"What is the matter?" inquired the poacher, stopping short.

"I saw some one in the path!" replied the youth in an undertone.

We turned back and reached the shadow cast by a group of willows on the edge of the pond; but were too late to escape the eyes of Moser and his two guards, who were just issuing from the wood.

"We are taken!" exclaimed the honey-seeker on seeing the Alsatian pointing to us.

"Not yet!" muttered Bon-Affût, concealing himself behind the foliage.

The foresters continued to march towards us; they could not have perceived the poacher, who, from the first moment, had disappeared in the shadow. I hastily gave Bruno to understand that the only method of concealing the presence of Bon-Affût, and of preventing a dangerous engagement was to go and meet them. He instantly dispossessed himself of the hunting horn, which he let fall on the grass near Bon-Affût, and advanced with me towards Moser. The forester had scarcely recognised me when, without losing time in questioning us, he hastened to examine the conflagration. Although the flames did not appear to be gaining, he sent the two guards to obtain help from the boisiers as speedily as possible. It was only after their departure that we were enabled to exchange a few words. As the poacher had expected, Moser had taken the direction indicated by the report of the gun. The brushwood being on fire confirmed his suspicions.

"The poachers are at work," said he to me, "and in order to keep the wood to themselves, they have attempted to frighten us. Happily, I have had too much experience to be alarmed by old women's tales. From the first I perceived that the forest was being plundered; every one makes use of it as if it were his own property. The flocks of the Gavra graze there and eat up the growing oaks; the scythe of the peasant cuts down the rest for litters; the bird-lime merchants, by taking off the bark of the holly, get a hundred louis a-year for dead wood. There are no longer stags in the forest, and soon one may search in vain for roes. It is high time to put a stop to the proceedings of these vagabonds, who thus impudently live upon the king's property."

At this moment his eye fell on Bruno, who was returning to us after examining the marsh, and he asked me who was the companion I had met with on my road. I explained our meeting at the farmer's during the day, and a few minutes since, at the "Oak of the Grand Duke," in such a manner as to avoid suspicion. Moser addressed several questions to him, but the honey-seeker appeared not to understand. An air of stupidity had suddenly spread over his countenance; at every question the forester asked, he burst out laughing, and gave long and childish answers. I soon perceived that, while he was thus diverting the attention of the Alsatian, his eyes were fixed on the opening of the glade, and he appeared by his glance to be penetrating the obscurity of the night; I looked in the same direction, and fancied that I could distinguish a vague form climbing up the side of the pond. This I instantly took to be Bon-Affût, who was then gaining the wood. Bruno testified no inclination to follow him. While seated on the grass before the fire, which appeared now to be dying away, he listened attentively to Moser, who was explaining to me his plan for the seizure of the forest plunderers.

Our conversation was interrupted by the arrival of the guards, who were accompanied by a numerous body of boisiers. At the announcement of a fire they had all hastened to the spot, armed with buckets, pitchforks, and axes. The women themselves had followed to lend their assistance. A slight effort sufficed to render them masters of the conflagration: the hedge which was still burning was cut down, the ground cleared, and the fire extinguished. The damage was very slight; but the boisiers being supported by the wood of the forest, which they considered as their property, were alarmed and irritated by the summons they had thus suddenly received. Everybody inquired at the same moment how the fire had broken out in the first instance.

"How? indeed!" repeated the forester; "ask those idle scoundrels whom you leave masters of the wood, and who will one day make of it a heap of cinders! This is what comes of your ghost tales round the fireside! The flourish of a horn makes you tremble like a parcel of old women, while the poachers are busy killing the game, and setting fire to the wood."

There was a general movement and exchange of looks among the country-people. The younger part of the community evidently inclined to Moser's opinions; but the larger portion could not thus easily escape from the empire of tradition.

"Bruno has seen the Spectre Huntsman," said a woman.

"We have all heard the vile horn," added an old man.

"To-morrow we shall have proof of the hunt by feathers and other things strowed in the paths."

"And since the forester went out during the chase, no doubt he will have his share."

"The devil take me! I should like to see myself at that game, certainly!" exclaimed Moser laughing, and taking up his gun, which he had placed against an oak.

He suddenly stopped short. The foot of a roe was placed in the very mouth of the gun! The surprise was general. The boisiers looked with terror on what they considered as a talisman of evil sent from the Spectre Huntsman; the Alsatian, after reflecting for a moment or two, struck his forehead, and turning towards me exclaimed:—

"It is a trick of that young lad whom you met at the Duke's Oak; he was here just now, what is become of him?"

I looked round me for Bruno; but he was not to be found. The forester was inquiring what road he could have taken, when the women who had gone to the pond in search of water to extinguish the last surviving embers returned with the hunting horn which Bruno had concealed under the willow. The boisiers instantly remembered that they had seen it in the hands of Bon-Affût. At the mention of this name, light appeared to break in upon Moser. The information he had received since his arrival concerning the poacher, inclined him to the belief that all that had just happened was his work. The honey-seeker was evidently his accomplice; both had taken advantage of the credulity of the boisiers to perform the comedy of the Spectre Huntsman, and when they found themselves pursued, had set fire to the thicket in order to escape attention.

Despite the probability of this explanation, the boisiers would have remained incredulous had it not been for the arrival of Marcella, who, on hearing of the fire, had proceeded to the spot by the main road, and was, consequently, ignorant of what had passed in the glade. She stated that in the lesser ravine she had seen two men who at first alarmed her, but on approaching, she had recognised Bruno and Bon-Affût; she had called to them, but instead of answering her, they had hurried into the plantations. This announcement put an end to all doubt. A general murmur of disapprobation arose. Ashamed of having been thus duped, and alarmed by the conflagration which threatened their means of subsistence, the boisiers exclaimed that the poachers ought to be arrested. Marcella's statement induced them to take the road leading to the Magdeleine: they divided themselves into several parties with the intention of occupying all the passages, and re-assembling at the farm. Being unable to warn the fugitives or prevent the pursuit, I determined on not quitting the forester. The troop that Moser led on took the path in which Bon-Affût and Bruno had been seen; but the latter were doubtless too far in advance of us to be overtaken, for we arrived at the Magdeleine without seeing anything of them. Although the farm was all shut up and still, yet one treacherous gleam of light on the threshold proved that everybody was not asleep; a dog having barked at our approach the light disappeared. Moser motioned us to remain where we were while he advanced alone. Almost at the same moment the door opened, Louroux looked out to see who was coming, and the forester suddenly appeared in front of him.

At the farmer's exclamation we all advanced simultaneously, while he moved back to permit us to enter; but instantly recovering himself, he again advanced to the threshold, and asked what brought us there.

"In the first place, this good-for-nothing fellow," said Moser, pointing to Bruno, who was seated by the fire, "and in the second place, another one, who, I take it, is also at the farm with him."

"Who is that?" inquired Louroux, with an air of astonishment.

"Anthony, the poacher."

"Bon-Affût? he is not here, as you may see; but I spoke to him only yesterday, as this gentleman can testify."

The forester did not waste his time in disputing, but diligently examined every corner of the farm, though without success. Louroux seeing his disappointment, judged it a favourable opportunity to complain of a visit of this description, and at such an hour: he began in a very lofty tone, but the Alsatian soon silenced him by stating that his connexion with the poachers was well known, that the reception of the honey-seeker at midnight was proof conclusive, and that he would have to give an account of his share in the double sin of poaching, and setting fire to the wood. He then briefly narrated what had happened, adding that all the roads were guarded, and resumed his pursuit followed by the terrified peasant, who had speedily changed his key, and was now in the humblest manner calling on all the saints in the calendar to bear testimony to his innocence.

The forester desired Bruno to follow him. On passing one of the press-beds which surrounded the only apartment of the farm, the youth murmured a few words which I was unable to distinguish; but he had scarcely departed, when the door of the bed was gently opened, and by the dawning light I perceived Louisa's lovely head advancing cautiously. Fatigued with my nocturnal walk through the forest, I had seated myself in the shade by the fireside, where she could not see me. She leant towards the side of the bed, looked again at the door, and quietly gained the floor; her feet were uncovered, she wore a plain cloth petticoat and a little nightcap, like a child's. I saw her advance towards the door carefully—look out—reach the second entrance, which opened on a back yard.

Being persuaded that it was her intention to warn the poacher, I followed her to the threshold. As she was about to cross the yard, Moser's voice was heard, and he himself soon appeared. The young girl was at first startled, and began to retreat, but apparently, on second thoughts, maintained her ground. The forester approached in company with Louroux. Marcella was at a little distance, carrying on a very lively conversation with Bruno.

"Pray what is the cause of all this bustle, M. Louroux?" inquired Louisa smiling; "why are the poor shepherdesses awoke before day-break?"

"Where does this girl come from, and what does she want?" interrupted Moser quickly, while Marcella started at the sound of Louisa's voice.

"What!" exclaimed she, approaching, "cannot the forester see that it is the shepherdess of the Magdeleine, whose parents did not leave her either shoes or stockings."

And addressing the young girl with triumphant and insulting pity, she continued:—

"Alas! this is a sad misfortune for you, poor child! your dear friend, Bon-Affût, will soon be taken to prison."

"And his misery appears to be a great benefit to you," replied Louisa rather bitterly; "at least, to judge from your face."

"It is always a benefit to honest people, when justice is done," returned Marcella, raising her voice; "Bon-Affût is a bad man who has set the hedges on fire. . . ."

"That is untrue, Marcella!" exclaimed Louisa, whose blue eye flashed with indignation; "Bon-Affût loves the wood too dearly to set it on fire. It is but poor courage to attack those who are absent, especially when there is no one to defend them."

"You are defending him yourself, stupid creature!" replied the boisière, bursting out laughing.

"That is at least a proof that she has a kinder heart than you," observed the honey-seeker sternly.

Marcella turned towards him with an air of disdain. "Well done, my good Bruno!" said she, satirically, "we know that you think well of Louisa and Bon-Affût. 'Birds of a feather flock together;' but, at present, things are against you, poor fellow, and you are both secured."

"That's another fib!" interrupted the shepherdess angrily; "Bon-Affût is not, and will not be taken."

"The cunning little thing, she knows that, at any rate!" cried Marcella; "I should not wonder if she knows the poacher's hiding-place too!"

Moser, who had hitherto paid but little attention to the dispute between the girls, now joined the conversation. He questioned Louisa, using every possible method of surprising her; but the little shepherdess eluded his snares with a quick and a ready tact, that quite surprised me. The boisiers arrived during the colloquy; they had explored the roads, but without meeting any one. The forester was unable to conceal his vexation. Besides the necessity he felt for justifying the trust committed to him by the administration, whom he had promised to reform the abuses by which the forest was being destroyed, he doubtless found his amour-propre wounded, by not succeeding in his project when surrounded by so many witnesses, especially as he had intended to signalise his arrival at Gavre by an important capture. Having given orders to search carefully the environs of the Magdeleine, he seated himself at the door, and lighted his German pipe, as if he intended there to await the result of the fresh researches.

Nevertheless, I observed that he continued to watch Louisa's movements. The day had dawned, and the horn of the cow-keeper was heard in the distance; the shepherdess brought the cattle out of the stables, and proceeded towards the pasture-land. Moser allowed her to depart without appearing to take any notice; but she had scarcely left the house two minutes, when he extinguished his pipe, and resumed his gun. I asked him what he proposed doing; he placed his finger on his lips, pointed to the shepherdess, and quickly gained the field she was crossing. I joined him without a very clear perception of his intentions, and we followed Louisa to the other side of the hedge. The young girl was singing, neither hurrying nor looking behind her, and apparently was solely occupied with the straws she was weaving. On reaching the pasture-land, she climbed on a little eminence, and seated herself under a group of ash-trees. For the first time she looked round her, but in a careless manner, as though she had no particular object in so doing. Almost at her feet extended a field of ripe corn, waving in the morning breeze. On the right, was situated the forest, on the left were some shrubs by which we were concealed. Louisa continued singing; but her voice was insensibly raised, and the sound extended to a great distance, in the stillness of the morning.

"In what heathenish tongue is she singing?" inquired Moser, vainly attempting to understand the words.

I motioned to him to be silent, for I had recognised the rude Breton accent. Louisa was singing the old "Quers de Jean Devereux," but interspersing it with advice to an invisible auditor. "Bretons, be on your guards, there is the dwelling of Jean la Prise; he is in the citadel with his soldiers, like a snail in his shell."

At this part, the intonation of the voice changed slightly, and the traditional words were substituted for the following concise warning: "The whole troop of the boisiers is here; the best thing for you to do is to return to the forest by the 'Mare aux Aspics.'"

Then the original strain recommenced: "They have pillaged the country of both old and new things,—the silver crosses of the churches, and the golden drinking-cups of the citizens."

The voice was again raised in order to add, "There is no one on the right; follow the corn-field without raising your head, you will reach the thicket of holly."

I looked towards the wheat-field, and in a few seconds saw a small opening made in the side, and a kind of furrow appeared, which seemed to be moving towards the forest. I rose in order to see more distinctly; Moser, who was watching my movements, followed the direction of my eye with his own, perceived the motion of the wheat, and uttered an exclamation of joy; he had guessed all. Hastening past the shrubs by which we were sheltered, he ran through the meadow and reached the wheat-field, which was surrounded at that part by an enclosure too high for leaping over; he hurried forward, and soon discovering a gap merely filled up with branches, sprang towards it; but uttering an exclamation of pain, he suddenly fell down. He had met with the scythe which was concealed under the branches for the destruction of wild boars. The two guards, who had at that moment arrived, and like myself had observed the accident, hastened to assist Moser. He was covered with blood, but appeared not to trouble himself about it. "Quick, quick, to the poacher!" murmured he, pointing to the road Bon-Affût had taken.

After a moment's hesitation, the guards commenced their pursuit of Anthony, whilst Moser raised himself and followed their movements with his eye. I inquired in vain whether he was dangerously wounded. Mechanically stanching with his handkerchief the blood which flowed from his breast and hands, he appeared solely intent on the poacher's progress. As soon as the latter saw that he was discovered, he did not attempt to conceal himself in the corn, but ran quickly through the field, hoping to gain the wood. The guards followed him; but he had evidently had more practise in running than his pursuers, for the distance between them was increasing at every step. He was on the point of escaping from them, when, at the last enclosure, he unexpectedly found himself in front of a troop of boisiers, who surrounded and seized him. At the cries which announced this capture, Moser made a triumphant gesture, and, faint from loss of blood, fell down on the ground.

A quarter of an hour afterwards every body was assembled before Louroux's farm. A cart was preparing for the forester, whose wounds had been bound up. At a short distance, in the centre of a circle formed by the peasants, stood Bon-Affût and Bruno, with their hands tied. Louisa was seated at a few steps from them, sobbing violently. I approached to give some encouragement to the prisoners; but the poacher, who had been silent for some time, just at that moment addressed the young shepherdess; he spoke Breton, that he might not be understood by the rest of the people.

"Do not cry any more, dear child," said he in a gentle voice. "Do you not remember that there is a jealous heart here, drinking in your tears like water?"

He looked at Marcella, who was watching them at a distance with an expression of joy mingled with uneasiness; but Louisa paid no attention to the kind of advantage she thus gave her rival: the misery of her two friends engrossed her attention. "You will be in prison! in prison! my dear ones!" resumed she, clasping her hands together.

"The had will not be long there, for they can bring forward nothing against him."

"But you, dear Anthony," said Louisa, looking at Bon-Affût with filial tenderness, "what will become of you when you have no beautiful trees over your head, when you can no longer breathe the fresh air, and will be obliged night and day to be confined in a wretched cell?"

A shade passed over the poacher's face. "Yes, it will be a hard trial," said he, sadly.

"Let me at least be with you, dear old Anthony," resumed Louisa, quickly; "perhaps they will let me live with you, or if that is forbidden, I can go to the prison-door and sing, to let you know that I am there, and I will go to the judges to ask them to let you come home again."

"Poor innocent one!" interrupted Bon-Affût, "what would the people say here? and how would you live down there?"

"Here they would say that I act towards you as if you were my father," replied the shepherdess; "you know they say so already; and to obtain my living at Savenay I would work, or if there is no work to be had, why, I would sit down near the prison, and when any kind persons passed, they would see that I was hungry and give me something."

A softened smile illuminated the countenance of the poacher; he looked kindly on the little peasant girl, whose face was turned towards him. "You are kind-hearted, Louisa," said he, "but you must stay at the Magdeleine; it is my desire. It is not proper for young girls to be begging on the road. Remain here; Bruno will be back before long, and I shall return afterwards."

The shepherdess wished still to oppose this plan. "I have said it, do you understand?" added the poacher, imperiously. Louisa joined her hands and bowed her head. "I will do as you wish," said she with almost timorous resignation.

There was a tolerably long silence; Bruno interrupted it by announcing in a solto voce that they were going to start. The guards had just placed Moser in the cart and taken their guns. Louisa threw her arms round Bon-Affût and sobbed aloud. The poacher's courage appeared to fail: he turned pale, trembled, and was obliged to sit down; but it was the emotion of a moment. He rose almost instantly. "God will protect you, poor child," said he, with difficulty restraining his tears, "do not weep. . . . Say good-bye to her, Bruno. . . . and now, enough. Courage, Louisa, we shall return when God pleases."

Then recovering himself, he added in a lower tone:—

"One word more, Louisa; you know where the Mare aux Aspics is, you know the snake's hole; I have hidden seven pieces of money there, it is all I have saved. I wanted to make up the number to ten for the day when you and Bruno return from church together. As long as there is any chance of my completing the sum, do not touch it; but if you hear that I am no longer alive, then take it as a legacy; the snake knows you as well as she knows me, and will let you go to the hole."

At these words he again embraced the young girl, whose sobs redoubled in spite of herself. I determined to interfere.

"Do not grieve yourself thus, my good girl," said I, in Breton, "your two friends will soon return."

"You speak Blohi,¹ sir," exclaimed the poacher, "then you have heard everything."

"But I will take advantage of nothing," added I, quickly, "for I am now about to depart as well as yourself, and I will join you to-morrow at Savenay, where I hope my deposition will completely acquit you."

"May God reward you!" exclaimed Bruno and Louisa at the same moment. We could say no more, for the guards approached. They motioned to the prisoners, who placed themselves behind the cart, and the little escort set out on their march. On passing, Moser hailed me. There was on his pale face and in his feverish eyes an expression of savage joy. The loutier watched the little band from the farm-yard, while Louisa, standing on the little wall, was by signs taking farewell of the prisoners, but suddenly she uttered a cry, and turning towards me, burst into tears. The cart and the prisoners had just disappeared in the shadow of the ravine.

I was unable to reach Savenay until the second day after my departure from the Gavre: but I immediately went to the magistrate who was entrusted with the affair of the poacher and Bruno. My explanations sufficed to dissipate all suspicion about the conflagration, and to set the young honey-seeker at liberty. As to his companion, he had two heavy old accounts to settle with the foresters to enable me to obtain his freedom before my departure; but I had happily found an old school-fellow at Savenay, who was then a lawyer, and who promised to attend to Bon-Affût, and assist him if he needed aid. I spent a long time after my excursion to the encampment of the boisiers, that the lawyer at Savenay had succeeded in procuring Bon-Affût's liberation after a few weeks' imprisonment, and that he had procured him a situation on the estate of Carheil, where the former poacher had become the lean ideak of a gamekeeper. I was informed also, that the latter was about to be once more associated with the honey-seeker, who had recently been engaged as gardener at the castle, and who was to join him after harvest time with the shepherdess of the Magdeleine, whom the natives of the forest denominated beforehand, Louisa Bruon.

TRIC TRAC.

TENIERS.

THE scene of this picture is the outer and inner guard-room: it is composed of three distinct groups, all differing in character, and yet united in duty, and forming a perfect whole. The men of the remotest group are huddled round the fire, and though their backs are towards us we can see that they are smoking and drinking and engaged at cards. Games of chance are the delight of soldiers. The second or central group is composed of three soldiers—men of mark no doubt in their regiment, for they stand in grave deliberation, and are either discussing the plan of the next campaign, or lamenting the lack of discipline, and love of drink and gaming in their comrades. Those of the third or foreground group are engaged on the game which gives the name to the picture. Two of them seem very citizens, or are more probably members of the Commissariat: the other two are officers, one of whom holds a small flagon in his hand, while the other is remonstrating with his opponent in the game, and by his clenched hands and serious visage seems to be on the point of losing it. The varied expression and light and shade and handling of the work are all masterly, and show on what grounds the reputation of the painter has been established.

(1) The Breton dialect of Vannes.

With the works of the school to which Teniers belongs no one was better acquainted than Reynolds, for he made a picture-tour in Holland and Flanders; made patient observations, took copious notes, and passed no fine production without careful examination. "Their merit," he says, "often consists in the truth of representation alone: whatever praise they deserve, whatever pleasure they give when under the eye, they make but a poor figure in description. It is to the eye only that the works of this school are addressed: it is not therefore to be wondered at, that what was intended solely for the gratification of one sense succeeds but ill when applied to another." This is an unfair description, we think, of the works of the Dutch School: had any one told Sir Joshua that his portraits were addressed but to the eye, he would have resented it as an affront, and with good reason. The pictures of which he speaks are full of domestic gladness and fireside joy, and though copies—literal perhaps—of what the painters saw, they supply the spectator with matter for reflection and study. Their object was not only to please the eye, but to gratify the mind. They are not exalted by genius, nor do they excite any extraordinary ecstacy, yet they please other senses than the sight—wherever human character appears, and of this the Dutch compositions are full, the mind is called into action.

It is one of the rules of study laid down by Reynolds, that a painter had to make up his idea of perfection from the various excellences dispersed over the world. To Italy, he said, men must go for dignity of thought and splendour of imagination, and for the higher branches of knowledge; but as a poetical fancy and power of expression, or even correctness of drawing, were seldom united with such skill in colour as would set off these beauties to the best advantage, it would be necessary to go to the Dutch to learn the art of painting, for in the true use of colours they were unequalled. An artist, he says, by a close examination of their works may, in a few hours, make himself master of the principles on which they wrought, which cost them whole ages—and perhaps the experience of a succession of ages—to ascertain.

Works bearing the name of Teniers are numerous in the world—three painters, a father and two sons—and each skilful—may in some degree account for this, but unquestionably there are counterfeits in circulation. Skilful copies pass in the sight of many for rare originals, or a slight change in a figure or a piece of furniture enables the happy proprietor to call it a first or a second thought of Teniers, and demand a high price. Their cabinet size aids too in countenancing the imposture, for a fine Teniers or an Ostade, a Jan Steen or a Gerard Dow will go into small space, and may have been contained in the hitherto unrummaged chamber of some Dutch Burgomaster: all this is present to the mind of the wily seller, who is as ready with simulated names and dates as with simulated commodities.

Those who visit Holland will still find the pictures of Teniers plentiful, though the French reaped a rich harvest of art in the land. The Dutch had the taste to fill their cabinets with pictures not only suitable in dimensions but also national with respect to subject. Whatever gave a true and brilliant image of the land and the people found favour in their sight; nor were they averse to look on the humblest scenes. Teniers was a painter after the people's heart: he went but to the cottage or to the market-place or the barracks for subjects: a woman spinning by a clear fire and well-swept hearth: a market-girl holding up a hare for sale: an old man repairing spectacles: boors drinking in the inside of a change-house or quarrelling at the door: a man blowing a trumpet or proving the strength of a new brewing; or soldiers at cards on the drumhead, or dancing on the dusty road-side during a march, or gambling in the guard-room, as in the present picture, were matters dear to the sight and welcome to the pencil of this eminent master.

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.

BY JANE M. WINNARD.

CHAPTER VIII.

LOVE AND LOVE'S ENEMY.

FOURTEEN years! twice seven glowing summers and as many icy winters had waxed and waned over the souls of that man and woman, with results notable and strange enough; but they had passed away as a tale that is told, and left no perceptible effect on that ruined turret. The self-same ivy wreaths clung round the old stones; the wall-flowers bloomed exactly where they use to bloom; and the delicate briar-rose showered down its perfumed petals on the moss as of yore, when the linnet sprung forth from its nest in alarm at the approach of human beings. To David Underwood the bird seemed the very same bird that he had so often disturbed when, impelled by the fervour of his youthful passion, he used to repair to the old turret at most unseasonable hours of the day and of the night, that he might be nearer, a little nearer to Miriam Grey. The bird burst forth now just as it used to do, fluttered about, uttered its short sweet note of alarm, swept rapidly round and round within the circle of the old wall; and then, descending once more, bravely settled on the topmost bough of the bush that concealed its precious home, and looked at the intruders with a bright bold eye, but a visibly palpitating heart.

"Poor little flutterer! you are here as of old," thought David Underwood; "What you are now you were then. The same love swells that melodious throat, the same joy satisfies, the same fear agitates that little beating heart. You are the same—the same! fourteen years have wrought no change in you. Oh! thou little bird—ye peaceful ancient stones! that for one hour I might be as ye, peaceful of no change in all these long, long years! That I might forget a little while that it is not with me as with you! That I might be a boy once more, that this painful load of experience would roll away from my heart, and send its deepest waters gushing up again into the sunlight, to gladden and refresh! But it cannot be! No, not for one hour—my lost love! Probation, struggle, failure, change! These—these are life, and I have lived! Love too is life. And I have lived in other love than this earliest one. Lived in the true love! aye, and well-nigh died of the false love; bitter hideous mockery of God's best gift!"

He stood with folded arms, erect, motionless, save for the slight quivering of that upper lip—that sensitive upper lip—which no amount of experience and victory over passion could quell into perfect calm, when the heart within was moved strongly. Seventy years of earthly life would not wear out the power of feeling in that heart. David Underwood would never die from mere fatigue of living. Even in the midst of his greatest sufferings, disappointments, crushing failures; when all the pleasant refreshing breezes of the morning of life had passed, and he was toiling amidst the burden and heat of the sultry noon; even then he had scarcely ever longed for death, but felt keenly the truth sung by our great contemporary poet—

"'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
Oh life, not death, for which we pant!
More life and fuller, that I want."

He stood before his first love, and shrank not from gazing on her, though his heart had not throbbed for her unceasingly, as he once believed it would do through life. David Underwood had not been a constant lover, and he had now to confess the truth. He could not choose but remember, how, fourteen years before, he had sought an interview with Miriam Grey on that spot to confess a far different truth. He looked back on the boy, David Underwood, with unutterable tenderness and sympathy. How he loved and venerated that young, pure, earlier self; that strong, untried spirit, crowned with no glory but that of a first love for the girl-angel, Miriam Grey!

He stood and gazed, and gazed. What was there in the expression of that woman's face, of those sightless eyes, that struck through him like an electric shock? Why are his arms extended as if to clasp her? Why do they sink again with ineffectual longing? Why are his eyes closed, as if to shut out earth and heaven, and all the past years that stare in upon him and tell of the actual, of the folly of unavailing regret; of the necessity for all things being as they are? Why is David Underwood, the philosopher, trembling before a woman? Fast losing his present, conscious, self-possessed Ego, and becoming a boy again?

This must not be. He did not think he was so weak. It must be suppressed—shaken off. He is no longer a boy, to be mastered by his feelings. His will is the lord and master over them. He will speak at once. First, about his father's unfortunate losses—and the remedy which he himself (thanks to his success in the career of this world) is able to bring, and of which he can as yet speak to no one but herself. After that, he will speak of David Underwood, as of an intimate friend who has sent him to tell the story of his eventful life; that she may know all, and judge righteous judgment. He will school his voice, and bring about the desired end by the means he himself appoints. That is to act like a wise man and a strong minded one; and such is he, by the acknowledgment of all the world. He folded his arms resolutely once more, he threw back his head, as if that proud action were necessary to his complete self-possession, and was about to speak; when a simple circumstance overturned pride, self-possession, plans, philosophy, all—

Miriam Grey, on her side, felt and thought. It takes long to write what a moment or two suffices to the heart and brain to think and feel;—and while the sound of the retiring footsteps died away, and while David was immersed in vivid emotion, such as I have so imperfectly indicated, the clear, pure spirit of Miriam Grey became subdued, and she waited patiently for the words of the stranger. At first she was simply expectant; conscientiously waiting, and endeavouring to hold her mind in readiness for any blow. But while she was waiting with her face turned towards the quarter where she felt sure the stranger was standing, a change came over her. There was an external influence, something she could not define, but which was as real as if she could grasp it in her hand, or explain it in mathematical form to another—an influence from without, from the unseen point where that stranger stood, which seemed to permeate and warm her whole being, and to draw her heart with trembling joy towards it. Her soft eyes brightened, the disquiet and fear passed away—an instinct, a moral certainty impelled her. She half rose. Some one was there whose presence was as sunlight to her soul. Pressing one hand over her eyes, she stretched out the other, and said in a low tone, half joyous, half fearful and surprised—

"Where are you, David?—For it is you, I know, now, though I cannot see. Where are you?"

The outstretched hand was grasped in silence—in silence pressed to lips, eager and trembling as those which had touched it on that night so many years ago. Oh! he had come back loving her still. She could not be mistaken. All her fears and doubts vanished. He had been true to her. How could she even for a moment think what she had thought this last few hours? But, he had come back—he was at her feet once more.

How it was so he knew not; but life came back again as it had been with him when he last kissed that gentle hand. The fourteen intervening years, with all their changes, trials, duties, rolled away, away, like a troubled dream when one awakes. For a brief space they were utterly forgotten, and David Underwood was a boy again—a boy that had never been a man—a lover who had never so much as dreamed that it was possible to love any woman but Miriam Grey. All that he had determined to do vanished from his mind,—his actual position was forgotten, and the thing he had believed was impossible took shape in a moment. He sunk at her feet—his arms were flung round her—his face was buried in her lap, his strong voice murmuring low—

"Miriam! my lost, lost love!"

Her hands were folded on his head; they pressed it fervently; she trembled in every limb, but her eyes looked steadfastly up to the sunny heaven which she could not see, as she uttered her simple thanksgiving:

"Oh God! I thank thee that thou hast brought this hour. That thou hast blessed me thus."

"Miriam! Sweet, lost love!" came forth in passionate accents from the heart that communicated somewhat of its wild pulsation to her own, usually so tranquil and resigned.

"You have come back to us, to me, at last. I knew you would. I had confidence always in your love."

"Miriam! Miriam!"

"Nay—if you had never come back, I should have trusted. I know that life for such as you, with genius and power, life has stern duties—duties which might keep you away from me long—very long."

"Miriam! Do you not know?"

"I ask not to know anything just now; but that you are here, and that you love me. These are truths enough."

"They are truths—but not enough. My own, my lost Miriam!"

"Yes, yes," she murmured, bending her gentle face down that she might whisper in his ear. "Enough for the present. Ample! I could bear no more now. You shall explain and justify hereafter. Since you hold the old love, let all the sad dreary past go by.—Forget it."

"Forget! Never! There is no forgetting. There is no going back." He started up.—"What mad delusion is this?" he continued, stepping slowly back as if to withdraw himself from her influence. "God pardon me! I have been dreaming, and—I have led you to mistake. I did not mean to wrong you thus. Pardon! Oh, pardon! You do not know—my father did not tell you—I see it now! It remains for me to tell, what should have been told you long since by others. Your old lover, David Underwood, was married five years ago."

Sudden as a lightning flash the eloquent blood rushed over her face and neck. There was a nervous clenching of the little white hands that had rested on his head a few moments before, and then slowly she rose and turned to go away without a word, a sigh, or tear.

There was a something in her motion as she stepped with an uncertain cautious tread, so unlike the graceful decision of the girl he had loved, that he was reminded of her affliction once more. He was penetrated to the soul with tender pity. Pity for her blindness crossed that other pity for the pain he had inflicted. So gentle, so delicate, so sensitive, and (as he now learned) still so loving towards himself! How could he bear to see her thus—blind, helpless, solitary; and not to have the power to comfort and support her! Nay, to have been himself the cause of the agony she now suffered, and which she, with all her pride and reserve, could not conceal!

"Miriam!" he cried in a voice of deep emotion, and grasping her arm gently. "Stop. Do not go, I implore you! Speak to me, Miriam!"

How that fair face turned from him, and the arm was withdrawn from his grasp!—How gently, how full of sorrow and gentle reproach!—there was no indignant pride in the action.

"I cannot speak to you now. Presently I—I—"

"Only one word—to save a fellow-creature from great pain. Say that you will hear my story one day,—that you forgive me. I wrote long since to you, to tell you of my intended marriage."

"I never had the letter."

"It was enclosed in one to my father."

"He never opened any of your letters. He—I—no one knew of this. It has taken me by surprise—after our meeting just now. Before, it would not have surprised me." She moved on.

"Miriam! you have not said you forgive me."

"Forgive, what? What do you ask me to forgive?"

"My faithlessness to you. I will not extenuate."

"There is no need. You owed me no faith—you were free. Did I not set you free when you first went away?"

"Forgive me, Miriam!"

"What shall I forgive?" She raised her head proudly, and the blind eyes filled with tears were fixed on him.

"Forgive me for betraying you into the manifestation of a feeling of which you are now ashamed. Forgive me for daring to forget what was due to you and to myself—for being led away by the associations of this place, and the disordered state of my own mind. Forgive me the pain, the—the insult—"

"Ah! there it is! that is the word: you have said it," she replied, in a low distinct tone. "Listen to me, David Underwood! You are right; I have somewhat to forgive. Of what once was between us—for it was a reality, even in your heart—of that I will say nothing. Let it go. Past of what is and ought to be I will speak. When David Underwood returns to his native place, should his first act be to enter into his father's house in disguise? Should his next act be to insult Miriam Grey in the very spot where he sought her love? Truly there is somewhat for me to forgive—a direct insult to myself, and the sudden annihilation of my reverence for a great man;—for until this hour, David Underwood, I have believed you to be a truly great and good man.—Let me go hence and learn to forgive."

He took her hand; he held it forcibly in both his. "Nay, Miriam; for the sake of truth and justice you will—you must hear what I have to say in defence of—"

As with eager remonstrant look and tone he held her hand, and was about to explain the cause of his strange conduct, the little door which communicated with the tower opened suddenly, and Mrs. Ward appeared.

"Come, Miriam, breakfast is waiting; the bannocks are nearly cold. There's Philip—Eh!—I beg your pardon, I did not know you had a visitor. You're just in time for breakfast, sir."

"I am afraid I must not remain any longer, madam; you are very kind—another time, perhaps.—Bannocks of your own making? that is a temptation, indeed! but it is impossible. I am waited for at the rectory. Good morning, madam; good morning, Miss Grey,"—and he disappeared.

"Well, he is the strangest looking creature I ever saw!" exclaimed the pretty widow, looking after him with the greatest curiosity. "What brought him here, I should like to know; he is an old acquaintance of yours, I suppose,—you seemed extremely intimate, Miriam!—why, she is gone, I declare!"

Miriam had passed through the doorway, had reached her own room, and locked herself in, before Mrs. Ward had recovered from her astonishment, and was recalled to a sense of the importance of bannocks and breakfast.

CHAPTER IX.

MIRIAM GREY

It was a small chamber high up in the tower, lighted by one window, gothic-arched, and covered with antique scutcheons of the Greys, painted by the hand of an Italian artist. It commanded a wide prospect—overlooking Milford Valley, and range after range of hill and mountain beyond; and on the far horizon, when the day was clear, might be seen a long blue line, which was the ocean.

Often, very often in early youth, had Miriam Grey crept into the deep embrasure of that window, and sat there with her eyes fixed longingly on that faint distant streak; seeking she knew not what—only something fuller, freer, more vivid than her life on this remote hill-side. The craving for emotion, for adventure, for change,—natural to every young and active soul, was strong within her, but it had to succumb to the iron rule of circumstance. The instincts of the free savage, the child of nature, with which we all come into the world, must be subjugated by the laws of civilized and social life, if we are to become members of a civilized society at all.

With men, who think without authority from other men, it oftentimes becomes a question whether membership of a civilized society is worth having, at the cost of cramping and crushing out many noble instincts, many germs of truth and beauty. With them it becomes a question, whenever the bonds of society are drawn tightly across their own souls, and they struggle to get free—only drawing the bonds the tighter by their struggling. With men it is a question, I say, because they feel within themselves a strength, (if the will were strong enough,) to break away from this artificial life,

"To burst all links of habit—there to wander far away
On from island unto island at the gateways of the day."

"There, they think, would be enjoyment, more than in this march of mind,
In the steam-ship, in the railway, in the thoughts that shake mankind."

There the passions, cramp'd no longer, shall have scope and breathing space—"

And this comes not from a desire for licence, but from a desire to seek out a better law, a truer law, a law that shall more nearly approach to God's law felt within themselves, than the little laws of man's making. This question is almost always decided (whenever it does arise in the mind of a man) in favour of remaining within the bounds of the civilization in which he was born. He believes it to be the least of two evils; that is all. He is by no means thoroughly in love with this beautiful state of things called Western civilization—nobody is who has a mind apt to look beneath the surface—but he accepts it as a necessary condition, a means; perhaps the only means, certainly the means appointed by the Great Creator for the passage of humanity to a higher mode of life here on the earth.

With women it is otherwise. It is no question with them, as regards their conduct, what they shall or shall not do in the matter. Morally, they are disabled from entertaining it, because they have neither the will nor the power to choose. Their desire is to another—in—and for another; and provided that desire be gratified, they are not curious about how the affairs of the world are managed. It is not a moral question with them;—the "ought I," or "ought I not," never comes to their minds in these matters. Even the pseudo-emancipated women do not discuss the question of emancipation from civilization itself: they only want to be emancipated from certain things in the present state of society which they believe to be positive evils, unnecessary and obstructive of civilization, and not things essential to the very existence of civilization itself;—which it is said by some wise people that they are. But though it is not a moral question, it is often, very often, a subject of speculation and imagination with cultivated women. They wonder what life, more especially life for woman, is like, elsewhere,—among the Amazons—in polygamous countries—among the Nomadic tribes of Central Asia, in that other civilization of China and Japan, and among the South Sea Islanders. Generally, as is most natural (whether always most strictly in accordance with the rules of logic and right reason, let logicians decide,) they draw comparisons much in favour of the land they live in. The more imaginative their nature, and the more of quiet and solitude and leisure there is in their daily life, the more are young girls wont to speculate upon modes of life most opposed to that to which they are accustomed; and very much astonished would the constituted authorities set over them be, if they knew half the wild ideas which find lodging in their brains.

Miriam Grey had been one of the most active-minded dreamers of this class when quite a child;—and as all the circumstances of her subsequent life had tended to confirm this habit, it had grown with her growth, and strengthened with her strength. Her gentle, somewhat sentimental mother, would sit for hours on the mossy bank in the old turret, musing silently and vaguely, while her little daughter would sit beside her, musing silently too, but by no means vaguely:—when she sat alone, coiled up on the window-seat in her chamber, her eyes strained towards the blue ocean line, the growing girl spent many an hour in a beautiful imaginary existence. She lived and moved in worlds of her own creation even then, and realized within herself all that she read about in legend or fairy tale, history or travels. As she grew older she was obliged to sacrifice many a charming impossibility on the altar of common sense; then came a perception of the poetic, as opposed to, and yet as reconcilable with, the practical. She listened to the schemes and hopes of that marvellous boy, David. She took them up—she carried them out in her own imagination. Her mind was a truly feminine one—recipient, not originating. It was greedy of great, beautiful, and new ideas; and David supplied her mind with these abundantly. How often she longed to be a boy, that she might travel into unknown regions with David Underwood, and see all the wonderful things and strange races in the world!—perhaps even, she might help him to get to other worlds!—Life in another planet! Ah! that, indeed, was worth thinking about! As she was on the eve of womanhood came Love, the Arch-Enchanter, unrecognised as yet, but felt through his magic power gilding their common life with glory, and making their barren native valley fruitful as the garden of the Hesperides. Soon came that August evening, which brought the knowledge that she loved, and with that knowledge came the banishment of her lover, and the beginning of sorrow for her. It was a rude awaking to this actual life, to find herself doing wrong, and yet not willing to do so. She loved David Underwood, and he was not worthy to be loved; for he had broken God's law, and had defied his father's authority. How was it possible that she still continued to love him, when she knew that? It had not been so in her dreams of love. There, the object of her love had always been faultless—made of every creature's best, and because he was better than all other men, therefore she had loved him. How was it that she was thus faithless to her own ideal? That she condemned, and yet loved? She had yet to learn her own weakness.

She suffered much; especially when within a month after David's banishment she received a letter from him, declaring that he set her free from her promise to him—that he had no right to bind her in any way; that it might never be in his power to claim her hand, even if she were willing to give it, in opposition to her guardian's will; that it would certainly be many years before he could take up a position in the world which he himself should think worthy the husband of the last descendant of the Greys of Milford. Moreover, as if to end the love between them, he had said in that letter, that in expiation of his offence against his father, he had determined never to seek her love any more without his sanction. Thus David gave her up. At first, Miriam did not understand his motive in writing such a letter, for there was a voice within her own heart which she could never silence, and which said that he loved her, and would continue to love her in spite of their separation. When she did understand that it was a principle of duty, a sense of honour, which had prompted the young man not to involve her in his uncertain fate—to leave her, young as she was, free to make a happier choice; when she understood that, the letter no longer gave her pain. David Underwood was almost restored to her good opinion, and she was less ashamed of loving him. If his passions were violent and terrible, he was no blind slave to them; he repented; and there was hope that, in time, he might subdue them, and become the great man which Mr. Shepherd had so often prophesied that he would be. So she went on loving him in secret, and spoke of him to no one. At length, as time passed on, and her reason became matured, she, still nursing her girlish love, examined the conduct and character of her guardian, and discovered in them the main cause of David's error. That once settled satisfactorily to her own mind, Miriam's peace was restored. David was worthy to be loved, and now she should never think of any other, but would love him as long as she lived, though she might never see him any more.

It was probable, nay, it was more than probable that David had now forgotten her in his wanderings in distant lands, and among the many great and beautiful ladies whom he must have associated with at the courts to which he went with Admiral Underwood and his family after he had become famous as an author. She had learned these facts about him, from the good vicar. He had friends in the great world who wrote to him occasionally of the figure made by his old pupil among them. Before that time, too, he had travelled so much, that Milford must have dwindled away into a speck in his recollection. Yet he had not quite forgotten it or her, then, because, from time to time, there came newspapers addressed to Miss Grey; a well-known hand; but never a letter—newspapers that came from every part of our habitable globe, telling of his whereabouts. He had not forgotten her then: and it was a lively pleasure to Miss Grey to feel assured of that, though she had given up all thought of him as a lover. He had kept away too long for the early love to have dominion over him now, though it might be a sweet recollection. But since his return to England, between five and six years ago, no newspapers had come to her, nor any other intimation that she was remembered. In those years, he had established his fame as an author—and she had become blind. Perhaps she regretted her affliction because she could not read and re-read his books to herself, more than for any other cause. Mr. Shepherd read them to her: those books of his! How distinctly they spoke to her heart! They were indeed part and parcel of the man. How wise he had become, how unworldly, how truly religious! Many times did she thank God for her lot, sad as it might seem to others, and sometimes to herself. David Underwood, the friend of her childhood,—her lover for a brief space of youth, was playing a noble part in the world, and she might sit silent in her solitude, and take a secret joy in all he did; and feel sure that he could do nothing unworthy of himself and of her admiration. Sometimes she thought he would come back to Milford one day—and then—she never liked to dwell on what might happen then. Whatever it might be, God would give her strength to bear it, or to rejoice in it. To a gentle, quiet soul, such as Miriam's, when the buoyancy of youth is past—the strength to rejoice seems harder to attain, than the strength to suffer.

She was not made for happiness in this life—she had long rested in that truth: but neither did she foster self-importance by magnifying the evils of her lot. They were few, and she could look them in the face calmly. She had been disappointed in love, like so many others. She had earnestly longed for variety in her external life—for other places—other people—other occupations and interests; and she had lived in the monotony and solitude of the Grey tower all the best years of life. God had willed it thus: He had also willed that she should possess a thousand small blessings, and some great ones.

"Shall I take good at the Lord's hands and not evil?"—Nay; I will submit with cheerfulness. I am his intelligent child, not his senseless, thankless slave. True! the happiness I yearned for once has been denied, but He has given me contentment in its stead.

"And that is next to best."

"Miriam Grey shall not be a useless member of society, because her love has been unfortunate."

In this frame of mind, the slow growth of years, she had been yesterday. Last night a change had come. That stranger, whose few words, foreign as was the accent, had sounded dimly familiar;—as if she had heard them before in a dream;—that stranger, who had a mission to Mr. Underwood and to her, must have come from David. Her heart told her so at once. When she was brought home and carefully tended and put to rest by her sister and old nurse Bernard, she seemed to have recovered her equanimity, and they left her to sleep.

How little do our housemates know how we really pass our time! Mrs. Ward was absolutely ignorant of Miriam's life,—she was worse than ignorant, for she *mis*knew, and could have no conception that what she knew was false. For that, and for other reasons, she could never know better, as a stranger might. They dwelt peacefully under the same roof, ate at the same board, sat oftentimes in the same room, talked oftentimes of the same things and people, but they did not live together, they lived as wide apart as the two poles. Contact is not sympathy.

"Good night, dear! Now you are quiet and comfortable you will sleep, I dare say," said Mrs. Ward when she left her on the previous night.

Sleep! How absurd the word sounded to Miriam's ear. Sleep! with this wild indescribable tumult in her heart. Why was it? What cause for apprehension, dismay, anxiety, the total breaking up of quiet within her? A stranger had come to the Grange, had seen Mr. Underwood on private business, and had requested to see her alone on the morrow. Was that cause sufficient for this disturbance of mind? Did not Mr. Underwood often have visitors on private business, and did not strangers often come to her on business, too? Why was she so disquieted now? There was no assignable reason, and therefore she was the more disquieted. She tried to pray, but she could not command her thoughts sufficiently. She did what she had been in the habit of doing ever since her childhood, in seasons of trouble; it was a childish thing, and would have astonished her sister, but it had a powerful effect in soothing and composing her mind,—it was like a dear familiar strain of music, charming away the cares and pains of the actual life. She stole from her bed, and felt her way across the chamber to the old window-seat. The great chair, by aid of which she used to clamber up, stood there, just as it used to stand twenty years ago. She did not sit down, but used it to step up by now, for the window-seat was high. One trifling act, however, marked the difference between the little maiden of twelve and the woman of two and thirty. It was unromantic but significant. She felt over the chair for a cloak which had been thrown there the previous night, and drew it carefully over her, before she mounted to the window. The little girl would have sprung up there in her night-dress, and stayed there an hour without thinking about taking cold, and probably she would not have sustained any injury. The woman took precaution by habit,—but, because she feared, she was in more danger than the thoughtless enthusiastic child. It was a delicious night, and she opened wide the painted casement, through which the moonlight was casting "warm gules" upon the chamber floor; and there, coiled up on the broad seat, wrapped in the cloak, she leaned forward to catch the midnight breezes on her face, and to look over the fells, far away to the East, where the ocean boundary was. Looking! she called it looking, from habit, when her eyes rested there; though they saw nothing. Yet, in truth, she saw just what she had seen when she was a child: the world of her own imagination. The old associations stole over her; in the midnight quietude, she was sailing over that Ocean yonder. Not indeed now, to Crusoe's island, and "the vexed Bermoothes,"—not with Columbus or De Gama,—not to find out the sources of the Nile, or the Lost Tribes. Not now did she seek all the wonders of the world; she cared no more for local habitations and for names; the desire of her soul was, "Oh that I had wings like a dove, for then would I flee away and be at rest." The desire fashioned itself into music,—the soul-supporting, soul-winging Handel-music, and it carried her away softly into the land of dreams. She slept on the window-seat as she had often slept in childhood, with the soft breezes playing in her hair, and the moonbeams gliding over her gentle face. But her childhood had returned only in outward semblance, within was trouble and care: her dreams were the dreams of to-day.

She is with the stranger who was at Mr. Underwood's that evening, where she knows not. He is sleeping, and she wakes him hurriedly, and urges him to go somewhere and do somewhat—she urges him with prayers and tears. He goes at her entreaty, and she follows him,—to the Grange? Yes. It is the Grange garden; the tablet over the door shines out white in the moonlight, and she reads the words, (for in her dreams she is never blind,) reads them aloud:—

"I have set the Lord always before me; He is on my right hand, therefore I shall not fall."

As she reads, a mist comes over the words, and she sees nothing more. Aton she is walking through a wood.—It is cold and dark, though the moon still shines, and there is a roaring as of a cataract in her ears. Suddenly the form of Mr. Underwood appears before her, as she has never seen him. He is hurrying through the wood, turning occasionally to gaze at her. His face is pale and haggard, his hair and dress disordered, his step uncertain and rapid. The stern, majestic, self-possessed guardian, whom she feared and loved so much, looks like a midnight murderer. He waves her off as she approaches, and hastens onward. She cries aloud; and at that moment David appears beside his father. It is the same David that she loved, that she parted from so long ago, radiant in youthful beauty and strength. He clasped his father in his arms, this time. No fierce looks now, no haughty words and dreadful blows are interchanged. The father's headlong course is arrested by the son's embrace, and then the scene changes. They are all three standing in the moonlight, within the ancient rifted turret, as they were on that fatal night; but now David does not defy his father;—and though he holds her with one arm as he did then, his father looks kindly at them. Presently some one, whom she did not see, seizes David suddenly; he loses his hold on her, and she falls to the ground as she did that other time. But now the blow is severe, and she feels a sharp pain; she utters a cry and awakes.

At first, she cannot distinguish between the dream and reality. Can it be that she has slept in the old window-seat all through the night? She raises her head, and listens eagerly to the faint waning notes of that heavenly music which awoke her. It is passing away, over the side of the hill, towards the distant ocean line, where,—

"the day begins to dawn, and the light Shoots like a streak of subtle fire."

She hears it still, the grand consolatory song: "Come unto me; all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." She leans forward in her half-conscious ecstasy, straining after that heavenly choir, and joining in the blessed music,— "Come! come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden." The sharp cold air of the morning, and the sound of her own sweet voice, restored her to complete consciousness. She rests her head against the grey stone mullion, and thinks how much of actual life is less vivid, less real than such dreams. Truly they mean something; God worketh within us in a way we know not.

While she was awaking, while her sweet voice joined in that spiritual melody, two men, linked arm in arm, walked slowly across the Grey Fell. They stopped at the same moment, and turned suddenly towards the Tower. Perhaps the sound of her voice had reached them, afar off as they were.—They gazed awhile as if rooted to the spot;—perhaps, they saw the angel-face that looked in rapture from that upper window. She in her blindness saw not the wanderers at that unseasonable hour; if she could have seen, she would have been almost as much alarmed as she was in her dream; for Mr. Underwood was one of them. She retired from the window, and then they passed on, down into the valley.

An hour or two of still, dreamless sleep, and Miriam Grey awoke to a recollection of her appointment. She was to meet the Strange Gentleman with Leah, near the old turret. She arose fevered and weary; all the sweet consolations of the night were gone. The dreary, dreary day was before her, and she shrank from the events which were about to unfold themselves. With aching head and limbs, and with a sorely aching heart, she threw herself on her knees to pray: but the prayers would not come; only the sense of utter helplessness, and an indescribable fear. But even then, Miriam's faith was not quite paralysed.

"No, no," she thought, "it is not so. God does not forget me.—I cannot pray just now, because I am ill, exhausted, fevered. The spirit truly is willing, but the flesh is weak. God is not far from me, though I do not feel his hand upon me now. I will go out into the morning air, and recover myself. Why am I so oppressed with sad presentiments? Even as a father pitieth his own children, so will God have pity upon me, and teach me his will, and guide me in the way I must go."

She went out, and the appointment was kept as we have described. * * *

She returned again to her chamber alone, a prey to contending emotions, and scarcely recognising herself. Fever was in her blood, and disordering her brain. She shut herself up, to think over all that had happened. She fastened the door eagerly, as if dreading intruders on her suffering. Not that she was likely to exhibit any violent outward symptoms of grief. Miriam Grey's nature was deep, reserved, and undemonstrative. She did not fling herself about in passionate attitudes; she did not fall on her bed, or on the floor, and give vent to floods of passionate tears. There was a still composure in her strongest grief. It was not that she subdued the natural expression of it, but that it was not natural to her to express it. On the present occasion, when she felt herself alone once more, she stood for some minutes in the centre of the room, with pale compressed lips, looking straight forward with her sightless, tearless eyes. She seemed to be trying to recollect what it was that had moved her so. Gently she raised her hand to her forehead—it was burning. The contact seemed to remind her that there might be a physical cause for the disorder of her mind. "I shall be better presently. It will all come right presently." She moved to the washing-stand, and with her usual gentle action, poured out water in a basin, and bathed her face and head. That done, she said to herself,—"Now I must go and rest awhile in the old window-seat, and look out to the sea until I recover myself. Something has gone wrong with me. I will wait patiently. It will pass away."

Again she reclined in the old place, and leaned her head against the stone-work, and the breezes, now warm with sunbeams, played over her face. Passive and full of dim misery she lay. Visions and fragments of memory floated uncontrolled through her brain. Recollections of early childhood—her mother, her earliest home in Germany, the figure and the voice of her old German nurse, Lotte, which she had not thought of for years and years, came upon her now like realities, as palpable as the stone which supported her head. Then they all passed away, and her mind seemed empty—a blank—there was no memory and no speculation in it. How long this state continued she knew not;—hours of bright summer time by the dial—months of oppressive vacuity to her heart. At length a thought passed through her mind like a dagger, and a word burst from her lips, "Married!" "Married!" she repeated again, after a time, and a great tear rolled down her cheek—another and another, and then her very heart seemed to dissolve itself in silent weeping. This was a relief, and when the weeping was ended, she raised her head once more and recollected all that had passed.

"Why is it so strange to me? Did I not always know that he would come back? And he has come back. Did I not say to myself a thousand times, it is impossible that his boyish love can hold? Did I not think of his marriage very often—picture it to myself—dream of it? Was I not familiar with the idea? Why am I so unreasonable? Why weep like a love-sick girl because I find that to be true which I expected would come to pass? It would seem almost as if I loved him with that sort of love which I have ever guarded against. What is this within me? Ought I not to rejoice in David's marriage? Oh, Miriam! Miriam Grey! what is this? Then,—he,—he,—forgot what was due to me. It pleased him to give free scope to a fitting fancy, called up by that old place, and he dared to make me minister to it. David! David Underwood! you should have died rather. For I am still Miriam Grey, and no light flirting girl, whom you, or any wise man, may amuse yourself with in an idle hour—if such poor amusement be to your taste. In all our best men there is folly: the gold and the clay are so mixed. Even in our David it is so. But to have no more respect for me—that indeed is humiliating to us both. And why has he come in disguise? Why entered his angry father's house to deceive? His return should have been so different. Ah! it is all strange—perhaps it is a dream—I have been dreaming much about him of late. Let me rest awhile. I'll think no more. It will all come right presently. God is over all. He will come close to me presently, and show me the meaning of all this, and teach me his will. Away all bad fears. The Underwoods are right. 'The Lord is on my right hand, therefore I shall not fall.' " And while the disquiet fades from her mind, the insidious fever creeps slowly through her veins. The hot sunbeams pour in through the open window: she heeds them not, but lies in a dull heavy slumber for many hours.

CHAPTER X.

BREAKFAST AT THE GRANGE.

THE rat-shooting had been eminently successful, and the shooters were prodigiously hungry.

It wanted ten minutes of eight o'clock, at which hour the breakfast-hell at the Grange was always rung; and by the time the peal died away every person was expected to be seated at the table. Mr. Underwood's rigid punctuality acted like a law of nature in his household; even those who seemed the least held in check by it conformed to it involuntarily. Therefore Jack brought Mr. Bang to the house ten minutes before the bell began to ring, that they might have time to mount to his dormitory, and "make themselves fit to be seen," as the latter gentleman said, though the former doubted the feasibility of the thing in his friend's case; and said so, earning by his candour the epithet "Puppy!" They were radiant and loquacious with the success of their shooting, as they went up the stairs. Chemin faisant, they met Philip Ward, very radiant also, but the reverse of loquacious.

"Hulloah!" cried Jack, clapping him on the shoulder, "what are you doing, loafing about here, my formosus puer? Waiting for some one, and trying to look as if you were not. Heartily glad to see you, though you were such a fool as not to come after those rats. We've had beautiful sport! Come along, and I will tell you all about it. You've come to breakfast, of course. Leah brought you, did she? Upon my honour! a most sensible thing of Leah! But are you sure she does not want to convert you? Let me remember," he continued, flinging off his shooting jacket, "which of the rats, I mean girls, is it you are spooney about? Rachel? Ah, yes! We noticed last night it was Rachel, didn't we, Bang?"

"Will you hand me over that brush, youngster," said Mr. Bang, "and just keep to subjects you're up to. Stick to the rats, and let the girls alone."

"Well, to oblige you, I'll acknowledge girls is rats'-bane to me. What's your opinion of them, Adonis?"

"Of which? the rats?" asked Philip, gently stroking the prettiest budding moustache in the world, and examining it with the gravity of a guardsman.

"No, the girls."

"Which of them?"

"Oh! you're particular, are you?"

"Not in the least, my dear fellow."

"Don't they allow you more soap than this, youngster?"

"It's Rachel's fault. She undertakes to see that my room is in a right condition. I'll blow her up on your account. What are you thinking about, Adonis? you look—Now, just look at him, Bang! Is it poetry? Have you been writing an ode?"

"Have you been imbibing alcohol? I can't stand here listening to your sweet voice, and watching Bang comb that sweet hair of his." And Philip lounged to the door, anxious to conceal his eagerness to rush down stairs to Mary. He wanted to say one word to her before they were surrounded by the rest of the household, and before the Noisies could get together. He saw that one of them had some inkling of his love, and he knew, from experience, that it would soon spread to the rest. However, he was not particularly bashful, and he flung open the door with a Hang-it! who's-afraid? sort of look. As he went down stairs he heard Jack's voice roaring out the following song, to his ineffable contempt and disgust.

"First love is a pretty romance,
But not quite so lasting as reckon'd;
For when we awake from the trance
There's a great stock of bliss in a second."

"Do hold your noise, or I'll annihilate you with a nail-brush!" growled Bang.

Jack went on—

"And e'en should the second subside,
Yet lovers need never despair;
For the world is uncommonly wide,
And the women uncommonly fair."

"What sort of voice do you call yours, my young Bull of Bashan?"—interposed Mr. Bang with a grim smile, such as one would bestow on a baby reuding Bacon,—Jack being nineteen, and having never had the remotest idea of falling in love.

"A bad barytone, at your service, Mr. Critic, for the completion of my song.

"The poets their raptures may tell,
Who never were put to the test—
A first love is all very well,
But believe me the last love's the best."

Thank heaven there's the bell, at last!—We are going to have something to eat! Think of it! 'Now could I do such deeds!'—with a knife and fork. Come along!—Let's get down before the governor."

When they entered the room they were struck with the look of anxiety which seemed to pervade all faces.

"Father not get up to breakfast!" exclaimed Jack, made serious in a moment.—"Asleep?—What can be the reason of it?"

"The reason of it is probably that he sat up all night, and is tired," said Mark, taking his father's place at the head of the table, and trying to look unconcerned, for he saw that Mr. Bang was on the alert. Now, Mr. Bang was a lawyer—an agent for neighbouring proprietors—and Mark thought it might be as well not to let him suspect that matters were going wrong with his father.

"But Mark! He never did such a thing before in his life," said Jack vehemently.—"What could he sit up all night for?"

"That's just what I want to know," said Rachel.

"Everything seems to go wrong this morning. I'm sure something is going to happen. There's Leah gone out before I was awake and not come back since. There's Mary been out, too, and won't tell—"

"Suppose we sit down and begin breakfast," said Martha; "Father would not like us to wait."

"Shall I go and see if he would like to take anything?" asked Jack, upon whom the fact of his father being in bed at that hour produced a great effect.

"My dear," said Martha, gently but sadly, "he is fast asleep—he is not well—he had better not be disturbed."

"Oh, nothing of any consequence, I apprehend," said Mark, in reply to Mr. Bang's inquiry, whether the news his father had heard from the Strange Gentleman the evening before, was likely to have disturbed Mr. Underwood.

"Oh! here comes Nanny Post," exclaimed Rachel, running to the open window; "I suppose she has got letters for somebody."

"That's not unlikely, my dear," said Jack with his mouth full of ham, "since it is her business to carry letters for everybody."

"Good morning Nanny," said Martha, turning round and speaking in a kind tone to some one in the garden.

Nanny Post was a character in Milford, and deserves a few words of description from any one who attempts to tell a story about the inhabitants of that remote and self-satisfied village. Nanny's real name was Jennima Sharp, but she was called Post because she carried the letters of Milford to and from the neighbouring post-town; and Nanny, because her predecessors from time immemorial had been called by that name. Nanny was a widow of about fifty—short, thin, bony and alert; quick-eyed, quick-footed, and quick-tongued. She knew everybody's business, but only troubled her head with her own. And her business, properly so called, consisted of two branches, carrying the letters, and keeping her only son at home. Jemmy Sharp was a ploughman to Mr. Underwood; he had one idea in his head, which one idea his mother was bent on eradicating. It was an idea that if he listed for a soldier he should be better off than if he stayed to plough fields in Milford. He had already enlisted twice, and been got off by the friendly interference of Mr. Underwood. Besides Jemmy, Nanny Post had one other object of domestic solicitude, to wit, her donkey, Bob. Bob carried her to the post and back again three days in the week. Bob was a beast of preter asinine sagacity, he knew when to stop and when to go on, which is more than can be said for some human creatures. Bob had stopped, as usual, of his own accord, at the front gate of the Grange, and Nanny had jumped down with a bag of letters in her hand, and was searching diligently therein for the Underwood packet, as she walked up to the house. On hearing Martha's voice and seeing Rachel's good-humoured face, she trotted up to the window, (ah, not Bob,) and said,—

"Well, and how be ye all this blithe morning? That's well! But I don't see the master. In bed! Na! na! Miss Rachel, that won't do. I know well enough where he's away too. Well, may be I'd best hold my tongue. Thank ye, I don't mind if I do take a sup of ale and a snack of bread and cheese. Coffee! Bless your heart! I never takes none of them French kickshaws. Ay! ay! I'll sit down. No chair; the winder will suit me best. Oh! never fear. Bob's as sensible as a Christian. He would'n't start off from now till fair-time, unless I wanted it. He knows my mind, does Bob. Ah! while the ale's a coming, I may as well see to the letters."

"Oh! I'm seeing to them, Nanny," said Rachel, "I declare they seem all for us. Every one seems directed Underwood."

"Like enough, lassie, like enough!" said Nanny. "I ain't looked at one on 'em since I came from the post. But gie me the bag, lassie. I must do what government pays me for doing."

"All the other officers under government don't do that, Nanny," said Mr. Bang. "That's right, my good woman, no sinecures!"

"What a radical you are, surely, sir!" said Nanny, grinning, "mind government does not hear of you, and put you into prison. There's a big letter for you in the bag, I know, and Bob will be as pleased as Punch when I tell him we haven't got to go up yon fell to your house, sir. There!—There it is! —Bang, Esq. Blengarth Lodge, Blengarth Fell, Milford."

Mr. Bang took his letter eagerly, and although Rachel was looking at him all the time, he was soon absorbed in reading it. In the meantime Nanny Post was adjusting her spectacles to examine the directions, and then taking the letters carefully out of the bag and laying them out upon her lap. Jack, Mary, Philip, and Rachel left the table and clustered round the good woman.

"That's for father," cried Jack, seizing a formidable looking one, and then reading the inscription on the seal aloud,—"London and ——— Grand Junction Railway Company."

He read it so loud that Mr. Bang could not help looking up for a moment from his own letter.

"Jack," said his brother Mark, "I thought you piqued yourself on being a gentleman. I've heard that it is not thought gentlemanly to examine the addresses and seals of other people's letters."

"Why, it's his own father's," said Philip; "I don't see much harm in that."

"But father would, though," said Mary, "and so should I. I should never like the addresses of my letters to be looked at by any one."

"Gideon Underwood, Yeoman, Milford." That comes from Castledown," observed Nanny.—"Who is this for? 'Mr. Underwood.'—No,—'Mrs. Underwood, care of Sir Ralph Grey, Bart., Torrington Hall.' —Underwood!—Is her name Underwood?" said Nanny, as if talking to herself.

"Who is she?" asked Rachel, with some curiosity.

"Why it's a lady staying there, with two or three children. They say her husband is a great man. He's book-learned; and has been in foreign parts and has talked many a time with the king on his throne."

"A great man, named Underwood!" exclaimed Rachel and Mary,—"What is he like? Have you seen him?"

"Not I," said the woman, spelling out another direction, "'Mr. Mark Underwood,—Grange Farm, Milford.' That's for you, Mr. Mark, and may it bring you good news. Now, here's a wee bit of a thing: who would think of sending that by post. That's come from abroad, I should say."

"From Leipzig, I can see the post-mark from here," said Philip,—"How is it addressed?"

"To the Doctor Underwood—Vicarage, Milford, —shire, England."

"That must be the Strange Gentleman!" cried out every one. "Let us look at the address, Nanny!"

"Oh! there are plenty more like it," said Nanny, turning out the contents of the bag into her lap. "Nearly all these letters are directed to Underwoods of one kind or another.—Oh! no; there's one to Philip Ward, Esquire."

"Let me help you," said Martha, who had left her place in her eagerness to hear the news.

"Mrs. Underwood, Torrington Hall.'—'Sir Ralph Grey, Torrington Hall.'—'Dr. Underwood, Torrington Hall.'—'Dr. David Underwood,'—"

"Hush! hush! There's some one coming," said Mary timidly.

"It's only Leah!" said Jack.

But he proved to be wrong. Leah was accompanied by Mr. Crypt and—

"The Strange Gentleman himself, by all that's incomprehensible!" exclaimed Mr. Bang, as he caught sight of him standing beside Leah, in the garden.

"Where have you been all this time?" asked Martha of Leah.

"We went to meet Nanny. These gentlemen wanted their letters early. We stopped with Mr. Crypt at old Dame Withers' cottage. We took this gentleman inside that he might see a specimen of what English cottages used to be in the beautiful old times, and while we went inside Nanny must have gone by."

"Have you any letters addressed to the Vicarage?" inquired David.

"Yes, a power of 'em, sir. Here is one, the address is—"

"Never mind the address, my good woman. Here, give me all those letters, and let me take mine." Thus speaking, he seized on all the letters from Nanny's lap, passed them rapidly through his fingers like a hand of cards, gave a glance at each, put one by one into his pocket, till he had only three remaining, one of which was for Mr. Crypt, and the other two for Mr. Underwood. These he gave back to her immediately.

"Will you walk in and take breakfast?" asked Martha.

"No, I thank you. I am waited for at the Vicarage. But I will just say 'how do you do.' Your father not down yet? Is he, perchance, indisposed?"

"Not seriously, I hope; but I own we are anxious about him. He sat up very late last night."

"If you will allow me, I will see him, Miss Underwood. I am a physician. I think I can administer something that will speedily restore him to health."

"Thank you, sir. He is asleep now," said Martha.

"No, hark! that is his step over head. He is getting up. I may go and see how he gets on now," said Jack, eagerly. "may'nt I, Martha?"

"Certainly! He will be glad to see you."

"Now then, Nanny! look sharp!" cried Jack, "give me all father's letters."

"And perhaps, young sir," said the Strange Gentleman, "you will give your father this little note from me, and say I'm waiting here in hopes of seeing him."

After Jack had disappeared, all eyes turned on the Strange Gentleman. Even those persons who had letters in their hands looked from them to him as if they were visiting a passport. He was looking intently at a portrait of the late Mrs. Underwood which hung over the mantel-piece. Somehow, no one seemed to have much appetite for breakfast; and yet, as our readers know, they had most of them been early risers. They seemed to be expecting something. If they expected Mr. Underwood to come down, they were doomed to disappointment.

(To be continued.)

CARLYLE'S LIFE OF STERLING.¹

DURING the fall of the past year this beautiful tribute to the memory of his deceased friend was published by one of the greatest men in the country. Because he is one of the greatest men in the country, and because the book has been much abused as well as much praised, the general public are curious to know what manner of man was this friend on whom he has bestowed a Biography, and thus the first edition is already exhausted. Probably the abuse, more than the praise, has furthered the sale of the book, and in this way it has been a public benefit. For, much as we desire to get foolish and bad books out of the way, still more do we desire to see good books—books stamped with true genius, lying in every one's way. The new "Life of Sterling" is full of genius from beginning to end, though written in "a very swift and immediate" style, as its author says. In addition to that, it is one of the best biographies ever written—the very flower and model of biographical writing. Not giving you a catalogue raisonné of the man's qualities and mental possessions, and a dry husky narrative of the events of his life,—which is all that most biographers do for their subject; but giving you the very spirit of the life itself, so that the real man lives before you, instead of being dissected. Comparisons may be odious, but they are elucidative also. If any candid competent reader will compare this swiftly-written compact and brief "Life of John Sterling," with other biographies sent forth during the last twenty years or so, they will find some light thrown on the question, "what a biography ought and ought not to be." Take up the voluminous lives of Byron, Southey, the Duke of Wellington, Dr. Chalmers, not to mention others lacking the merit which these have, and see how ineffectual they are as representations of the men,—how tedious, how devoid of what the intelligent reader most desires to know; how utterly unlike the brilliant, lifelike, artistic picture which Carlyle has given us of his friend! The face and figure smile out from the canvas, making the hearts that knew and loved him in life beat high with a sort of melancholy delight as they contemplate the picture; while those who knew him only by hearsay, and even those who never heard of him till now, are struck by a certain vital power and truth which seems to temper and direct the artistic skill, and they think within themselves—Ah! that must be an admirable likeness, as well as a noble piece of painting! In short, this book is among biographies, what portraits by Titian, Velasques and Rembrandt are in painting. The "Life of Schiller" is, perhaps, as correct in drawing; but the flesh-tints are not so life-like, so fresh, blooming and incarnadine. They could not be; for Schiller was not to Carlyle the friend that is dearer than a brother, as Sterling was.

(1) "The Life of John Sterling. By Thomas Carlyle." Chapman and Hall. Piccadilly.

His reason for writing this life at all he gives at the commencement of the book, thus:—

"Near seven years ago, a short while before his death, in 1844, John Sterling committed the care of his literary character and printed writings to two friends, Archdeacon Hare and myself. His estimate of the bequest was far from overweening; to few men could the small sum-total of his activities in this world seem more inconsiderable, than in those last solemn days it did to him. He had burnt much; found much unworthy; looking stedfastly into the silent continents of death and eternity, a brave man's judgments about his own sorry work in the field of Time are not apt to be too lenient. But, in fine, here was some portion of his work which the world had already got hold of, and which he could not burn. This, too, since it was not to be abolished and annihilated, but must still for some time live and act, he wished to be wisely settled, as the rest had been. And so it was left in charge to us, the survivors, to do for it what we judged fittest, if indeed doing nothing did not seem the fittest to us. This message, communicated after his decease, was naturally a sacred one to Mr. Hare and me."

The doing nothing in the matter, it is clear, did seem fittest to Mr. Carlyle, but other considerations induced him to agree to the proposition that Archdeacon Hare should write a life of Sterling, and edit a collection of his published papers and remains. His "Life and Remains" we read two years ago, and can testify that it is a careful, affectionate piece of work, saying what the author thought and wished to think of his sometime pupil and much loved friend; but that it is not what Carlyle or any one who knew the whole of Sterling's nature could accept as a true account of him.

The two first chapters are occupied with the childhood and boyhood, and are singularly interesting as indications of the light, and warmth, and tenderness that there is in Carlyle himself.—How he talks of Captain Edward Sterling, "The Thunderer of the 'Times' Newspaper," John's father; of his loving, sensitive, and withal sensible mother; of his migrations and changes; of little John and his brother Anthony,—the only ones left of a numerous young flock,—of the death of those little ones, and its effect on John. Some of the incidental touches here, and indeed throughout the book, awaken thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.

Then comes the portion of the volume which, to literary persons, must appear the most remarkable and the most debatable: viz.—the Eighth Chapter, entitled "Coleridge." It has surprised many, and disappointed not a few; while every regular Coleridgean—whether a worshipper of the lake-poet and philosopher, or of the Highgate sage—is, of necessity, displeased. They will not accept this representation of their great man. It is a misrepresentation, a caricature—like, and yet the reverse of like. One discerning and judicious friend of ours, competent in all respects to give an opinion on the matter, warns us that we must not receive it "as anything but a delinquency by a hostile hand," that with all its brilliancy this sketch of Coleridge "can only be classed with Leigh Hunt's account of Dante in the stories from the Italian poets," or with Carlyle's own account of operatic music and the ballet just published in the Keepsake for next year. We feel the truth of this to a certain degree, but not to the degree which is the truth to a thorough Coleridgean.

In philosophy, we of the present generation, or generation now presenting itself, are deep debtors to Coleridge. "The Friend," the "Aids to Reflection," "The Constitution of Church and State," "The Literary Remains," the "Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit," and the "Biographia Literaria," have had no small influence on us all, either directly or indirectly. He was the greatest thinker of the age, and was necessarily a lord of other minds. We have also sought eagerly for all descriptions of the outward man —for all accounts of him and his gentle ways and glorious talk. We have reckoned it among the evils of our lot to have lived, though but as a child, in his life-time, and never to have seen "the noticeable man with large grey eyes," or to have listened to the rhythmic ebb and flow of the multitudinous billows of his eloquent talk. We were not prepared to receive readily any disparagement of Coleridge; and on first reading the chapter by Carlyle, of which the following extracts will give some idea, we were disposed to think it must be all wrong, and that from the Carlylean point of view no right conception of Coleridge was to be obtained.

* * * "He distinguished himself to all who ever heard him as at least the most surprising talker extant in this world—and to some small minority, by no means to all, the most excellent. The good man, he was now getting old, towards sixty perhaps; and gave you the idea of a life that had been full of sufferings; a life heavy-laden, half-vanquished, still swimming painfully in seas of manifold physical and other bewilderment. Brow and head were round and of massive weight, but the face was flabby and irresolute. The deep eyes, of a light hazel, were as full of sorrow as of inspiration; confused pain looked mildly from them, as in a kind of mild astonishment.

"Sterling, who assiduously attended him, with profound reverence, and was often with him by himself for a good many months, gives a record of their first colloquy. Their colloquies were numerous, and he had taken note of many; but they are all gone to the fire, except this first, which Mr. Hare has printed, unluckily without date. It contains a number of ingenious, true, and half-true observations, and is, of course, a faithful epitome of the things said; but it gives a small idea of Coleridge's way of talking. This one feature is, perhaps, the most recognisable,—Our interview lasted for three hours, during which he talked two hours and three-quarters." To sit as a passive bucket and be pumped into, whether you consent or not, can, in the long-run, be exhilarating to no creature, how eloquent soever the flood of utterance that is descending. But if it be withal a confused, unintelligible flood of utterance, threatening to submerge all known landmarks of thought, and drown the world and you! I have heard Coleridge talk, with eager musical energy, two stricken hours, his face radiant and moist, and communicate no meaning whatsoever to any individual of his hearers—certain of whom, I for one, still kept eagerly listening in hope; the most had long before given up, and formed (if the room were large enough) secondary humming groups of their own.

"He had knowledge about many things and topics—much curious reading; but, generally, all topics led him, after a pass or two, into the high seas of theosophic philosophy, the hazy infinitude of Kantian transcendentalism, with its 'sum-m-jects' and 'om-m-jects.' Sad enough, for with such indolent impatience of the claims and ignominies of others, he had not the least talent for explaining this or anything unknown to them; and you swam and flutered in the mistiest, wide, unintelligible deluge of things, for the most part in a rather profitless, uncomfortable manner. Glorious islets, too, I have seen rise out of the haze; but they were few, and soon swallowed in the general element again. Balmey, sunny islets, islets of the blest and the intelligible; on which occasions those secondary humming groups would all cease humming, and hang breathless upon the eloquent words, till once your islet got wrapt in the mist again, and they could recommence humming."

After several times reading and reconsidering the chapter upon Coleridge, this is what we venture to offer as our opinion. Carlyle did not like the man, had little or no sympathy with that class of mind. With all his care to be just and to guard against his conscious predisposition to judge him severely, he has not altogether succeeded in giving a true account, even in direct statement. He has almost passed over as insignificant what Coleridge has done—actually left the world in printed form. In poetry, he was unrivalled. In a rare union of all the highest qualities of poetry,—creative imagination—spiritual intuition—subtlety, force and maturity of thought—exquisite tenderness and depth of feeling, and the perfection of musical form, no one in his own day could be compared with him. Campbell, Rogers, More, Southey, Scott, and Byron, were far, far below him. Wordsworth not on a par—no, nor Shelley—though he might have been. In our own day, Tennyson possesses all, or nearly all, that Coleridge had. He was emphatically a poet—a great poet, though not a copious writer of poetry. In philosophy, too, justice is not done him here. The logician, metaphysician, bard, dwindles away into a vague disjointed talker of unintelligible transcendentalisms—a mere writer of fair verses in his youth. Intellectually and in matters of faith and opinion, Carlyle is not just to Coleridge,—could not be, perhaps, from the very constitution of his mind. Morally, however, we cannot help thinking (in despite of all reverent loving Coleridgeans) that our author is right, emphatically right. With all humility, as of a small creature looking up to a giant and noting a disproportion, we would say, that Coleridge was morally defective—wanted steadiness and strength of will—did not trouble himself sufficiently about his duties as a man—and that he suffered from neglecting his own axiom, that “the duties which we owe to our own moral being are the grounds and condition of all other duties.” The strong, upright, brave, and just Carlyle, with no personal tenderness towards the man to soften his judgment, speaks out honestly, and, as we said before, justly, to our thinking on the subject. Therefore is it that this chapter has caused us so much pain—we could not avoid thinking that there is much truth in it.

Our readers will be glad to see the following letter from Sterling to his son, a boy of fourteen, then studying in London in the house of his uncle, the now celebrated Frederick Maurice. It has a grave tone in it, as if a presentiment of his own speedy death oppressed the writer. It must be very precious to the receiver now.

“You may suppose that my thoughts often move towards you, and that I fancy what you may be doing in the great city—the greatest on earth—where I spent so many years of my life. I first saw London when I was eight or nine years old, and then lived in or near it for the whole of the next ten, and more there than anywhere else for seven years longer. Since then I have hardly ever been a year without seeing the place, and have often lived in it for a considerable time. There I grew from childhood to be a man. My little brothers and sisters, and, since, my mother, died and are buried there. There I first saw your mamma, and there married. It seems as if, in some strange way, London were a part of me, or I of London. I think of it often, not as full of noise and dust and confusion, but as something silent, grand and everlasting. When I fancy how you are walking in the same streets, and moving along the same river that I used to watch so intently, as if in a dream, when younger than you are, I could gladly burst into tears, not of grief, but with a feeling that there is no name for. Everything is so wonderful, great, and holy, so sad and yet not bitter, so full of death and so bordering on heaven. Can you understand anything of this? If you can, you will begin to know what a serious matter our life is; how unworthy and stupid it is to trifle it away without heed; what a wretched, insignificant, worthless creature any one comes to be, who does not, as soon as possible, bend his whole strength, as in stringing a stiff bow, to doing whatever task lies first before him.”

The following scraps extracted from letters are doubtless read with melancholy interest by the persons mentioned:—

“Of other persons whom I saw in London, there are several that would much interest you—though I missed Tennyson by a mere chance. John Mill has completely finished and sent to the bookseller his great work on Logic; the labour of many years of a singularly subtle, patient and comprehensive mind. It will be our chief speculative monument of this age. Mill and I could not meet above two or three times; but it was with the openness and freshness of schoolboy friends, though our friendship only dates from the manhood of both.

“I got hold of the two first numbers of the ‘Hogarty Diamond,’ and read them with extreme delight. What is there better in Fielding or Goldsmith? The man is a true genius, and with quiet and comfort might produce masterpieces that would last as long as any we have, and delight millions of unborn readers. There is more truth and nature in one of these papers than in all —’s Novels put together.”

Carlyle adds—

“Thackeray, always a close friend of the Sterling house, will observe that this is dated 1841, not 1851, and have his own reflections on the matter!

“Owen is a first-rate comparative anatomist, they say the greatest since Cuvier; lives in London and lectures there. On the whole, he interested me more than any of them, by an apparent force and downrightness of mind, combined with simplicity and frankness.

“Milnes spent last Sunday with me at Clifton; and was very amusing and cordial. It is impossible for those who know him well not to like him.”

Carlyle adds—

“The ‘Milnes’ is our excellent Richard, whom all men know, and truly whom none can know well without even doing as Sterling says.”

Sterling was a good letter-writer. We would recommend to the notice of the readers of Carlyle’s “Life” the small penny pamphlet containing twelve of Sterling’s letters to his cousin William Coningham.¹ They contain the free expression of his opinions on several important subjects.

Perhaps, the letter in this book which will touch the reader most deeply by its revelation of the strong and tender friendship between Sterling and Carlyle is the following, the last he wrote to him.

“My dear Carlyle,—For the first time for many months, it seems possible to send you a few words; merely, however, for remembrance and farewell. On higher matters there is nothing to say. I tread the common road into the great darkness, without any thought of fear and with very much of hope. Certainty, indeed, I have none. With regard to you and me I cannot begin to write; having nothing for it but to keep about the lid of those secrets with all the iron weights that are in my power. Towards me it is still more true than towards England, that no man has been and done like you. Heaven bless you! If I can lend a hand when you want, that will not be wanting. It is all very strange, but not one hundredth part so sad as it seems to the standers by. Your wife knows my mind towards her, and will believe it without asseverations.

(1) Published by Olivier, Pall Mall.

"Yours to the last,

"JOHN STERLING."

Mr. Carlyle remarks on this—

"It was a bright Sunday morning when this letter came to me; if in the great cathedral of immensity I did no worship that day, the fault surely was my own. Sterling affectionately refused to see me; which also was kind and wise. And four days before his death there are some stanzas of verse for me, written as if, in star-fire and immortal tears; which are among my sacred possessions, to be kept for myself alone."

All those persons who are in the habit of regarding Carlyle as a strong, violent man, without gentle impulses and soft warm sympathies, should read this Life of Sterling. He makes no moan for the loss of his friend; but this book is a sort of "In Memoriam" in accordance with his nature, as that of Tennyson is with his. The grief is felt here, not heard. Steadily he proceeds with the account of his bright, eloquent, eager-souled, graceful Sterling, the loved of all hearts, through his stages of consumption, the spirit wearing out the frail body and living till the last moment in thought and action.

Sterling's personal appearance must have been wonderfully emblematic of his character. It is thus described:—

"Sterling was of rather slim but of well-boned wiry figure; perhaps an inch or two from six feet in height, of blonde complexion without colour, yet not pale or sickly, dark blonde hair, copious enough, which he usually wore short. The general aspect of him indicated freedom, perfect spontaneity, with a certain careless, natural grace. In his apparel, you could notice he affected dim colours, easy shapes, cleanly always, yet even in this not fastidious or conspicuous; he sat or stood, oftenest in loose sloping postures, walked with long strides, body carelessly bent, head flung eagerly forward, right-hand perhaps grasping a cane, and rather by the middle to swing it, than by the end to use it otherwise. An attitude of frank, cheerful impetuosity, of hopeful speed and alacrity, which indeed his physiognomy, on all sides of it, offered as the chief expression. Alacrity, velocity, joyous ardour dwelt in the eyes too, which were of brownish grey, full of bright, kindly life, rapid and frank rather than deep or strong. A smile, half of kindly impatience, half of real mirth, often sat on his face. The head was long, high over the vertex, in the brow of fair breadth, but not high for such a man.

"There is no portrait of him which tolerably resembles. The miniature medallion, of which Mr. Hare has given an engraving, offers us, with no great truth in physical details, one, and not the best, superficial expression of his face, as if that, with vacuity, had been what the face contained; and even that Mr. Hare's engraver has disfigured into the nearly or the utterly irreconcilable. Two pencil sketches, which no artist could approve of,—hasty sketches done in some social hour—one by his friend Spedding, one by Banim the novelist, whom he slightly knew and had been kind to, tell a much truer story so far as they go. Of these his brother has engravings; but these also I must suppress, as inadequate for strangers."

If the world did not need a Life of Sterling,—if it could well do without knowing exactly what he was, it could not do so well without knowing what Carlyle is. Nothing that he has yet published shows the gentle side of his nature so well—not even "The Sartor." His relations with the Sterling family appeal to all parts of our nature. Think of little Charlotte Sterling running to Carlyle to put on her doll's shoes for her—and getting the feat successfully performed;—and then reflect on the perfect way in which the whole biography is done—never overdone—or slurred. The image of John Sterling as he appeared in life to his friend, appears to us. With all his errors, and short-comings, and impediments to the attainment of greatness—he is still a true brave man with a noble lofty nature:—

"Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

PARIS IN 1851.

"All my Eye," the title under which this book was first announced, and which excited in the minds of the reading public considerable interest, appears in publication to have given place to another more characteristic and less slangy title. It is well called a Faggot of French Sticks, as it consists of nothing more than sketches of what every visitor to Paris can see if he will, and yet even the half of which few ordinary travellers or excursionists think worth visiting. The general impressions we carry away from Paris are full of life and gaiety, theatres and amusements of all kinds being mostly the sources whence they are derived; and few are aware of the existence of the various charitable establishments and other institutions which are here described. As our author informs us, it was his first visit to the French capital for nearly forty years, and it is to the vivid impressions produced upon his mind, of the comparison of Paris in 1851, with Paris as he knew it when an officer on duty in the British army, in the eventful year 1815, that we are indebted for these entertaining volumes. The last revolution of December 2, which took place while the book must have been passing through its final stages, can have effected few alterations in the originals of the slight but masterly series of sketches Sir Francis Head has chosen for his subject: although amusing, and interesting enough, little is said about the objects of interest and places of amusement usually first visited by strangers, and which our author's bodily infirmities and ill health prevented him from enjoying. Charities, public institutions of all kinds, and private establishments of various sorts, together with a few short notices of some places which have been already "done" to death by enthusiastic tourists of every age and condition, make up a couple of entertaining, somewhat instructive, and very readable volumes. In places there are too evident marks of book-making, but we think that the samples we propose to give will show that there is much to atone for occasional dullness, or rather, perhaps, flagging interest.

(1) "A Faggot of French Sticks. By the Author of 'Bubbles from the Brunnen of Nassau.'" 2 vols. Murray.

Without any regard to order in the choice of our subjects, let us first look at his description of a Crèche, a species of establishment entirely unknown to Londoners, but of which we know there are several in Manchester, and believe that they are to be found in other English manufacturing towns, where female labour is largely required. La Crèche is simply a receiving-house for babies, where they can be sent by their mothers to be well taken care of during the day, so that their ordinary daily avocations are not interrupted by the necessity of attending to their baby, during the few months of helpless infancy. It appears that there is one in each of the twelve arrondissements of Paris, subject to the following regulations:—

- "1. That the mother be poor.
- "2. That she works out of her own house.
- "3. That she conducts herself well.
- "4. That her infant is not sick.
- "5. That it has been vaccinated.
- "6. That its age does not exceed two years."

Sir Francis now goes on to describe the internal arrangements, and much of his description we think worthy of notice:—

"Every crèche is open daily from half-past five in the morning till half-past eight at night, excepting fête-days, for the reception of all who have been recommended by the ladies vice-presidents, and whose infants have been examined by one of the physicians of the crèche. The mother is required to bring her child in a clean state, to furnish linen for the day, and, if she can afford it, to pay twenty centimes (2d.) per diem for its management. She is required to suckle the babe when she brings it; to come and repeat the operation twice during the day, and again at night, when she takes the thing ('la creatura') away; for under no circumstances is it permitted to remain all night in the crèche.

"The kind sister, having very good-humouredly explained to me these preliminaries, conducted me into room No. 1, in the centre of which there was what she called a 'pouponnière,' or pound, in which those little errant infants that can stand are allowed to scramble round a small circular enclosure, composed of a rail, just high enough for them to hold. Within it were seven or eight, all dressed in red caps, little blue frocks, covered with white spots, and very clean white pinafores, in winter exchanged for coloured ones with sleeves. Every child on its arrival in the morning is stripped of its own clothes, which are hung up in a closet, and instead thereof, it wears throughout the day the costume, or, as my sœur termed it, 'l'uniforme de la crèche,' as described. At night it is again washed and re-dressed in its own clothes.

"Around the pouponnière, against the walls of the room, there stood, shaded by white curtains, fourteen little iron bedsteads, two feet eight inches high, on each of which was appended a black plate of iron, bearing, in white letters, the name of the charitable person who had given it (the bedstead, not the baby) to the crèche. The bedding consists of two clean mattresses, both filled with oat-chaff, a soft white pillow, blankets, but no sheets.

"In every one of these cradle bedsteads, in each of the three rooms, I found, as, in passing along with the sœur, I peeped into it, an infant in a pink cap, fast asleep. One, as I gently withdrew its curtains, suddenly twisted round, as if I had stuck a long pin through it. Another lay quite exhausted, with its little toothless mouth wide open, and with a fly on its nose. One had flushed cheeks, like roses. Another, only twenty-five days old, looked flabby, and breathed very quickly. Another was sleeping with a fist on its left eye. Another had his right arm extended, with its tiny empty hand wide open. Some were lying on their sides, some on their backs. One, with its eyes open, was sucking the whole of its hand. Another was crumpled up with its head under the clothes, and its little wrong end on the pillow. One slept with its elbow up; one, with its hand under its cap, was pinching and pulling at its own ear. Of one nothing was to be seen but the back of its pink nightcap.

"In each room, close to the windows, which were all wide open, stood a row of white basins, with two small sponges in each. In the middle of the room hung a thermometer. Outside the windows of the three chambers, in a balcony thirty feet long, and four feet broad, covered with a chequered awning, and wired at the sides, I found a number of infants in 'uniforme,' enjoying the fresh air.

"As we were walking through the establishment, I observed, attending to the children, three or four young women, dressed in blue gowns, with white handkerchiefs covering their heads, and ending in a corner down their backs. Each of these 'berceuses' is required to take charge of six infants not weaned, or twelve that are weaned, or twenty that can eat and run alone. The youngest, besides the natural nourishment their mothers are required to give to them, are kept quiet (i. e. full) during the day by means of what the sœur called a 'bibéron,' Anglice, a bottle with a zinc top. The weaned are collected together into a pouponnière, where they are fed with soup and bread.

"Among a long list of very sensible regulations, by which the crèches of Paris are conducted, and which the sœur was good enough to explain to me, the following are submitted for the consideration, not only of such of my young readers as may lately have happened to set up a baby, but of any one who secretly believes that some of these days he, she, or both, may perhaps have one, or possibly two:—

- "No flowers are admitted into the crèche.
- "No bonbons, no cakes, no painted toys to suck.
- "The curtains of cradles should never be entirely closed.

"Every baby should enjoy 'pieds chauds, ventre libre, tête fraîche.'

"It should never be lifted by one arm.

"It should be caressed, but—(the following regulation applies only to the baby)—seldom kissed.

"It should not be awakened when asleep.

"It should be seldom scolded—never beaten.

"If an infant begins to squall, the best way to quiet it, 'calmer ses cris,' is to play to it gently on an accordion.

"Lastly, its mother, however poor, should teach it 'à être aimable, aimant, poli, bon, reconnaissant.'"

We cordially agree with the author, in recommending the nursery regulations to domestic use in England.

The account of a visit to the poor of Paris, undertaken by Sir Francis Head and Lord Ashley, gives a different idea of their state, to that which we had formed in our own mind. After visiting some of the poorest localities, they came to the conclusion, that although the sanitary state of Paris is known to be far worse than that of London, still there is none of that utter destitution, and recklessness of personal appearance and decency, so often found among the poor English. They found an amount of "clean-shirtedness," and fancy in dress, even in the worst neighbourhoods, the imitation of which would vastly improve the appearance of the same class in London. While talking of sanitary arrangements, let us make an extract of his visit to the "Abattoir des Cochons," into which he is admitted, with the usual French politeness, on the mere plea of being a stranger, and under the guidance of the chêf perambulates the building:—

"As we were walking along, I asked him to be so good as to explain to me what was the foundation of his establishment. As if I had touched a vital point, he immediately stopped dead short, looked me full in the face, and with great dignity briefly explained to me, in the following words, the axiom or principle of the whole concern:—'Monsieur,' said he, 'personne n'a le droit de tuer un cochon en Paris!'

"Said I to myself, 'How I wish that sentence were written in gold on our London Mansion House!'

"We now reached a long building, one story high, not at all unlike a set of hunting stables; and on door No. 1 being opened, I saw before me a chamber ventilated like a brewhouse, with a window at each end, and paved with flagstones, the further half of which was covered with a thick stratum of straw, as sweet, clean, and unstained, as if it had just come from the flail of the thrasher. Upon this wholesome bed there lay extended, fast asleep, two enormous white hogs, evidently too fat even to dream. They belonged to no political party; had no wants, no cares, no thoughts; no more idea of to-morrow than if they had been dead, smoked, and salted. I never before had an opportunity of seeing any of their species so clearly; for, in England, if, with bended back and bent knees, an inquisitive man goes to look into that little low dormitory called a sty, the animal, if lean, with a noise between a bark and a grunt, will probably jump over him; or if fat, he lies so covered up, that the intruder has no space to contemplate him; whereas, if the two pigs lying before me had been in my own study, I could not have seen them to greater advantage.

"Without disturbing them, my conductor closed the door, and we then entered Nos. 2, 3, and 4, which I found to be equally clean, and in which were lying, in different attitudes, pigs of various sizes, all placidly enjoying the sort of apoplectic slumber I have described. My conductor would kindly have opened the remainder of the doors, but as I had seen sufficient to teach me what in England will be discredited, namely, that it is possible to have a pigsty without any disagreeable smell, I begged him not to trouble himself by doing so; and he accordingly was conducting me across the open square, when I met several men, each wheeling in a barrow a large jet-black dead pig, the skin of which appeared to be slightly mottled in circles. As they passed me, there passed also a slight whiff of smoke; and I was on the point of asking a few questions on the subject, when I found myself within the great slaughter-house of the establishment, a large barn, the walls and roof of which were as black as soot. The inside of the door, also black, was lined with iron. The floor was covered for several inches with burnt black straw, and upon it lay, here and there, a large black lump, of the shape of a huge hog, which it really was, covered over with the ashes of the straw that had just been used to burn his coat from his body.

"In vain I looked beneath my feet and around me to discover the exact spots where all this murder had been committed; but nowhere could I discover a pool, slop, or the smallest vestige of blood, or anything at all resembling it. In short, the whole floor was nothing but a mass of dry, crisp, black, charred remains of burnt straw. It was certainly an odd-looking place; but no one could have guessed it to be a slaughter-house.

"There was another mystery to be accounted for.

In England, when anybody in one's little village, from the worthy rector at the top of the hill, down to the little ale-house keeper at the bottom, kills a pig, the animal, who has no idea of 'letting concealment, like a worm in the bud, prey on his damask cheek,' invariably explains, seriatim, to every person in the parish—dissenters and all—not only the transaction, but every circumstance relating to it; and, accordingly, whether you are very busily writing, reading, thinking, or talking about nothing at all to ladies in bonnets, sitting on your sofa to pay you a morning visit, you know, and they know perfectly well—though it is not deemed at all fashionable to notice it—the beginning, middle, and end, in short, the whole progress of the deed; for, first of all, a little petulant noise proclaims that somebody somewhere is trying to catch a pig; then the animal begins, all at once, with the utmost force of his lungs, to squall out, 'They have caught me;—they are pulling at me;—they are trying to trip me up;—a fellow is kneeling upon me;—they are going to make what they call pork of me. O dear! they have done for me!' (the sound gets weaker;)

'I feel exceedingly unwell;—I'm getting faint;—fainter—fainter still;—I shan't be able to squall much longer!' (a long pause.) 'This very long little squall is my last;—'tis all over,—I am dying—I'm dying—I'm dying—I'm dead!'

"Now, during the short period I had been in the establishment, all the pigs before me had been killed; and although I had come for no other earthly purpose but to look and listen—although, ever since I had entered the gate, I had, to confess the truth, expected to hear a squall;—was surprised I had not heard one;—and was not only ready, but really anxious, with the fidelity of a short-hand writer, to have inserted in my notebook, in two lines of treble and bass, the smallest quaver, or demi-semiquaver, that should reach my ears, yet I had not heard the slightest sound of discontent! However, while I was engrossed with these serious reflections, I heard some footsteps outside; a man within opened the door slightly, and through the aperture, in trotted, looking a little wild, a large loose pig, whose white, clean, delicate skin, physically as well as morally, formed a striking contrast with the black ruins around him.

"In a few seconds he stopped; put his snout down to the charred ground to smell it; did not seem to like it at all; looked around him; then, one after another, at the superintendent, at me, and at three men in blouses; appeared mistrustful of us all; and not knowing which of us to dislike most, stood, as if to keep us all at bay. No sooner, however, had he assumed this theatrical attitude, than a man, who, with his eyes fixed upon him, had been holding in both hands the extremity of a long, thin-handled, round, wooden mallet, walked up to him from behind, and, striking one blow on his forehead, the animal, without making the smallest noise, rolled over on the black charred dust, senseless, and, excepting a slight convulsive kick of his upper hind leg, motionless. Two assistants immediately stepped forward, one with a knife in his hand, the other with a sort of iron frying-pan, which he put under the pig's neck; his throat was then cut; not a drop of blood was spilled; but as soon as it had completely ceased to flow, it was poured from the frying-pan into a pail, where it was stirred by a stick, which caused it to remain fluid.

"Leaving the poor animal to be singed by a portion of the heap of white straw in a far corner, I followed the men who, with their barrows, had come again for one of the black corpses lying on the ground, into a large, light, airy building, as high as a church, as clean as a dairy, and with windows and doors on all sides. In the centre was a beautiful fountain playing, with water-cocks all round the walls. By this ample supply, proceeding from two large reservoirs, by steam-power maintained constantly full, the flagstones were kept perfectly clean, and were consequently, when I entered, as wet as a washhouse.

"As fast as the black pigs were wheeled in, they were, by a running crane, lifted by the hind legs, until they appeared suspended in rows. Their insides were here taken out, and carried to a set of large stone tables, where, by the assistance of the water-cocks and fountain, they were not only cleaned, but became the property or perquisite of the cleaners. Their bodies were then scraped, until they became dead white, in which state, to the number of about 300 per week, they are restored at night to their respective proprietors in Paris.

"By the arrangements I have described, conducted by one receiver of the 'droits d'octroi' (my friend), four surveillants, or foremen, and the necessary quantity of slaughterers, wheelers, cleaners, and scrapers, the poor animals, instead of being maltreated, half frightened to death, and then inhumanly killed;—instead of inflicting upon all classes the sounds and demoralizing sight of a pig's death;—instead of contaminating the air of a metropolis;—undergo the treatment I have described, for the knowledge of which I am deeply indebted to the politeness of him who so justly expounded to me the meaning of that golden law—

'PERSONNE N'A LE DROIT DE TUER UN COCHON EN PARIS!'

We hope the reader will not think this extract too long: our zeal for the improvement of the court of Common Council was too great to admit of our omitting a single line. We commend it to their special study and imitation.

The chapter devoted to the police of Paris shows a state of vigilant watchfulness over individuals of which, happily, we have no idea in London, and yet, let France be governed by emperor, king, president, or Republic, this terrible system is considered by each and all of them necessary for the public welfare. The following instance is curious, if nothing else:—

"Every one of the twelve arrondissements of Paris is subdivided into four 'quartiers,' or sections, each superintended by a 'Commissaire de Police,' who, in his bureau, in the centre of his district, is, in fact, the efficient head of the police; and yet, although every person looks only to his own commissaire, and although of the 'préfet de police' it may truly be said or sung, 'Oh no, we never mention him,' yet all the departments I have enumerated, under his sole direction, not only work independently, but harmoniously interlace together, playing into each other's hands, giving to each other every information in their power, and even arresting for each other any one whom, in the prosecution of their own duties, they may observe infringing upon the regulation of any other department in the several services to which they belong; in short, every one acts, not only for his own district, but for all Paris; and thus the eye of the prefecture of police, by night as well as by day, like Shakspeare's Ariel, is here, there, and everywhere; indeed, almost a single anecdote will exemplify its powers. When Caussidière—now in London, and who was condemned with Louis Blanc—was, in February, 1848, made 'Prefect of the Police of Paris,' knowing that he had long been watched, he inquired at the office over which he presided for his own 'dossier.' On reading it, he exclaimed with astonishment, 'Non seulement mes actions, mais mes pensées intimes!'

Our author himself, it seems, received some highly flattering attentions at the hands of these gentlemen, and for which we hope he was truly grateful.

"You are," said very gravely to me a gentleman in Paris of high station, on whom I had had occasion to call, "a person of some consideration. Your object here is not understood, and you are therefore under the surveillance of the police."

"I asked him what that meant.

"Wherever you go," he replied, "you are followed by an agent of police. When one is tired, he hands you over to another. Whatever you do is known to them; and at this moment there is one waiting in the street until you leave me."

"Although the above sketch, which, on the whole, I believe to be a faithful one, delineates, I am fully aware, a system which in England would be deemed intolerable, and which, indeed, I have not the smallest desire to defend, yet it must also be evident that, on the whole, it is productive of a series of very great benefits to the community."

It would not at all enhance the pleasure of our own annual jaunt of pleasure to know that a police spy was set to watch our every motion, and that seen or unseen there existed so unwelcome a participator in our enjoyment; and we do not at all agree with Sir Francis as to the benefit of such a system.

Paris from the Arc de Triomphe is graphically described. We pass over the perils of the ascent, and just accompany our author as he—

"—at last arrived in the fresh, warm, open air, upon an exalted platform 150 feet in length by 23 in breadth, from which there suddenly flashed upon my eyes, or rather upon my mind, one of the most magnificent views I have ever beheld, the characteristic of which was that, like that from the top of the Calton Hill, at Edinburgh, it afforded a panorama of scenery of the most opposite description.

"In front lay before me, towards the east, the broad, straight, macadamized road, boulevard, or, as it is more properly termed, 'avenue,' up which I had just been driven, terminating in the green trees of the gardens of the Tuileries. On each side of this great road there appeared, expressly for foot passengers, a beautiful shaded space, in the middle of which was an asphalt path, broad enough for about six persons to walk abreast. The foot-roads were flanked with pedestrians, the carriage-road spotted with equestrians, military wagons, cabs, public as well as private vehicles, and buses, increasing in size until they passed beneath like toys before the eyes.

"This magnificent arterial thoroughfare, nearly five times the width of St. James's-street in London, nearly bisects Paris, the whole of which, as seen at a single glance, appeared composed of lofty houses of different shades of white (unlike the heads of human beings, the youngest are the whitest), light-blue roofs of zinc or slate, and Venetian windows, bearing silent testimony to the heat of the climate in summer. But what attracted my attention more than the sight of all the objects in detail before me was the striking absence of what in England is invariably the characteristic of every large city or congregation of men—namely, smoke. Here and there a dark stream, slowly arising from the lofty minaret of a steam-engine, reminded me of the existence of commercial life, but with these few exceptions the beautiful clear city before me appeared to be either asleep or dead. During the few minutes I gazed upon the scene, I several times looked attentively at the large stacks of chimneys which rose out of the blue roofs, but, with a few exceptions, not a vestige of smoke was to be seen.

"Of the two portions into which Paris by the triple road described is divided, that on the left—the largest—was bounded by the Hill of Montmartre, upon which, with great pleasure, I observed, at work, apparently the very same four windmills which were always so busily grinding away when I last resided in their vicinity. They had ground wheat for Napoleon, for the Duke of Wellington, for the allied Sovereigns of Europe, for Louis XVIII., for Charles X., for Louis-Philippe, for the leaders of the Red Republicans, and now they were grinding away just as merrily as ever for Prince Louis Napoleon. In fact, whichever way the wind blew, they patriotically worked for the public good. Round the foot of Montmartre there had lately arisen a young city of new white houses.

In the half of Paris on the right of the great triple road, there appeared resting against the clear blue sky the magnificent domes of the Invalides, Pantheon, Val de Grace, and the Observatory. Beneath on each side I looked down upon a mixture of new buildings and of green trees, which, in the advent of May, had just joyously burst into full leaf.

"In contemplating the beauty of Paris from the summit of the Arc de l'Etoile, it is impossible to refrain from remarking that, with the exception of the three domes I have mentioned, no one of which is for the purpose of worship, scarcely a church-looking building is to be seen.

"The view from the opposite or west side of the summit of the Arc forms a striking contrast to the picture of a city as just described. With the exception of the Fort-du-Mont Valérien, on an eminence 580 yards off, the horizon is composed of hills as blue, bleak, and houseless as the highlands of Scotland, which indeed they faintly resemble. Between the fort and the Arc lies prostrate the Bois de Boulogne. I had left it hacked to death by the sabres and hatchets of the troops with whom I had been bivouacked in it. But these unfriendly scars were, I rejoiced to see, all obliterated. A new generation of trees as of men had succeeded, and the large extensive dark-green, but rather cheerless-looking mass, was enlivened only by the old broad pavé, running—as it always has run—as straight as a sergeant's halbert to Neuilly, and at an angle to the left by an equally straight broad macadamized road—the Avenue de St. Cloud."

"From the south side of the platform I looked down upon, or rather into, the uncovered, gay, but lawdry Hippodrome, the exercises, amusements, and spectators of which can be almost as clearly seen as by a hawk hovering over them. Beyond it appeared a mixture of houses, including Passy, composed of about two-thirds white buildings, and one-third green trees.

"From the foot of the north side of the Arc runs a short pavé of about 200 yards, bounded on each side by houses and trees, which, by a sort of dissolving process, change into green fields, across which were to be seen here and there little picturesque streams of the white steam of the Versailles and Northern Railways, bounded by blue distant hills."

Mrs. Colonel Amelia Bloomer is not entitled to claim all the credit for the invention or even adaptation of the peculiar costume which bears her name. The description of the Vivandière may be read perhaps with profit by ladies who have any tendencies towards the Bloomer mania. We can bear our humble testimony to its elegant appearance, and although perhaps a thought more masculine, it is infinitely more graceful than the "baggy continuations" in which the disciples of the new school of female costume prefer to encase the nether extremities.

"As we were proceeding along the ranks, I was altogether astonished to find, standing immediately on the right of every regiment, in line with the troops, and as immovably erect as themselves, one or two very nice-looking young women, dressed in scarlet regimental trousers, little short white aprons, and neatly-ornamented blue loose frocks. Under each of their left arms they held, supported by a strap that passed diagonally across their breasts, a small barrel, beautifully painted blue, white, and red, from which there protruded a bright silver cock; on their heads sat a tricolour sort of Scotch bonnet. The dress altogether was wildly picturesque; and the contrast between the soft smooth chins, slender hands, and small feet of the wearers, compared with the formal uniforms, dark hairy faces, and rough limbs of the troops, was most striking. They were the 'cantinières' of the different regiments; and being, as in my description of the 'Casernes' I have explained, the only women in the regiment, they are naturally enough petted and adorned in the way I have prescribed."

Sir Francis, we observe, in the course of his rambles never lets an opportunity slip of enforcing the moral he strove to inculcate in his work on "the Defenceless State of England." His allusions to the superior numbers and admirable drilling of the French army as compared with ours, all tend towards the same end; whatever species of military sight passes before him, the conclusion he draws is terrific to Englishmen. The gymnastic exercises of the French troops, he contends, must make the men more active, and their new guns, at the use of which they are so well practised, will tell fearfully upon us in the event of another war. But as our mission is not to preach politics, we will leave Sir Francis to settle the point with those representatives of economy and peace in the House of Commons—Richard Cobden and Joseph Hume: whether such precautions are taken or not, all we hope is that they may never be needed.

Although visits to the Artesian well at Grenelle have been often written, we hope Sir Francis's will not be unacceptable to our readers.

"Of the water which flows into the large reservoirs enumerated, a considerable portion has, under Providence, been summoned by science to arise from a dark subterranean depth, exceeding, by 100 feet, five times the height of the cross on the summit of St. Paul's church in London!

"Although I was aware that there exists in the locality in which this feat has been performed but little to behold, I felt, on arriving at the gate of Grenelle, that sort of satisfaction which every pilgrim enjoys in reaching the shrine he has long desired to worship. On ringing the bell, the gate was quickly opened by a very young lady in curls; and on my stating I had come—I was so tired that I must have looked as if I had walked from Jerusalem—to see the Artesian well, she replied, with evident satisfaction, that she would be happy to show it to me, and accordingly, without putting on her bonnet, or granting me the smallest opening to remonstrate, she conducted me, tripping by my side, to the foot of a weather-beaten scaffolding, 112 feet high, containing a rude ladder-staircase, and encircling three iron pipes. My first object was to get myself quietly divorced; and as soon as this important measure—which, after all, only cost me a few civil words, two or three bows, and tenpence—was consummated, I enjoyed for some moments reflections which, like the water passing up the central tube before me, arose from beneath the ground on which I stood.

"On the first day of the year 1834, M. Mulot, after having entered into the contract which eventually immortalised his name, commenced the work that had been intrusted to him, of endeavouring to tap the subterranean supply of water which it had been calculated must exist about 1200 feet beneath the dry, deep, rocky strata upon which the gay city of Paris has been constructed.

"During the operation of piercing through successive beds of flint and chalk, the borer several times broke, and the fragment, by dropping to the bottom of the excavation,—deserting as it were to the enemy,—suddenly became the most serious opponent of the power in whose service it had been enlisted. Indeed on the occasion of one of these accidents, it required, at a depth of no less than 1335 feet, fourteen months' incessant labour to recover it!

"After working for rather more than seven years without any apparent encouragement, on or about the 20th February there was drawn up a small amount of greenish-coloured sand, indicating that the borer was approaching water. At two o'clock on the 26th of February, 1841, there arose through the tube a tiny thread of the element which had been the object of such ardent and long-protracted hopes; and the welcome omen of success had scarcely diffused joy and gladness among those who witnessed it, when, as if the trumpet of victory had been sounded, there arose from a depth of 1800 feet a column of warm water of $83\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ of Fahrenheit, which, bursting through the machinery that had called it into existence, rushed upwards with a fury it appeared to be almost incapable to control.

"The height to which through an iron pipe it rises above the earth is, as has been stated, 112 feet; and thus not only is Paris gifted with an everlasting supply of water, amounting, at the surface, to 660 gallons per minute, and at the summit of the pipe to 316, but the latter quantity, in virtue of its elevation, and in obedience to the laws of hydrostatics, which it is sworn to obey, can be made to ascend to the various floors, including the uppermost, on which, one above another, the inhabitants of Paris reside.

"The concealed tube or passage, through which, by the magic influence of science, this valuable supply of water is now constantly arising from the deep, dark caverns in which it has been collected, into the light-some painted chambers of the most beautiful metropolis on the surface of the globe, has been lined throughout with galvanised iron. Its diameter is, at the bottom, about 7 inches, and at the top 21 inches.

"The water, when I tasted it, was not only warm, but strongly impregnated with iron. As a dog grows savage in proportion to the length of time he has been chained to a barrel, so does the temperature of imprisoned water increase with its subterranean depth; and accordingly it has been calculated by M. Arago and by M. Walleferdin, that the heat of the water of an Artesian well which, previous to the Revolution of 1848, it had been proposed to bore in the Jardin des Plantes to a depth of 3,000 feet (nearly nine times the height of the cross on the top of St. Paul's), would amount to about 100° of Fahrenheit, sufficient not only to cheer the tropical birds and monkeys, the hothouses and greenhouses of the establishment, but to give warm baths to the inhabitants of Paris."

We have thus endeavoured to lay before our readers a few samples of the sticks of which the "faggot" is composed. As a description of Paris it is of no value at all, but as a series of lively daguerrotypes of daily Parisian life, and scenes with which we are not already very familiar, it will be found amply to repay the reader. In the present days of universal education, we would suggest that to add the translation of all the most petty French phrases occurring in the text appears somewhat pedantic and unnecessary. The description of the Great Northern Railway is, perhaps, the best paper in the book, although we have been unable to find an extract which could be used with effect, and the article is far too lengthy for insertion in an entire form. The experience of our own North Western line, which Sir Francis "got up" for the purpose of publication in "Stokers and Pokers," has been of great use to him, and many French customs by which our own railway directors might profit are dwelt upon, as well as those instances in which they might advantageously copy our system. The article on the Paris Post-office, too, is well worthy to rank beside the famous account of the London Post-office which appeared in Dickens' Household Words. But we have already presumed too much upon our readers, and must perforce abruptly finish, as our space is limited, and moreover we only intended to review the book, and not fill our columns by wholesale with its matter. For further information we refer our inquiring patrons to the neatly-bound volumes themselves: we have derived much pleasure and information from the perusal of them, and we hope to turn what we have read to account when next we visit the French capital; and we will take our leave in saying that we believe there is not another writer in the English language who could have made so lively a work on a field which has been already so well gleaned.

SHORT NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Use of Sunshine. A Christmas Narrative. By S. M.

THOSE who are familiar with "The Story of a Family," "The Maiden Aunt," &c., will be prepared to expect, in any production of the same authoress, a delicate perception of character, and a happy readiness in laying hold of, and delineating, those finer traits which give verisimilitude and individuality, and make her fancy sketches portraits. They will look with certainty for that intense feeling of the beauties of natural scenery, which is skilfully conveyed to the reader, and that power of finding in things natural, types and mementos of things spiritual, which gives no small part of its power to charm and instruct to her favourite guide, "The Christian Year;" all being bound together, in one harmonious whole, by high, moral, and definite Christian principle. Some readers will perhaps be taken by surprise, to find, in a young English lady, a power of catching those chamæleon-like tints which characterise our Irish neighbours, and of Daguerrotyping the ever-varying lights and shades of the inmates of a cabin, as if she had been familiar with them from infancy. The "History of Three Christmas-days" constitutes the tale, and the motif, or moral, is the "Use of Beauty and Joy."

A young English clergyman, overworked by his exertions among his flock, in one of our Yorkshire manufacturing towns, during a time of fever, is ordered to recruit his strength by quiet and pure air. A charming child-like sister, of seventeen, who has been as his child to him since the early death of their parents, accompanies him to a secluded part of the north of Ireland, on the banks of Lough-Foyle, a place to which they are attracted as having some connexion with a mysterious part of their mother's history, and by a college-friendship of Horace with the son of the "principal inhabitant." This friend has gone into voluntary exile in New Zealand, in consequence of offending his father, who is described by Marion, after her first glimpse of him, as "having a bright inexorable eye, which looked as if he could, if he had lived hundreds of years before, have walled up a town with his own hands, and been haunted by her groans afterwards without minding it." At present he lives in a lone dilapidated house, having no comfort in this life, nor care nor hope for the future. Horace's wish is to be allowed to act as "Amateur Curate" in this widely-spread parish, where the people are alike neglected by the English and Romish priest; he desires, by showing them the "use of beauty and gladness," by acting as far as possible as the friend of each of his poor neighbours, to bring before them, in a living reality, the lovingness of the Church—to show them that all her members are of one family; that the various festivals of the Church,—the greater ones, immediately commemorative of our Lord himself, and the others, reminding us of his earliest followers,—are as it were the birthdays of spiritual kinsmen; thus forming part of our invisible communion, and binding together the "whole family in heaven and earth." How the refined, methodical Horace is tried by the Irish cottage-habits of his flock,—how Marion, his doating sister, by her young feminine enthusiasm, and the love which she soon acquires for the loving grateful hearts around her, who are sure that if "there is a place kept in heaven for the rare ladies, she will be among them!"—how they win the affections of the poor by caring for their temporal wants, and when their affection is thus gained, turning it towards their spiritual needs—how their first effort is "to give such a Christmas treat that they shall date from it as an event in their lives"—how this succeeds—how they nurse them through the Cholera—how Mr. Kennedy (the bad man, the rich wretch) falls sick, and is tended by them, and comes out of his long trance-like stupor, an altered man, teachable, childlike—how the remains of his stubborn nature are crushed out of him by the discovery of a life-long injustice inflicted on a dead sister—how he resolves, as a thank-offering to God, to build a church in these wilds, where the sinner may be warned, the penitent consoled, and built up in their most holy faith—how Horace is the pastor—that Brian Kennedy comes back forgiven—that he and Marion—But we have kept and can keep a secret; only we do believe that everybody lived and died very happy, because they were of those to whom although

"Sweet is the smile of home, the mutual look,
When hearts are of each other sure;
Sweet all the joys that crowd the household nook,
The haunt of all affections pure;
Yet in the world even these abide, and 'they'
Above the world 'their' calling boast."

KEBLE.

How all this, and much more, came to pass, we hope our readers will soon judge for themselves. They must form acquaintance with Peggy Doherty, an Irish opal, if such a gem exist; no pearl or diamond fitly typifies her vivid, glowing, ever changing character, with a heart of fire irradiating as it glows, and many smaller diamond-sparks. If it be their good fortune, (as we account it such in ourselves,) to open the volume on the dreariest of days, when the fog shuts us in like a wall, deadening all sounds, and rendering spectral all sights, they will feel the more keenly the pure and warm celestial light, shining inward, but from above, which illumines the writer's mind.

"All through the wintry heaven and chill night air,
In music and in light thou dawnest on our prayer."

On the Study of Words.—Five Lectures addressed to the Pupils of the Diocesan Training School at Winchester. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, B. D.

IF one of old, tired out of all that was under the sun, offered a reward to him who should discover a new pleasure, meaning thereby a new aliment of luxury for the "vile body," how should we hail him who opens new avenues and paths of pleasantness, wherein the mind and spirit may wander up and down, drawing in vigour and strength with every intellectual breath, and finding that this access of vigour was not only excited by the new objects of wonder and admiration, but that our old familiar paths shone with flowers and were verdant with grasses, heretofore unobserved or unknown? How should we reward him?—He would be to us as a friend, one whose name, though we might never look on his face, would never be heard without a feeling of gratitude and a throb of pleasure. We are mistaken in our present author—he has caused us to mistake his character and motives—if such a reward would not be welcome to him; and if his pages awaken one and excite another, and stimulate the young mind especially, he will have his reward. His object in these five lectures is to take, as it were, the units which make the wealth of "our mother-tongue," as we fondly call it, and show the exact weight and worth of each. He detects and catches the various shades of meaning of each word, tracing its history, its date, its variations of meaning as time creeps on, and men's minds and manners vary, and so their estimation of the things indicated by words vary too. Laying all these together, he shows how a word in its derivation may stamp a historical fact (for instance, our word Church having a Greek origin, and being quite dissimilar to the Latin word expressing the same thing, is corroborative evidence of our Church itself not having a Roman source at its beginning);—how a declension in the scale of humanity is marked by the word which once was used to express a higher power, having been forgotten, only remaining as a tradition with some of their aged men—how our very moral being is benefited by our being cognisant of the exact significance of each word we utter, so that we may neither go beyond nor fall short of the truth. The Fourth Lecture, "On the Distinction of Words," is perhaps the most rich in suggestion in the series to all classes of readers. The process of "desynonymizing," or distinguishing between words synonymous in their origin, but by use and custom acquiring each its separate inflection of meaning, is most interestingly wrought out, but too closely for extracting from. We will, therefore, choose the conclusion of this portion of the book, as indicative of the moral application of what might at first be considered merely scholastic instructions; prefacing it by a passage from the introductory lecture:—

"A popular author of our day has somewhere characterised language as 'fossil poetry,'—evidently meaning that just as in some fossil, curious and beautiful shapes of vegetable or animal life, the graceful fern, or the finely vertebrated lizard, such as now, it may be, have been extinct for thousands of years, are permanently bound up in the stone, and rescued from that perishing which would otherwise have been theirs; so in words are beautiful thoughts and images, the imagination and feeling of past ages, of men long since in their graves, of men whose very names have perished, those, which would so easily have perished too, are preserved and made safe for ever . . .

"Language may be, and is, this fossil poetry, but it may be affirmed of it with exactly the same truth, that it is fossil ethics, or fossil history. Words quite as often and as effectually embody facts of history, or convictions of the common moral sense of mankind; even as, so far as that moral sense may be perverted, they will bear witness and keep a record of that perversion . . .

"Language, then, is fossil poetry; in other words, we are not to look for the poetry which a people may possess, only in its poems, or its poetical customs, traditions, and beliefs. Many a single word is also in itself a concentrated poem, having stores of poetical thought and imagery laid up in it. Examine it, and it will be found to rest on some deep analogy of things natural and things spiritual; bringing those to illustrate and to give an abiding form and body to these. The image may have grown trite and ordinary now, perhaps through the help of this very word may have become so entirely the heritage of all, as to seem little better than a common-place; yet not the less he who first discerned the relation, and devised the new word which should express it, or gave to an old, never before but literally used, this new and figurative sense, he was in his degree a poet—a maker, that is, of things which were not before, which would not have existed but for him, or for some other gifted with like powers.

"Let me illustrate that which I have been saying, by the word 'tribulation.' We all know, in a general way, that this word, which occurs not seldom in the Scriptures and in the Liturgy, means affliction, sorrow, anguish; but it is quite worth our while to know how it means this, and to question the word a little closer. It is derived from the Latin tribulum, that word signifying the threshing instrument or roller, by which the Romans separated the corn from the husks; and 'tribulation' in its primary significance was the act of this separation. But some Latin writer of the Christian Church appropriated the word and image for the setting forth of a higher truth; and sorrow and distress and adversity being the appointed means of separating in men their chaff from their wheat,—of whatever in them was light and trivial and poor, from the solid and the true,—therefore he called these sorrows and griefs 'tribulations,' threshings, that is, of the inner spiritual man, without which there could be no fitting him for the heavenly garner."—Pp. 4—6.

"Now let us suppose this power of exactly saying what we mean, and neither more nor less than we mean, to be merely an elegant mental accomplishment; it is indeed this, and perhaps there is no power so surely indicative of a high and accurate training of the intellectual faculties. But it is also much more than this, it has a moral meaning as well. It is nearly allied to morality, inasmuch as it is nearly connected with truthfulness. Every man who has himself, in any degree, cared for the truth, and occupied himself in seeking it, is more or less aware how much of the falsehood which is in the world passes current under the concealment of words, how many strifes and controversies, find all, or nearly all their fuel and their nourishment in words, carelessly or dishonestly employed. And when a man has had any actual experience of this fact, and has at all perceived how far this mischief reaches, he is sometimes almost tempted to say with Shakespeare's clown, 'Words are grown so false, I am loath to prove reason with them.' He cannot, however, forego their employment, not to say that he will presently perceive, that this falseness of theirs, whereof he accuses them, this cheating power of words, is not of their proper use, but their abuse; that, however they may have been enlisted in the service of lies, they are yet of themselves most true, and that where the bane is, there the antidote should be sought as well. Ask, then, words what they mean, that you may deliver yourselves, that you may help to deliver others, from the tyranny of words, and from the strife of 'word-warriors.' Learn to distinguish between them, for you have the authority of Hooker, that 'the mixture of those things by speech, which by nature are divided, is the mother of all error.' And although I cannot promise you that the study of synonyms, or the acquaintance with derivations, or any other knowledge but the very highest knowledge of all, will deliver you from the temptation to misuse this or any other gift of God, a temptation which always lies so near us, yet I am sure that these studies rightly pursued will do much in leading us to stand in awe of this divine gift of words, and to tremble at the thought of turning it to any other than those worthy ends for which God has endowed us with it."—Pp. 116, 117.

'Which feed the simple and offend the wise,'

One word on what we should lose by adopting the "Phonetic" method of spelling.

"I can conceive no method of so effectually defacing our English tongue, nothing that would go so far to empty it, practically at least and for us, of all the hoarded wit, wisdom, imagination, and history which it contains, as the introduction of this scheme. In innumerable instances, it would obliterate altogether those clear marks of birth and parentage which, if not all, yet so many of our words bear now upon their very fronts, or are ready on a very slight interrogation to declare to us. Words have now an ancestry, and the ancestry of words, as of men, is often a very noble part of them, making them capable of great things, because those from whom they were derived have done great things before them."—Pp. 119, 120.

Ravenscliffe. A Novel, by the Authoress of Emilia Wyndham. 3 vols. 8vo.

WE have the pleasure of announcing to our readers that, in spite of defects, "Ravenscliffe" is a story worthy of the writer of the "Admiral's Daughter." So powerful and affecting a book has not issued from the press for a long time. It is in the skilful contrast of characters and in the equally skilful interweaving of the various parts of the story that some of the secret of its success lies; but the great crowning excellence is the concentrated feeling, the deep passion, the vehement, absorbing, real, and yet romantic struggle which goes on in the minds of Randal Langford of Ravenscliffe and his adored bride Eleanor: he loving her above all things, to the exclusion of all things else; she loving him, it is true; but second to another, who is as precious to her as she is to him. She is gentle and weak, bowed down by the tyranny of her worldly mother and brother, and is compelled, out of very shame at the supposed desertion of the man she loves, to accept for husband the man who loves her with his whole heart, and whom she esteems and pities and loves from the habit of her childhood. The marriage day of these two is one of the finest and most effective pieces of domestic tragedy we have seen for a long time. The only thing which in the least mars its effect, on reflection, (it does not occur to the mind while reading,) is the similarity of position between Eleanor Wharnccliffe and Lucy in the Bride of Lammermoor; only the Master of Ravenswood and the Master of Ravenscliffe, in spite of their striking resemblance, play opposite parts: the latter being the unwelcome husband. The passionate and pathetic scenes of "Ravenscliffe" are worthy of the best praise we can give; but what shall we say of the clay which she has allowed to mingle with her gold? for some portions of this book are as much below par as others are above it. The authoress seems to have gone to sleep over some parts, or to have given them to a housemaid to write, they are so stupid and so slovenly. At other times the moral reflections are such as to provoke laughter: they are so very flat and silly. Who, for instance, can read such platitudes as the following in such a book, and not wonder as some people used to wonder about the flies in amber?—

"Not that the things themselves were very rare,
They wondered how the devil they got there."

We certainly did the same on coming across a few things like this:—

"It is lamentable, it is grievous—one of the great evils under the sun—is perversion of character!!! In my opinion almost all faulty, almost all criminal characters, are but perverted ones. There is not only the mystery of original sin, for which most are but too ready to look, to be found, but the image of God exists, however defaced, in every one. If in busying ourselves so much in punishing, in order to the correction of faults, we were to give half our attention to the discovering and developing of good qualities, I believe our moral education would produce far less unsatisfactory results than it at present does!!!"

Our authoress does not seem to be in the least aware that she has said something as novel as the French incontrovertible truth, "Henri Quatre est mort." She goes on:—

"We ought to have more faith in human nature. Faith, in itself, moves mountains, and the very confidence in the existence of good qualities would often call them into action."

Very original and fresh, certainly! If Mrs. Marsh would tell stories and avoid moral sentiments—stick to Scheherazade and abjure Joseph Surface—she would be a charming tale-teller. She cannot write a fine style, but she can, if she will, tell a story incomparably well—as she has done now.

The Old Engagement. A Spinster's Story. By JULIA DAY. 1 vol. 8vo.

If the Authoress of this little volume had possessed a judicious friend, privileged to be perfectly frank, (and consequently very disagreeable,) and who, in virtue of that frankness, had whispered into her ear, "Do not publish." Your dialogue, though lively, is often forced, and the machinery by which you move your characters is so visible, that discerning people like your Miss Vaughan and Colonel Estcourt, instead of being again drawn together by it, would have been bound to assert their free agency, and cast off the ropes (not threads) by which officious friends were seeking to bind them together, and would take refuge, one 'at the centre,' the other, thrice further than 'the utmost pole.'" If a judicious friend had so spoken, we should have been spared the unpleasant office of whispering the same into the ear of our friend the public. We own, however, to a secret affection for Dr. Grove, perhaps because he is "the ugliest man in England." There is nothing in the tone or intention of the tale to condemn, and when a little reflection has enabled Miss Day to manage her plot a little more scientifically,—when, like nature, she learns to carry on her works in secret till the "bright consummate flower" bursts on us, we shall be very glad to welcome characters so agreeably sketched as hers in a more skilful grouping.

The Fair Carew; or, Husbands and Wives. A Novel 3 vols. 8vo.

A BOOK full of talent—well written, lively, sensible, with experience and insight into character—but a book that fails to keep up the attention, from the continual introduction of new people and their histories into the main current of the tale. Some of the characters, especially in the Luttrell family, are remarkably well drawn and worked out. On the whole, we are of opinion that the book ought to be more interesting than it is, and the next production of the author will be completely successful.

NOTICE OF ERROR.

IN page 274, volume xiv., there occurs a very serious error. James Graham, Marquis of Montrose, is there confounded with John Graham, otherwise called "Graham of Claverhouse." The mistake seems to have arisen from the accidental omission (either in proof or manuscript) of the word "not." The writer intended to have written: "It needs scarcely be mentioned that this is not the famous 'Graham of Claverhouse,'" &c.; he begs to present his respectful acknowledgments to the two intelligent correspondents who have drawn his attention to the error; and he trusts they will perceive how easily the omission ~~men~~ might be made, in the haste and rapidity sometimes required in periodical writing. For the benefit of the few readers whom the error may be supposed to have misled, it will be right to state that—the Graham described in the article in question as being put to death at Edinburgh, was the Marquis of Montrose, who in 1650 attempted a cavalier insurrection in Scotland, while Charles II. was an exile in Holland; and that the not so respectable "Graham of Claverhouse" was the Viscount Dundee, who fell in battle at Killiecrankie (July 27, 1689), while engaged in an insurrection which he had raised in the Highlands in behalf of James II., at the time when the "Scottish Convention" was about to settle the crown on William and Mary.

Chronicle of Ethelfled.

BOOK SECOND.

WHEN I, Ethelfleda, consider the enormous disproportion between the most aggravated and prolonged sufferings of this present life and the glory that shall hereafter be revealed to us, it seems to me that were this little span one entire spasm or throe, we might gratefully so purchase the everlasting bliss. Whereas, we very well trow that this thorn-strewn path is interspersed with many sweet flowers, and watered with many refreshing streams, and overhung with many wholesome, unforbidden fruits; and that its course lies through many a deep glade and cheerful meadow, alternately in the cool shade and genial sunshine. Well, therefore, may the holy apostle of old remind us that our present afflictions, which are but for a moment, are working for us a far more exceeding weight of glory.

But reflections such as these do not, it is true, obtain their full masterdom under the immediate pressure of trials that wring from us strong crying and tears. And such being the case, it is no wonder that I, Ethelfleda, then a mere child, should have been sorely grieved that my sister's wedding-dinner was spoilt as it was. Three days the feast arose; on the third day, Alfred the prince, clad in weeds of peace, was seated at table between my mother and Ethelswitha, with a circlet of gold about his head, and a golden cup in his hand, and a smile and cheerful saying on his lips, when he suddenly gave a sharp cry, that made every one's blood run cold.¹ You may be sure every man and woman there present started up or looked aghast, thinking he was either stabbed or poisoned; but none were so amazed as was Ethelswitha. They had both risen up, and he had staggered towards her a little, with his hands on her shoulders, his head drooping, and his face and hair steeped in a clammy dew. Then it was that my mother, who says that the same thing can never astonish her twice, did with all her composed stateliness cause him to be borne away to his chamber, attended by my father and Ethelswitha; and did check and allay the universal panic and ferment by telling the company, truly, the prince had a spasm she had seen him taken with once before. Having thus pacified the assembly, she departed with all haste to the prince's chamber; and I, Ethelfled, who, if I had been less of a child should have remained and done the honours in her stead, did, by reason of my youth, steal away from the confused groups, and make for the ante-room of the prince's chamber, having no access whereunto, I hung about for a while in the outer gallery thereof. And, looking forth of the lattice at the gaily pranked groups on the green, the pavilions fluttering with ribbons, the booths loaded with cakes, the gleemen harping and piping, archers leaning on their long bows, wrestlers rolling on the grass, and children scrambling for nuts and halfpence,² I wondered within myself, childlike, how folks could be so unfeeling and so happy.

But they were not so, in fact, at least the elder and more thoughtful, though I wist it not at the time. Many were astounded, some in tears, and every one anxious for tidings of the prince's welfare. For he was greatly loved of all.

At length, my mother coming forth, composed, but very pale, said "You here, Ethelfleda? we should both be in the hall." I said, "Oh, mother, what has hurt your hand? it has five wounds on it." She looked at them and began to weep, saying, "The print of his nails in his strong pain; I marked them not till now." But she wiped her eyes and went into the hall directly: I close following. I remember not much of that heavy evening, every one seemed out of tune. Feigned mirth is heavy; and feigned sympathy heavier. There was a minstrel who did us good service by singing the doleful song of Beowulf, which, at the speediest, is three hours long. The men drew about him, and many gerefas and thanes that pretended to listen consulted on the expediency of taking leave and ending the feast. My mother began to look harassed; she whispered to me, "See if you can glean tidings of him," so I went and found the outer gallery full of yellow torch-light and of people waiting quietly. I passed on through the now empty ante-chamber: Ethelswitha came to the door when I tapped; she said, "He is sleeping now, help me to disengage my veil, and be within call in my little room." So I undid her veil, which had been sent from Rome, and was as fine as gossamer, worked all over with silver stars; and I unclasped her golden slippers; and then, having advertised my mother of the prince's repose, I obeyed my sister's behest, and betook myself into her little dressing closet. After a time, I heard horses' feet softly treading under the window, and, looking forth, could make out, by the light of torches, my father bidding hushed farewells to sundry guests. Still looking forth, but noting nothing, I mused of all that had befallen during the last three days, which seemed now to have no reality in them; the gay carolling and winding of horns before day-dawn; the hunters and dogs dispersed over the dewy grass, impatient to start. . . Alfred the prince stepping forth, a gay bridegroom from his closet, people huzzaing, dogs baying, horses champing, the gay sun shining over all.

Then the noon-tide feast—royal and noble guests arriving—minstrels harping—rich gifts presenting—Ethelswitha as fair as May—tables spread all down the hall and along the green—others spread in green bowers—baked meats smelling everywhere—wine, ale, and cyder running—my mother seeing to all and at leisure for everything.

The archery, the prizes, the bride on her flowery throne; the rustic sports, the music. Supper, jesting, complimenting, mirth growing noisier; every one full of themselves, and yet over looking at the bridegroom and bride . . . all at once brought to a pause by that exceeding bitter cry.

(1) See Leigh Hunt's "Indicator."

(2) Halfpence.

In the stillness of the night, I could hear one of the guards without, ask his fellow, "What made him, wit ye, so cry out?" The other responded, "They may say what they list; I take it that he was tormented of the devil." Musing much of this, and of the distinctions between chastisements and temptations, I fell on sleep or ever I was aware, with my head on my arms and a prayer on my lips; and thereupon had a dream, which was, indeed, but that of a child, yet which, for its singularity and the impression it made upon me for a long time afterwards, I cannot refrain from here recording.

Methought I was still waking, and reclining, because of my weariness, on an oaken settle that stood over-against the casement, when a bright figure stood suddenly beside me, and said, "Arise up quickly!" So I did; and we passed through my sister's chamber, where she and the prince lay strait and stiff, like two monumental figures on an altar-tomb carven out of stone; and her veil of stars, which methought she still wore, hung nigh unto the silver lamp, but burnt not. For why? A watcher sat at their head, and another at their feet, clad in long white garments, looking holier than men, stronger than women, fairer than either; and they were keeping ward. So we left them, and passed on through the outer door, that unclosed and folded again of itself; and without, in the gallery, were the lights burning dim, and men dropped asleep after all sorts of fashions; but, among them here and there, spiritual beings in orderly array, silent and attent. At each door and each bed-head as on we passed, were still other virgins on guard; and so we passed on from the chief chambers to the low, narrow, and close rooms and offices round about the court-yards beyond; and even here, too, amongst the tired servants, were other watchers. In special, I marked two in the women's quarter leaning over a poor wench, Ethelice by name, of fearful and sorrowful mood, and one said softly to the other, "How troubled she is above measure!" and the other made answer, "Yea, but not for long." Then the first saith, "'Tis a vain terror, a mere shadow she has started at;" and the other saith, "Yea, but whileas it lasteth, 'tis no mere shadow to her!" And so, made a cross on her forehead, and its furrows disappeared. But the brightest watcher of them all, in appearance like to a king, stood by a poor esne¹ that was driven from pillar to post from morning to night. This angel had a pale blue star on his brow, and was so deep in thought, that he noted us not as we passed by. Then we came into the outer court, into the dark glooming shade and cool night air; and, methought, my guide said "Go forward, and see the wonders of the night." So I went forward alone, and a little but not much afraid, into the chase, which soon became a forest with moonlit glades. But here and everywhere, I encountered spiritual beings, in companies or alone; some in inaudible discourse, walking, standing, or lying; some busied among the leaves and flowers; and it seemed unto me, that every tree and herb had its gardener, though so shadowy, so silent, so like it in colour, as to be only with pain made out. None looked on me, but many looked up, and I wist not whether there were more of gravity or happiness in their faces. After a while, they seemed all to look round with reverence at some one preceding me, and then quietly return to their labours; but I could see none before me. However, I came at length to a high wall, still in the blackness of midnight shade, and in the wall, a door, and in the door, a key; and I heard some one between it and me turn that key, and that door opened and I went in. Withinside, I could discern rather than see there was a fair garden, for I could smell aromatic herbs and sweet spices, such as are used by our priests, and the odour of sweet flowers; and once and again my foot caught in the tendrils of creeping plants that seemed to grow too rankly, intermixed with weeds. A pleasing kind of fearfulness overcame me in this garden, and I went on through a tangled foot-track that descended pretty steeply to the brink of a little lone pool or well, lying in the darkness of brightness. It looked so cool and pure, that I took some of the water in my hand to drink, but it tasted bitter; and I stooped over it to look in its clear depths, expecting to see myself reflected in it; but, instead thereof, lo! another face, not mine own! And I trembled, and awoke.

(1) S.A.V.E.

. . . There was Ethelswitha standing over me, looking haggard in the grey light of dawn; and she said, "Poor child, sorrow hath made you heavy to slumber—send me my women, and go you and sleep on your bed."

So I did as she bade me, and sank into dreamless sleep; for, indeed, I was new to night watching. The busy throng soon dispersed; and the prince, making out from his leeches that they knew not what ailed him, and could give no certitude of speedy recovery, gat up from his couch, saying, "Then I'll bear it as best I may." And calling me to him, he took from his vest a little note-book full of wiselike sentences and saws of Scripture, whercon he loved to look, though he was not fluent at reading; and he bade me write therein a saying of Ethelswitha's, which had much pleased him,—"Jesus hurts but to heal." Having fulfilled his behest, I returned it unto him; when, regarding it admiringly, he said, "Thou'rt the featest little scribe in Chriendom or Kent. I will give you my silver pen."

It came to pass after those days, that our country had no rest. Without, were fightings; within, were fears. We were tried and put to the proof every way; in assaults, in sieges, in pillagings, in the burning of our houses, in the destruction of our crops, in the peril of our lives. What wretchedness did those pagans, the Danes, occasion! yea, what weariness of living; yea, what difficulty to live! I have known rulers in high places as hard put to it in those days for a dinner, as were the princes of Samaria during the siege, when an ass's head sold for fourscore pieces of silver; and though a man were liable to the healsfang or neck-catch if he gave his servants flesh-meat on a fast-day, meat of all sorts was so hard to come by, that I fancy the rule was never less observed, except upon compulsion, for all ate a hearty meal when they could. As for the lower sort, they were fain to see the pottage of ramps, cresses, and refuse, such as, in common, only the swine would eat; and would hardly, I think, have refused strong drink, though a mouse or weasel had died in it, in spite of the penalty; for what escaped the troops of Tema, the companies of Sheba licked up; of Hubba, that is, and Hingmar, his brother, the sons of Lodbrog the Dane. It would seem they had come up from their place in the North, as Gog and Magog in the prophecy of Ezekiel, with all their bands, into the land of unwall'd villages, and to them that were at rest and dwelling safely, to take a spoil, and to take a prey, and to carry away silver, and gold, and goods, and much cattle.

In those days was it feelingly to be experienced, in the words of the holy Shepherd-king, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of man; for albeit the famine and pestilence had been hard to bear, the war was much worse. These infidel wretches embittered the very morsel between our teeth, scouring the country like troops of wolves, violently taking away our flocks and feeding thereof, driving away the ass of the fatherless, and taking the ox of the widow, turning the needy out of doors, and causing the naked to lodge without covering; inasmuch that they were wet with the showers from the mountains, and constrained to burrow in caves and holes of the earth, or to roost in the forest for shelter. As for ourselves, . . . to-day there would not be a man on the premises; every soul of them fluttered like sparrows from corn; anon, like the sparrows to their meat, they come back again, every man with his hart or roebuck, or maybe a handful of them with a wild boar; and so we eat and are refreshed, till a cry comes sooner or later of "The Danes!" Howbeit, I am running on too fast, into the middle and latter part of the year, and must return for a little to the beginning of the spring, after my sister's marriage, when the floods of the valley began to show their tender blades, and the primrose and celandine to peer forth on the banks, and jack-of-the-hedge to show his saucy face along the by-paths; and the jays and starlings to chatter, and the wrynecks to pipe, and the rooks to utter their hoarse notes. I had shot up very fast, of late, into a mere cornstalk, and had, I think, a little outgrown my strength; add to which, I had applied somewhat too closely to a wall-hanging I was working for Ethelwitha, so that I lost my health a little, and was dull and sorry of cheer; but my mother thought I should clear up in the spring; howbeit, I did not. The subject of my hanging, which was lovely, I will here describe. It was the flight into Egypt, which has always had something about it very pastoral and pleasant to my mind. Joseph and Mary would, no question, shun the walled towns and populous villages, and trace their way through the most sylvan and sequestered paths. How pleasant, to camp out, in that warm climate, under date-trees and palm-trees, out of reach of the enemy, sleeping on honeysuckle banks, crossing brooks, resting in cool valleys, and dining under hedges! . . . I depicted them, to the best of my ability, halting at one of those rustical resting-places; the ass turned loose to graze, Joseph dipping water from the spring, Mary setting out their frugal repast, and the Holy Child, looking with grave serenity at two pieces of wood, fallen over one another in the form of the cross. It was a delightful subject; only that I Ethelfled, wist not how to make the rivulet look as if it wound away into the distance; it would go up into the sky. I thought about it and dreamed about it, and I think over-application to it made me ill of cheer, but my mother thought I had taken the lung-ail,¹ and dieted me on chestnuts and honey; but this doing me no good, she made out that I was bewitched; and in the following manner.

Straying one morning in the cow-pastures, hunting for the first primroses, there comes me a pretty white doe, flitting among the bare trees, and presently trots from the brake close up to my side. I hold out my hand, which it licks; and to my surprise I note a leathern bottle tied about its neck with a thong. On handling the same, I find some drops of sour milk hardened about its mouth, and guess whosoever hath tied it about the doe's neck must depend on it, somehow, for a supply. Remembering Elijah and the ravens, I tempt the doe towards the dairy, feed it with crumbs, and fill the bottle with milk; whereon it trots away as though its mission were fulfilled. Day after day it returns with the empty cuche, which I as constantly replenish; and at length I am avised to track the pretty creature into the woods. Having now become friendly with me, it ambled on a little in advance, oft stopping for me and then trotting on again, till it had led me much further than I reckoned on, quite beyond my knowledge, and far away from home. At length I became scared, doubting how I should find my way back, and apprehensive of some salvage beast rushing out upon me . . . as for the more harmless sort, we scattered herds of them, right and left. All at once, we reach a glooming brake, with dead men's bones whitening among the grass, as though some death-struggle had occurred there long ago; and in the midst a prodigious huge gnarled oak, of unaccountable age, and embosht with moss; in the hollow of which, cowers or crouches an old woman, a gnawing of her arm, as it seemed to me, and muttering in a strange, eldritch fashion, "What ho! Thor! what ho, Odin! Bring back my little lad. . . Did he then? Lordsake, who'd mind a child? What wouldst have? here's fever-few an' time past in a honey-bug—indeed purslane's wanting . . . oh! oh!" And seeing the doe trot up to her, she clasped her skinny arms about its neck, undid the bottle with trembling hands, drained it as though she were famishing, and then fell to kissing and hugging the doe as though she were crazy, which indeed she was.

(1) Consumption.

Her face was more like that of a man's than a woman's, more like a fiend's than either; her skin like old brown leather, eyes red as ferrets, with grisly hair falling over them. Nor had I a doubt, hearing her name the names of the Danish gods, but that she was a wicca or witch; and, in my fearfulness, making a little rustling noise which caught her ears, she started up, caught sight of me, and was about to fall on me, when a savage growl from behind, followed by the spring of a huge, hairy, dark body over my head, towards her throat, so skeared me as that I fell lifeless to the ground. When I recovered, there was Eadwulf's great black and tawny blood-hound licking my face, and Eadwulf himself, with eyes as red as his hair, coming up all panting. His first greeting was, "Tell 'ee what, mistress . . . thou's led me a pretty dance; and may I be hung for a Danes' spy if e'er I let thee out o' sight of us all, so long together again!" He'd been crying, I think; and I was somewhat cowed, so 'compained him homewards quietly enow, without saying, as I sometimes did when he chode me, "Where's the harm?" or "Where's the wrong?"

Some foresters, whom we met by the way, reported old Mulla, as they called her, to be a harmless maniac, whom the pagans had bereft of her wits by slaying her sons; howbeit, my mother apprehended her to have somewhat of malign power about her; and, seeing me much fluttered by the encounter, would have it I was bewitched. An ashen bough was therefore placed over my pillow, and Gunfried, the wise woman, was called in. As for the doe, I regret to relate that the poor, harmless creature was chased away by the serfs, who held it to be little better than its mistress.

I had a secret fear of one who, like Gunfried, was reported to have some mysterious insight into bodily and mental diseases; which left me, however, the moment I saw her; for she was the keenest, yet gentlest and sweetest-looking old woman I ever set eyes on. She took me readily in hand, and made much of certain herbs which, to be of any good to me, I must gather at day-dawn myself; to wit, white horehound, hyssop, brown-wort, parsley, rue, and groundsel; of each twenty penny-weights, seethed in a syster-full of old ale till half boiled away; of which I was to drink a neap-full cold every morning fasting, and in the evening as much warm. To collect the roots and fresh leaves, she and I footed it together over the early dew many a May morning; and, whether owing to the fresh air, or to her medicine, I became quite strong and well. Many a wise lesson did she teach me of the goodness and glory of God, as set forth in the properties of this and that herb and flower; and many a lovely tale did she tell me that carried me quite out of myself. On my putting it to her, one day, why the herbs, to do me any good, must be gathered by my own hands, she, smiling, made answer,—

"There are many things which, to be of any good to you, must be done by yourself. You must pray for yourself, you must sleep for yourself, you must eat for yourself. Can my having a full meal afford any nourishment to you, wit ye? We must all walk along the strait path ourselves, if we would wonne through the gate at the further end of it."

I have often since thought, how sad to be old Mulla, how happy to be old Gunfried. There was everything about the one to make old age fearsome; there was nothing about the other to make old age otherwise than pleasant.

Now, ever since my encounter with old Mulla, my walks had been more guarded and circumscribed. For some time, save with Gunfried, Eadwulf, or some of our own women, I stirred not. Howbeit, as habit bates sense of danger, and over-charge is onerous, I gradually became less watchful and watched, and made long progresses in and about the woods on foot, attended only by the wolf-dog, Bran. One day we met a prodigious large wolf, who had scarce glared on me with his red, hungry eyes, when Bran throttled him and laid him dead at my feet. I was so pleased with myself for being no more scared than I was, that it was the greatest effort to me to refrain from bragging of it on my return home; howbeit, I abstained, that is, for three days, lest my walks should thereon be forbidden. At the end of that time, my natural sincerity made the concealment extremely burdensome unto me; and, as the Psalmist expresses it, "my heart was hot within me." Howbeit, it seemed so stupid and shameful then to reveal a matter I had already made a secret of, that I could not bear to tell it, except to my confessor, to whom I mentioned it in confession, but so slightly, and, as it were in parenthesis, that I much think the old man never heard it at all. Howbeit, I got absolution, which peaccified me at the time, though, in the end, neither that nor my old "Where's the wrong?" proved of any avail; and I refrain not from saying that since I have come to mature years, I have done penance for that little fault.

However, the secret . . . (I pray thee, reader, bear awhile with my garrulity,) the secret, I say, was not to be so kept, whether I would or no. Previous to the appearance of the wolf, I had been knitting blue-bells about Bran's neck with an azure twine; and the very next time we three went that way together, Eadwulf, Bran, and I, Bran pulled Eadwulf by the skirt of his skin hunting-frock, to the place where the dead wolf lay, and lool ad up in his face, as much as to ask whether he had not done a clever thing. The moment Eadwulf saw it, he cries, "Hey! here's been death-work! This twine is thine, mistress!—I marked it, last week, in thine hand. Did the wolf, then, fly at thee?" I hastily cried, "Dear Eadwulf, it did;—but don't tell. It did me no harm, you see." He stood musing, and looking on me awhile, the blue twine still in his hand, and then delivered himself thus:—"Don't tell," thou says, mistress? and, 'it has done thee no harm?' Has it done thee no harm, mistress, if it comes to 'Don't tell?' Why, thou's putting a rope round thine own neck, and giving me the other end of it! I've only to say, Wolf, or to growl a little, or to say, I wish I had a piece of twine,—to make thee ready to kill me! . . . I cares for thee, mistress, as thou wert mine own daughter; howbeit, let it be as thou wishest. . . . An thou bids me, I'll not tell."

So, of course, I consented to make no secret of the matter any longer; and all the better, I think, for my own heart and soul. Trifle as it was, I have often since remembered the wolf.

I know not whether I were at this time what is ordinarily thought comely. Ethelswitha was always so much more thought of than myself, that I thought as little of myself as the rest did, and never troubled the looking-glass much. In sooth, I was apt to take too little rather than too much thought of what I should put on; and left the charge of my hair, which was now very long, entirely to my women, who seemed to me to spend a good deal more time than they needed to have done, in smoothing and trifling with it. But the sensation was pleasant and soothing, and left me to pursue my own thoughts; so I never hurried them. My father called me his apple-blossom; and, one day, I heard some one say, to another one, without thinking I noted him . . . somewhat about . . . "Sweet as the breath of morning." 'Tis strange, how we remember such-like things.

* * * * *

About this time, for as young as I was, my marriage with the Earl of Berks became the common report; not that I had seen much of him. He was a brave man, with a face like an owl; and I must say, I should have preferred his younger brother. However, it was, of course, quite out of the question to think of the latter, since, though noble, he had not forty hides of land, and could not sit in the witenagemot. The earl his brother was good-hearted, but somewhat tedious. He sang a song at the prince's wedding, that, had he not been who he was, every one would have lost patience with. Notwithstanding which, had we been espoused, I could have found it in my heart to be unto him a good wife; but, on the whole, am thankful it went otherwise. My mother thought me too young; my father thought, if 'twere delayed too long, it might, in such unsettled times, never come to pass at all. Had he had his will, I Ethelred might not now be writing this chronicle.

However, the lamentable event which deprived me of my intended husband, demands a new book,—not to say a better and more moving writer than my most contemptible self. Nor is it to be supposed that I should ever have attempted to preserve, by my mean pen, events so worthy of a much better narrator, had it seemed likely that, in the much greater importance men attach to themselves and their own sayings and doings than to those of other people, any other chronicler would address himself to my task, or, if he did, be able to make half so much of it as I can.

—It was among the loveliest customs of the ancients to bury the young at morning twilight; for as they strove to give the softest interpretation to death, so they imagined that Aurora, who loved the young, had stolen them to her embrace.

A CHAPTER ON THE ROBIN.

BY H. G. ADAMS.

"The Redbreast, sacred to the household Gods,
Wisely regardless of the threatening sky,
In joyless fields, and thorny thickets, leaves
His shivering mates; and pays to trusted man
His annual visit. Half afraid, he first Against the window beats; then, brisk, alights
On the warm hearth; then hopping o'er the floor,
Eyes all the smiling family askance,
And pecks, and starts, and wonders where he is;
Till more familiar grown, the table crumbs Attract his slender foot." THOMSON.

"I HAVE heard," says Macgillivray, "of a closet naturalist, who, slighting the labours of a brother of the field, alleged that he could pen a volume on the Robin; but surely if confined to the subject, written in the manner of the Classification of Birds in Lardner's Cyclopædia and without the aid of fable, it would prove a duller book than Robinson Crusoe." Now we are free to confess that we belong to that order of naturalists, to which the term "closet" is here somewhat slightly applied; and it seems to us, that we, too, could pen a volume on the Robin, and make it exceedingly interesting, without the aid of fable, although it should be very different from a mere scientific classification of orders and genera. A duller book than De Foe's immortal production perhaps it might prove, and yet not be so very dull either. There is much in natural history, even if an author confines himself to strict and literal facts, to instruct the heart and delight the understanding; and if he call in the aid of memory and association, he may, without wandering into the misty region of fable, find sufficient material for his purpose, even when writing on the least known and admired of God's living creatures. How easy, then, is his task, when he essays to place before his readers an account of so lively, and familiar, and interesting a bird as the Robin Redbreast; spruce Robinet, the cheerful Ruddock, as he is called in some districts, welcomed and loved alike by old and young;—the bird to which Carrington addresses these fine lines, in the sentiment of which all must cordially sympathize:—

"Sweet bird of Autumn, silent is the song
Of earth and sky, that in the summer hour
Rang joyously, and thou alone art left
Sole minstrel of the dull and sinking year.
But trust me, warbler, lovelier lay than this,
Which now thou pourest to the chilling eve,
The joy-inspiring summer never knew.
The very children love to hear thy tale,
And talk of thee in many a legend wild,
And bless thee for those touching notes of thine!
Sweet household bird, that infancy and age
Delight to cherish, thou dost well repay
The frequent crumbs that generous hands bestow:
Bequiling man with minstrelsy divine,
And cheering his dark hours, and teaching him
Through cold and gloom, autumn and winter, morn.
Who feeds the fowls of air, shall He forget
His own elect ones, who their every want
To Him in prayer and thankfulness make known?"

It is, indeed, truly a "household bird," and one around which home memories and associations most thickly cluster; a lively and pleasant feature in the scene, when there is least in the outward aspect of nature to cheer and gladden us, and we love it accordingly, with an affection such as we bestow upon few other irrational creatures. How cheerily sounds its short sweet warble, amid the gloom and silence of a winter's day! How brightly gleams the ruddy breast, contrasted with the dull, leaden-coloured sky; the brown, naked branch; or the snow-covered earth! Who is there to whom the Robin is not a welcome visitant, and to whom these sweetly simple lines, by Dr. Jenner, seem other than appropriate?

"Come, sweetest of the feather'd throng,
And soothe me with thy plaintive song:
Come to my cot, devoid of fear,
No danger shall await thee here:
No prowling cat with whisker'd face
Approaches this sequester'd place:
No school-boy, with his willow bow,
Shall aim at thee the murderous blow:
No wily lime-twig here molest
Thy olive wing, or crimson breast.
Thy cup, sweet bird! I'll daily fill
At yonder cressy, bubbling rill:
Thy board shall plentifully be spread
With crumbets of the nicest bread:
And when rude winter comes, and shows
His icicles and shivering snows,
Hop o'er my cheerful hearth, and be
One of my peaceful family:
Then soothe me with thy plaintive song,
Thou sweetest of the feather'd throng!"

Can we suppose that the part which the Robin is made to play in the well-known story of "the Babes in the Wood" had its origin in any other than a deeply-seated and widely diffused sentiment in favour of the bird? It is in such fables as these, that popular feelings and superstitions are embodied, and made manifest, so that the likes and dislikes of a people may be surely traced in their national ballads, not one of which is more beautiful and pathetic than that wherein the untimely fate of the fair children is so sweetly and touchingly described, and in which it is said—

"No burial these pretty babes
Of any man receives;
But Robin Redbreast painfully
Did cover them with leaves."

In a poem entitled "England," by John Walker Ord, we find these simple lines expanded into a fine Spenserian stanza—

"And at their graves no virgins clad in white
Attended, and no minstrelsy was heard,
But they were gather'd to eternal night
By the dear love of what!—a helpless bird!
Who sung their dirges and each corpse interr'd,
Gathering the sweetest leaves of all the wood,
And shrouding them of its own sweet accord;
So that they slept in holiest solitude,
Where nature was their tomb, and no one might intrude."

Ever mingled with the feeling of pity, called forth by this story of helpless innocence perishing thus untimely, is one of love for the bird, which so "painfully," that is, tenderly—carefully, performed the last sad rites of sepulture, and sung a requiem over the dear children, at the account of whose cruel death many a young heart has bled, and for whom many youthful eyes, and, for that matter, older ones too, have shed tears of sorrow; even as, according to the nursery rhyme, did all "the birds of the air"—

"When they heard the bell toll for poor cock Robin," slain by the wicked sparrow, no doubt for sheer envy at the universal regard in which Robinet was held.

But a field naturalist would perhaps tell us that we are now getting very deep indeed into the region of fable, and call us back to the terra firma of fact, to which we shall endeavour to keep, at all events until we get to the end of the chapter; not that we are ready to admit that fables are at all times, or generally, pure fictions; they embody thoughts, and feelings, and beliefs, which have their origin in truth, if they be not at all times themselves literal verities. The matter-of-fact field naturalist, however, tells us, that—"The Robin is a privileged bird, spared even by Cockney sportsmen, every one looking at him as a friendly and pleasant little fellow, whose company is never tiresome;" and therefore we speak advisedly, when we give him the praise which is justly his due, and feel that we are fully authorized to quote the "mad poets," who have sung the praises of our little favourite, which, with J. A. Wade, we observe, is the bird of memory and of pity:—

"This was the home of Memory, the grave
Was Pity's,—both were handmaids of the queen;
The first was absent from her lonely cave,
The other codd beneath the turf so green;
A Robin's nest above her tomb was seen,
Within the leaves that crowded there to shade
The grassy hillock, all around had been Touched by some sacred sympathy, and made A cloister for sad hearts, whose hope had been betray'd."

This is quite in accordance with the feeling which has prompted so many a poet, when selecting some green spot of earth, where, when life's "fitful fever" is over, he may rest in peace, to wish that—

"There the earliest flowers may spring,
And there the Redbreast build and sing."

As an introduction to a more precise description of the Haunts and Habits of the Robin, we may quote Grahame's poetical and graphic lines—

"How simply unassuming is that strain!
It is the Redbreast's song, the friend of man,
High is his perch, but humble is his home,
And well conceal'd. Sometimes within the sound
Of heartsome mill-clack, where the spacious door
White-dusted, tells him plenty reigns around;
Close at the root of brier-bush, that o'erhangs
The narrow stream, with shavings bedded white,
He fixes his abode, and lives at will.
Oft near some single cottage he prefers
To rear his little home; there, pert and spruce,
He shares the refuse of the goodwife's churn,
Which kindly on the wall for him she leaves:
Below her lintel oft he lights, then in
He boldly flits, and fluttering loads his bill,
And to his young the yellow treasure bears.
Not seldom does he neighbour the low roof
Where tiny elves are taught; a pleasant spot
It is, well fenced from winter blast, and screen'd
By high o'erspreading boughs from summer sun."

Before the door a sloping green extends
No farther than the neighbouring cottage-hedge,
Beneath whose bountee shade a little well
Is scooped, so limpid, that its guardian trout
(The wonder of the lesser stooping wights)
Is at the bottom seen. At noontide hour,
The imprison'd throng, enlarged, blythsome rush forth

To sport the happy interval away ;
While those from distance come, upon the sward,
At random seated, loose their little stores :
In midst of them poor Redbreast hops unharm'd,
For they have read or heard, and wept to hear,
The story of the Children in the Wood ;
And many a crumb to Robin they will throw.
Others there are that love, on shady banks
Retired, to pass the summer days : their song,
Among the birchen boughs, with sweetest fall,
Is warbled, pausing, then resumed more sweet,
More sad ; that, to an ear grown fanciful,
The babes, the wood, the man, rise in review,
And Robin still repeats the tragic line.
But should the note of flute, or human voice,
Sound through the grove, the madrigal at once
Ceases ; the warbler flits from branch to branch,
And, stooping, sidelong turns his listening head."

Long as this extract is, we are strongly tempted to pass on from the leafy spring-time to the bare desolate winter, and continue the description of the Scottish poet :—

"Of all the tuneful tribes, the Redbreast sole Confides himself to man : others sometimes
Are driven within our lintel-posts by storms,
And, fearfully, the sprinkled crumbs partake :
He feels himself at home. When lours the year,
He perches on the village turfy copes,
And, with his sweet but interrupted trills,
Bespeaks the pity of his future host.
But long he braves the season, ere he change
The heaven's grand canopy for man's low home ;
 Oft is he seen, when fleecy showers bespread
The house-tops white, on the thawed smiddy roof.
Or in its open window he alights,
And, fearless of the clang and furnace glare,
Looks round, arresting the uplifted arm,
While on the anvil cools the glowing bar.
But when the season roughens, and the drift
Flies upward, mingling with the falling flakes
In whirl confused, then on the cottage floor
He lights, and hops and flits, from place to place, Restless at first, till, by degrees, he feels
He is in safety : fearless then he sings
The winter day ; and when the long dark night
Has drawn the rustic circle round the fire,
Waked by the dinamo wheel he trims his plumes,
And, on the distaff perched, chaunts soothingly
His summer song ; or, fearlessly, lights down
Upon the basking sheep-dog's glossy fur ;
Till, chance, the herd-boy, at his supper moss,
Attract his eye, then on the milky rim
Brisk he alights, and picks his little share."

Elsewhere Grahame addresses some musical lines to a Redbreast that flew in at his window, which, however, we must refrain from quoting, having much to say about the bird which will, perhaps, prove interesting to our readers. With regard to the place which naturalists have assigned to it, in their systematic arrangements of feathered creatures, we may observe, that by Linnæus it is placed in the 6th order—Passeræ, or Sparrows,—under the generic title of Simplicirostræ, that is, having simple bills ; the family name of the group, in which also is included the Nightingale, &c., being Motacilla, which name, however, Latham applies to the Wagtails, giving Sylvia to the warblers. It were a difficult, and, after all, an uninteresting task, to trace our red-breasted friend through the varying systems of Cuvier, Pennant, Brisson, and others, amid the labyrinths of which he plays at hide and seek in a most provoking manner, bearing now this, and now that unaccountable, and almost unpronounceable name—a veritable off-shoot, no doubt, from a Greek or Latin root, but sadly puzzling to those who have not had the advantage of a classical education. Let us then take him up where Macgillivray leaves him, standing all alone in his glory, as far as British birds are concerned, the sole and undisputed owner of the pretty generic name Eriiha, to which, if we want to distinguish the species from its foreign congeners, we must add Rubecula. There, Robinet, what do you think of such a title ? If that is not enough to make you too proud a bird to "sing to simple ears a simple lay," why, we know not what is. And now we have come to speak of your song, we may as well quote some curious remarks upon its variations, in accordance with the seasonal and atmospheric changes, from "Anecdotes of the Animal Kingdom."—

"Few observers of nature can have passed unheeded the sweetness and peculiarity of the song of the Robin, and its various indications with regard to the atmospheric changes: the mellow liquid notes of Spring and Summer, the melancholy sweet pipings of Autumn, and the jerking chirps of Winter. In Spring, when about to change his winter song for the vernal, he warbles for a short time in a strain so unusual, as at first to startle and puzzle even those ears most experienced in the notes of birds. He may be considered as part of the naturalist's barometer. On a Summer evening, though the weather may be in an unsettled and rainy state, he sometimes takes his stand on the topmost twig, or on the 'house top,' singing cheerfully and sweetly. When this is observed, it is an unerring promise of succeeding fine days. Sometimes, though the atmosphere is dry and warm, he may be seen melancholy, chirping and brooding in a bush, or low in a hedge: this promises the reverse of his merry lay and exalted station."

A Kentish poet, F. F. Dally, has given this sometimes melancholy chirping of the bird a funeral character—

"Though silent is the Nightingale,
The Robin here takes up the tale,
And unto ears that love to hear,
To hearts that fancy fairy things,
In plaintive prelude sweetly sings
The requiem of the dying year."

With William Howitt the bird is a musing monk, haunting the deserted cloisters of Wykeham's college at Winchester ;—

"A Robin Redbreast was the only musing monk that we found in these cloisters. He went with us all round, hopping from opening to opening, or perching on the bushes near us. 'Ay,' said the porter, 'that is the chapel Robin, it regularly attends service.' The Robin is a monk indeed."

Here is a picture by Mrs. Ellis, which may well be taken for the death scene of the departing year, in which also the Robin figures as a mourner:—

"With wintry aspect had that day begun,
There was no wind, no rain, but yet no sun;
A dreamy silence slumber'd all around,
And damp and dull the dews lay on the ground;
No movement stirr'd the air, save now and then
A leaf came flickering down upon the plain;
A lonely Robin from the leafless spray,
Tuned a sad song, then wing'd its flight away."

James Montgomery also speaks—

"The song of the Redbreast with ominous note, Foretelling the fall of the leaf."

Elsewhere the poet hails this note as the harbinger of Spring and liberty:—

"Soon shall spring, in smiles and blushes,
Steal upon the blooming year;
Then amid th' enamour'd bushes,
Thy sweet song shall warble clear.
Then shall I, too, join'd with thee,
Swell the Hymn of Liberty."

By that close observer of nature, Neville Wood, we are told that—

"The song of the Robin is not very loud, but it is remarkable for its sweet, soft, and melancholy expression. In summer, as I have observed, it is little noticed, but in autumn it is peculiarly delightful, though I am certain of the truth of Selby's supposition, that the notes which are heard in autumn and winter, proceed from the throats of the young of the year. Nor do I ever remember to have heard the adult bird singing in its natural state during the inclement seasons. But when confined to the house, or in a cage, both old and young will carol away right merrily. In softness and sweetness, I think the song of the Robin Redbreast is unexcelled by any of our other sylvan choristers, though as a whole it is surpassed by many. Witness, for instance—leaving the Brake Nightingale, 'the leader of the vernal chorus,' out of the question,—the ethereal strains of the Garden Fauvet, the Blackcap Fauvet, the Wood-Lark, and many others. But none of these, no, not even the Brake Nightingale itself, possesses that ineffably sweet expression, which we must pronounce to be peculiar to our admirable favourite."

Similar testimony to this is given by Bechstein and other naturalists. In a beautifully illustrated work on the Song Birds of Great Britain, privately printed, and edited by John Cotton, F.Z.S., it is stated that the song of this bird is "sweet and well supported, and is continued almost throughout the year." Allusion is also there made to the various familiar and affectionate appellations by which it is known, as in Bornholm (Sweden), Tommi-Liden; in Norway, Peter Romsed; in Germany, Thomas Gierdet; in England, "Bob," &c. Wordsworth also alludes to some of these titles of endearment, when, addressing the Robin, he says:—

"Art thou the bird whom man loves best,
The pious bird with the scarlet breast,
Our little English Robin;

The bird that comes about our doors
When autumn winds are sobbing?
Art thou the Peter of Norway boors?
Their Thomas in Finland,
And Russia far inland!
The bird who by some name or other
All men who know thee call thee brother?"

The nest of the Robin, we are told by Mudie, a good authority on such matters, is "on the ground, at the roots of trees, and in other concealed places, formed of the same materials as the nest of the wren," that is, almost anything suitable which can be found near the spot, and lined with wool or hair; these materials are very loosely put together, so that it is generally a rather bulky affair. "If, however," continues the above named naturalist, "there is not a natural concealment of foliage, the birds contrive to form an artificial one of dry leaves, under which they may reach the nest without the precise spot being known; and when the dam leaves her eggs, she sometimes covers them in the same manner, so that the strewing of leaves mentioned in the old ballad of 'the Babes in the Wood,' is true to the habits of the Redbreast. The eggs are yellowish grey, mottled with chestnut colour, and rarely exceed seven," Macgillivray describes them as "reddish-white, faintly freckled with light purplish red, nine and a-half twelfths of an inch in length, seven and a fourth in breadth," while Bolton, in his truly beautiful and valuable work, entitled "Harmonia Ruralis," says that they are of a dull white, or cream colour, marked with reddish brown spots, varying in number from five to nine." There is in reality however no discrepancy here, as the tints vary considerably in the eggs of different individuals. By the authority last named, we find it stated that—

"Young Redbreasts, when full feathered, may be easily mistaken for a different kind of bird, being spotted all over with rust-coloured spots, on a light ground; the first appearance of the red is about the end of August, but the bird does not attain its full colour till the end of the following month."

What its full colour is, all our readers must be aware, as its familiar habits give frequent opportunities of observing it; and this, not only in the wintry and inclement season, but also in the glad spring and leafy summer time; for, as Bishop Mant observes in his description of the month of April,—

"—most of all to haunts of men,
Familiar though to savage glen,
And woodland wild he oft may roam
Secluded, oft his wintry home,
No less the Redbreast makes his bower
For nestling in the vernal hour,
In thatch or root of aged tree
Moss-grown, or arching cavity
Of bank or garden's refuse heap,
Or where the broad-leaved tendrils creep
Of ivy, and an arbour spread
O'er trellised porch or cottage shed."

Hitherto we have looked only on the bright side of Robinet's history; but it is now our duty, as faithful chroniclers, to state the sad fact, that he is, to his own feathered friends and kinsfolk, a most disagreeable, quarrelsome fellow; a very Turk among the bushes, disturbing the sweet serenity of the sylvan scene with his brawls and scuffles, and frequently, shocking to relate, staining the greensward and the pure white blossoms with blood. Who that knows this, would—could, invoke him as the “gentle bird!” Yes, Robinet! for the truth must be told, thou art a fierce, pugnacious fellow, and of a verity dost not deserve the affection which is lavished on thee by those who see in thee a poor little harmless creature, driven by the inclemency of the weather, and the pangs of hunger, to seek shelter and food from man, and who doubtless think thee very grateful therefore, though even this may be doubted; for, as soon as the ice-bound streams begin to flow once more, and the bare branches to put forth buds, thou art away into the woods to seek the food which best thou lovest, and to build a home for thy expected progeny. Not that we would blame thee for thus obeying the promptings of nature, nor, indeed, for anything, save thy quarrelsome propensities: so never heed the ungracious truths which we have been telling of thee, but believe us to be quite in earnest while repeating the anecdote and verses in thy praise, which follow.

The following paragraph, illustrative of the Robin's docility, and attachment to its friend and benefactor, man, is extracted from Percy St. John's “Birds.”

“John McKelvie, gardener to the lady of the late General Inghes, at her seat of Mount Charles, beautifully situated on the banks, and near the mouth of the classic Doon, has a host of winged companions, all of which come at his call, flutter around him in the garden, and feed from his hand. At the head of this feathered tribe stands a Redbreast, which all but speaks, in return for the long kind treatment it has experienced from its master. This bird, when called upon, will fly from the furthest point at which it can hear his voice, alight on his hand at once, and without any apprehensions, pick its meal, and oftentimes will sit on his shoulder as he walks or works, and nestle in his bosom in well-known security. Nay more, when the gardener goes to town, if the Robin by any chance espies him as he departs, it gives him an escort, chirping and fluttering along the hedge before him, until he reaches the toll-bar, at Alloway place, on which, or on a neighbouring tree, it perches awaiting his return.”

Mrs. Schoolcraft, the wife of an English missionary at Mackinaw, on Lake Huron, relates that—

“The North American Indians have a tradition that the Robin, which, with them, is a considerably larger bird than with us, was once a youth whose father enjoined on him too long a fast (twelve days), on occasion of the customary abstinence from food before entering upon the duties of manhood, and choosing a guardian spirit, which must be something dreamt of during this fast. When the youth was upon the point of perishing with hunger, the transformation was effected, which saved him from such a doom: and the story goes on to tell how the father, who had been thus severe from a desire to make his son a great chief and warrior, went to the lodge in which he was confined, on the morning after the prescribed time had expired, and how he saw the change take place, crying out the while in agony of spirit,—“My son! my son! do not leave me!” But the bird looked down on his father with pity beaming in his eyes, and told him he should always love to be near man's dwellings; that he should always be seen happy and contented, by the constant uprightness and joy he would display; that he would ever strive to cheer his father by his songs, which would be some consolation to him for the loss of the glory he expected—and that, although no longer a man, he would ever be the harbinger of peace and joy to the human race.”

This tradition is beautifully expressive of the universal feeling of affectionate regard for the Robin, which seems to prevail wherever the bird is known; it appears to be looked upon as a kind of connecting link between humanity and the feathered creation, and it is a creature so intimately associated with the recollections of home and childhood, and all that is brightest, and freshest, and purest in the heart and imagination of man, that we need feel no surprise at the number of poetic tributes which the bird has received from the sensitive and the gifted sons of genius.

In conclusion, we would endeavour to express our own sentiments in relation to this universal favourite, in lines which, if they have no other merit, possess, at least, those of earnestness and sincerity.

STANZAS TO THE ROBIN.

“The Lark has ceased his merry trill, the Nightingale is mute,
The Blackbird poureth out no more his notes, so like a flute;
No longer on the bending spray sings sweet the speckled Thrush,
The Linnet's silent in the copse, the Redstart in the bush:
The trees stand bare and verdureless, all swaying to the blast,
And from the leaden sky come down the hailstones thick and fast;
No flower is seen upon the banks, but patches white instead,
Where whirling snow-wreaths cover o'er the leaves all sere and dead.
A mournful silence reigns around, no cheerful sound is heard,
No hum of insect on the wing, no note of warbling bird.
No low of cattle on the hills, no bleat of pastured sheep;
All objects wear a sombre hue, all creatures seem to weep;—
Nay! hear ye not that warble low? again it meets the ear,
Like a consolatory voice the mourning soul to cheer:
It is the Robin, who, when all our summer friends are gone,
Because he beareth love to man, still singeth gaily on.
Oh, gentle Bird! with ruddy breast, and quick and restless eye,
That flieth not our presence when the stormy days are nigh,

But makest music in our homes, and cheerest us with song
Throughout the winter desolate, so dreary and so long;

I love thee well, for all that thou hast done for us and ours,
Aye ! better than the soaring Lark, or Linnet in the bowers;
And better than the Nightingale, though sweet her song to me,
Or e'en those children of the sun, the butterfly and bee !

Didst thou not cover o'er with leaves, those babes so fair and young.
That died within the gloomy woods ! and it was thou who sung
The requiem for their sinless souls, now looking from above,
To bless thee for thy tenderness, and never-tiring love.

Hast thou not ever proved thyself to man a friend indeed,
By solacing his saddest hours, and helping him in need ?
For he is cheer'd and strengthen'd, when he listens to thy voice,
He owns a watchful Providence, and doth therein rejoice.

He knows the clouds will pass away, and brighter days will come,
Thou art than him more destitute, no food hast thou,
no home :
Thy sylvan haunts no more can give a shelter to thy head,
And all thy spring and summer friends, the lovely flowers, are dead.

Yet cheerfully thou singest on, one heedful eye doth see,
One arm doth minister unto the wants alike of man and thee !
And those teachings holy, and thy friendship for mankind,
Affection's links unto my heart shall thee for ever bind.

A COLONIST'S STORY OF CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY HUGH JOHN URQUIHART.

PREVIOUSLY to the year 1847 I was comparatively a wealthy man. From small beginnings I had gradually risen to a station far beyond that to which I looked forward when I started in life. Emboldened by the success which had attended my former transactions, I plunged deeply into the railway speculations which were then so prevalent, and the result was that my golden visions vanished with those of other dreamers, and I found myself the loser of the bulk of my fortune, having however luckily saved a small portion from the general wreck.

It was a heavy blow to me. So confident had I been of success that I had been revolving the project of a marriage with a lady of suitable wealth, and therefore the disclosure of the real state of my affairs came like a thunderclap. But my previous struggles with the world having hardened my sensibility and sharpened my penetration, I at once set about collecting the ruins of my property, and consulted with my friends as to the best means of employing the little capital with which I was to begin the world afresh.

Their advice was rather contradictory, but at length an idea of my own originating attained an ascendancy in their judgment. Acting upon it, I purchased some land in the vicinity of the Cape Colony, and soon after set off to my new home there. When I arrived I found my land situate upon the very borders of the civilized districts; indeed, it was more advanced than any of the pieces already occupied. The natives were rather friendly, for the war having been concluded to their apparent satisfaction, they seemed inclined to show kindness to the Whites.

My task was pretty hard, but I bore up against new difficulties with an energy which surprised me. By degrees my loneliness was alleviated by a few newcomers who settled round me, and I began to be reconciled to my novel situation. After the first year had passed I became more accommodated to my work; indeed I found it much lighter and easier than when I had to break the ice, as I may say.

On Christmas Eve, 1850, a party composed of my friendly neighbours was assembled round my hearth for the purpose of renewing in a foreign land the festivities with which the season is celebrated in England. First in rank, (according to my colony notions,) sat John White, who had been in the employ of the settlers since he was a boy of ten, which was then thirty years ago. During this time he had acquired an extensive knowledge of Cape life, and contrived to save sufficient to purchase a piece of land contiguous to mine. The next was a ten years' settler, Harry Percy, who also understood something of the wild countries; and the remaining two, Richardson and Hall, were men of about thirty, and a few months my juniors in the experience of this kind of life.

We were seated round the fire talking over our several adventures and experiences, when a violent knocking at the door interrupted us, and a voice exhorted us to admit the owner for the sake of God. Our whole party were on their feet in an instant, and we at once opened the door to the stranger, who rushed in with looks of terror. By his dress, which was torn and much stained with dirt, we recognised him as one of the native police, and eagerly interrogated him as to the cause of his alarm.

He explained, that having, with a companion, gone in search of a man who had stolen some bullocks, three Kaffirs had attacked them in the evening, within a quarter of a mile of my house, when his fellow had been killed, and he himself had escaped with difficulty. Under these circumstances he implored our protection, which, I need not say, was readily granted.

Rumours of an outbreak among the native tribes had reached us, and therefore we had thought it prudent to keep our weapons near us, although apprehensive of no immediate danger. My friend White glanced at the row of rifles which our party had placed by the wall, and observed,

"The man says they are only three. We are five, and could see justice done."

The native eagerly seconded this suggestion, and the result was, that seizing our weapons, we quitted my house in search of the robbers, leaving Hall behind to protect my property.

The night was rather threatening. When the moon occasionally shone forth with a faint glimmer we could discern great piles of clouds approaching, or already surrounding her. Only here and there a star could make itself visible, and as we went on, even these wholly disappeared.

We followed the stranger for at least half a mile, anxiously looking round for signs of the presence of his late assailants. Not a sound, however, broke the heavy silence of the night. We proceeded over a piece of rising ground which lay within my bounds, and when these latter were passed, continued our course into a little valley which was situate beyond.

We hurried along the path which had been worn in the centre, while at our right and left hands rose a sloping embankment, forming a rather lofty wall on either side. These walls were covered with long grass, interspersed with trees and bushes of various kinds. No settler had yet taken possession of it, although it was a promising spot and consisting of fertile earth, as the abundance and richness of its vegetation, even without artificial assistance, plainly proved.

We had reached the centre of this miniature valley when our native guide suddenly stopped. He said in a low whisper to White,

"It was here or about dry stop me. I creep forward soft, find 'em, and come back to tell."

"No!" replied the veteran colonist, "you lead us to them. We can come gently after you."

The other urged objections with such eagerness, and hesitated so much to proceed with us at his heels, that White became the more resolute to accompany him.

"You are a stranger to us," he observed in reply to the ebullition of argument, "we come here to protect you, and if you practise treachery you shall dearly answer for it."

As he spoke he reached his hand to grasp him by the shoulder. The fellow, alarmed at the action, eluded him and sprang into a thick bush close by, uttering a loud cry. A sickening emotion of despair seized us when we perceived the treachery which had been practised upon us. With a furious imprecation White raised his rifle in the direction of the fugitive, a stream of flame poured from its muzzle into the bush, a yell of mortal agony mingled with the roar of the explosion and resounded with it among the hills.

"One of 'em!" muttered White, between his teeth.

A chorus of cries burst from the ambushed savages, and we heard the rustling of the long grass and the trampling of many feet in close proximity. We commenced rapidly retracing our steps, White leading, and reloading by the way. We were soon convinced by the savage noises which were heard in our rear that we were discovered, and in a few moments we became aware that the whole band of wretches were in full pursuit.

Favoured by the darkness, we contrived to ensconce ourselves in the midst of a clump of trees before our foes could overtake us. They passed the place of our concealment in hot pursuit, and in a few minutes had put some distance between us and them. But their fierce yells were echoed with such fearful distinctness that a foe seemed to be approaching from every side, and we knew not which way to turn.

Cautiously emerging from our concealment, we hurried to avail ourselves of the shelter of another clump of bushes, and by thus changing our quarters several times, we contrived to get over some distance. Once, when we were about starting for a fresh ambush, we all distinctly heard a rustling noise in the grass, and shrank back in dismay. We remained for some time anxiously listening for a repetition of it: but in a few minutes we heard the return of the Kaffirs, who were rushing along the path at a furious rate. White, who understood the purport of their exclamations, informed us that they believed we had evaded their pursuit. Overjoyed at the prospect of escaping their anticipated vengeance, we were crouching still closer in our concealment while they passed, when, to our unspeakable dismay, a figure started from the long grass within three yards of us, and leaped directly into the pathway.

"All up!" whispered White to us, "what we wish to keep we must fight for!"

When I consider that I had never seen a shot fired in earnest before, and look at the odds which were against us, I am surprised at the coolness with which I examined my rifle and prepared my knife for deadly work. My energies were all collected to sustain the excitement of the struggle, and I even awaited the onset of the natives with impatience.

They were not long assembling in a body directly in our front, where they deliberated for a few minutes. Our inclinations prompted us to let fly amongst them while they were thus crowded together, but Harry Percy urged the necessity of reserving our fire, and therefore we waited.

Presently our enemies made a simultaneous movement, and a shower of spears fell upon the bush in front. They then uttered their war-cry and rushed on us, keeping huddled together in a dark mass.

They were within three yards of us when, taking steady aim at breast height, we discharged our weapons amongst them. A fiendish chorus of screams of agony and imprecations of vengeance ensued, by which we were made aware that our fire had not been without due effect.

Checked but for an instant, our ferocious foes, howling with fury, leaped into the bush behind which we lay concealed. Now, we found that a hand to hand struggle must decide the question; we rose to our feet and fell upon the bloodthirsty wretches with the utmost fury. Grasping my rifle by the barrel with both hands, I dashed the stock down upon them with a force that must have made a due impression on all who encountered the descending weapon. The mad-dened yells of the savages, the continual crashing of the bushes, the deep imprecations and short breathings of our party, and the heavy sound of the rapidly interchanged blows, all mingling together, produced a frightful effect. From the manner in which they had attacked us and the horrible cries to which they continually gave vent, I could not look upon our assailants as beings of my own species, and in the midst of the awful din I continued my heavy blows as if I had a troop of ghouls to contend with, who were fighting only for our blood.

During the first panic we contrived to keep them at fair distance, but they soon pressed so close that our clubbed rifles became unavailable. I drew my knife and sprang to grapple with a huge fellow who was preparing to dash his formidable hatchet upon the head of White, who was already engaged.

Had we been on even ground I should have been able to have struck him before he could have been ready for me; but by floundering amid the bushes I lost my opportunity. I however speedily wrested his weapon from his grasp, and was preparing to do execution upon him, but a friend came to his assistance, and in a moment after I was upon the ground, struggling between the pair.

My fresh antagonist appeared to be chiefly intent on obtaining possession of my rifle, and he seized it by the barrel and commenced twirling it about to effect his purpose. Seeing a favourable opportunity I suddenly relinquished my hold, and with the disengaged hand put a period to the opposition of his fellow. Turning to rise from the ground, I beheld the second native standing over me and preparing to bring down the stock of my gun upon me. Before I had time to lift an arm in defence it fell upon my head with a crash that sent flashes of fire across my eyes and deprived me of all sense.

After some time passed in an insensible state, I began to experience a feeling of suffocation, which caused me to make several convulsive efforts to draw my breath; then recollection slowly returned to me and I opened my eyes. I found myself lying upon the floor of a kind of hut, which I guessed was of Kafir workmanship, and near me, though not watching me, stood a native warrior. Glances of strong light were thrown into the place through the door, proceeding, as I judged, from some large fire, and illumined some portion of the hut, while the remainder was left in total darkness. From my dark corner, I observed some person lying down at a distance, and the light, suddenly flashing with more than usual brightness, revealed poor White, bound with strong twigs, and looking as disconsolate as possible.

Seeing him so firmly secured I examined my own limbs, fully expecting to find myself in the same condition. However, not a withe was upon me, and I felt assured that my captors believed me to be dead.

I was aware from what I had heard of their character that they would not allow us to live, it being their custom to murder their prisoners in cold blood, and thus my ideas were immediately directed to the means of effecting an escape from my present custody. I took a thorough mental survey of the aspect of things in my prison, as I suppose I may term it, and set about concocting a scheme.

Beside White, myself, and the native, there was evidently no other living being in the place. The native was armed only with a rifle, which I had little difficulty in recognising as my property, and was standing with his back to me, looking at White and occasionally addressing a scoffing remark to him.

It was apparent to me that, could I prevent this man from rushing from the hut, he possessed but two means of alarming his countrymen,—namely, his voice and his gun. I had not the least doubt of my ability to overcome him if he were deprived of the power of rousing his fellows, and as I was conscious nothing could be done without first putting him out of the way, I resolved at once to make an attempt upon him.

Rising slowly and with great care from my recumbent posture I stood on my feet, and made sure I had but one to cope with. Satisfied of this, I moved forward with the same caution till I had got within a yard of my foe.

He was standing leaning upon his rifle upon the verge of the dark portion of the place, his back being towards me. Thus I was sensible that the shadow would protect me from observation until I had crept so near as to touch him. I went as close as I dared venture, and calculated on the means of preventing alarm.

A thought suddenly flashed across me as I stood thus deliberating. I acted upon it immediately. As the fellow was leaning on the gun, the stock was placed upon the ground behind his foot. I crouched on my knees, reached forward my hand, gently opened the pan, and wiped out the priming with my finger. This accomplished, I once more rose to my feet.

A minute was spent in deliberation, and then I sprang to his side, placed my right hand upon his throat, which I grasped with all my strength, and clasped him round the waist with my left arm, at the same time pulling his opposite elbow to his back with my disengaged hand. Half-strangled, and unable to articulate a syllable, he raised the rifle, and as I forced him back into the darkness, I heard the ineffectual click of the lock. Exerting all my science in wrestling, I threw him heavily upon his back, falling with him, and keeping my hold upon his wind-pipe. I placed my knee upon his chest, and in a few minutes, after a useless struggle on his part, I knew that he would never speak more.

I then left him and stole up to White, who had been an amazed spectator of my feat, and asked him a few questions about the best manner of proceeding, at the same time releasing him from bondage. He told me that our two friends had made good their escape from their assailants, but that he, being entangled in the bush, was unable to follow them, and consequently had been taken prisoner; and that the natives were sleeping outside while the man I had killed, whose brother and father had perished in the affray, had remained in the hut to taunt him. He advised that we should proceed quietly through the midst of our sleeping enemies, and if we were discovered, he said the best we could do was to make a rush for it, as our lives depended on our success.

These hurried words having passed between us, I secured my rifle and joined my companion at the entrance. As we cautiously emerged into the open air, I perceived that the natives had kindled a fire to protect them from the attacks of wild beasts, and were sleeping round it. We passed them in the full glare of the flame without disturbing them, and began to feel assured of our safety.

My friend was pointing out the path which led to our settlement, when I suddenly struck my foot against a dark object that lay before me. A yell broke from it, and I felt my leg in the grasp of a pair of hands. I commenced striking with desperate fury in the direction of my unseen foe, who redoubled his cries, which soon aroused the circle of natives sleeping round the fire. One of them threw a blazing brand in our direction, the light from which exposed the whole affair. Clutching my leg with all his strength lay the fellow who had caused the mischief, while White and myself were endeavouring to disengage him. The light enabled me to direct my blows with certainty, and a crushing hit on the forehead soon laid the rascal on his back.

There was no time to be lost, for we had drawn the whole gang upon us.

"Run for it!" exclaimed White, now concealment was at an end; "those devils 'll follow like wild-fire!"

We darted off at such a pace as men only can run when dear life depends upon their exertions. The forest trees flew past us as we held on in the homeward path; our pursuers followed also at a prodigious speed, occasionally sending a spear by way of amusing us.

It was a sultry night, and I soon began to feel the effects of my unusual exercise. The perspiration poured from my skin as I toiled on by the side of my more hardy companion, who was accustomed to long runs, and who bounded along like a denizen of the woods we were traversing.

At length I began to experience the sensation of a bandage being bound round my brain, my eyes became hot and dry, and I drew my breath with difficulty. I panted with such violence that White gave me his hand, and assisted me in the way.

Our pursuers kept to the chase with that speed and perseverance for which savage races are so notorious. At periods they saluted us with a shower of their rude spears, accompanied by yells of defiance, and once or twice the sound of a rifle shot resounded in the solitude. Both weapons, however, were equally harmless, and could we have maintained our pace, we had an excellent chance of making good our escape.

But the pressure upon my brain became more and more oppressive, and I ran on almost mechanically. My gallant friend cheered me with his voice, and assisted me with his hand, but, nevertheless, my efforts became more feeble, as each yard of our course was left behind, and at last, with blood gushing from my nose, I reeled against the massive trunk of a forest patriarch, and stammered my inability to proceed.

"Only another mile, Thornley, and you're at your own door," replied White.

"No, no!—save yourself,—not another step!" I stammered.

"Well, if that's the case, we must do our best agin' yon devils; but as to savin' myself, why, in truth, I won't leave you an inch!" was the energetic response.

We drew between two trees to conceal ourselves, but the moon having emerged from behind the clouds which had shaded her in the early part of the evening, betrayed the movement to our enemies, who were soon yelling in front.

"Here's for the first of you!" exclaimed White, as he retreated behind one of the trees and levelled my rifle at the first who approached. But the priming not having been replaced the action was harmless, and a heavy blow by the stock was substituted.

"If they don't come behind we may keep 'em some time," whispered my companion, but even as he spoke the crashing of heavy bodies was heard amid the bushes in our rear.

"I'll pay the coming one!" resumed he, and he ran up close to the bushes, and took his stand by a gleam of moonshine, across which these fresh assailants would be compelled to pass.

A form emerged into the light, and the watcher uttered an exclamation of joy as he discovered that the stranger was a white man.—Our two friends who escaped had mustered a strong party for our rescue, and, guided by the yells of the Kaffirs, had hastened to save or avenge us: and a score of dead bodies, and many wounds on living ones, attested how well they kept their word.

SORCERY AND MAGIC.¹

THE obsolete beliefs and delusions of mankind are on many accounts deserving of consideration. It is interesting to learn the extent of human credulity under the fosterings of ignorance and superstition, and to observe how the atrocities and absurdities thereby occasioned naturally disappear before the advancing lights of science and intelligence. There is no history properly complete which does not represent the dark and grotesque hallucinations by which the popular mind in different ages has been influenced; for these have undoubtedly, in a great measure, determined the character of nations and societies, and given a specific form to the general notions, habits, and moral development of the people among whom they have prevailed. Tales of sorcery, magic, and other kindred perversions of the wonderful, accordingly demand attention, not merely as matters of curiosity, but as being illustrations of the consequences of imperfect knowledge, and as examples of inferior conditions of civilization. Such things have manifestly an historical, and also a scientific value; and therefore it is presumed that the readers of this Journal will not object to be made acquainted with a few of the strange particulars contained in Mr. Wright's recently published volumes.

(1) "Narratives of Sorcery and Magic. From the most Authentic Sources. By Thomas Wright, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., &c. &c." Two volumes. Bentley. 1851.

The belief in magic, witchcraft, and the rest of the modifications of sorcery, was evidently grounded in a misconception of natural agency. It seems to have sprung out of a prior and once universally prevailing faith in the existence of an invisible world of spiritual beings, who exercised control over the elements of nature, and interfered for good and evil purposes in the sublunary concerns of men. All mythologies present evidences of such a faith, and the early history of all nations is full of fables founded upon a supposed intercourse with supernatural powers. It was clearly the imperfections of physical science which rendered such misconceptions possible. Sorcery and magic, as occult arts, appear to have been most widely recognised in the middle ages; and it was then that they began to be regarded as practices amenable to civil and ecclesiastical control and discipline. Trials and punishments for witchcraft, however, were common in England, and in Europe generally, down to the beginning of the eighteenth century, when at length the delusions which promoted them became exploded. For the last hundred and fifty years the belief in witchcraft, though not entirely extinguished, has lingered only in remote and neglected places, and is at last well nigh universally regarded as a mere incredible superstition.

Though sorcery and magic were manifestly of kindred origin, they appear to have been held in somewhat different repute, and to have been, in fact, different forms of the same erroneous belief. The witch, wizard, or ordinary sorcerer, was a malignant person, working evil under the constraining influence of the devil: the magician was an individual of dark scientific capacity and attainments, one who had the power of employing diabolical agencies for the accomplishment of his own ends and objects. In early times schools of magic existed in several parts of Europe. One of the most famous of these was established at Toledo in Spain, nearly on the confines which divided Christendom from Islam, on that spiritual neutral ground where, it was supposable, the demon might bid successful defiance to both the Gospel and the Koran. The science of the magician was considered dangerous, but not necessarily fatal, to salvation. To imperil this it was required that he should sell his soul for some unlawful gratification; and as the possession of one object naturally led to the desire of another, there was obviously a likelihood that he would sometime be induced to make the final sacrifice. One magician is said to have sold himself on condition of being made a pope—a bargain which he would probably not have ventured on had he lived in the present century! The legend of Faust presents another case in point; and in this singular personage we have, moreover, a general type of the learned magician of the middle ages.

In the scale of forbidden knowledge, the witch was inferior to the magician. She had no command over evil spirits, but was used by them as an instrument of hostility against her fellow-creatures; having sold herself, apparently, without an object, unless it were for the mere power of working mischief. She was generally poor and despised, and commonly an outcast of society. It is to this class of persons that Mr. Wright's book is principally devoted.

The practice of sorcery was not confined to women, but, as Mr. Wright observes, it was an article of popular belief among all the nations of Western Europe, from the earliest period of their history, that women were more easily brought into connexion with the spiritual world than men, and thus they became more frequently addicted to deeds of mystery and darkness. In pagan times, to them especially were known the herbs and other articles which were considered obnoxious to mankind, and the ceremonies and charms whereby the influence of the gods might be invoked for purposes of injury or preservation. After the introduction of Christianity, the belief arose that these incantations were particularly addressed to demons, and on that account they were strictly forbidden by the early ecclesiastical laws, which alone appear at first to have taken notice of them. From these laws we learn that witches were believed to destroy people's cattle and goods, to strike persons with withering diseases, and even to bring about their death. But it does not appear that their power was originally understood to be derived from a direct compact with the evil one. Prior to the twelfth century they were generally supposed to be aided in their objects by the spirits of groves or fountains; but of the superstitious practices of these early ages we have little or no definite information.

During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, however, witchcraft became recognised as a power derived expressly from the devil, whom, by direct compact, the witches were "bound to worship with certain rites and ceremonies, the shadows of those which had in remoter ages been performed in honour of the pagan gods." The character of the popular belief at this time may be seen from the story of the Witch of Berkeley, which Southey has made the subject of a ballad, and which William of Malmesbury, an historian of the twelfth century, relates from the information of a professed "eye-witness," an individual of respectability, whom William declares he "would have been ashamed to disbelieve." This unfortunate old lady, after a long career of mischief, was at length apprised by her unearthly taskmaster that he would, on a certain day and hour, take final possession of her soul and body, according to the agreement under which they had been bound together. Startled by the intimation, and in great natural alarm about the consequences, the old woman forthwith called around her all the monks of a neighbouring monastery, confessed her evil courses and her long subjection to the devil, and begged that they would do as much as in them lay to save her from destruction. She hoped that they would at least secure her body after death from being carried away by fiends. "Sew me in the hide of a stag," said she, "then place me in a stone coffin, and fasten the covering with lead and iron. Let fifty psalms be sung each night, and fifty masses be said each day, and so, peradventure, you may break the power of the evil one. If you can thus keep my body for the space of three nights, on the fourth you may bury it with safety in the ground."

These directions were literally executed; but psalms and masses were signally unavailing. The fiends came in great force to carry off their victim; and though, for the first night, the priests withstood their efforts, on the second the gates of the monastery were burst open in spite of the strongest bolts and locks, and even two of the three chains by which the coffin was held down were violently broken: a significant omen that on the third night the last would probably give way. So indeed it happened. "On the third night the clamour of the fiends increased till the monastery trembled from its foundations; and the priests, stiff with terror, were unable to proceed with their service. The doors at length burst open of their own accord, and a demon, larger and more terrible than any of the others, stalked into the church. He stopped at the coffin, and with a fearful voice ordered the woman to arise. She answered that she was held down by the chain: the demon put his foot to the coffin, the last chain broke asunder like a bit of thread, and the covering of the coffin flew off. The body of the witch then arose, and her persecutor took her by the hand, and led her to the door, where a black horse, of enormous stature, its back covered with iron spikes, awaited them, and, seating her beside him on its back, he disappeared from the sight of the terrified monks. But the horrible screams of his victim were heard through the country for miles as they passed along."

Oh, Goodness, what a ride! But the witches were well practised in extraordinary horsemanship. According to one of the oldest traditions concerning them, they were accustomed to travel through the air mounted on broomsticks or besoms. Sometimes, however, they went upon a genteeler kind of palfrey. William of Auverne, who wrote in the thirteenth century, informs us that the witches of his day were in the habit of taking a reed or cane, and, on making some magical signs, and uttering certain barbarous words, it became transformed into a horse, which carried them whither they wished to go with astonishing rapidity. It was a common article of belief in the middle ages, that women of this description travelled immense distances in this way in an incredible short space of time; and that they often entered people's houses without opening doors or windows, destroying their goods and injuring their persons while asleep. It would seem, nevertheless, there were sceptics in those days, who, if not altogether denying witchcraft, entertained some sensible doubts about the truth of the current notions. Vincent of Beauvais, in the thirteenth century, tells a story which is somewhat in support of this opinion:—

"One day, an old woman went to the priest in a certain parish church, and said, 'Sir, I did you a great service last night, and saved you from much evil; for the dames with whom I am accustomed to go about at night entered your chamber; and if I had not interceded with them, and prayed for you, they would have done you an injury.' Says the priest: 'The door of my chamber was locked and bolted, how could you enter it?' To which the old woman answered, 'Sir, neither door nor lock can restrain or hinder us from freely going in and out wherever we choose.' Then the priest shut and bolted the church doors, and seizing the staff of the cross, 'I will prove if it be true,' said he, 'that I may repay you for so great a service;' and he thereupon belaboured the woman's back and shoulders. To all her outcries his only reply was, 'Get out of the church and fly, since neither door nor lock can restrain you!' It was an argument," says Mr. Wright, "that could not be evaded." However, a writer of the twelfth century relates an incident where, of his own knowledge, a woman in France had been seized for her wicked opinions, and condemned to be burnt; but, with contemptuous words for her keepers and judges, she approached the window of the room in which she was confined, uttered a charm, and instantly disappeared in the air!

Among the capabilities attributed to witches in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was a power of taking strange shapes, as those of different animals, and of transforming others after the same manner. "It was a very prevalent belief that such persons turned themselves into ravenous wolves, and wandered about by night to devour people. They took many other shapes to indulge passions which could not be otherwise gratified. They sometimes revenged themselves upon their enemies, or those against whom they bore ill-will, by turning them into dogs or asses, and they could only recover their shapes by bathing in running water." William of Malmesbury, before mentioned, tells us, that on the high road to Rome there dwelt two old women, of questionable reputation, in a wretched hut, where they allured weary travellers; and by their charms transformed them into horses, swine, or other animals which they could sell to the merchants who passed that way; and by this means they gained a livelihood. One day, a jongleur, or mountebank, asked for a night's lodging; and on learning his profession, they told him they had an extremely intelligent donkey to dispose of—an animal which could do every kind of feat it was ordered to do, and was indeed deficient in no accomplishment save that of speaking. The jongleur saw the ass, was delighted with its exploits and intelligence, and bought it for a considerable sum of money. At parting, one of the women told him that if he would preserve the animal long, he must carefully keep it away from water. The mountebank followed the direction, and his ass became a fertile source of profit. But its keeper, as he became more prosperous, grew dissolute, and less attentive to his interests; and one day, when he was in a state of jollification, the ass escaped, and went directly to the nearest stream, "into which it had no sooner thrown itself than it recovered its original shape of a handsome young man." The mountebank soon after missing his ass, set out anxiously in search of it, and, meeting the young man, was told what had happened, and how he had been transformed by the scandalous charms of the old women. The latter were carried subsequently before the Pope, to whom they confessed their wicked practices, but what judgment was imposed on them is not related.

We have no detailed trial of witches before the fourteenth century, but about that time sorcery began to be regarded as a sort of heresy, and the pretence of it was often used for political and ecclesiastic purposes. The famous Knight Templars were among the earliest victims of this superstition, and suffered spoliation, and ultimate dissolution of their order as a consequence. In France, the belief in sorcery appears to have been prevalent at an early period, and in the middle of the fifteenth century it became the ground of one of the most remarkable persecutions that the history of that age has preserved on record. In the city of Arras, and other places, numerous persons, charged with the practice of diabolic arts, were brought into the merciless toils of the inquisition—confessions were wrung from them by torture, and most of them were punished capitally, by burning. In Italy, Spain, and Germany, similar atrocities occurred; and the Romish priesthood appears to have availed themselves freely of the charge of sorcery everywhere, for the purpose of suppressing every rational inquiry, and for maintaining their tyrannous and superstitious domination. During the age of the Reformation, Protestants were generally denounced as sorcerers, or persons of malignant disposition, combined in unholy alliance with the principalities of darkness. The belief in sorcery, however, was not peculiar to the adherents of the Romish faith, but was universally shared by people of all "persuasions," being, in fact, a common and unquestioned article of belief throughout the middle ages, and thence downwards to the end of the seventeenth century.

Mr. Wright has collected a very considerable number of cases, illustrative of the working of this wide-spread superstition during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, when it was most extensively and successfully in force; but as it is impossible for us here to do more than touch upon the subject, we propose to confine ourselves mainly to the aspects and characteristics which sorcery and magic presented in our own country. In proceeding, we shall glance first at the type of the magician of the middle ages, as that character appeared among us in the person of Roger Bacon.

"So naturally," says Mr. Wright, "was the notion of magic connected with that of superior learning in the mind of the multitude, that few of the great scholars of the middle ages escaped the imputation." Bacon, however, would appear to be the "representative man" of his class—the model magician, whom all inferior practitioners of the occult arts tended unconsciously to resemble, but fell short through imperfection of capacity. It is not as a sorcerer, but as a discoverer and experimenter in natural philosophy, that Roger Bacon is properly to be regarded; but viewed through the eyes of his contemporaries, it was his skill and repute in magic which gave him his importance, and it is solely in his character as a magician that we are here concerned with him. Not what Bacon was, but what the people of his day supposed him to be, is the matter which we have to deal with at the present.

According to legendary history, Roger Bacon was the son of a wealthy farmer in the West of England, who had placed his son with the parish priest to gain a little scholarship. The boy soon showed an unusual ability for learning, which the priest encouraged, but which was extremely disagreeable to the father, who, it seems, intended to bring him up to farming. Disliking the prospect of such a way of life, the young student fled from home and took refuge in a monastery, where he followed his studies peacefully, and was eventually sent to complete them in the University at Oxford. There he is reported to have made himself a proficient in the occult sciences, and attained to the highest success in magic. In course of time, he had an opportunity of exhibiting his skill before the court, and in return received many favours from the king.

The traditions respecting Bacon are for the most part extremely vague, and Mr. Wright considers the greater number of them to be mere adaptations of popular mediæval stories; but he observes that they show, nevertheless, what was the prevailing notion of the magician's character. One of these stories will be all that we are able to find room for. It relates to a certain "fast" gentleman of the olden time, who, being reduced to poverty, and involved in debt by his extravagance, "sold himself to the evil one, on condition that he was to deliver himself up as soon as his debts were paid." There was doubtless something honourable in a man, running so terrible a risk for the simple satisfaction of paying twenty shillings in the pound; but at the same time, it is not difficult to imagine that he was in no great haste to satisfy his creditors. As, however, every evil day is sure to arrive, the time at length came when he could no longer put them off; and accordingly, his affairs being settled, he found himself in an extremely unpleasant situation. In a somewhat defiant humour, akin to the desperation of pirates and burglars when they swear never to submit to the indignity of being "taken alive," the unhappy gentleman contemplated committing violence on himself, and was on the point of effecting his intent, when it happened his hand was arrested by the interposition of Roger Bacon. The magician, when he had heard the gentleman's story, directed him to repair to the place appointed for his meeting with the evil one, and there boldly to deny the devil's claim, and then refer for judgment to the first person who should pass. Bacon, of course, intended to be the man. Accordingly, in the morning, the gentleman, "after he had blessed himself," went straightway to the wood where he had been summoned to appear, and there, as he expected, he found the devil waiting for him. The greeting, you may be sure, was no-wise very cordial. As soon as the man came near, the devil said—"Now, deceiver, art thou come? Now shalt thou see that I can and will prove that thou hast paid all thy debts, and therefore thy soul belongeth to me!" "Thou art a deceiver," said the gentleman, "and gavest me money to cheat me of my soul, for else why wilt thou be thine own judge? let me have some other to judge between us." "Content," said the devil, "take whom thou wilt." "Then I will have," said the gentleman, "the next man that cometh this way." Hereto, the devil agreed; and no sooner had these words ended than friar Bacon came by, to whom the gentleman spoke, and requested him to "be judge in a weighty matter between them two." The friar expressed his willingness, provided both parties were agreed: the devil said they were, and told Bacon how the case stood between them. "Know, friar," said he, "that I, seeing this prodigal like to starve for want of food, lent him money, not only to buy him victuals, but also to redeem his lands and pay his debts, conditionally, that so soon as his debts were paid, he should give himself freely to me; to this—here is his hand," showing him the bond, signed with the presumably man's blood—"now my time is expired, for all his debts are paid, which he is unable to deny." "This case is plain," observed the friar, "if it be so that his debts are paid." "His silence confirms it," said the devil, "therefore give him a just sentence." "I will," said friar Bacon; "but first tell me," speaking to the gentleman, "didst thou never yet give the devil any of his money back, nor requite him in any ways whatever?" "Never had he anything of me as yet," answered the gentleman. "Then never let him have anything of thee, and thou art free." "Deceiver of mankind," said he, turning to the devil, "it was thy bargain never to meddle with him so long as he was indebted to any; now, how canst thou demand of him anything when he is clearly indebted for all that he hath to thee? When he payeth thee thy money, then take him as thy due; till then thou hast nothing to do with him, and so I charge thee to be gone." At this the devil vanished, much chagrined; "but," says the story, "friar Bacon comforted the gentleman, and sent him home with a quiet conscience, bidding him never to pay the devil's money back, as he tendered his own safety."

This, if report be true, was not the only time when the cunning friar cheated the grand adversary:

there is a story, that he himself had entered into compact with the evil one, but, by superiority of artfulness, evaded the conditions. The agreement is said to have stipulated, that "he was to belong to the devil after his death, if he died in the church or out of it;" but, it seems, the sly magician, when he found his end approaching, caused a cell to be made in the church wall, into which he entered, and wherein he died and was buried; and thus, being "neither in the church nor without," the fiend once more was successfully over-reached.

It is easy to see that stories of this kind are but the sport of sorcery, and must evidently have had their origin in quite a different feeling from that which produced the grim and terrible reality involved in the imputation of witchcraft in the next two succeeding centuries. The growth and development of the superstition, appears to have been fearfully accelerated by the efforts of the religious inquisitors and the judicial courts upon the continent, to exterminate all accused and suspected sorcerers from society. The crime came gradually to be held as one of the greatest possible enormities, being regarded, in fact, as a sort of deliberate combination with the powers of darkness, to destroy all order and religion. In some countries; however, it would seem that the art of witchcraft was not yet considered to be necessarily connected with diabolic agency, but was, at least in many instances, derived from other and less abominable sources. The witches of Scotland, during the sixteenth century, were understood to receive their power, not from the evil one, but from the "fairy folk," with whom, until a comparatively late period, their connexion was somewhat whimsical and harmless, and characterised by none of the disgusting particulars which were attributed to other practitioners of the art in the continental countries. In 1576, an extraordinary case was brought before the high court in Edinburgh, an account of which will serve to show the form in which witchcraft then appeared among the Scottish people.

The chief actress in the business, was one Bessie Dunlop, a native of the county of Ayr, and wife of a cottager named Andro Jak. "In her confession, this woman stated that she was one day going from her own house to the yard of Monkcastle, driving her cows to the pasture, and weeping 'for the cow that was dead,' her husband and child that were both lying ill of an epidemic, and herself newly risen from child-bed, when a strange man met her by the way, and saluted her with the words, 'Gude day, Bessie!' She returned his salutation, and, in answer to his inquiries, told him of her troubles, upon which he informed her, that her child, as well as the sick cow, and two of her sheep would die, but that her 'gude man' would soon recover; all which took place as he foretold. She described her interrogator as 'ane honest wele-elderlie man, gray-bairdit (bearded), and had ane gray coit with Lumbart slevis of the auld faussoun; ane pair of gray brekis (breeches), and guhyte schankis, gartanit above the kne; ane black bonet on his heid, cloisie behind and plane befoir, with silkin lassis drawin throw the lippis thair of; and ane guhyte wand in his hand.' This personage told her at last that he was one Thome Reid, 'guha deit (died) at Pinkye,' (Sept. 10, 1547). And this account was confirmed by the manner in which he disappeared through the yard of Monkcastlel—"I thoct he gait in a narrowware hoill of the dyke, nor only erdlie man culd haif gane throw; and swa I was sumthing fleit (aghast)." It appears that Thome Reid had been a turned-off servant of the laird of Blair, and Bessie Dunlop was once sent on a message to his son who inherited his name, and had succeeded to his place in the household of the laird, and who fully confirmed Thome's story, that he had gone to the battle of Pinkye, and fallen in that disastrous conflict.

"The next time Thome Reid appeared to Bessie as she was going between her house and the thorn of Dawmstarnok, and he then declared more openly his ultimato designs. After remaining some time with her, Thome asked her pointedly, if she would believe in him; to which she replied with great naïveté, 'she would believe in anybody who did her good.' Thome had hitherto spoken like a good christian, and at their first interview he had addressed her in the name of the blessed Virgin, but now, encouraged by her answer, he boldly proposed to her that she should 'deny her christendom and the faith she took at the baptismal font,' in return for which she should have goods, and horses, and cows, in abundance, besides other advantages. This, however, she refused indignantly, and her tempter went away, 'something angry' with her.

"Thome's visits generally occurred at mid-day, not at the still hour of night, and he seemed little embarrassed by the presence of other company. Shortly after the interview just mentioned, he visited her in her own house, where she was in company with her husband and three tailors, and, unseen by these, he took her by the apron and led her to the door, and she followed him to the 'hull-end,' and there he told her to remain quiet and speak not, whatever she might hear and see. She then advanced a little, and suddenly saw twelve persons, eight women, and four men—the men were clad in gentlemen's clothing, and the women had all plaids round them, and were very seemly like to see, and Thome was with them.' They bade her sit down, and said, 'Welcome, Bessie, wilt thou go with us?' but, as she had been warned, she returned no answer, and, after holding a consultation amongst themselves, which she did not hear, they disappeared in a 'hideous' whirlwind. Shortly afterwards Thome returned, and told her, the persons she had seen were the 'good wights' who dwelt in the court of Elfin, who came there to invite her to go with them, and he repeated the invitation very pressingly, but she answered that 'she saw no profit to gang that kind of gate, unless she knew wherefore.' Then he said, 'Seest thou not me, worth meat and worth clothes, and good enough like in person?'—and he promised to make her far better off than ever she was.

"Her answer, however, was still the same,—she dwelt with her own husband and bairns, and could not leave them—and so he 'began to be very crabbed with her,' and told her that if she continued in that mind, she would get little good of him. His anger, however, appears to have soon subsided, and he continued to come at her call, and give her his advice and assistance, always treating her with respect, for she declared that the greatest liberty he had taken with her, was to draw her by the apron, when he would persuade her to go with him to fairy-land."

On all such occasions, it would seem that Bessie firmly declined going; and it appears that "the whole extent of her witchcraft consisted in curing diseases, and recovering stolen property, which she did by the agency of her unearthly visitor, who gave her medicines, or showed her how to prepare them." Some of the particulars of her statement were supported by the evidence of other witnesses; and, in concluding the narrative, Mr. Wright observes that "however we may judge of the connexion between Thome Reid and Bessie Dunlop, it is rendered certain by the entry in the court records, that the unfortunate woman was convict and brynt."

By way of contrasting the popular credulity in different countries at the same period, it may not be amiss to introduce, in connexion with the foregoing, some few particulars, relating to the progress of sorcery on the continent.

"During the earlier part of the sixteenth century, trials for witchcraft in France are of rare occurrence, and there are no cases of great importance recorded till the year 1560. In 1516, a number of persons were brought to trial at Vernon, accused of having held their sabbath as witches in an old ruined castle in the shape of cats: and witnesses deposed to having seen the assembly, and to having suffered from the attacks of the pseudo-feline conspirators. But the court threw out the charge as worthy only of ridicule. In 1564, three men and a woman were executed at Poitiers, after having been made to confess to various acts of sorcery. Among other things, they said that they had regularly attended the witches' sabbath, which was held three times a year, and that the demon who presided at it, ended by burning himself, to make powder for the use of his agents in mischief. . . . Several witches, who all confessed to having been at the Sabbaths, were in 1573 condemned to be burnt in different parts of France. In 1578, a man was tried and condemned in Paris, for changing himself into a wolf: and another man was condemned at Orleans for the same supposed crime in 1583. As France was often infested by these rapacious animals, it is not difficult to conceive how popular credulity was led to connect their ravages with the crime of witchcraft. The belief in what were in England called wer-wolves (men-wolves), and in France, loups-garoux, was a very ancient superstition throughout Europe. It is asserted by a serious and intelligent writer of the time, that in 1588, a gentleman, looking out of the window of his château in a village two leagues from Apoth, in the mountains of Auvergne, saw one of his acquaintances going a hunting, and begged he would bring him home some game. The hunter, while occupied in the chase, was attacked by a fierce she-wolf, and, after having fired at it without effect, struck it with his hunting knife, and cut off the paw of its right fore-leg, on which it immediately took to flight. The hunter took up the paw, threw it into his bag with the rest of his game, and soon afterwards returned to his friend's chateau, and told him of his adventure, at the same time putting his hand into the bag to bring forth the wolf's paw in confirmation of his story. What was his surprise at drawing out a lady's hand, with a gold ring on one finger! His friend's astonishment was still greater, when he recognised the ring as one which he had given to his own wife; and, descending hastily into the kitchen, he found the lady warming herself by the fire, with her right arm wrapped in her apron. This he at once seized, and found, to his horror, that the hand was cut off. The lady confessed that it was she, who, in the form of a wolf, had attacked the hunter; she was, in due course of time, brought to her trial, and condemned, and was immediately afterwards burnt at Rheims."

About the time of these occurrences, several local councils passed severe laws against witchcraft, and thenceforward to the end of the century, the number of miserable persons put to death in France under the accusation was very great. "In the course only of fifteen years, from 1580 to 1595, and only in one province, that of Lorraine, the president Remigius burnt nine hundred witches, and as many more fled out of the country to save their lives; and about the close of the century one of the French judges tells us that there were not gaols enough to hold the prisoners, or judges to hear their causes." In Germany, Spain, and Italy, kindred atrocities were perpetrated to the like extent—scarcely any accusation of sorcery being made without involving a number of hitherto unsuspected persons in the same pretended guilt, through the confessions wrung by tortures from the victims. Thus the horrible infatuation spread like flames upon a prairie, kindling in all directions new and more fearful fires, until scarcely any one, whatever might be his rank or credit in society, was free from the danger of being accused, should selfishness or malice at any time be excited to denounce him.

Allusion has been made in a former paragraph to what was called the "witches' sabbath;" and here, perhaps, it may be fitting to give a more complete account of it. This sabbath, or general sorcerers' assembly and convocation, was usually held in some wild, solitary spot, often in the depths of forests or on the tops of lofty mountains, and commonly at a great distance from the residence of the attendants. The circumstance connected with it most difficult of proof, was the method of transport from one place to another. The witches, in their confessions, generally agreed in the statement that they divested themselves of their clothes, and anointed their bodies with a particular kind of ointment. They then mounted a staff or a broomstick, and, muttering a charm, were carried speedily through the air to the place of meeting. Sometimes the witches were carried by demons in the shape of a goat or some other animal, who, moreover, brought them back again after the meeting was dissolved. Bodin, a learned physician who wrote on Demonology in the sixteenth century, relates that a man, who lived at the little town of Loches, had observed that his wife frequently absented herself from home in the night, and, being suspicious of her conduct, he questioned her as to whither she betook herself at such unseasonable hours. After some hesitation she at length confessed that she was a witch, and went out to attend the witches' sabbath. "To appease the anger of her husband, she agreed to gratify his curiosity by taking him with her to the next meeting, but she warned him on no account whatever to allow the name of God or of the Saviour to escape his lips. At the appointed time they stripped and anointed themselves, and, after uttering the necessary formula, they were suddenly transported to the landes of Bordeaux, at an immense distance from their dwelling. The husband there found himself in the midst of a great assembly of both sexes in the same state of deshabille as himself and his wife, and in one part he saw the devil in a hideous form; but in the first moment of surprise, he inadvertently uttered the exclamation, "Mon Dieu! où sommes-nous?" and all disappeared as suddenly from his view, leaving him cold and naked in the middle of the fields, where he wandered till morning, when the countrymen coming to their daily occupations told him where he was, and he made his way home in the best way he could. But he lost no time in denouncing his wife, who was brought to her trial, confessed, and was burnt." The same thing is stated to have happened to a man at Lyons, with a like result; and various instances of the kind are given by Bodin and other contemporary writers on the subject.

Of the many curious trials for witchcraft which took place in England, those relating to the witches of Pendle forest, and to the "witches of Warboys," in Huntingdonshire, are to be reckoned as among the most remarkable. They are, however, much too lengthy in particulars to be introduced into these pages. The story of the "witches of Samlesbury" is also somewhat long; yet, as the reader will probably desire to see some complete and regular narrative of the kind, we have determined to extract it in full from the second of the volumes under notice.

Be it understood, then, that the village of Samlesbury is at some distance from the town of Preston, in Lancashire. At the commencement of the seventeenth century, the principal family in this township was that of the Southworths, who had their seat at Samlesbury Park, and who appear to have been much divided among themselves—a division which was unhappily increased by religious differences, some of them being Protestants and others Roman Catholics. The narrative proceeds:—"Lancashire was at this time remarkable for the number of Papists which it harboured. It was the grand asylum of the English seminary priests, and there are documents which show that Samlesbury Park was a well-known resort of the partisans of Rome. One of these priests was Christopher Southworth, who, for concealment, had assumed the name of Thompson, and who appears to have been nearly related to Sir John Southworth, the occupier of the park, who was then recently dead. Between Sir John and one of his female relations, Jane Southworth, there was a bitter feud, for what reason is not stated. A servant of Sir John's, named John Singleton, deposed that 'he had often heard his old master say, that the said Jane Southworth was, as he thought, an evil woman and a witch;' and he added, 'that the said Sir John Southworth, in his coming or going between his own house at Samlesbury and the town of Preston, did for the most part forbear to pass by the house where the said wife dwelt, though it was his nearest and best way, and rode another way, only for fear of the said wife, as this examine verily thinketh.' This statement was confirmed by another witness, a yeoman of Samlesbury, named William Alkes, who deposed, 'that he had seen the said Sir John Southworth shun the said wife when he came near where she was, and hath heard the said Sir John say that he liked her not, and that he doubted she would bewitch him.' And as far as we can gather, it appears further, that Jane Southworth was a recent convert from Romanism to the Church of England.

"There was in the same village a family of the name of Bierley. Jennet Bierley was an aged woman, who appears to have lived with a daughter-in-law, Ellen Bierley. Her own daughter had married Thomas Sowerbuts of Samlesbury, a husbandman, and by her he had a daughter, Grace Sowerbuts, who was at this time about fourteen years of age. Jennet and Ellen Bierley were Protestants, while Thomas Sowerbuts was a Catholic, and there was probably a quarrel between them on account of the religion of the child, which Thomas Sowerbuts resolved should be that of Rome, and for that purpose he sent her for religious instruction to the priest Thompson (alias Southworth).

"Soon after, or about the time of the seizure of the witches of Pendel, Grace Sowerbuts pretended to be seized with strange fits, and she was found in a sort of trance among the hay and straw in a barn, whence she was taken to her father's house, and there told a story which led to the arrest of Jane Southworth, and Jennet and Ellen Bierley, and they were committed to Lancaster jail. They were brought to trial on the 19th of August, 1612, and then Grace Sowerbuts made a statement in court, to the effect that after having been 'haunted and vexed' for some years by the prisoners and another confederate, named old Doewife—these four women had lately drawn her by the hair of the head to the top of a hay-mow, where they left her. Not long after this, Jennet Bierley met her near her home, appearing to her first in human likeness, 'and after that in the likeness of a black dog,' and attempted to terrify her. The girl told her father what had happened, and how she had often been 'haunted' in this manner; and being asked by the court why she never told anybody before, she said, 'she could not speak thereof, though she desired so to do.' Soon after this, on the 4th of April, 'going towards Samlesbury, back to meet her mother coming from Preston, she saw the said Jennet Bierley, who met this examine at a place called the two Brigs, first in her own shape, and afterwards in the likeness of a black dog with two legs, which dog went close by the side of this examine till they came to a pit of water, and then the said dog spake, and persuaded this examine to drown herself therein, saying it was a fair and an easy death; whereupon this examine thought there came one to her in a white sheet, and carried her away from the said pit, upon the coming whereof the said black dog departed away.' The dog subsequently returned, and carried her to a neighbour's barn, where it left her in a trance on the floor. She went on to describe other instances of persecution by the witches, and declared that on one occasion her grandmother and aunt had taken her by night to the house of a man named Thomas Walshman, which they entered, 'she knew not how,' and Jennet Bierley caused the death of an infant child; and the night after the burial of the child, 'the said Jennet Bierley and Ellen Bierley, taking this examine with them, went to Samlesbury Church, and there did take up the said child, and the said Jennet did carry it out of the churchyard in her arms, and then did put it in her lap and carried it home to her own house, and having it there, did boil some thereof in a pot, and some did broil on the coals, of both which the said Jennet and Ellen did eat, and would have had this examine, and one Grace Bierley, daughter of the said Ellen, to have eaten with them, but they refused so to do. And afterward the said Jennet and Ellen did see the (boil) the bones of the said child in a pot, and with the fat that came out of the said bones they said they would anoint themselves, that thereby they might sometimes change themselves into other shapes. And after all this being done, they said they would lay the bones again in the grave the next night following; but whether they did so or not this examine knoweth not; neither doth she know how they got it out of the grave at the first taking of it up.' She next stated, that 'about half a year ago the said Jennet Bierley, Ellen Bierley, Jane Southworth and this examine (who went by the appointment of the said Jennet, her grandmother), did meet at a place called Redbank, upon the north side of the water of Ribble, every Thursday and Sunday, at night, by the space of a fortnight, and at the water-side there came unto them, as they went thither, four black things, going upright, and yet not like men in the face, which four did carry the said three women and this examine over the water; and when they came to the said Redbank, they found something there which they did eat. . . . And after they had eaten, the said three women and this examine danced, every one of them with one of the black things aforesaid.' She proceeded to describe further acts, familiar to those who enter into the minutiae of sorcery, and which seem to have been taken from the foreign books on the subject, until the time of the arrest of the prisoners.

"It was not the fashion at this time to submit witnesses in such cases to a strict cross-examination, nor did any one think of opening the grave of the child to ascertain in what condition the body might then be; but Thomas Walshman deposed that his child died about the time stated, though he said that it had been sick for some time. Witnesses were also examined as to Grace Sowerbutts' fits, and the father and one or two other witnesses gave their evidence in corroboration of her statements. The evidence was thus in due order taken, and the jury was, no doubt, ready to give a verdict against the prisoners, when the judge, Sir Edward Bromley, demanded of the latter what they had to say for themselves. The sequel may be told best in the rather dramatic language of the report of the trial. The three prisoners, instead of being abashed as persons under such circumstances usually were, 'humbly upon their knees, with weeping tears, desired him for God's cause to examine Grace Sowerbutts, who set her on, or by whose means this accusation came against them. Immediately the countenance of this Grace Sowerbutts changed; the witnesses, being behind, began to quarrel and accuse one another. In the end his lordship examined the girl, who could not for her life make any direct answer, but strangely amazed, told him she was put to a master to learn, but he told her nothing of this. But here, as his lordship's care and pains were great to discover the practices of these odious witches of the forest of Pendle and other places now upon their trial before him, so was he desirous to discover this damnable practice to accuse these poor women and bring their lives in danger, and thereby deliver the innocent. And as he openly delivered it upon the bench, in hearing of this great audience, that if a priest or Jesuit had a hand in one end of it, there would appear to be knavery and practice in the other end of it—and that it might the better appear to the whole world, examined Thomas Sowerbutts what master taught his daughter; in general terms he denied all. The wench had nothing to say, but, her master told her nothing of that. In the end some that were present told his lordship the truth, and the prisoners informed him how she went to learn with one Thompson, a seminary priest, who had instructed and taught her this accusation against them, because they were once obstinate papists, and now came to church. Here is the discovery of this priest, and of his whole practice. Still this fire increased more and more, and one witness accusing another, all things were laid open at large. In the end, his lordship took away the girl from her father, and committed her to Mr. Leigh, a very religious preacher, and Mr. Chisnal, two justices of the peace, to be carefully examined.'

Grace Sowerbutts now made a full confession; she declared that all she said before had been taught her by the priest; that it was a mere invention; that her fits were counterfeit; and that she had, by her own will, gone into the barn and other places where she was found."

The above is a tolerably fair sample of the narratives contained in Mr. Wright's volumes; though, in the majority of cases, there is no such clue to the imposture or nefarious designs connected with the accusation. In a great proportion of instances, the prosecutions for witchcraft appear to have been carried on under the influence of an honest, unaccountable delusion. To get at motives, or to unravel the mass of intricate absurdity presented in these stories, with a view to understand how so strange an infatuation could so long prevail, or in what elements of human nature or perverted social feeling it had its growth and derived its credibility—is a result which, with our present helps, seems hopelessly unattainable. Mr. Wright has, perhaps wisely, declined entering into any "disquisition" on a matter so subtle and perplexing. Indeed, he does not profess to give "a regular history of witchcraft;" but has "merely attempted to show the influence which superstition once exercised on the history of the world, by a few narratives taken from the annals of past ages, of events which seemed to place it in its strongest and clearest light." And yet, after going carefully over the volumes, we have to complain of a defect of "light" in the whole business. The book is worth consulting, and it is, we believe, the most popular and complete work of the kind which has hitherto been published in the language; but somehow we fancy a still better book might be written on the subject: we think that something might be done in the way of breaking ground upon a "philosophy of witchcraft"—something calculated to help one to understand the thing a little better than most people are able to do from the productions hitherto attempted. Is there no thoughtful and patient country gentleman, learned in such matters, who, with plenty of time upon his hands, and having access to the requisite materials—a Sir Thomas Browne of the nineteenth century, with genius enough to discern the rationale of "Vulgar Errors"—is there no such person to whom researches of this kind might become a labour of delight, and in that case get thoroughly, laboriously, and philosophically investigated? These "narratives" by Mr. Wright, "thrown together somewhat hastily," as he says, cannot be considered as an adequate and final exposition of so renowned a subject.¹

(1) One of the marks of "haste" is the multitude of printers' errors in the work. Mr. Wright seems to have been very careless with his "proofs." In one place, for instance, he states respecting the celebrated wife of Concin, that, on being asked what charms she had used to gain her influence over Marie de Medicis, she replied "that it was but the power of a weak mind over a strong one." (Vol. ii. p. 53.) Everybody cannot be expected to know that this is either a compositor's blunder, or a slip of a compiler's pen, and that the real answer was just the contrary—"the power of a strong mind over a weak one." Errors of this sort should not have escaped the notice of an author of Mr. Wright's repute and standing. Should the work ever reach a second edition, it will need a smart revision.

Here, however, we have well-nigh reached the limits of our space. By way of a "finish," therefore, let us mention that the last trial for witchcraft in England took place in the year 1712, the accused being a poor woman named Jane Wenham, living at Walkern in Hertfordshire. We cannot give the particulars of her story, but it will suffice to say that one of the principal charges was that of "conversing with the devil in the shape of a cat," and that in support of the indictment, there were sixteen witnesses examined, three of whom were clergymen, all of them evidently sincere believers in the truth of the accusation. In spite of the poor woman's declarations of innocence, and of the efforts of Mr. Justice Powell in her favour, the Hertfordshire jury, under a profound impression of their duty, delivered a verdict of "Guilty." As a matter of form, the judge was obliged to pronounce sentence of death upon the prisoner; but he subsequently obtained a "pardon" for her, and an enlightened gentleman in the county took her under his protection, and placed her in a cottage on his own estate, where she "passed the rest of her life in a quiet, inoffensive manner."

After this, prosecutions of the kind ceased to be entertained in the courts of justice, witches gradually diminished in the land, and at length a tragical outrage, which occurred exactly a hundred years ago, was the occasion which led to a final repeal of the statute against witchcraft. In the year 1751, there were living at Tring, in the same county of Hertford, a poor man and his wife, of the name of Osborne. One day mother Osborne went to beg a little butter-milk of a farmer named Butterfield, who, it seems, harshly refused to give her any, saying he had not sufficient for his hogs; and she is said to have gone away muttering threats against his goods and person. Some time afterwards, Butterfield's calves became distempered, and the ignorant people of the neighbourhood declared they were bewitched by mother Osborne. By-and-by, Butterfield himself had a repetition of certain fits to which he had formerly been subject; and as he was persuaded that the "doctors could do him no good," he took the advice of some of his neighbours, and sent for an old woman out of Northamptonshire, who had the reputation of being skilful in counteracting the effects of sorcery. This woman confirmed the opinion which she found prevailing,—namely, that the man was certainly bewitched. She advised, moreover, a general rising of the populace against the witch, that her powers might be tested by a "ducking;" and accordingly, on a certain day in April, both the poor old woman and her husband were conducted to a pond, and there treated so brutally, that they both died of their injuries. A coroner's inquest, however, brought in a verdict of murder against several of the ringleaders, and one of them was executed for the crime. "From this time," as Mr. Wright remarks, "witchcraft has attracted no attention in England, except as a vulgar superstition in some rude localities, where the schoolmaster had not yet penetrated."

THE TWO ISABELS.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"Oh love, love, love, love!—love is like a dizziness,
It will not let a poor man go about his business."
OLD SONG.

"And are those follies going,
And is my proud heart growing
Too cold, or wise, for woman's eyes
Again to set it glowing?"
MOORE.

THE General put on his spectacles, and looked steadfastly at Isabel for at least two minutes. "Turn your head," he said, at last,— "there, to the left."

Isabel Montford, although an acknowledged beauty, was as amiable as she was admired; she had also a keen appreciation of character; and, though somewhat piqued, was amused by the oddity of her aunt's old lover. The General was a fine example of the well-preserved person and manners of the past century; beauty always recognises beauty as a distinguished relative; and Isabel turned her head, to render it as attractive as it could be.

The General smiled, and, after gazing for another minute with evident pleasure, he said,— "Do me the favour to keep that attitude, and walk across the room."

Isabella did so with much dignity; she certainly was exceedingly handsome;—her step light, but firm; her figure, admirably poised; her head, well and gracefully placed; her features, finely formed; her eyes and smile, bright and confiding. She would have been more captivating had her dress been less studied; her taste was evidently Parisian rather than classic. The gentleman muttered something, in which the words, "charming," and "to be regretted," only met her ear; then he spoke distinctly:

"You solicited my candour, young lady,—you challenged comparison between you and your compeers, and the passing belles whom I have seen. Now, be so kind as to walk out of the room, re-enter, and curtsy."

Had Isabel Montford been an uneducated young lady, she might have flounced out of the salon, in obedience to her displeasure, which was very decided; but as it was, she drew herself to her full height, and swept through the folding-doors. The General took a very large pinch of snuff. "That is so perfectly a copy of her poor aunt!" he murmured;—"just so would she pass onward, like a ruffled swan; she went after that exact fashion into the ante-room, when she refused me, for the fourth time, thirty-five years ago."

The young Isabel re-entered, and curtsied. The gentleman seated himself, leaned his clasped hands upon the head of his beautifully inlaid cane—which he carried rather for show than use—and said, "Young lady, you look a divinity! Your tourneure is perfection; but your curtsy is frightful! A dip, a bob, a bend, a shuffle, a slide, a canter—neither dignified, graceful, nor self-possessed! A curtsy is in grace what an adagio is in music;—only masters of the art can execute either the one or the other. Why, the beauty of the Duchess of Devonshire could not have saved her reputation as a graceful woman, if she had dared such a curtsey as that."

"I assure you, sir," remonstrated the offended Isabel, "that Madame Michcau——"

"What do I care for the woman!" exclaimed the General, indignantly. "Have I not memory?"

"Can you not teach me?" said Isabel, amused and interested by his earnestness.

"I teach you!—I! No; the curtseys which captivated thousands in my youth were more an inspiration than an art. The very queen of ballet, in the present day, cannot curtsey."

"Could my aunt?" inquired Isabel, a little saucily.

"Your aunt, Miss Montford, was grace itself. Ah! there are no such women now a-days!"

And, after the not very flattering observation, the General moved to the piano. Isabel's brows contracted, and her cheeks flushed; however, she glanced at the looking-glass, was comforted, and smiled. He raised the cover, placed the seat with the grave gallantry of an old courtier, and invited the young lady to play. She obeyed, to do her justice, with prompt politeness; she was not without hope that there, at least, the old gentleman would confess she was triumphant. Her white hands, gemmed with jewels, flew over the keys like winged seraphs; they bewildered the eye by the rapidity of their movements. The instrument thundered, but the thunder was so continuous that there was no echo! "The contrast will come by-and-by," thought the disciple of the old school;—"there must be some shadow to throw up the lights."

Thunder—crash—thunder—crash—drum—rattle—a confused, though eloquent, running backwards and forwards of sounds, the rings flashing like lightning! Another crash—louder—a great deal of crossing hands—violent strides from one end of the instrument to the other—prodigious displays of strength on the part of the fair performer—a terrific shake! "What desperate exertion!" thought the General; "and all to produce a soulless noise." Then followed a fearful banditti of octaves—another crash, louder and more prolonged than the rest; and she looked up with a triumphant smile,—a smile conveying the same idea as the pause of an opera-dancer after a most wonderful pirouette.

"Do you keep a tuner in the house, my dear young lady?" inquired the General.

If a look could have annihilated, he would have crumbled into ashes; but he only returned it with admiration, thinking "How astonishingly like her aunt, when she refused me the second time!"

"And that is fashionable music, Miss Montford? I have lived so long out of England, only hearing the music of Beethoven, and Mozart, and Mendelssohn, I was not aware that noise was substituted for power, and that execution had banished expression. Dear me!—why, the piano is vibrating at this moment! Poor thing! How long does a piano last you, Miss Montford?"

Isabel was losing her temper, when fortunately her aunt—still Miss Vere—came to the rescue. The lovers of thirty years past, would have met anywhere else as strangers. The once rounded and queen-like form of the elder Isabel was shorn of its grace and beauty; of all her attributes, of all her attractions, dignity only remained; and it was that high-bred, innate dignity which can never be acquired, and is never forgotten. She had not lost the eighth of an inch of her height, and her grey hair was braided in full folds over her fair but wrinkled brow. Isabel Montford looked so exactly what Isabel Vere had been, that General Gordon was sorely perplexed; Isabel Vere, if truth must be told, had taken extra pains with her dress; her niece had met the General the night before, and her likeness to her aunt had so recalled the past, that his promised visit to his old sweetheart (as he still called her) had fluttered and agitated her more than she thought it possible an interview with any man could do; she quarrelled with her beautiful grey hair, she cast off her black velvet dress disdainfully, and put on a blue Moire antique. (She remembered how much the Captain—no, the GENERAL, once admired blue.) She was not a coquette; even grey hair at fifty-five does not cure coquetry where it has existed in all its strength; but, for the sake of her dear niece, she wished to look as well as possible. She wondered why she had so often refused "poor Gordon." She had been all her life of too delicate a mind to be a husband-hunter, too well satisfied with her position to calculate how it could be improved, and yet, she did not hesitate to confess to herself that now, in the commencement of old age, however verdant it might be, she would have been happier, of more consequence, of more value, as a married woman. She had too much good sense, and good taste, to belong to the class of discontented females, consisting of husbandless and childless women, who seek to establish laws at war with the laws of the Almighty; so, if her heart did beat a little stiffly, and sundry passages passed through her brain in connexion with her old adorer, and what the future might be,—she may be forgiven, and will be, by those not strong-minded women who understand enough of the waywardness of human nature to know that, if young heads and old hearts are sometimes found together, so are young hearts and old heads. The young laugh to scorn the idea of Cupid and a crutch, but Cupid has strange vagaries, and at any moment can barb his crutch with the point of an arrow.

"The old people," as Isabel Montford irreverently called them that evening, did not get on well together; they were in a great degree disappointed one with the other. They stood up to dance the minuet de la cour, and Isabel Vere languished and swam as she had never done before; but the General only wondered how stiff she had grown, and hoped that he was not as ill used by time as Mistress Isabel Vere had been. At first, Isabel Montford thought it "good fun" to see the antiquities bowing and curtseying, but she became interested in the lingering courtliness of the little scene, trembled lest her aunt should appear ridiculous, and then wondered how she could have refused such a man as General Gordon must have been.

Days and weeks flew fast; the General became a constant visitor in the square, and the heart of Isabel Vere had never beaten so loudly at twenty as it did at fifty-and-five; nothing, she thought, could be more natural than that the General should recal the days of his youth, and seek the friendship and companionship of her who had never married, while he—faithless man!—had been guilty of two wives during his “services in India.” It was impossible to tell which of the ladies he treated with the most attention. Isabel Montford took an especial delight in tormenting him, and he was cynical enough towards her at times. Although he frankly abused her pianoforte-playing, yet he evidently preferred it to the music Miss Vere practised so indefatigably to please him, or to the songs she sung, in a voice which, from a high “soprano,” had been crushed by time into what might be considered a very singular “mezzo.” He somehow forgot how to find fault with Miss Montford’s dancing, and more than once became her partner in a quadrille. It was evident, that while the General was growing young, Miss Vere remained—“as she was!” Isabel Montford amused herself at his expense, but he did not—quick-sighted and man-of-the-world though he was—perceive it. At first he was remarkably fond of recalling and dating events, and dwelling upon the grace, and beauty, and interest, and advantage, of whatever was past and gone—much to the occasional pain of Isabel Vere, who, gentle-hearted as she was, would have consigned dates to the bottomless pit; latterly, however, he talked a good deal more of the present than of the past, and, greatly to the annoyance of younger men, fell into the duties of escort to both ladies,—accompanying them to places of public promenade and amusement.

On such occasions, Miss Isabel Vere looked either earnest or bashful—yes, positively bashful; and Miss Isabel Montford, brimfull of as much mischief as a lady could delight in. At times, the General laid aside his cynical observations, together with his cane, which was not even replaced by an umbrella; to confess the truth, he had experienced several symptoms of heart disease, which, though they made him restless and uncomfortable, brought hopes and aspirations of life, rather than fears of death.

One morning, Isabel Montford and the General were alone in the salon where this little scene first opened:—

“Our difference has never been settled yet,” she exclaimed, gaily; “you have never proved to me the superiority of the Old school over the New.”

“Simply because of your superiority to both,” he replied.

“I do not perceive the point of the answer,” said the young lady. “What has my superiority over both to do with the question?”

The General arose, and shut the door. “Do you think you could listen to me seriously for five minutes?” he said.

“Listening is always serious work,” she answered. He took her hand within his; she felt it was the hand of age; the bones and sinews pressed on her soft palm with an earnest pressure.

“Isabel Montford—could you love an old man?”

She raised her eyes to his, and wondered at the light which filled them:—

“Yes,” she answered, “I could love an old man dearly; I could confide to him the dearest secret of my heart.”

“And your heart, your heart itself? Such things have been, sweet Isabel.” His hand was very hard, but she did not withdraw hers.

“No, not that, because—because I have not my heart to give.” She spoke rapidly, and with emotion.

“I have it not to give, and I have so longed to tell you my secret! You have such influence with my aunt, you have been so affectionate, so like a father to me, that if you would only intercede with her, for HIM and me, I know she could not refuse. I have often—often thought of entreating this, and now, it was so kind of you to ask, if I could love an old man, giving me the opportunity of showing that I do, by confiding in you, and asking your intercession.”

The room became misty to the General’s eyes, and the rattle of a battle-field sounded in his ears, and beat upon his heart.

“And pray, Miss Montford,” he said, after a pause, “who may him be?”

“Ah, you do not know him!—my aunt forbade the continuance of our acquaintance the day before I had the happiness to meet you. It was most fortunate I wou’d you to call upon her, thinking—” (she looked up at his fine face, whose very wrinkles were aristocratic, and smiled her most bewitching smile) “thinking the presence of the only man she ever loved would soften her, and hoping that I should one day be privileged to address you as my friend, my uncle!” And she kissed his hand.—It really was hard to bear. “I have heard her say,” persisted the young lady, “that when prompted by evil counsel, she refused you, she loved you, and since your return, she only lives in your presence.” The General wondered if this was true, and thought he would not give the young beauty a triumph. He was recovering his self-possession. “I remembered your admiration of passing belles, and felt how kindly you tolerated me, for my aunt’s sake; and surely you will aid me in a matter upon which my happiness and the happiness of that poor dear fellow depends?” She bent her beautiful eyes on the ground.

“And who is the poor dear fellow?” inquired the General, in a singularly husky voice.

“Henry Mandeville,” half-whispered Isabel. “Oh, is it not a beautiful name? the initials on those lovely handkerchiefs you gave me will still do; I shall still be I. M.”

“A son of old Admiral Mandeville’s?”

“The youngest son,” she sighed, “that is my aunt’s objection; were he the eldest, she would have been too happy. Oh, sir, he is such a fine fellow—such a hero! lost a leg at Cabool, and received I don't know how many stabs from those horrid Affgauns."

"Lost a leg?" repeated the General, with an approving glance at his own; "why, he can never dance with you."

"No, but he can admire my dancing, and does not think my curtsy a dip, a shuffle, a bend, a bob, a slide, a canter! Ah! dear General, I was always perfection in his eyes."

"By the immortal Duke," thought the General, "the young divinity is laughing at me!"

"My aunt only objects to his want of money; now I have abundance for both; and your recommendation, dear sir, at the Horse Guards, would at once place him in some position of honour and of profit; and even if it were abroad, I could leave my dear aunt with the consciousness that her happiness is secured by you, dear guardian angel that you are! Ah, sir! at your time of life you can have no idea of our feelings."

"Oh yes, I have!" sighed the General.

"Bless you!" she exclaimed enthusiastically; "I thought you would recal the days of your youth and feel for us; and when you see my dear Henry—"

"With a cork leg—"

"Ay, or with two cork legs—you will, I know, be convinced that my happiness is as secure as your own."

"Women are riddles, one and all!" said the General, "and I should have known that before."

"Oh! do not say such cruel things and disappoint me, depending as I have been on your kindness and affection. Hark!" she continued, "I hear my aunt's footstep; now dear, dear General, reason coolly with her—my very existence depends on it. If you only knew him! Promise, do promise, that you will use your influence, all-powerful as it is, to save my life."

She raised her beautiful eyes, swimming in unshed tears, to his; she called him her uncle, her dear noble-hearted friend; she rested her snowy hand lovingly—imploringly, on his shoulder, and even murmured a hope that, her aunt's consent once gained, it might not be impossible to have the two weddings on the same day.

The General may have dreaded the banter of sundry members of the "Senior United Service Club" who had already jested much at his devotion to the two Isabels; he may have felt a generous desire to make two young people happy, and his good sense doubtless suggested that sixty-five and twenty bear a strong affinity to January and May; he certainly did himself honour, by adopting the interests of a brave young officer as his own, and avoided the banter of "the club" by pledging his thrice-told vows to his "old love," the same bright morning that his "new love" gave her heart and hand to Henry Mandeville.

FÊTE DAYS AT ST. PETERSBURG.

(Translated from the French of Alexander Dumas.)

BY JANE STRICKLAND.

NEW YEAR'S-DAY and the Benediction of the Waters provide the inhabitants of St. Petersburg with two great national festivals, in which all classes share in the pleasures and devotion of the sovereign. The first is an imperial fête, the second an imposing religious ceremony.

On New Year's-day, in virtue of an old and touching custom by which the Emperor and Empress of Russia are designated by their poorest subjects Father and Mother, these potentates at the commencement of the year receive their children as their own invited guests. Their family being too vast to invite by name, they adopt the simple but efficacious plan of scattering about the streets of their capital twenty-five thousand cards of invitation indicative that they will be at home to such a number of their children. These cards bear no address, but they give admission to the bearers to the splendid saloons of the Winter Palace without the slightest distinction of rank or wealth.

It was thus that the Emperor Alexander, according to custom, kept the first day of the year 1825, the last he was ever destined to see. The rumour of the conspiracy that embittered the closing months of his life and reign, though it had reached his ears and troubled his repose, did not appear to him any reason for depriving his subjects of their annual visit to their sovereign. From these unknown guests the Russian Autocrat felt assured he had nothing to fear. With them he was not only popular but adored. He therefore directed the Master of the Police to order no alteration in the usual costume of the male part of the company, whom he was to admit in masks according to custom on these occasions. In the darkest annals of barbarism, despotic sovereigns dreaded and often found the dagger of the assassin in the hands of some member of their own family. Civilization, however limited, changes the objects of suspicion to the aristocracy, who are always, under these unfortunate constitutions, of the military profession. Now the want of the counterpoise of the middle classes creates this secret but perpetual warfare between the absolute monarch and the nobility—the nobility who in free countries are the natural bulwark of the throne. In Russia the Autocrat is never afraid of the multitude, with whom he holds a two-fold claim to their veneration, as supreme pontiff, or head of the Church, and Czar.

The cards of invitation, being transferable, are, as a matter of course, purchasable; and among his masked guests who were privileged to shake hands with Alexander, some cowardly assassin might take that opportunity to murder the sovereign; yet he, with a firm but touching reliance on God, ordered at seven o'clock on the New Year's evening, the gates of the Winter Palace to be thrown open as usual, to his motley company.

No extra precautions were taken by the police; the sentinels were on duty, according to custom, at the palace gates, but the Emperor was without any guards in the interior of the imperial residence, vast as the Tuileries. In the absence of all precaution or even regulations for the behaviour of an undisciplined crowd, it was surprising what natural politeness effected. Veneration for the presence of the sovereign was alone sufficient to produce good breeding; there was no pushing nor striving, nor clamour, and the entrance was made with as little noise as if gratitude for the favour accorded to the guests had induced each to give a precautionary admonition to his neighbour.

While the thronging thousands were gaining admission to his palace, the Emperor Alexander was seated by the Empress in the Hall of St. George in the midst of the imperial family, when the door was opened to the sound of music, for the saloons were filled with his visitors, and a grand coup d'œil of grantees, peasants, princesses, and grisettes was discerned. At this moment the Emperor advanced and gave his hand to the English, French, Spanish, and Austrian ambassadors, the representatives of their several sovereigns. He then moved alone to the door, that his guests might behold in their sovereign and host the father of his people. It was a moment anarchy was said to have dedicated to his assassination, and that parricidal and regicidal act could have been easily effected at such a juncture had it really been in contemplation. Alexander was no longer in appearance a melancholy and suffering invalid, he looked happy and smiling; and if his smile was counterfeited, he wore the mask ably and well. The instant the Autocrat appeared, the motley group made a forward movement, and then a precipitate retreat. The danger vanished with them. The Emperor regarded the retiring waves of this human sea with imperturbable serenity, a remarkable feature in his character, a moral re-action, which a courageous mind can alone bestow, and which he had shown on several trying occasions. One of these was at a ball given by M. Caulincourt, Duke of Vicenza, the French Ambassador; the other was at a fête at Zakret, near Wilna.

The ball was at its height, when the ambassador was informed that the house was on fire; fearful that the news of the conflagration might occasion more ill-consequences than the fire itself, he posted an aide-de-camp at every door, and ordered his people to keep the misfortune a profound secret, after which he communicated the accident in a low voice to the Emperor, and assured him that no one should be permitted to withdraw till he and the imperial family were in perfect safety:—he was going to see the fire extinguished, and he hoped the efforts made to get it under would be successful; adding, that even if a report should circulate in the saloons as to this startling fact, no one would credit it while they saw the Emperor and his family still there.

"Very well, then, I will remain," coolly remarked the Emperor; and when Caulincourt returned some time after to announce the extinction of the fire, he found the Russian Autocrat dancing a polonaise.

The guests of the ambassador heard on the morrow that their festivities had been kept over the mouth of a volcano.

At the fête held at Zakret not only the life but the empire of Alexander was at stake. In the middle of the dance he was apprised that the advanced guard of a guest he had forgotten to invite had passed the Niemen. This was the Emperor Napoleon, his old host at Erfurth, who might momentarily be expected to enter the hall, followed by six hundred thousand dancers. Alexander gave his orders with great coolness, chatting while he issued them with his aid-de-camps. He walked about, praised the manner in which the saloons were lighted, which he declared was only second to the beautiful moonlight, supped, and remained till dawn. His gay manner and the serenity of his countenance prevented the guests from even suspecting the nature of the communication he had received, and the entrance of the French into the city was the first intimation the inhabitants had received of their approach.

He was in imminent peril in this Polish city, from which his great self-command delivered him. His retreat at early morning was made before the approach of an enemy he had hitherto found invincible. Very different might have been the result of Napoleon's campaign in Russia, if the inhabitants of Wilna had known during the fête of Zakret of his vicinity.

These incidents naturally occurred to the guests of the Emperor Alexander, during this New Year's-day festival, when they beheld him approach alone to show himself to the multitude, amongst whom he had reason to believe many conspirators, or even assassins lurked. If such indeed were there, the calm serenity of his countenance disarmed them, and none dared raise an arm against the life he fearlessly trusted, if not to their loyalty at least to their honour.

Indeed the suffering and melancholy Emperor, the last time he received his people, seemed to have shaken off his lassitude and depression, and appeared full of life and energy, traversing with rapidity the immense saloons of the Winter Palace. He led off the sort of gallop peculiar to the Russian Court, which, however, terminated about nine o'clock.

At ten, the illuminations of the Hermitage being finished, those persons who had cards for the spectacle went there. Twelve negroes, superbly arrayed in rich oriental costumes, kept the doors of the theatre, to admit or restrain the crowd, and examine the authenticity of the vouchers of the guests. Here the admission was not promiscuous, a certain number alone being allowed to be present at the banquet.

Upon entering the theatre, the spectators found themselves in a land of enchantment—a vast hall encircled with tubes of crystal, bent in every possible way, meeting at top in order to form the ceiling, united by silver threads of imperceptible fineness, behind which hung 10,000 coloured lamps, whose light, reflected and refracted by these transparent columns, illuminated the gardens, groves, flowers, cascades, and fountains, like an enchanted landscape, which seen across this veil of light resembled the poetical phan-tasms of a dream. These splendid illuminations cost twelve thousand roubles, and lasted two months.

At eleven a flourish of musical instruments announced the arrival of the Emperor, who entered with the Empress and the imperial family, the ambassadors, the ambassadresses, the officers of the household, and the ladies in waiting, who all took their places at the middle supper-table; two other tables were filled by six hundred guests, mostly composed of the first-class nobility. The Emperor alone remained standing, moving about the tables, conversing by turns with his numerous guests.

Nothing could exceed the magnificent effect produced by the banquet, and the appearance of the court; the sovereign and his officers and nobility covered with gold and embroidery, the Empress and her ladies glittering with diamonds and splendid velvets, tissues and satins. No other fête in Europe could produce such a grand coup d'œil as the New Year's fête at the Hermitage. At the conclusion of the banquet the Court returned to the Saloon of St. George, where the music struck up a polonaise, which was led off by the Emperor. This dance was his farewell to his guests, for as soon as it was finished he withdrew. The departure of their sovereign gave pleasure to those loyal subjects who trembled for his personal safety; but the courageous and ever paternal confidence reposed in his subjects by Alexander, turned away from him every murderous weapon. No one could resolve to assassinate a kind father in the midst of his children, for as such the Emperor had received his numerous guests.

The second annual fête was of a religious character. "The Benediction of the Waters," to which the recent disastrous calamity of the most terrible inundation on record in Russia, the preceding year, had given deeper solemnity. The preparations were made with an activity tempered by care, which denoted the national character to be essentially religious. Upon the Neva a great pavilion was erected of a circular form, pierced with eight openings, decorated by four paintings, crowned with a cross; to this pavilion access was given by a jetty forming the hermitage. The temporary edifice, on the morning of the ceremony, was to have its pavement of ice cut through in order to permit the Patriarch to reach the water. The cold was already twenty degrees below zero, when at nine o'clock in the morning the whole population of St. Petersburg assembled themselves on the frozen waters of the Neva, then a solid mass of crystal. At half-past eleven the Empress and Grand-Duchesses took their places in the glass balcony of the Hermitage, and their appearance announced to the crowd that the Te Deum was concluded. The whole corps of the Imperial Guards, amounting to forty thousand men, marched to the sound of martial music and formed in line of battle on the river, from the hotel of the French embassy to the fortress. The palace gates opened as soon as this military evolution was effected, and the banners, sacred pictures, and the choristers of the chapel, appeared preceding the Patriarch and his clergy; then came the pages and the colours of the different regiments of guards, borne by their proper officers; then the Emperor, supported by the Grand-Dukes Nicholas and Michael, followed by the officers of his household, his aid-de-camps and generals. As soon as the Emperor reached the door of the pavilion, which was nearly filled with priests and banners, the Patriarch gave the signal, and the sweet solemn chant of more than a hundred voices rose to heaven, unaccompanied by music indeed, yet forming a divine harmony hardly to be surpassed on earth. During the prayer, which lasted twenty minutes, the Emperor stood bareheaded, dressed in his uniform, without fur or any defence from the piercing cold, running more risk by this disregard to climate, than if he had faced the fire of a hundred pieces of artillery in the front of battle. The spectators, enveloped in fur mantles and caps, presented a complete contrast to the religious imprudence of their rash sovereign, who had been bald from his early youth.

As soon as the second Te Deum was concluded, the Patriarch took a silver cross from the hand of the younger chorister, and encircled by the kneeling crowd, plunged it through the opening made in the ice into the waters below. He then filled a vase up with the consecrated element, which he presented to the Emperor. After this ceremonial of blessing the waters, came the benediction of the standards, which were reverently inclined towards the Patriarch for that purpose. A sky-rocket was immediately let off from the pavilion, and its silvery smoke was answered by a terrible explosion, for the whole artillery of the fortress gave from their metallic throats a loud Te Deum, and these salvos were heard three times during the benediction of the standards; at the third, the Emperor commenced his return to the palace.

He was more melancholy than usual, for during this religious ceremony he felt no need of courage or presence of mind; he was secured by the natural veneration of a superstitious people. He knew it, and, therefore, wore no mask in the semblance of a joyless smile.

On the same day, this imposing ceremonial is used at Constantinople, only the winter is a mere name and the water has no ice. The Patriarch stands on the deck of a vessel, and drops his silver cross into the calm blue waves of the Bosphorus, which a skilful diver restores to him before it reaches the bottom.

To these religious ceremonies succeed sports and pastimes of all kinds. Booths and barracks are erected on the frozen Neva from quay to quay, Russian mountains, down which sledges slide with inconceivable velocity, and the Carnival commences with as much zest as in cities enjoying a southern temperature. Plays are performed on the ice, and curious pantomimes, in which a marmot performs the part of a baby very cleverly, while the man who shows him off under the character of the good father of the family finds resemblances in this black-nosed imp to all his supposed human relatives, to the infinite delight of the spectators.

Sleighting on the ice is, as in Canada, a favourite diversion with the Russians, whose sledges are lined with fur and ornamented with silver bells and ribbons of every colour. Sometimes a wind loaded with vapour puts an end to these diversions by rendering the ice unsafe, in which case they are interdicted by the police, and the sports and pastimes of the people are transferred to terra firma; but the Carnival is considered to come to an abrupt conclusion if this misfortune occurs at its commencement, for the Neva is to the inhabitants of St. Petersburg what Vesuvius is to the Neapolitans, and the absence of the ice robs their Saturnalia of its greatest attraction. In countries where the Greek religion is the national standard of faith, Lent is preceded by the same unbounded festivity as in those which are Roman Catholic; but the Court does not display in these days so much barbarous magnificence as in those earlier times when civilization was unknown. The Carnival was, however, held during the last century by Anna Ivanovna, in a style surpassing that of her ancestors. This pleasure-loving princess, the daughter of the elder brother of Peter the Great, covered her usurpation of a throne she had snatched not only from the descendants of her mighty uncle, but also from her own elder sister and niece, by conducting to the popular amusements of her people, who in their turn forgot her defective title to the throne. This popular female sovereign founded the largest bell in the world, and gave the most magnificent Carnival ever held in Russia. Thus she maintained her sway by the aid of pleasure and devotion, a twofold cord her subjects never broke. In 1740 Anna Ivanovna resolved to surpass every preceding Carnival by her unique manner of providing her people with amusement during this merry season. It was customary for the sovereign of Russia to be attended by a dwarf, who united the privileged character of a jester to the tiny proportions of a little child. This empress possessed two of these diminutive personages, and she chose for her own amusement and that of her loving subjects that they should be married during this Carnival, and "whether nature did this match contrive," or it was the consequence of her own despotic will, cannot be known without a peep into the jealously guarded archives of Russia; but the nuptials of these sports of nature was the ostensible cause of the fête. This the Autocrat gave on a new and splendid scale. She directed her governors to send her two natives of the hundred districts they ruled in her name, clothed in their national costume, and with the animals they were accustomed to use on their journeys. The idea was certainly a brilliant one, and worthy of the sovereign lady of so many nations, tongues and languages.

Anna Ivanovna was punctually obeyed, and at the appointed time a motley procession, including the purest types of the Caucasian race and the ugliest of the Mongolian, astonished the eyes of the Empress, who had scarcely known the greater part of these distant tribes by name. There she beheld the Kamtchadale with his sledge drawn by dogs, the Russian Laplander with his reindeer, the Kalmuck with his cows, the Tartar on his horse, and the native of Bochara with his camel, the Ostiak on his clogs. Then for the first time, the beautiful Georgian and Circassian, with their dark ringlets and unrivalled features, looked with astonishment upon the red hair of the Finlander. The gigantic Cossack of the Ukraine eyed with contempt the pigmy Samoiede—and in fact, for the first time were brought into contact by the will of their sovereign lady, who classed each race under one of four banners representing spring, summer, autumn and winter; and these two hundred persons, during eight days, paraded the streets of St. Petersburg, to the infinite delight of the population, who had never seen the power of the throne displayed in a manner so agreeable to their taste before.

Upon the wedding day of her dwarfs, these important personages had been attended to the altar by this singular national procession, where they plighted their faith in the presence of the Empress and all her Court, after which they heard Mass, and then, accompanied by their numerous escort, took possession of the palace prepared for them by the direction of their imperial mistress. This palace was not the least fanciful part of the fête. It was entirely composed of ice, and resembled crystal in its brilliancy and fine cutting and polish. This beautiful fabric was fifty-two feet in length and twenty in width; the roof, the floor, the furniture, chandeliers, and even the nuptial bed, were formed of the same cold, glittering, and transparent materials. The doors, the galleries, and the fortifications,—even the six pieces of cannon that guarded this magical palace, were of ice; one of these, charged with a single ice-bullet and fired by the aid of a pound of powder, perforated at seventy paces a plank of twelve inches thickness. This was done to salute the bridal party, and welcome them home. The most curious piece of mechanism, and which pleased the Russians the most, was a colossal elephant, mounted by an armed Persian, and led by twelve slaves. This gigantic beast threw from his trunk a column of water by day, and at night a stream of fire, uttering from time to time roars which were heard from one end of St. Petersburg to the other. These noble roars were produced by twelve Russians concealed in the body and legs of the phantom elephant, whose costly housings hid the men whose noise so delighted their countrymen. This Carnival of the fête-loving female usurper has never been surpassed by any Russian sovereign, though, with the exception of the assembly of her distant subjects, its taste was barbarous enough.¹

(1) Our Sovereign Lady, Queen Victoria, were she to raise her sceptre, might easily convolve a far more numerous and interesting assembly, from lands more distant, and climes of more varied temperature. How many more nations in the far east and west are ruled and maintained by her lawful rule, than rendered unlawful homage to the Russian Empress! If she were to send for two persons from every tribe, nation, or empire she governs, England would behold the grandest and most interesting national spectacle her sun ever shone upon. Can this idea be realized?—and if it can be, why then should it not be done?

VENUS AND THE BOAR.

VENUS AND THE BOAR.

NOTWITHSTANDING the absurdities and irrational fictions which are interwoven with the stories of classic writers, there are many of them exceedingly beautiful, and not altogether destitute of natural truths. In the mythology of the ancients are frequently to be discovered shadows—dim indeed, but yet types of the loftier creeds which have been revealed to us; thoughts and sentiments almost worthy of the age of Christian enlightenment, and records of deeds which, had they been the work of those who actually trod on this lower world, would have formed no unintelligible and unworthy portion of man's history. The thoughts of ancient poets and philosophers were often nearer to our own than we are apt to believe; those who put them forth expressed all their reason and intelligence knew, and, in doing so, they only left the mind hungering for a higher and more spiritual food.

Ever since that period in the history of art when, freed from those restrictions which almost compelled its disciples to defer the efforts of their genius to the requirements of the Roman Church, painting sought a wider and more diversified channel for the development of its powers, the heathen writers, as they are generally termed, have furnished a fine and inexhaustible field for illustration, wherein may be discerned symbols of those attributes of social and moral virtues which are common to humanity, however circumstanced. The story of "Venus and the Boar" scarcely can be allowed to rank among such shadowy truths, but it is nevertheless a very beautiful fiction, that speaks of the sorrow of the heart. The shepherd Adonis, son of the King of Crete, was the great favourite of Venus: he was passionately fond of hunting, and was frequently admonished by the goddess not to hunt wild beasts, lest any accident should happen to him. He disregarded the advice, and one day received a mortal injury from the tusks of a boar, which he had wounded; and Venus, after shedding many tears at his death, changed him into the flower called Anemone. But the animal that caused so much grief was not allowed to escape with impunity; the light-winged attendants of the goddess were commanded to go in search of the boar, to bind him, and bring her to him for trial. Theocritus, a Greek poet, who flourished at Syracuse, in Sicily, about three hundred years before the Christian era, gives a most fanciful account of the apprehension and trial of the culprit, the commencing portion of which has been thus translated, and here is introduced as explanatory of Westall's picture, though we are not aware that he borrowed his version of the story from the Greek writer:—

"When Venus saw Adonis dead,
And from his cheeks the roses fled,
His lovely locks distain'd with gore,
She bad her Cupids bring the boar—
The boar that had her lover slain,
The cause of all her grief and pain.
Swift as the pinion'd birds they rove
Through every wood, through every grove;

And when the gull'd boar they found,
With cords they bound him, doubly bound.
One with a chain secure and strong,
Haul'd him unwillingly along;
One pinch'd his tail to make him go,
Another beat him with his bow;
The more they urg'd, the more they dragg'd,
The more reluctantly he lagg'd;
Guilt in his conscious looks appear'd,
He much the angry goddesses fear'd.
To Venus soon the beast they led," &c. &c.

Westall's illustration of this subject ranks among the best of his pictures; it is replete with rich and poetical fancy, and presents a combination of graceful elegance with playful conception, not often surpassed.

Richard Westall, R.A., was born about the year 1765, and, like several other artists who rose to eminence as painters, he was apprenticed to an engraver of heraldic designs, in the neighbourhood of Cheapside, London. Towards the conclusion of his term of servitude, his master permitted him to attend the schools of the Royal Academy, and also to devote his evenings to the practice of drawing. At the Academy he formed an intimacy with his fellow-pupil, the late Sir Thomas Lawrence; and when Westall's apprenticeship had terminated, the two young artists took a house, jointly, at the corner of Greek Street, Soho. The house had two entrances, one in Greek Street, and the other in Soho Square, which bore that of Lawrence. Westall soon became a great favourite with the public; his style was new, and, possessing considerable elegance not unmixed with pretty affectations, it suited the taste of the period. His designs were therefore much sought after by the publishers of illustrated books, to which he, Stothard, and Smirke, were by far the largest contributors for many years. "Episodes of Love," it has been remarked, "seemed best suited to his gentle mind and pencil;" but he frequently launched out into higher and bolder themes.

Like his friend Lawrence, Westall enjoyed more fashionable patronage than any other artist of his time; his water-colour drawings especially being much sought after by collectors of "elegant trifles," for drawing-room albums. As an instructor of drawing among the higher circles, he was also greatly in request, and among his more distinguished scholars was our present beloved Queen, when Princess Victoria; how effective his lessons have been, the beautiful drawings of his royal pupil abundantly testify.

Westall was elected an Academician before he had reached the age of thirty; an honour, it is believed, almost unparalleled in the history of this institution; it was in 1794, the same year that Stothard and Lawrence arrived at a similar dignity. It is, however, greatly to be lamented, that the bright promise of Westall's earlier life was not realized by his subsequent productions; for, however admirable his style is in many particulars, it rarely reaches what may legitimately be called high art. Perhaps, had he found fewer patrons, he would have striven more nobly to become a great artist; the path to substantial fame is rarely that which is strewn with flowers.

LIFE IN PRAIRIE LAND.¹

CHAPTER VIII.

Commencement of Sucker life—Our next neighbour—The mother Meg Merrilies—The house; its architecture—The grounds; how laid out and adorned—The children; their pastimes—The father; his political and social position—Another house: the spirit which reigned in it—Beauty of order and purity in domestic life.

At Prairie Lodge our acquaintance with Sucker life commenced. But it was not carried to any great intimacy here. My sister's home had been little visited, even in earlier days, by the primitive settlers. Their principal intercourse had consisted of business affairs between the men, and visits of mercy between the females in the times of sickness or death, so that we saw little of them excepting an occasional out-of-door call from some neighbour, or in passing their residences or wagons in our various excursions.

One family of this kind occupied the next house west from the Lodge. We often passed it, and the external appearance excited the most intense curiosity to have a peep at the internal. But I grieve to say that it could never be accomplished under any decent pretext whatever. All the showers were either too early or too late. No wagon ever broke down in the neighbourhood, though the road was at times bad enough to encourage hope for a long way on either side. It was too near home ever to stop for water. It is true there was an occasional illness, but this could not serve my purpose, for the wife had a mother, to whom the lively doctor of our village gave the name of Meg Merrilies (I fancy there was a little spite in it, for she was his rival in this branch of the medical profession), who would travel fifteen or twenty miles on foot in the morning, attend to her patient, and return in the evening. Meg then officiated, to the exclusion of all the curious gossips of the neighbourhood, and had things all her own way. The patient was generally out the next day, and all went on as before.

The house was one of the meanest description of cabins. It turned its back upon the road, and showed only a four-light window, or rather sash; for soon after I first saw it, the third was broken out, and the fourth so fractured that its continuance seemed extremely doubtful. A patchwork quilt of blue jeans and red flannel was hung across the aperture a few days after, and never removed while I remained in the country. Directly beneath this, against the wall, which was on a line with the fence, was a green pool of about the dimensions of the house. It was of artificial construction, and redounded not a little to the taste of some eight or ten large swine, who delighted their senses in its aromatic depths, at the same time that they regaled those of by-passers.

The entrance to the house was in the rear. A low kind of shantee projected from the door several feet back, which served for pantry, milk-house, pig-pen, poultry-house, and possibly stable in winter. In the right angle between these was the well, just far enough from the corner to be visible in passing. The ground around this was the great theatre of action for mother and children. I never knew the exact number of the latter, but if called to testify in any matter concerning them, I should say the minimum was eight, the maximum double that number. I rarely saw less than the former, sporting away the morning of life, in their rags and filth, on the banks of the verdant pool, or the hard-trodden ground around the well. Their dress and complexions were so uniform that I could never distinguish but one of them, a girl of some twelve years, whose face was always a little dirtier, her hair a little stiffer, and her clothes a shade nearer the colour of the earth in which she burrowed. When any one approached the house, they all scampered like a herd of wild animals into the angle between the cabins, and peeped around the corners as long as the traveller was in sight. A general yell and shout announced his disappearance and their return to the several amusements from which they had fled.

The father of this family was a man of sense and much general information; his morals were unimpeachable, and his character commanded so much respect, that he was proposed for one of the highest offices in the county. His election was lost in consequence of some local division, not at all connected with the degraded condition of his family. He had a fine farm, valuable horses, and other property, and, away from home, appeared as well as any of his neighbours who lived more comfortably. His means would have enabled him to build a good house, surround it with cultivated grounds, and furnish it with every requisite for neatness and comfort. Had such physical degradation been the result of extreme poverty, the case would have excited compassion, instead of curiosity or disgust. But it was not so.

It may be asked, then, what was the cause? It was not that the parties were misers, and hoarded their gains; for their means were spent freely to procure whatever they deemed necessary to comfort. What, then, was it? Merely the incapacity of the mistress of this family to appreciate a better condition, or help to create one. I afterwards saw many cases of a like mode of living, and am bound, in fairness, to say, that the credit was due in nearly every one to the females.

I once entered a cabin of this description, on a cold November day. It had no window; all the light came down the wide chimney, or through the open door. There was a long shelf in one corner, on which two plates, two cups, and three saucers were arranged, in conjunction with an iron skillet, a small bake kettle, and a tin tea-pot. A broken table stood against the wall, on which the breakfast things yet remained, though it was eleven o'clock. In a back corner of the room was a bed, and the only thing that indicated the exercise of powers superior to the ingenuity of the beaver, was a wide shelf over it, on which some husks were deposited, and covered with a bit of filthy cotton cloth. This was constructed for the nocturnal quarters of the blowsy little heir, who was then tumbling over and over on the ground. There was one dilapidated chair in the room, besides a single bench and a double one. The chair was standing back on the platform which had been laid for the bed, and, as I entered, escorted by the husband, the wife rose from her seat near the table, took her pipe from her mouth, and placing it near the edge of the hearth, invited me to sit. A second child was playing in the ashes. The door was wide open, and the raw wind swept in gusts through the miserable place, filling it with ashes and smoke. I have never seen more utter poverty or filth.

(1) Continued from p. 345.

(2) The cognomen of the Illinoisans, answering to the Buckeye of Ohio, the Wolverine of Michigan, the Corn-cracker of Kentucky, &c.

When I had gathered my skirts and seated myself as safely as the circumstances would permit, the woman returned to her pipe, and the employment which my entrance had interrupted. She had a large paper of coffee in her lap, from some of which she was selecting the foul kernels, et cet. preparatory to roasting. Never was there a more perfect picture of self-satisfaction. She had a fat figure, which seemed, when she seated herself, to settle away into a circular mass of matter, in which life and motion were barely manifest. Her children received but little attention; indeed, it was not easy to see how one could bestow more upon them. The elder was enjoying himself intensely; and the happiness of the younger was abated only by the caution which the mother occasionally gave it, "not to swallow the rocks," which she threw from among the coffee.

It was impossible for me to contemplate this revolting scene, without endeavouring to ascertain the state of mind that could lead a human being to live willingly in the midst of it. I remarked, that it must be a serious inconvenience to live through the winter with the door open.

"Why, yes," she replied, "'tain't as warm hyar as it used to be in Kaintucky: 'twasn't of much account there."

"But we obviate the difficulty of a colder climate by windows, they admit the light without the cold."

"Yes, I reckon they're mighty convenient, but we hain't had one yet."

"How long have you lived here?"

"Four year."

"Have you never had a floor?"

"No, we hain't yit; but I reckon we shall git one afore long. It's mighty bad to have the old man to work around the house, so I don't say nothing about it: he wants to put it down, but I don't allow 't would make much difference; I reckon that ont thar," pointing to the little platform, "will do us yet."

It would weary the reader to give further details of a conversation that evinced only the most disgusting indifference to the common comforts of a more civilized condition. I rode several miles on the same day with the husband of this woman, and had an opportunity to learn that he would prefer a better manner of life, but that her aversion to change or action rendered so great an effort necessary on his part, that he had never undertaken it. He had ample means for surrounding himself and his family with every comfort. Beside a fine farm, which he cultivated near a good market, he owned a valuable stock of cattle and other property, and had between a thousand and fifteen hundred dollars, in specie, lying in a black chest by the head of his bed. He had no disposition to hoard it; he would spend it the next day, for anything that they could agree on as conducive to happiness. He was likewise possessed of superior natural powers, which he had used in acquiring knowledge of various kinds, and was then capable of making himself a very pleasant companion, by the use of his varied information. His mode of living was never the subject of remark among people of his own class. No one thought it strange, or wondered whether it would ever improve. The women, who, with more household industry, lived better than "Miss Andrews," probably thought she lost a "heap of comfort," in her windowless, floorless, dirty house, but so a smart Yankee woman would have thought of them.

These extreme cases, however, are fortunately rare. In the homes of most of the first settlers there is much more regard paid to cleanliness and comfort. In many of them the neatness and order are perfect. Of necessity they have fewer artificial luxuries than the inhabitants of older regions, but these are not evidences of talent or worth. The inherent virtues of cleanliness, order, and self-respect are often more manifest in a simple than a complicated style of living, and are not less productive of happiness in one than the other.

CHAPTER. IX.

Spring around Prairie Lodge—Showers—Thunder-storms at night—Their sublimity—Their effect on the landscape—Pleasures of the season—Strawberry—Quail—Scene from his domestic life—Grouse, his habits—Spring Morning in the prairie—Bob-o-lak—Woodpecker—Parrot—Crow—Bussard—Wild Turkey—Cattle on the prairie—Hare—Deer—Whip-poor-Will.

THE beautiful progeny of spring began now to gather around Prairie Lodge. Animate and inanimate nature teemed with the loveliest creations. The showers that had been so emphatically foretold on our arrival did not disappoint us. They fell almost daily for several weeks, and were generally accompanied by lightning and thunder, such as the dwellers in the east have no conception of. Nothing of the kind can be more magnificent, unless it be the marshalling of the same storms on the vast plains farther west, where they are said to be even more terrific. They come more generally toward evening, and not unfrequently continue till near morning. Nothing can exceed the rapidity with which they gather after the first signal is given. A little cloud not larger than a man's hand rises on the horizon, and in fifteen minutes the earth is deluged, and the pealing heavens seem on fire. There are few showers here unaccompanied by the most striking electric phenomena: sometimes the whole arch is lighted by a continuous flickering glare, rent occasionally by a more intense vein. The thunder roll is ceaseless, with such lightning! The deep peals that accompany the brighter flashes only strike with a more appalling tone. At other times the whole vault is filled with a darkness that seems ponderable, till a mighty flash rends the pall and searches the very soul. It is gone, and the solid earth trembles under the mighty concussion. Again darkness, as if eternal night had come, wraps the scene till the flame leaps forth with a more blinding glare than before, and a crash follows that seems to shatter the foundation of the world. The third or fourth signal is followed by the storm, which breaks through the sable rack as if half the ocean had been lifted from its bed and were wandering in the upper air. In an inconceivably short space of time the plains around you are deluged, so that every succeeding flash is reflected from innumerable little pools, as if you were in the midst of a shallow lake broken by islands of sedge and grass. I never appreciated the sublime power of the elements till I witnessed these storms. They are one of the most glorious features of the country.

Their effect was heightened too by contrast with the scenes which followed them. The vast expanse of country over which they ranged was in a few hours after as quiet and smiling as if the upper elements had dispensed only peace and sunshine from the first hour of creation. And beauty born of these awful wrappings stole over every rolling height and into every green glade in our landscape. The swelling bud, the unfolding leaf and flower followed in the path of their majestic progress, making rich and beautiful what had before been desolate and wintry. The spirit that had all the night perhaps raved with such fearful and angry power, seemed, when the bright and peaceful morning came, to have borne a magician's wand after his wrath, and kindled life, beauty, and joy on the plains it had threatened to devastate. The trees around our lodge now began to put on their summer garb; the hazel copses unfolded their young leaves. The prairies spread their green carpets, and even went so far as to variegate the pattern with the violet and the scarlet-painted cup. The strawberry came out in her bridal flowers, and blushed herself into luscious maturity beneath the ardent sun. It was not confined to beds and patches such as delight the eyes of the urchin roving through forbidden meadows in the east, but reddened whole acres around the lodge. The pleasure of gathering it was surpassed only by its delicious flavour. When we came in heated, and just enough fatigued to make rest delightful, our blushing treasures were cleansed of the leaves and grass, sprinkled with sugar, and deluged with delicious cream fresh from the brimming pan. Oh what a feast! and while we were enjoying it the soft breeze floated in laden with the odours of the young world, and the music of its varied populace. The grove in the rear of the house was tenanted by many little songsters, busily employed in these days of universal industry in announcing their return and preparing for the duties of the season. My favourite was the Quail, the merriest, the happiest, and most business-like bird of them all. He rejoices in the showers, and so do I. The harder the rain, the livelier his cheering when it is over. He makes the dripping wood ring with his shrill note. If you walk out while the drops hang upon the leaves, and the grass bends with the weight of its gems, you hear his merry greetings floating by as gaily as if a bevy of children had escaped to the woods and were playing hide and seek with an omnipresent "Bob White," who would only answer when called with a whistle. You hear it in every tone, the imperative, the plaintive, the querulous, the dignified, the entreating, the congratulatory. "Bob White!" soliloquizes one philosophic-looking fellow from the second story of a hazel clump. He looks about a moment, and repeats in a higher and more intense key, "Bob White!" Two or three more turns of the smooth little head and the sagacious little eye seem to raise his temper, and he adds the epithet "Old!" as if Bob White were rather sensitive on the score of his years, and would be drawn out to repel the injurious insinuation. "Old Bob White!" he exclaims, and it is responded to from below. Presently out trips a neat, industrious, thrifty-looking bird, who appears to be keeping house in some of the snug little apartments to which these clean paths lead, and exclaims, "Old Bob White!" He starts and looks smartly about for the individual who has perpetrated so unjust a slander. "Old Bob White!" And, as if the enormity grew with the repetition, he hops upon another branch, adjusts his plumage, and boldly as an eye can defy, he defies any libeller to prove his charge.

The altercation is becoming sharp, when presently a softer and entreating voice from below, cries out "Bob White!" His anger is dissipated in a moment. With a look of universal charity toward all quail slanderers, he alights from his post of defiance, and trips away up the leafy aisle. He runs along in haste, looking expectant but determined. He evidently anticipates some appeal to his feelings as a husband and father; but is resolved to yield to no indiscreet solicitation. He reaches a little nook near the edge of the thicket, where low herbage has crept in and woven a thick bed, soft and odorless. The branches are closely knotted above it, and two or three stems of the Geranium Maculatum droop gracefully over, looking with their meek pale eyes at the nestling little group which Mrs. Bob White is vainly endeavouring to keep in order during her husband's sally in defence of his youth. When he arrives, he finds a dozen callow Bob Whites tumbling about with the manifest intention of rebelling against parental authority. The mother entreats, the father remonstrates, but to no purpose. He finally changes his tone to that of instruction, and warns his inexperienced children against the many dangers which wait on the life of a quail, but more especially against traps. In due time order is again restored, and the exercise of the parental authority has so elevated Bob White's estimation of himself, that he can now forgive all that previously excited his indignation. He feels that respectability established on such a basis is not easily overthrown; and thus reconciled with himself and the world at large, he walks forth beneath the dripping boughs with a complacency which mere epithets cannot disturb.

The Grouse is another member of the feathered tribe, peculiar to these beautiful regions. He is a large, mottled grey bird, with a heavy ruff of feathers running over his head, which adds much to the watchfulness and timidity of his appearance. Their nests are built on the open prairie in some thick knot of grass. This bird has no proper song, and is in general a very silent inhabitant of these vast plains. When hunted or overtaken by the traveller, they rise suddenly with a whirr, somewhat similar to, but not so distinct as that of the pheasant, and fly very rapidly. If not disturbed they describe the half of an ellipse between the points of rising and alighting. The strokes of the wing are short and rapid, and the flight is very swift and direct. These fowls are rarely heard to utter any noise except at one chosen hour of the day. On a spring morning before sunrise, if you are in the vicinity where grove and prairie meet, the air resounds with a peculiar noise, between the whistle of the quail and the hoarse blowing of the night-hawk, but louder than either. You inquire what it is, and are told that it is the prairie cocks greeting the opening day.

Spring morning on the prairies! I wish I could find language that would convey to the mind of the reader an adequate idea of the deep joy which the soul drinks in from every feature of this wonderful scene! If he could stand where I have often stood, when the rosy clouds were piled against the eastern sky, and the soft tremulous light was streaming askant the dewy grass, while not a sound of life broke on the ear, save the wild note just mentioned, so much in harmony with the whole of visible nature, he would feel one of the charms which bind the hearts of the sons and daughters of this land.

We are within the borders of a little grove. Before us stretches a prairie; boundless on the south and east, and fringed on the north by a line of forest, the green top of which is just visible in a dark waving line between the tender hue of the growing grass and the golden sky. South and east as far as the eye can stretch, the plain is unbroken save by one "lone tree," which, from time immemorial, has been the compass of the red man and his white brother. The light creeps slowly up the sky; for twilight is long on these savannas. The heavy dews which the cool night has deposited glisten on the leaves and spikes of grass, and the particles, occasionally mingling, are borne by their own weight to the earth. The slight blade on which they hang recovers then its erect position, or falls into its natural curve, with a quick but gentle motion, that imparts an appearance of life to that nearest you, even before the wind has laid his hand on the pulseless sea beyond. A vast ocean, teeming with life; redolent of sweet odours! It yields no sound save the one which first arrested our attention, and this is uttered without ceasing. It is not the prolonged note of one, but the steady succession of innumerable voices. It comes up near you and travels on, ringing more and more faintly on the ear, till it is returned by another line of respondents, and comes swelling in full chorus, stronger and nearer, till the last seems to be uttered directly at your feet.

But the light is gaining upon the grey dawn. Birds awoken in the wood behind us, and salute each other from the swinging branches. Insects begin their busy hum. And now, the sun has just crowded his rim above a bank of gorgeous clouds, and pours a flood of dazzling light across the grassy main. Each blade becomes a chain of gems, and, as the light increases, and the breath of morning shakes them, they bend, and flash, and change their hues, till the whole space seems sprinkled with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, amethysts, and all precious stones. Nothing can be conceived more beautiful or joyous than such a scene at this hour. The contiguous wood conveys an idea of home, such as you have borne from the forest-clad states of the east. It is a refuge from the vastness which oppresses the mind, because it can never wholly compass it. You rejoice, you exult in the friendly presence of the trees; not because they afford you a grateful retreat from the ardent sun; not because they adorn your rude dwelling; not because they promote the growth of fruit and flowers; not even because they congregate the dear little birds about your home; but because they afford the natural and familiar alternative to which the mind recurs when it is weary of the majesty which lies beyond them. You have sat under them in childhood; you have swept the fragments from the little spaces among their roots, and carpeted them with moss, and festooned them with the wild flowers which nodded near. You have peopled these magic palaces with fairies, and felt a joy which words can never tell, in dreaming how happy the little beings might be where nothing is visible to their tiny eyes but exquisite beauty, and no sound falls on their small ears but the melodies of growing life. You have listened to the winds, sighing plaintively through the boughs, and felt your soul grow fit for companionship with all things whatsoever that are beautiful and lovely. And now your heart turns fondly to these tall tenants of the plain as to elder brothers, and for a moment you look coldly on the naked expanse beyond. But stop! the sun is fairly up. The flashing gems have faded from the grass tops; the grouse has ceased his matin song; the birds have hailed the opening day, and are gaily launching from the trees; the curtain which has hung against the eastern sky is swept away, and the broad light pours in resistless. The wind comes coursing gently up from the far distance, bending the young herbage, and bearing to your senses sweet sounds and odours, nursed on the unsullied breast of Nature.

The tenants of the farm-yard are now a-stir; the cows are milked, and all the animals whose services the farmer does not call to aid his labours, are dismissed to ramble in the boundless pasture. The generous oxen are summoned to the yoke, and the labour of the day commences. If I have lingered long over this revel of nature, a spring morning on the prairies, with the grouse be all the blame!

Among the more accomplished feathered artists here are the Bob o'Link, a species of mocking-bird, sometimes called the Brown Thrasher, the Robin, and the melancholy Whip-poor-Will. These inhabit the barrens and the prairies in their vicinity. They are seldom found at any great distance from the woods. There are some small birds who love the free plain, but they cannot boast of much genius as singers. It is beautiful to think, however, that as man creeps outward from the groves and builds his cabin, opens his garden, and nurses a few shrubs and small trees around him, the little wood songsters construe it into an invitation to accompany him. Trees are of very rapid growth on the exhaustless soil of the prairies. A few years' care will bring about your house a dense grove of the locust, the cotton wood, aspen, and several other species, so that one need not be long deprived of bird-music. There are several varieties of the Woodpecker; but they will not visit a new home so soon. They look upon young and thrifty trees as humbugs, so far as they pretend to any present utility, and regard them rather as estates to be held in trust for future generations, than as available funds for the present. They decidedly prefer the aged and established to the young and ambitious. In the heavily wooded bottoms of large rivers and their tributaries, is found the Parroquet; not so finished a speaker as the Parrot, but quite as ready. He is a lively chatterer among the stately trees in the summer months, and when winter comes he betakes himself to the dark deep forests of the south. Like the most voluble consolers of our own species, he shrinks before the approach of stern trial. There are also several coarser tribes, which I never loved, and shall therefore only name for the gratification of the curious. The crow caws here as everywhere else, but he has been rescued from the general detestation in which he was formerly held by the magic pen of Bryant. No other could have done it. And yet, who can read the "Death of the Flowers," and not entertain a higher respect for him, and feel more melody in his croakings than before? The hawk screams above the wood top, and over the poultry yard, all through the bright summer day. But nothing could make him other than an object of abhorrence to me since he bore my favourite chicken away before my very eyes, many, many years ago. I could not love him even with such an introduction as made his croaking cousin acceptable.

Next in kind, but more loathsome, is the buzzard, an indolent, gluttonous bird, who wheels lazily over the great plains, till the decaying carcass of a wolf, deer, or other animal attracts him to the earth. He then descends, gorges himself with the foul carrion, and often rests beside it after eating, from sheer inability to rise. The turkey, whom this infamous fellow so much resembles, that he has succeeded in stealing his name as a prefix to his own, is a much pleasanter member of the feathered tribe.

Great numbers of them abound in the woodlands, where the stately march of the old cock gallanting his hen and her lively brood through the forest is one of its most delightful features.

The landscape grows more beautiful every day. The prairie puts on its richest garb about the first of June. The painted cup, mocassin flower, and geranium, come out; and there is more repose in the vegetable world than there has been. Nature, like a notable dame, has cleaned house in proper season, got her furniture and ornaments arranged, and now seated complacently in her easy-chair, challenges the admiration of beholders. In the vicinity of farms, the landscape is enriched by herds of cattle feeding on the prairies. If you walk or drive among them in the afternoon, they are panting like gourmands after a turtle dinner. Their very ribs are distended with the luxurious fare in which they have revelled all day, and their breath perfumes the air. As the sun declines they wander homeward, the cows bearing a treasure that almost flows without the pressure of the housewife's hand. When the milk is strained and set away, the cares of the day are over, and then we wander out among the hazel copses or through the grove, to enjoy the gorgeous sunset, and the long dreamy twilight that lingers over these peerless lands.

The hazel copse is one of the most picturesque features of our landscape. It grows very abundantly, and in autumn yields an inexhaustible harvest of the most delicious nuts. It is found several miles from the woodland, and grows in clumps from three to six feet in height. At a little distance these shrubs have the appearance of green mounds thrown up on the smooth surface of the plain. Its shelter is much sought by the rabbit, the most tender and timid inhabitant of the prairie. Where the hazel has a strong compact growth it uproots the grass and leaves the soil unoccupied, except by an occasional flower or creeping vine, whose long tendrils make a beautiful festoonery for such little aisles. Along these the timid hare skips and feeds during the day, and when twilight favours his faint heart, he may be seen leaping out into the more dangerous paths trodden by man and other beings whom his instinct teaches him to dread as foes. Let him hear your footsteps and he flees the sound as if it foretold his death. We stroll through these miniature groves, treading carefully, and speaking in low whispers not to alarm the quick ear of their little tenants. By-and-by, we emerge from the winding road into the more open barrens. We wander onward, talking of olden time and the time to come, when presently a sharp, shrill sound breaks upon the ear, followed by the bounding of light feet. Away flies the deer, startled by our white dresses moving among the green foliage, and fearful every moment of the cracking rifle. Poor innocent, we shall not harm you! You might have cropped the twigs unmolested, and been spared that pang of fear, had you known that we love mercy, and find no pleasure in depriving any created thing of the joys which are its natural inheritance.

But while we have mused and talked, the magnificent drapery of the west has been folded away. The gorgeous piles of gold and crimson have melted and left the sky faintly tinted with their departing glories. The curtain of night is creeping slowly over the earth; the breeze steals gently through the foliage, and shakes the large leaf of the sassafras with a soft hollow sound, which, with the quick, liquid rustling of the aspen, and the fuller notes of the forest tree, pours a delicious harmony into the ear of night. Half-an-hour later the light is gone out in the west. The night-hawk has ceased his airy, sounding swoops, and the whip-poor-will has come from his retreat, to tell again the melancholy tale he urged so mournfully last night. There he sits, in the top of the tall oak before the door, and will not cease his plaint. What is it troubles thee, poor Will? Hast thou been engaged in some naughty affair, wronging thy neighbour, or looking sweetly at the daughter of some sour old worshipper of Mammon, who scorns thy poverty, and threatens thee, unless thou desist? Or has some gay gallant misled thy dame, and is thy song a cry for vengeance? Methinks it is too melancholy in its tone. Some sorrow surely is its burthen. But our ears are grown familiar with it, Will; and thine, perhaps, is lighter than that we turn away from every day, though uttered more intelligibly. They say thou art a merry little fellow all day; that joy dances in thine eye, and that thou hoppest from branch to branch, laughing under thy wing at the anticipation of the melancholy pranks thou wilt play at night, with sentimental maidens and moonstruck lovers. If so, Will, thou art a sad rogue, and deservest some real sorrow, little masker that thou art!

But, good night! I turn my ear to a tale of more unequivocal sorrow than thine. Sister has promised me the story of the dark man's griefs.

(To be continued.)

THE KING OF CORSICA.

AMONG the crowd of adventurers, who, having done in their lifetime neither much good nor evil, have yet succeeded by means of cunning and boldness in deceiving mankind, in order to accomplish their own ambitious projects, there are few who have risen so high in the world, or whose lives have been so remarkable, as that of the Baron Theodore de Neuhorf. Successively officer, statesman, financier, king, in prison for debts, and lastly dependent on the bounty of others for means of existence, the Baron de Neuhorf has enjoyed all the honours, as he has undergone all the vicissitudes of human life.

It is the history (but little known) of this remarkable man's life which we purpose here to relate. Had he been favoured by fortune, his name would have been inscribed among those of the greatest men; oppressed by reverse, history will always look upon him as an adventurer.

The Island of Corsica, until its definite annexation to France, had always been a prey to anarchy. The inhabitants, who claim their descent from the Arabs and Carthaginians, had preserved in the fastnesses of their mountains all their primitive roughness of manners. Courageous but vindictive, simple but proud, and divided into hostile factions, they were at constant warfare with one another.

The Genoese had settled in Corsica about the middle of the fourteenth century. Their dominion was at first passively accepted: but wearied by the continual insurrections of which this island was the theatre, they adopted a more rigorous system, which was subsequently destined to prove fatal to themselves. This new government, harsh and oftentimes cruel, excited the hatred of the inhabitants, whose history is but a long succession of attempts made to regain their independence. One of these insurrections broke out in the middle of the eighteenth century. In the year 1735, a few inhabitants of the island, who, during these civil discords, had acquired a certain authority and influence over their fellow-citizens, convoked a general assembly of the nation. They there determined to shake off the yoke of the Genoese. The code of laws which this republic had given to them was publicly burnt, and Paoli and Giafferi were elected representatives of a government half republican and half monarchical.

Paoli and Giafferi had scarcely been five months at the head of affairs, when the Baron de Neuhorf was proclaimed king by the unanimous consent of the nation.

Theodore de Neuhorf, a baron without a barony, was born in France. His father, a seigneur of reduced circumstances, in the principality of Marek in Westphalia, had formed an unfortunate matrimonial alliance, and was, in consequence, obliged to leave his native country. He came and settled in Lorraine, where, through the interest of the Duchess of Orleans, he obtained the governorship of Messin; but, a short time after this appointment, he died, although in the prime of life, leaving two children, a daughter and son. The Duchess of Orleans took them under her protection. The daughter was brought up in her house, and was afterwards married to the Marquis de Trévoux. As for his son, after having been received as one of the Duchess's pages, he obtained, through her influence, the command of one of the regiments of La Marck.

Theodore was tall and well built; nature had given him a commanding appearance and handsome face, and he possessed all the accomplishments of the gentleman of that period. He had a taste for luxury and extravagance which ill-accommoded with his means. Debts, as well as bad conduct, obliged him to give up the command of his company. Endowed with a bold and enterprising spirit, he determined to seek his fortunes in the life of adventures.

Charles XII., King of Sweden, was at that time, by his success as well as reverses in arms, by his boldness and intrepidity, filling all Europe with the renown of his name. The Baron de Neuhorf thought that in the service of such a master he would find a fair opening for his talents and ambition. He repaired to Stockholm, where he was well received by the Baron de Goertz, Charles XII.'s minister, who, divining his real character, and finding that he had more talent for intrigue than inclination for war, instead of sending him into the army, employed him as secret agent in a negotiation which the court of Sweden was then carrying on with Cardinal Alberoni, and which had for its object the re-establishment of the Stuarts on the throne of England. The Baron de Neuhorf filled with success the various missions which were entrusted to him by the Swedish minister, both in London and Madrid. He was on the point of reaping the reward of his skill and intelligence, when the failure of the negotiation, added to Charles XII.'s death and his minister's miserable end, crushed all his hopes, and finding that he had nothing more to expect from the Swedish government, he set out for Madrid. Alberoni, who had not forgotten the secret mission on which Theodore had been employed, nor the ability he had displayed on that occasion, graciously received him and gave him the command of a regiment with the rank of colonel. By means of flattery and the insinuating manners he possessed, the Baron de Neuhorf directed all his efforts to secure the favour of men influential at the court of Madrid, managed to render them some important services, obtained great honours, and so skilfully manœuvred that the Duke of Ripperda, the cardinal's successor, married him to Lady Forsfield, the daughter of a peer, and one of the queen's maids of honour.

This marriage, and the position it enabled him to take up at the court, opened to the Baron de Neuhorf a brilliant and happy future; but his restless disposition and thirst for adventure soon induced him to quit Spain. He abandoned his wife, and is shortly after found in Paris, mixed up in Law's speculations.

The sympathy which remarkable men secretly feel for one another, in a short time sprung up into a warm attachment between Theodore and the Scotch financier. He assisted him in carrying out his banking system: and when Law became Comptroller-General of Finances, and held, as it were, the first rank in the state, his flatterers showed as much deference to Theodore as they did respect to him. We know what was the fate of this new Bank. The downfall of the inventor of this financial system, which ruined France, left the Baron de Neuhorf without resources. He immediately followed the example of his companion in misfortunes, and hurried out of Paris.

After this catastrophe, which precipitated him from the height of prosperity into the depths of misery, Theodore, for a moment, hesitated on his plans respecting the future. Trusting to his good fortune, he travelled over all the principal countries in Europe, everywhere victimising the credulous, and in every town leaving numerous creditors behind him. He wandered about, in this way, for many years, in vain expecting some change in his fortunes. Already he might have been induced to look upon his hopes of ambition as mere dreams and illusions, when, thanks to an intrigue, in which several ladies of the court of Charles VI. were concerned, he obtained from this sovereign a diplomatic mission, and was sent to Florence clothed in the character and dignity of resident Delegate.

Any other man but the Baron de Neuhorf would have found in such a position all that his ambition could desire; but here again he was not satisfied. Impelled either by a secret presentiment of a more brilliant future, or the slave of a sickle and restless mind, he gave up his place of Delegate, and returning to his former erratic life, began to travel over Italy. In this manner he reached Genoa, where he planned out the boldest and most extraordinary enterprise of his whole life.

There happened to be at that time at Genoa a Corsican monk, Raphaeli by name, whom chance threw in Theodore's way. He entered into conversation with this monk on the condition of that island, which was then groaning under the oppressive yoke of the Genoese, and appeared to feel deep commiseration for the sufferings of its inhabitants. Rejoiced at finding a man who sympathised so sincerely with him in his country's calamities, the monk began to entertain a high opinion of the Baron, and proposed to bring him in communication with some Corsicans, who lived concealed in the neighbourhood of the town. Theodore gladly accepted his proposal, and had several long conferences with these proscribed men, many of whom possessed considerable influence in the island. Like most men of enterprising character, Theodore was gifted with a natural and persuasive eloquence. Deficient in real genius, but endowed with a certain amount of esprit, he possessed the talent of pleasing and sufficient skill to set such an enterprise on foot, although he might want perseverance and moral courage to support it. He had no difficulty in securing the confidence of his new friends. He showed them the necessity of forming a government sufficiently powerful to struggle with advantage against the supremacy of Genoa: he purposely exaggerated the forces, resources, and means, which nature had placed at their disposal, and how easy it would be, with an experienced commander at their head, to drive the Genoese out of the island. At the same time he spoke of his influence at the different courts of Europe, the considerable interest he possessed with their respective sovereigns, and finished by declaring that his talents, experience, and devotion to their cause, pointed him out as the man whom they required to assist them in regaining their independence. Corsicans are by nature enthusiasts, and consequently easily persuaded. Theodore's confident manner, the weight which his words seemed to carry, had already half captivated his hearers; but when some of their countrymen, who had been imprisoned in the fortress of Savona, were set at liberty, according to a promise Theodore had made of interceding for them, they were fully convinced of his sincerity. They were now eager to secure the services of a man whom they considered in the light of a powerful seigneur and protector, and assured him that their country would, through their influence, present him with the supreme power. Theodore, after having thanked them for this mark of their confidence, urged them to return as soon as they possibly could to Corsica and prepare the people for his arrival; whilst he would, in the meantime, repair to the different courts of Europe, where his interest would be of use to them in obtaining those succours which they required, and without which they would be unable to drive the Genoese out of the island.

At the time he was thus representing himself to the Corsicans as all-powerful, Theodore was ignorant of the means he would be obliged to adopt for the performance of these promises; but he trusted to his mind, fertile in expedients, to bring him out of his difficulties. Giving himself out as an envoy from Corsica, he visited the principal capitals of Europe, seeking to enlist the sympathies of several monarchs in the misfortunes of that island and in his own. But everywhere his solicitations remained unheard, and his exertions were of no avail. At last he repaired to Constantinople, where his demands were more favourably listened to; the Grand-Signior gave him some money and appeared disposed to assist him in his plans, but the delay which attended the proceedings of the Turkish government was too much for his patience: he suddenly left Constantinople, and went and offered to the Bey of Tunis the *suzeraineté*¹ of Corsica, if he would only give him a vessel of ten guns, four thousand muskets, three hundred pistols, a thousand sequins and a few provisions. What were the means Theodore employed to ensure the success of this important negotiation? and how did he prevail upon the government of Tunis to embark in an enterprise of such political importance? This remains a secret. We only know, that the Bey acceded to all his demands, and in a few weeks the vessel was ready. Theodore then embarked, and, under the protection of the English flag, sailed to Leghorn. He there sold the vessel, the proceeds of which he pocketed, and then wrote off to his Corsican friends to inform them that he was ready to assist them in their great undertaking, the recovery of their freedom.

Three years had elapsed since Theodore had quitted Genoa. The Corsicans had expected him for a long time, but hearing nothing of him, had at last resolved to shake off their yoke without his assistance. Placing the island under the protection of the Virgin Mary, they had named Paoli and Giafferi generallissimos, as we have stated above. The letters which came from Theodore, announcing to them that he had at his disposal immense treasures, and was secretly assisted by several foreign powers, spread enthusiasm over the island. He was entreated to hasten his arrival, and was assured, as a recompense for his services, that the Corsicans would invest him with the supreme power.

Theodore, accompanied by an escort of only five or six persons, arrived in the port of Aleria, on the 15th March, 1736, on board a merchant vessel. The principal inhabitants of the island had come forth to meet him; he was conducted in state to the Cervonian palace at Campoloro. Knowing how fond the common people are of extraordinary things, he had coiffed his head with a magnificent turban, glittering with gold and precious stones, and had put on a Greek costume, of a scarlet colour, lined with ermine; his companions were also accoutred in as bizarre a manner. As soon as he set his foot on shore, he threw amongst the crowd a handful of sequins. In order to appear more worthy of the regal dignity, Theodore had added to his name a long string of titles,—he gave himself out as Peer of France, Grandee of Spain, Prince of the Church, and Baron of England. Every morning during the first few days after his arrival couriers were seen coming from Leghorn, bearing fictitious despatches from various European and African courts.

This pomp, added to the dignified manner he had assumed, the praises his old friends of Genoa spread concerning his merit, the influence he boasted to possess with several sovereigns of Europe, and his supposed wealth, imposed on the credulity of the inhabitants. The baron was proclaimed king, under the name of Theodore I., at a general assembly of the nation, which took place at Alcain, on the 15th April, 1736. A fundamental law was presented to Theodore, which constituted Corsica a monarchy, and vested the crown in the person of his heirs, male or female, for ever. After having taken the customary oath, he was crowned a few days afterwards in the Church des Récollets de Tavagna.

When once seated on the throne, Theodore surrounded his person with all the grandeur of royalty,—created nobles, organised a body-guard, consisting of four hundred soldiers, appointed secretaries of state, and instituted an order of knighthood under the appellation of Ordre de la Délivrance, the insignia of which he bestowed on the principal families of the island.

Theodore's extraordinary life can be divided into two distinct parts: if we have hitherto followed him since his first appearance in the world as page to the Duchess of Orleans, gradually rising, in the midst of the many vicissitudes inherent in a life of intrigues, to the highest honours, and finally to the throne, we shall presently see him, step by step, sinking down from his pinnacle of greatness, and ending his days in obscurity and want.

The king-baron did not, in the mean time, forget that he had promised the Corsicans the freedom of their island. The enthusiasm which had arisen at his arrival, and which had increased by the dazzling display of magnificence that surrounded his person, enabled him to raise a large army. He put himself at their head, attacked the Genoese, and in a few days confined them to their maritime places. But he could not, unfortunately, follow up his first success. Destitute of the means necessary for the siege of well-defended towns, he was obliged to stop before their walls. The Genoese, in the mean while, having received reinforcements, immediately assumed the offensive, and soon drove him back beyond the mountains. The people began to murmur: their complaints increased, when the king, who had in a short time expended all his money, was obliged to make an avowal of his penury. On the other hand, the clergy had taken umbrage at his liberal views on religion, and still more so at his loose morals. Gradually dissatisfaction succeeded to the recent enthusiasm, and pervaded the whole nation.

(1) The power attached to a lord-paramount's right of possession.

An event which took place about this time, showed Theodore how altered the feelings of the people were towards him. As he was walking one morning, in the neighbourhood of his palace, the king met a young peasant girl, whose beauty completely captivated him. He had frequent interviews with her, and described his passion in such eloquent language, that the poor girl would have yielded, had not her brother, a soldier in the king's body-guard, discovered the intrigue. He went to his sister, reproached her with wishing to dishonour his name, threatened to kill her if she again met Theodore, and, by way of a lecture, gave her a sound beating. The king was at dinner with his generals when he was informed of the cruel treatment the girl had received: he ordered the soldier to be brought before him, and severely rebuked him for his conduct. The soldier replied to the king in an insolent manner. Theodore, enraged, ordered him to be hanged at the window of the room in which they were sitting, but observing the hesitation which followed his order, rose from the table to execute it himself. The soldier seized hold of a chair, and, brandishing it above his head, threatened to knock the king down if he touched him. The generals interposed between the two, and ordered the soldier to be put under arrest, but he called out to his comrades for assistance, and was immediately rescued by them. The palace was filled with clamours, and the royal body-guard seemed disposed to rise against their king. Theodore jumped out of a window, and concealed himself till the tumult was over.

This scene, added to several others of a similar nature, proved to the king that he had lost the affection of his subjects. Complaints from all quarters arose; he was reproached for not having fulfilled the promises he had made to the nation—his subjects no longer obeyed him—insolent and daring language was held in his presence. Theodore began to entertain apprehensions for the safety of his person, and determined, for a time, to withdraw himself from the honours and dangers of his exalted position. He convoked deputies from the several districts, and informed them that he was about to leave Corsica, to seek those succours which had been promised to him, but which were not forthcoming; and entrusted the government of the island, during his absence, to them. Then, without waiting for their reply, he embarked the same day on board an Italian vessel, disguised as an abbé, in order to escape recognition, and thus left the island. Eight months had scarcely elapsed since Theodore's coronation.

This compulsory flight threw the Baron de Neuhorf into the greatest difficulties, and it turned out, as we shall presently see, prejudicial to the liberty of his person. Recognised in all the principal towns of Europe, it was a difficult matter for him to make fresh dupes, or to escape from the clutches of his numerous creditors. After having visited Rome, Turin, and Paris, in which last place he was threatened by the police with imprisonment in Fort l'Evêque, he fixed upon the unfortunate plan of proceeding to Amsterdam, where he owed considerable sums of money. The very day of his arrival, his creditors had him arrested and thrown into prison.

To pass from a palace to a prison was a dreadful change, and one calculated to intimidate even the stoutest heart. But to Theodore, so unexpected a reverse of fortune was nothing. Trusting to his tutelary genius, he only bethought himself of the means of extricating himself out of his difficulties, nor was it long before an opportunity presented itself. Theodore had for a companion a man condemned for usury, whom a Jew, a wealthy merchant of Amsterdam, often visited. He became acquainted with the Israelite; he described to him in the most heart-rending terms his position—purposely expatiated on the affection his subjects bore to him—set all the powers of his cunning mind at work, to excite the merchant's cupidity, (which Theodore's sagacity told him was the Jew's vulnerable point,) and promised, if he would assist him in recovering his kingdom, to abandon to him the trade-monopoly of the whole island. The credulous Jew fell into the snare; he paid Theodore's creditors, placed at his disposal five millions of francs, two ships freighted with arms and ammunition, and a frigate of war.

Theodore comes out of prison, more elated than ever; he embarks on board the frigate, repairs to Algiers and Tunis, from which two governments he again succeeds in obtaining more money, rejoins his two transports at Leghorn, and arrives in Corsica about the middle of September, 1737. At the news of his arrival, some of his partisans came forth to meet him. But the appearance of the French troops, which, under the command of the Comte de Boissieu, were occupying the island, intimidated the king. He thought it prudent not to disembark, but set sail for the town of Ajaccio, whither he intended to attack by sea. A violent tempest arose before he could reach his destination; the ship, dismasted, was obliged to seek shelter in the Bay of Naples. Theodore landed and repaired to the house of the Consul of the States-General. He had scarcely arrived there, before the governor of that city had him arrested and imprisoned at Gaeta. He did not, however, remain there long—but his star was rapidly sinking, and fortune, wearied of the favours she had bestowed, no longer smiled on her protégé. He had the mortification to learn that his frigate had been condemned, and his two transports captured. It was impossible for him to return to Corsica. Even then his courage does not fail him; he writes to the Jews of Amsterdam, to inform them of his losses, and the necessity of fresh succours, but his letters remain unanswered; he then goes to London, and tries by intriguing to get the ministry to assist him in his plans of recovering his throne. The English Government, dissatisfied with the Genoese, secretly seconded Theodore's projects, with a view of throwing difficulties in the way of that republic. The following year, the dethroned monarch landed on the island of Rousse, and hastened to apprise the Corsicans of his arrival, at the same time publicly announcing that he was supported by England; which appeared credible enough, he having under his command two English men-of-war. Nevertheless, his promises were not listened to, nor were his proposals accepted.

Theodore returned to London, where a last misfortune awaited him. His creditors served him in the same manner as he had been treated in Holland. He remained in prison several years. Through the interest of the prime minister, Horace Walpole, a subscription was raised in his favour, which enabled him in part to satisfy his creditors, and as a security for the rest of his debts he abandoned to them his kingdom. Through the generosity of his kind protector he was able to live in a quiet way in the neighbourhood of London. Whether the infirmities of old age were fast creeping on him, or that his many reverses had broken his courageous spirit, or that he could no longer impose on people, Theodore, from that time, was no more heard of. He died in 1746, aged 60 years, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Anne's, Westminster. Voltaire says, that Walpole caused a simple monument, with this inscription, to be erected to his memory:

"Fortune gave him a throne, but denied him bread."

But the epitaph, still legible on his tomb, is as follows:—

"Near this spot is buried Theodore, king of Corsica, who died in this parish, the 11th Oct. 1746, after he had left the King's Bench, a prison erected for insolvent debtors, and after having surrendered his kingdom to his creditors as a security for his debts."

THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY.¹

If the age of poetry has departed, the age of fiction is with us, in all its strength and vigour. "Blackwood," and "The Dublin University Magazine," give proof, in every number, of the power increasing, not decaying, in our Tale writers. The author of "Merkland" is quite a modern Miss Ferrier; "Currier Bell" took the world by storm; and Eliot Warburton, who, but a few nights ago, passed away amid the awful strife of fire and water, decked truth with such magic fiction, that both became incorporated on his living page: there are the author of "Mary Barton" and the author of "Two Old Men's Tales;" the former, so true to the phases of life she has observed; the latter, so unrivalled in her wealth of thought and power of expression. There are Frederika Bremer, Mrs. Norton, Mrs. Howitt—numbers, both here and in our sister lands, whom we could name, who give to the world fiction of the highest and purest kind; but with them, at present, we have nothing more to do, than to congratulate ourselves and the public, that even if one or two great prose craftsmen, swept into the grave by death, remain unreplaced, there is a greater diffusion of talent, particularly amongst women, than has been known in England previous to this present time.

It seems to us but as yesterday—though it must be ten or eleven years since we were shown some sweet and gentle poetry, by a very young lady, who, though she may have looked like a poet, was as retiring and quiet as any young lady of fourteen ought to be.

We were not so well pleased with the poetry, as with the author. She has since written a charming little story called, "How to win Love;" and we could not help smiling at the title. She was mistress of the art in childhood; to predict success in her case, as a prose writer, was a safe prophecy. She was silent and observing. She thought, read, and compared, and felt deeply; her spirit was calmly brave; she had an intense love of art, and thirsted for knowledge; her enthusiasm was great and sincere. Our only fear was, that she might rush into print too soon. Her wings grew in strength, and she tried them—in short flights at first, and then soared into a three-volume novel, called "Olive," followed, in due time, by "The Ogilvies;" and this Christmas, she has given to the world one of the most exquisite fairy tales that was ever written, called "Alice Learmont," and a fine novel, "The Head of the Family."

We will not detail the plot; this we consider neither fair to the author, nor to the publishers.

But we warn our readers not to mind the occasional slowness of the first two volumes (which might have been crushed into one with advantage to the reader and to the plot); nor must they feel bewildered by the number of characters introduced so suddenly, evidently for the purpose of testing the metal of "The Head of the Family," but which are perplexing to the reader. On must the reader go, to the threshold of the third volume: and once having passed its portal, there will he remain until the end, without the desire or power to escape. This third volume atones for the tediousness and perplexity of the commencement, as perhaps no third volume ever atoned before, by its absorbing interest, its noble carriage, its fine development of character, its poetic justice, and its high and holy sentiments—sentiments, not drawn out, or put in sermon-out-of-place fashion, but founded on the principles and fidelity of a long and pure life; self-denying, and of good repute before God and man.

The whole of this finely-arranged volume is of such equal merit, that it is no easy matter to find an extract of detached interest. There is one character, woven into the thread of the narrative—seen dimly at first, but coming out gradually and naturally into strong light—which is as fine in fiction as Rembrandt was in painting,—the actress, named, perhaps, from feelings inspired by a great foreign tragedian, Rachel. This woman was known to "The Head of the Family" in her youth, before the commencement of her influence over the public. Ninian Graeme (such is the uncomfortable name of the "Head" and the hero of the story) has a beloved younger brother, a youth of genius, and heir to its waywardness and weakness, who, awakened by the talent of Rachel into dramatic fervour, produces a successful drama. Perils, however, surround the boy, who, like Chatterton, seems doomed to perish in his prime, when his elder brother, whose character is one of the noblest and best sustained in modern fiction, seeks and finds him in London, and the scene we extract ensues. He has found "Edmund" as a successful dramatist, surrounded by men, older men, clever men, but men incapable of understanding the enthusiasm or honour which still lingered round the boy's heart. "Edmund" owed money to a certain Lyonell, who had insulted Rachel by an offer of "love without marriage." He burns to pay his debt and win revenge: his patient, loving brother, knowing this, watches for him outside "the stores."

(1) "The Head of the Family." By the Author of "Olive," and "The Ogilvies." Chapman & Hall.

"He followed. It was late; the theatres had disengaged their last relics of audience, and the streets were growing quiet and deserted. From lamp to lamp Ninian easily traced that tall, thin, boyish figure, with the long, light-brown curls—the same vision which Lindsay used to watch so proudly, as day by day it passed up the avenue at The Gowans.—Poor Lindsay! How foolish women are!"

"Edmund turned along Regent-street. All the shops and houses were shut up, except that through some second-floor windows might be seen lights—generally two high lamps, visible through the thin blinds. There were no open doors visible, but these lamps were sufficient beacon to those who knew the mysteries of the place."

"Ninian watched his brother approach one of these—pass it—return again, and examine more closely. Then Edmund went to the next street-lamp, took out his purse, and seemed to be reckoning its contents. At last, so quickly that Mr. Graeme hardly perceived how he entered, the youth disappeared into the house."

"It was one of those places—rightly named 'hells'—a London gambling-house."

"Ninian was uncertain what to do. To follow and command the boy home, was impossible; Edmund was of age, and his brother had no legal right over him. Even the thought of being watched might drive him to desperation. But to leave him was out of the question. Ninian resolved to wait, if it were the whole night, until he had seen him quit the house."

"He did so before very long, rushing out half-maddened—not with ruin, but success. He staggered into the street, recklessly holding a handful of bank-notes, gazing at them with eyes that seemed positively to feast on the sight. So occupied was he, that he never looked up until he ran against some one standing in the street."

"What are you doing here, Edmund?"

"The cold, clear voice was his brother's—the arm, stern and strong, that linked itself in his, was his brother's also. Edmund stood speechless."

"They walked on a few paces, Ninian keeping firm hold,—and then the boy rebelled."

"What is this for? Have you been dogging my heels? Let me go, I say."

"Ninian let him go."

"Edmund stopped a moment, hardly comprehending where he was, and what he had intended to do. Then his mind seemed to grow clearer. Secretly he clutched the money in his hand, and assuming an unconcerned air, said, 'Good night, brother; this is my way.'

"And mine too," added the other, quietly."

"Do you mean to follow me? Am I to be watched about like a child? Do it at your peril!" And the frantic boy shook his clenched fist in his brother's face."

"Edmund! Somehow, at the tone of that voice, perfectly self-possessed—neither haughty nor angry—the passionate hand dropped down rebuked."

"What do you want with me, brother? Make haste, and let me go; I have an engagement to-night."

"Where?"

"I shall not tell you."

"I will tell you, then. You have been gaming, in order to win the money you owe Mr. Lyonell. You are now going to find him—pay him—then seek a quarrel with him, and have either a duel to-morrow morning or a street row to-night."

"Edmund drew back thoroughly confounded. In his face was the confession of all which Ninian's penetration had lighted upon as the truth."

"But," the other continued, "I, being a good deal older, and a little wiser than you, think this proceeding would not be to my brother's credit, or that of our family. Therefore I will prevent it if I can."

"Edmund—gentle by nature, and unaccustomed to contend, especially with his elder brother—seemed desirous, not of warfare, but escape. He tried to cross the street, but the fumes of wine in his brain were too much for him."

"Ninian laid on his shoulder a firm hand. 'Come home, my boy—come home.'

"Quiet, even gentle, as the manner was, it contained something of command against which the weak Edmund struggled in vain. He suffered his brother to take his arm, and walk with him down the street towards home."

"After a while, his frantic purpose seemed to dawn upon him again. 'Brother!—Ninian!—I must go,' entreated he. 'I will do no harm. I only want to pay the fellow what I owe, and tell him he is a villain. I'll not fight—if you don't wish it. Only let me give him the money.'

"Where is it?"

"Here, in my hand! I won it all—luck was with me. Never was there such a run of cards. Ha! ha!"

"Have you been often to that place?"

"Come now, don't be pumping me," stammered Edmund, in half-intoxicated cajoling. "Be a good fellow, can't you? It is a very respectable place, and does no harm."

"And you won the whole sum to-night? You have it in your hand there!"

"Yes, every pound. All right—count it! Hurra! Hazard's the king of all games." And he flourished the notes triumphantly."

"Ninian took them out of his hand—spread them out one over the other, doubled them, and before the youth could resist, tore them once—twice—thrice—until they were converted into the smallest fragments. Then he threw them into the street, carelessly, as if they had been a handful of dust."

"What are you doing?" cried Edmund, furiously."

"Just what I would always do with stolen property."

"Do you dare to call mine stolen? Am I a thief?"

"Every gambler is, for the time being—I will show you that clearly to-morrow. Now, come home."

"His stern calmness, his unflinching will, positively appalled the boy. Unresisting, Edmund suffered himself to be led home. Arrived there, all his remaining faculties became numbed in the stupor of intemperance and the exhaustion of spent fury. The whole night, Ninian, fearing to leave him, remained by the poor lad's bed—side. Never had he kept such a vigil since the night his father died. Little he then thought that the next watch would be beside his dead father's ruined son. Ruined!—no! Edmund, the child of such pride and tenderness, should not be ruined. That tenderness must win him back still—or else, abjuring it, his elder brother must assume a father's place, and hold the rein with a tight hand. Ninian thought he could if need be make his brotherly heart as hard as adamant; but he would try gentle means first. Only, in some way or other, the boy must be saved.

"The first thing was to shield him from that disgrace which in a mind like his was sure to produce utter desperation. Therefore he managed so that even Katie knew not the whole extent of his brother's shame. He sat alone by the boy's bedside; until towards morning Edmund, being a little recovered, fell into a sound sleep. Then Ninian went to his own room, lay down for an hour, rose, and breakfasted—lest by his look Tinie should suspect anything wrong. When late in the forenoon Edmund awoke, he found his brother sitting beside him. Their eyes met—one was cold, the other defiant. 'Are you better?'

"'Nothing was wrong with me. What are you here for?'

"'Ninian made no answer.

"'I will not be watched in this manner. Leave me; I want to dress and go out.'

"'It would be better not, I think—after last night.'

"'What of last night? But in any case, it was no affair of yours.'

"'None—except that I object to see any young man, much less my own brother, ruined—if I can help it.'

"'Well, suppose I do go to ruin—or to the devil, what will it signify? Who cares?'

"'I care.'

"'And who will prevent me?'

"'I will.'

"The boy started up in bed with passionate violence. 'Dare you?—But his dizzy, hot, drink-oppressed brain was too strong for his will—he sank back upon his pillow with a groan.

"'Keep quiet, Edmund! You must, or God knows what may happen to you.' And with a care almost womanly, he bound a wet cloth round the poor lad's burning head. 'Are you easier now?'

"'Don't speak to me—let me alone. I wish I were dead! That's the only thing for such a miserable wretch as I.'

"'Not quite; when you have your brother and Lindsay.'

"Edmund clasped his hands over his wan face, and hid it on the pillow. He did not speak another word for many minutes. Ninian asked him softly 'if he were asleep?'

"'No! It would be better if I were. It would be a blessing if I never woke again. You would think so, and Lindsay too. But I don't care—whatever becomes of me, I don't care!'

"He tried to assume a daring indifference; but in vain. Physical prostration, and the natural gentleness and irresolution of his character, overcame him. A prodigal he might be, but nothing would ever make Edmund a hardened sinner. 'My boy, whether you care or not, we care,' said Ninian, kindly. 'But I will talk to you another time. Now, try to rise, and come and take a walk with me. It is a lovely morning.'

"'I hate it!—I hate the light!—I hate everything!'

"'Nay, that is wild talking. You must be reasonable. Only get a little better, and in a few days you shall come back with me to Scotland.'

"'No—no. Your quiet life at home would drive me mad! Besides, I must stay here, and go on with my old ways. I can't get free.'

"'You must get free—I will help you. Have confidence in your brother. Remember,' and Ninian smiled sorrowfully, 'I was a young man myself once.'

"Slowly, imperceptibly, so that they seemed less confessions than exclamations of remorse and pain, the elder brother won from the younger a story which it is needless to repeat here. Enough,—that it had been the story of thousands cast into the whirlpool of life, adding to all the passions of youth that keen susceptibility to every form of pleasurable sensation, which is the peculiar characteristic of genius. Heaven have mercy on such! for Heaven only knows with how much they have to struggle. And all honour be unto the noble few—not those who were never tempted, but those who, being tempted, have come out from the warfare victorious!

"Edmund's heart, once opened, poured itself out unrestrained. The elder brother listened, without betraying any gesture of contempt or rebuke, to this sorrowful revelation of extravagance, intemperance, degrading companionships, and unholy loves; over the long catalogue of which rosted the perpetual shade of the one misery of which Edmund did not speak, though probably it was the origin of all—his hopeless passion for Rachel.

"'Now,' said the young man at last, with a bitter laugh—'now you see the consequence of my ambitious notions. Such is the end of "the Genius of the Family!"'

"'Not the end—God forbid!'

"'He cannot—or He will not,' was the reckless answer. 'This life is slowly killing me. Look here!' and he held up his hand, thin, withered, and shaking like that of an old man. 'You might "almost see through it," as people say. No—no; a year or two more will finish me, and the sooner the better.'

"Perhaps Ninian judged at their true value these ravings, always the resource of miserable youth. He only said, 'We will not talk of the future, my dear boy. The question is, what must be done at present? Again I would advise,'—he laid a gentle stress on the word—'that you go home with me for a time.'

"'And I say again, I cannot!'

"'Why not?'

"'First, because I will not. Secondly—if you want the plain common sense of the matter—I dare not. Look in that desk, and you'll find three hundred pounds' worth of good reasons why Edmund Græme, just come of age, should, if he left London, be caught and sent to prison as a runaway debtor. There!—that would be a credit to the family—would it not?'

"Ninian had not yet considered this difficulty. He looked very grave. Edmund watched closely his elder brother's face; it seemed to bring back to his variable mind old times, far more innocent and happy than these.

"'I wish,' he sighed—'I almost wish I could go back to The Gowans.'

"Ninian made no answer—he was in deep thought. At last he said: 'Edmund, give me the key of your desk. You would not show me only half-confidence, would you?'

"Edmund objected at first, then answered despondently: 'Do as you like. Whatever you find out, it's no matter to a poor half-dead fellow like me. I shall not trouble you long.'

"Mr. Græme unlocked the desk, and passing over a farrago of papers—doubtless containing many a revelation of the poor youth's history—confined himself to the business secrets,—the numerous unpaid debts; that one to Mr. Lyonell, which the world's ironical speech would entitle 'a debt of honour,'—being at the head of the list. It was a list long enough to drag the young author down into a hopeless slough of despond. The like has happened to many another,—forced to work his brains with a perpetual millstone of debt around his neck, knowing that by nothing except dishonesty can he free himself from the burden.

"Ninian looked over the bills; tied them up again in his business-like way, without any comment whatever. Edmund was silent too, either in sullen despondency, or else, exhausted and half-stupified, he had fallen into a doze. The elder brother moved away, and stood in the clear light by the half-open window, which jutted out on the leads. There was a long box of mignonette, over which the pert London sparrows came hopping and twittering. A thought,—not inconsequent, nor irreverent,—flitted across Ninian's mind, of those who were once bade to 'fear not,' being 'of more value than many sparrows.'

"It touched nearly upon a plan he had in view. The sum laid up, as he deemed, for his marriage, and then vainly intended to be sacrificed for the good of Hope's father, was of course in his possession still. The first pain being conquered, he had placed it by securely; from the feeling that now, weakened as his health was, he had no certainty for the future. He found a comfort in thinking, that did anything happen, he had at least something to keep him for a time from positive dependence on the children he had brought up. It was the only trace of pride, the only thought of self, that dwelt in the breast of the elder brother.

"This sum would be just sufficient to shield Edmund from the results of his sad career. Freed from debt—unshamed before the world—placed for a while out of reach of temptation—the young man might yet be saved. Nay, he must be saved—poor Lindsay's boy!

"Ninian stood—the bright light from the attic-window showing every line in his worn face, every white thread—there were but too many—in his hair. But he looked at peace, even glad. Quickly in his own mind he portioned out this money of love's heaping, of which every coin had been laid together with a quivering of the heart.—Thus often we gather up treasures, and find them end as sacrifices; but the sacrifice is the holier after all.

"Mr. Græme went up to his brother once more. 'Are you awake, Edmund?'

"'Ay!'

"'You had better rise now. Leave me these.' He glanced at the bundle of bills he held. 'You cannot pay them, so I will. But I think it right to tell you that I do so at a great sacrifice—of which, knowing our circumstances, you must yourself be aware. Nevertheless, I do it with full trust that the same will not happen again, and that for the future I will have no need to blush for my brother Edmund.'

"His voice, firm and grave as it was, trembled at the close. He held out his hand to the poor prodigal;—Edmund sprang up in bed.

"'You don't mean this? It is impossible! You cannot do it—or if you could, I would not suffer it.'

"'You must! Some day, when you are a great author, and I an old man—we will have our reckoning.'

"Edmund looked up into the face that wore a kind though serious smile. 'Oh, Ninian—oh, my brother!' he cried, and grasping the outstretched hand, sobbed over it like a child."

In a dedication, somewhat overstrained, the Author of "The Head of the Family" states, that probably this may be the last novel she will write for some time. We hope it may be so—repose is necessary, both for health and fame, after such an effort, and what follows must be superior to the present, or else her reputation must suffer.

In this, her "last novel" for the present, Miss Mulock has almost proved she is all, that one at least, who knew her well, believed she might be "hereafter." She has power to be more than that "all;" but she must rest. She can afford to do so now, and we regard her too highly to endure that she should peril her reputation by writing a single hasty or unconsidered sentence, or weaken her noble conceptions, by adding the water of mere words, or make-weight characters, for the sake of the mystic "Three Volumes," so long the object of the Publishers' idolatry.

CHEPSTOW CASTLE AND BRIDGE.

WHOEVER of the thousands that at certain periods of the year seek health and recreation amid the varied beauties of Old England, has failed to visit the banks of the Wye, will have omitted from his tour one of the most lovely and picturesque localities our country possesses. There is not a mile of its tortuous course, from near the foot of "huge Plinlimmon" to its junction with the Severn, that is not marked by the most striking and beautiful features of natural scenery. Ever varying in its aspect from the shifting of the foreground and screen-like sides, the pictures, like the forms in a kaleidoscope, assume different shapes and colours, though composed of the same materials: thus the ruins of a castle, the spire of a church, hamlets half hidden among lofty trees, masses of rocks—sometimes high and bare, at other times low and covered with herbage—are seen, now on the right-hand of the traveller, and now on his left, alternately forming the fore or back ground of the picture in view. Occasionally the river runs in a continuous line for a considerable length between overhanging rocks, then sweeps along, in a serpentine direction, between rich slopes and flowery meadows; then again it is half concealed by the shadows of the thick mounds, and once more it is glittering with the brightness of a summer's sun. The broadest and the finest parts of the Wye are those separating the counties of Gloucestershire and Monmouthshire; and the most expansive and picturesque view is obtained from the distant high ground overlooking the junction of it with the Severn.

The two most celebrated relics of antiquity standing on the banks of the Wye, are Chepstow Castle and Tintern Abbey: with the former of these we have alone to do at present. We confess to have almost a childish reverence for all such mementos of past ages; and though there may be nothing left but a few grey stones, or at best a few yards of wall, with no other decoration than the ivy that clings to them, they commend themselves to our thoughts as landmarks of departed time, speaking silently but impressively of men and deeds that make up a nation's history. But we cannot now find space for moralizing.

Chepstow Castle, of which an engraving is here presented, is of the period of the Conquest; a portion of it was erected by William Fitz-Osborn, created Earl of Hereford by the Conqueror, and who, for the distinguished services rendered at the Battle of Hastings, had large territories conferred upon him, and was also appointed Justiciary for the northern part of the kingdom, and Marshal of England jointly with Roger de Montgomery. The castle subsequently came into the possession of the Earls of Clare, from whom it descended to the families of the Plantagenets, the Herberts, and the Somersets. We believe it to be still in the hands of a branch of the last-mentioned noble family. There is little or no record of its history during the feudal times, but during the Civil War it became the object of many well-contested assaults, and was repeatedly taken and retaken by the contending parties; its possession being considered of vast importance, from the commanding position it held over the navigation of the river, and the influence it gave to the possessors with respect to the surrounding locality. The most interesting portion of the building as it now stands, from historical association, is a round tower at the south-east angle of the first court, in which, at the Restoration, Henry Marten, one of the regicides of Charles I., was confined for thirty years; not, as was long supposed, in a wretched dreary dungeon, but in a suite of apartments of considerable dimensions, sufficiently lighted, airy, and with fire-places. Moreover, he had his family residing with him, and his own domestic servants. Marten was a determined republican, and to the day of his death expressed the most intense hatred of kingly government. Southey—it is presumed, before he had himself imbibed the extreme royalist principles by which he became distinguished—laments the fate of the Roundhead captive in one of his poems:—

"For thirty years, secluded from mankind,
Here Marten linger'd. Often have these walls
Echoed his footsteps, as with even tread
He paced around his prison. Not to him,
Did Nature's fair varieties exist.
He never saw the sun's delightful beams,
Save when through yew high bars he pour'd a sad,
A broken splendour."

But although, as previously remarked, the castle is referred to the Norman period, it is not to be supposed that the immense pile of ruins now standing is of so ancient a date; very little of the original edifice is extant, the remainder being the work of subsequent eras. The grand entrance on the east displays a fine specimen of the Early Norman style, and consists of a circular arch between two round towers, leading into the first court, where the grand hall, kitchen, and other apartments were situated; some of the latter are still inhabited by a family who have the lease of the premises. A gate opens by the side of a round tower into the second court, now laid out as a garden; another into a third area, in which stands the roofless chapel; this has pointed windows, but the walls being lightened by tiers of semicircular arches has induced the belief that the edifice belongs to an earlier period than it actually does. At the south-eastern extremity of the third court, a winding staircase leads to the battlements; and formerly, a communication existed between this court and a fourth, which is now entered by a sally-port.

The engraving of this exceedingly picturesque building shows that one side of it rises perpendicularly from the water's edge; a portion, however, of what seems to be wall is, in fact, the natural rock, which, in some places, is so covered with pendant foliage as to be altogether invisible. A little beyond the castle is seen an insignificant part of the town of Chepstow, with its bridge: half of the latter belongs to the county of Monmouthshire, and the other half to that of Gloucestershire; the central pier, of massive stone, separates the two counties. Chepstow is said to have been of Roman origin, and there are numerous traces of encampments in the vicinity of the town, which appear to favour the supposition; but the name seems rather to imply a Saxon origin.

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.

BY JANE K. WINNARD.

CHAPTER XI.

A MINGLED WEB.

No one knew what to think, when so many letters addressed to persons of the name of Underwood, were pocketed in this way. They knew that other Underwoods were visiting Sir Ralph Grey, but it entered into no one's mind, that the man before them was the David Underwood, and their own brother. It was a strange stupidity. A quarter of an hour elapsed. The presence of the stranger threw a restraint over the family party; and no one during that time spoke much, or in an ordinary tone. At length, however, Nanny Post, having finished her bread and cheese, rose from the window-ledge on which she had been sitting. Nanny's organ of veneration was of the smallest; and without any respect of persons, she spoke as follows:

"Well, ladies and gentlemen, good morning. I hope there's nothing amiss with the master. Of course, if you say it, Miss Underwood, he is at home; but I heard say, there was good reason why he should go to Torrington Hall late last night—too late to come back. All I know is, my Jemmy saw him going there. He was coming home from Torrington fair at three o'clock in the morning, and he saw the master walking away near the Black Scur Wood. Leastways, if it was not the master his own self, it must have been his feteh."

"Nanny," said Mark, "I thought you were a wiser woman than to believe in fetehes, or in what a man says he saw, coming from a fair, at three o'clock in the morning."

"Well now, there's wisdom in your words, Mr. Mark, I will say that for you. As to fetehes, I don't believe in them, not I; nor any such old woman's nonsense! And if your father did sleep at home last night, he couldn't be walking by the wood, that's certain. Yet Jemmy vows he was there; and Jemmy was tolerably sober."

"Nanny," said Mr. Bang, "if you are in the habit of stopping to have a meal and a gossip at every house in your rounds, I don't think the Government gets its business done as quickly as it might, in Milford. Have you no other letters to deliver?"

"There you are again, sir; sharp as a needle! Always looking out for abuses and such like! What a radical you are! But you're a little too sharp this time. I've delivered all the letters, as it happens. Remember, I never stop either for a meal or a gossip at your house. Good morning, ladies and gentlemen."

Martha stepped out into the garden after the little woman, as she was trotting to the gate, and muttering ungentle words against Mr. Bang between her teeth.

"He! a pretty thing for Milford indeed, if he is to have the Grange! A meddling, prying body! Can't let a poor post-woman rest a moment. He's just fit for a nigger-driver over among them French. And that Strange Gentleman, with the beard, ain't no better. They're all in a league with Torrington Hall, to ruin Mr. Underwood, I'm sure. I can see as far into a millstone as most. Eh? Do what, Miss Underwood? No. I've gone my rounds for to-day. A packet for Miss Grey. That's another thing! Of course, I take that or anything else for her. Who am I to say it came from?"

"Thank you, Nanny. Just say that I found it on my father's study table. He is not well this morning, or he would have sent it himself, I dare say. Perhaps he would be vexed if it were neglected, as he is so very particular about letters and parcels."

"So he should be, Miss, so he should be. I'll take care she has it this morning, though I do stop at every house in my rounds to have a meal and a gossip!"

"Oh Nanny, you must not mind what Mr. Bang says; he only said it to tease you."

"Did he! I'll see if I can't find something to say that will tease him. Come up, Bob."

"Good morning, Nanny. Perhaps you don't know Mr. Bang and my brother have been killing rats in the field by your cottage all the morning. They've killed more than they can count."

"Well now! That's the best turn Mr. Bang's ever done me. If he gets me shot of them creatures, I'd let him say anything he likes as long as he lives. Shooting our rats! D'ye hear that, Bob? Come up, there's a good beast. That's it. Good morning, Miss Martha." And the little old woman departed at that dreadful pace, in which she took pride,—namely, a donkey's gallop. Martha looked on, and in spite of the anxiety at her heart, she could not help laughing at the funny figure of the little dame stuck on her donkey, as she careered away towards the village.

As Martha stood for a moment at the gate, Mr. Crypt came up to her.

"Are you going?" she asked. "I am sorry my father is unwell this morning. It is so unusual an occurrence, that it puts us about a little; and I hardly like to press you to stay and take breakfast with us."

"Don't mention it, Miss Underwood. I will be candid with you. I did come here this morning in the hope of having a private conversation with your father. Your sister thought the hour immediately after breakfast the time of the day he would prefer to see me. I am naturally anxious to see him as soon as possible, now. Perhaps you will mention this, and ask him to appoint his own time. Good morning!"—and the sedate curate touched Martha's hand rather nervously, while his face was suffused with a colour that made it look like human flesh, instead of monumental marble.

Before Martha could reply, he had passed through the gate, and was walking soberly after Nanny Post, his long flowing coat swelling out behind him in the wind.

"It must be Leah!" mused Martha, smiling to herself; "how very odd that it should happen to-day of all days in the year! Well! Nanny Post is right; marriages, like misfortunes, never come alone. I wonder how long it has been going on. What a sly thing of her! The demure little puss, never to say a word to me about it, but always seeming to think he preferred Mary. How glad I am for both the dear girls! I suppose father will make no objection to Mr. Crypt for Leah, but what will he say to Philip for Mary? Poor dear Philip!—they are quite children. I must do what I can for them with father. But I won't have it kept secret from him. We've had too many secrets in our family."

The thought of "secrets" brought Martha's mind back to the Strange Gentleman, and his business with her father. Was Mark's surmise true? Was their father ruined? Had this stranger come to take possession of all that was once theirs? Ah! this is no time to think of marriages for her dear girls, while their father is in so much trouble. Yet what can she do? She cannot dash their happiness by telling them of her fears. It would be quite time enough for them to know when the evil actually came. It might be a mistake altogether. She would say nothing to them; appear as usual, and awaken no suspicions: though, to be sure, Leah, the thoughtful Leah, had already her suspicions that all was not going right with their father's affairs.

"At any rate," concluded Martha to herself, "it will be a comfort to have some of the dear children well married; Leah and Rachel both for, of course, Mr. Bang will come forward decisively for Rachel, if anything should happen to father. Mary, indeed, could not marry so soon; Philip has nothing, but Miss Grey would be sure to take Mary to live with her at the Tower. As for herself, she should stay always with her father, whatever happened."

In spite of her anxiety on his account, Martha felt a movement of pleasure as she reentered the breakfast-room and saw the happy faces of the three girls. Mary was listening to Philip's whispers, Rachel was pouring out coffee for Mr. Bang, and Leah, oblivious of the suspected Jesuit behind her, was reading a little note which had been placed in her hand ten minutes ago, by Mr. Crypt. Over them all a bright light seemed to float, while in the background stood Mark and the Strange Gentleman, each occupied in looking over their letters, with faces of gravity and gloom. The good Martha sympathised with both parties; read the thoughts of both, as she believed, and was anxious to do she knew not what.

If Martha had been a poet or a philosopher, she would have moralized on the specimen of our human life presented by that old-fashioned parlour at the moment. What a mixture of contradictory elements went to the making up of that pretty, social party! In one heart all was new-dawning hope; in another, vague, black fears; here, an eye glancing with unspeakable love on its object; there, another gleaming out with hatred on the intrusive betrayer. Leah, all calm and satisfaction, certain of no "cause or impediment" obstructive of her marriage; Mary, fearing all sorts of obstacles in the way of hers. Each heart occupied with its own feelings, a world within itself, knowing its own bitterness, and none other meddling with its joy, yet all having one feeling, at least, in common,—a vague dread of the Stranger, mingled with an anxious expectation of Mr. Underwood's entrance into the room. Life at Milford Grange was precisely the same sort of life that we all experience in our own circle. Life is essentially the same throughout humanity, though its external manifestations, its mere costume, be multifarious. Ever waxing, ever waning, the new passing into the old, sorrow clasping joy in her arms, and light shining beside darkness,—this is life as it appears everywhere to the discerning eye, but none the less acutely is it felt by the living soul.

The good Martha thought not these thoughts; but the unknown brother, whose heart yearned towards her and all the others, thought these and many more, as he waited in that old familiar room, and marked the changes which time had wrought on all those whom he loved. Again his eye rested on what was unchanged—the portrait of his beloved mother. The serene face looked down on him, as it used to look when he was a boy. And David Underwood found the beautiful old verses, which everybody knows, stealing over his mind, as he gazed.

"Oh! that those lips had language! Life has pass'd
With me but roughly since I heard thee last.
Those lips are thine—thy own sweet smile I see,
The same that oft in childhood solaced me.

"And while that face renews my filial grief,
Fancy shall weave a charm for my relief,
Shall steep me in Elysian reverie,
A momentary dream that thou art she.

"My Mother, when I learn'd that thou wast dead,
Say, wast thou conscious of the tears I shed?
Hover'd thy spirit o'er thy sorrowing son,
Wretch even then, life's journey just begun?"

Good, gentle Cowper! the amiable poet whom the Calvinists drove mad!—these true verses of yours are dear to the heart of every man who has lost his mother in early youth, and who gazes on her picture after he has borne the burden and heat of the day. There is no small poem in our language, more certain of living to the end of time.

David Underwood removed his eyes from the portrait, when the door opened. It was his youngest brother, Jack, looking very unlike the Jack of half an hour ago.

"What is the matter?" inquired several voices, and the sisters rose in alarm.

"I don't know—can't tell," said the boy, trying to control his emotion; "Father's changed. I can't tell what's come to him. He called me, 'my dear child,' and there were tears in his eyes—'pon my honour there were," cried Jack, dashing away some from his own. "I don't quite like it. I wish he wasn't so kind and gentle—He's not himself. You go to him, Mark; he wants you, and the Strange Gentleman, if he hasn't gone."

"I am here," said the latter, drawing near; "where is your father?"

"In the back parlour.—Mark!"

But Mark had already left the room, and the stranger had followed him.

CHAPTER XII.

MARK'S PLANS AND RESOURCES.

We have said, that old as Mr. Underwood was, he began to live a new life on the previous night. It was almost as if the rash act which he then meditated, or which an evil spirit seemed to lure him to, had been actually committed—that the cold and proud Gideon Underwood had died on that memorable night, and that a new man had arisen in his place.

On his return to the home which he might never have seen more, the love of it, and of all those whom it contained, and of all whom he remembered to have dwelt there, rushed in a warm torrent to his heart. All humanity seemed endeared to him—to belong to him. The very stranger who had saved his life, became blended with all his nearest affections,—his oldest associations,—and by his embrace, had revealed to him the depth of his own heart, and the priceless value of that life which he had well-nigh thrown aside as an intolerable burden.

"Blessed be this man whom God has made an instrument in my salvation from deadly sin," thought the old man, as he turned his head to look after the retreating form of his preserver, ere he re-entered the house. Once more he looked up at the inscription over the door-way—paused to read it attentively, and then went straight to his bedroom to pour out his soul in prayer. At length, he lay down to rest—a calm dreamless slumber, prolonged, as we already know, much beyond his usual hour in the morning.

When he awoke he heard the voices of his children in the room below; and in a moment he remembered what might have been, and rendered thanks to God that he was yet spared to hear those sounds so dear to his heart; so much dearer than he had ever known. The sleep had restored his mind to its usual calm; and he began to consider his position as a brave man should. Not seeking how he can most speedily slip away from the penalty of his own misconduct and leave the burden of it to others, (for assuredly the burden must fall somewhere,) but seeking how he can strengthen himself to bear it, so as to save others from enduring more than is absolutely necessary of the consequences of his error. The popular phrase, "He hurts no one but himself," is a popular fallacy. When a man does wrong he always hurts others as well as himself. To seek to escape the consequences of our wrong-doing is cowardly and ungenerous. Gideon Underwood was keenly alive to that truth now; for God had heard his fervent prayers. He had given him "a clean heart, and had renewed a right spirit within him."

A sense of physical weakness and exhaustion kept him in bed some time after he was thoroughly awake. Yet he was able to enjoy the consciousness of existence. He was as fully sensible of it as a high-hearted boy with whom life is just beginning. He tried to distinguish the voices below. There was John's laugh! Jack, as the rest of the family called him, he would call him Jack, too. What a happy-natured boy he was! his youngest child, dearer to him than all the rest, except, perhaps, the eldest, the lost absent one!—the boy whom he had driven from him, and who had made his name honoured in the world. He had not forgotten that lady of aristocratic appearance, who had come in a fine carriage one day through this remote valley, and had inquired at the vicarage, if this were "the Milford, where the famous David Underwood was born." When the good Mr. Shepherd had told him this, he had received the information sullenly, had even spoken angry words at being reminded of his son's existence; but afterwards, in the solitude of his proud heart, he rejoiced to think of his son's fame and honour; for, though he scorned to confess it, David, his offending child, whom he had taken an oath never to recall, was dearer to him than all the rest. As he listened to the voices below, he sighed to think that David's was not to be heard among them. Presently he distinguished Nanny's sharp tones at the window beneath his own; and they brought back the troubles of every-day life. The post! He sickened at the word; for what could letters bring to him but ruin and disgrace? For many months past he had hated the sight of Nanny and her donkey, as they came trotting along the valley; and used to frown at the eagerness with which his younger children cried out, "A letter! A letter!"

He did not lie long, listening to Nanny's voice, and hoping that to-day, at least, she had brought no letters for him. No. "The die is cast," he said within himself. "Let me meet all the consequences of my folly, nay, my guilt. It can be borne, and it behoves me to bear it like a man, like an Underwood of the old stock, like the father of a man whom all the world calls honourable." A remnant of his natural pride rose up at the thought that his disowned son should ever wish to disown his father.

He began to get up; and presently Jack knocked at his door, and brought the letters, inquiring with anxious solicitude concerning his health. He spoke with unwonted gentleness in reply. All unconsciously to himself, tears came into his eyes as he thought of the misery to which it was likely his children would be reduced, and his voice was broken as he remembered how much that misery would have been aggravated had he been permitted to perish at the Black Scur.

He did not like Jack to leave the room. It was a comfort to him to keep the boy in his sight. Soon he must send him to rough it in the wide world. And then, again, recurred the thought,—"I might have lost him from my sight for ever! I might never have seen him again! My poor boy!"

It was no wonder that the warm-hearted Jack felt deeply the change in his father's manner, or that he wished to caution Mark not to let him enter into any very serious business that morning.

But Mark had gone before he spoke; and accompanied by the Strange Gentleman, was soon in the presence of Mr. Underwood.

He was seated at the oak-table in the back parlour, once more. Martha and the housemaid had restored some degree of order to the room since the previous night; but Martha dared not meddle much with any of the papers. She had only taken from a side table, where her father always laid letters which he wished to have posted, the packet addressed to Miss Grey, and had despatched it to the Tower by Nanny. The packet contained, as the reader may remember, all David's unopened letters. It was one of Martha's regular morning duties to arrange her father's private room. She had seen a letter addressed "To my Children," but concluding that it had been written in connexion with his Will, which lay beside it, and that it was intended to be read by them after his death, she had reverently abstained from touching it, though it was unsealed. When Mr. Underwood saw this note still lying on the table, he rejoiced to think that it had remained unread, and that his children were and might ever continue ignorant of the sin he had meditated. He tore it up, and was scattering the fragments on the floor beside him, when Mark and the Strange Gentleman entered the room.

He did not rise from his seat, but stretched out a hand to each, in silence.

"Are you better, father?" inquired Mark, looking at the pale face of the old man, gravely, but without any show of tenderness.

"Much better. You are all uncares, I find, because I overslept myself this morning? My children are affectionate and dutiful beyond most, you see, sir," he added, turning to the stranger, and pressing his hand again. "It will not be an easy thing for me to part from them."

"Part from us! What do you mean, sir?" asked Mark.

Here was a pause of a few moments, in which they all looked at each other, and at the end of the pause, Mark spoke again. His tone was different from the usual sober, measured one, beyond which he was seldom betrayed.

"Father, I have a right to know your affairs I work with, and for you. I am your eldest son."

"Not my eldest, Mark."

"You have called me so for many years. I have conducted myself in all respects as your eldest son; you have told me that I should be your heir."

"It is true. You have been industrious and dutiful. What have you to say to me now?"

The stranger moved towards the door.

"Stop, sir," said Mark, "what I have to say concerns you also. May I speak, father?"

Mr. Underwood bowed his head, and schooled his spirit to submission. He knew the hardness of Mark's character—his coldness—his selfishness—his perfect propriety of conduct. He could never blame Mark, neither could he love him very much. He had never quarrelled with Mark, neither had he ever pressed him to his heart since he was a child. But he could not justly complain of a son who reflected so many of his own characteristics, and who never disputed his will.

"Father!" said Mark, taking a seat at the table and gently moving a pen backwards and forwards through his fingers as he spoke; "I know that your affairs are going wrong, that you have speculated foolishly, that you have lost much. I, as the next heir to this estate, and your own son, have a right to demand a full statement of your difficulties. This gentleman is thoroughly acquainted with your true position. He has evidently some power over you; if I mistake not, he is your chief creditor. I claim to be present during your conversations with him; I ought to know all."

"You shall know all, Mark," replied his father, "there is justice in what you say, though the manner of saying it is somewhat cold and unfeeling."

"Have you ever shown much feeling, any warmth of heart towards me, father? I have lived with you a life of perfect obedience and submission, have you loved me in your soul as you have always loved your disobedient son, David? I do not reproach you, father, I only remind you of the truth."

Mr. Underwood was silent, but a dusky red crept over his aged cheek. The stranger raised his eyes, and looked from father to son with mournful surprise.

Mark went on, with his gaze fixed on the pen in his hand, (he never looked steadfastly in the face of a person he addressed,)—

"For some years I have suspected that you have squandered our property. I say our, because I have devoted my time to it, and as it is to be my inheritance, my interest in it is as great as your own. I wish to know how deeply you are involved. It is mortgaged to a considerable extent, I am sure. Let me know the true state of matters, and I may, perhaps, be able to assist you."

"You?" said his father, looking up in surprise. "You have no property except what depends on me."

Mark smiled. "You have supposed so. You have believed me to be a child—a slave. But you are mistaken. I have property. Tell me how much money is required to redeem the mortgage on the Grange Farm, and I will yet try to keep it in the family. It is the thought of losing what has been ours so long that has weighed on your spirit. I would spare you that pain."

Mr. Underwood stretched out his hand to Mark. "I have done you injustice, my boy. Let me hear what your plans were for my assistance;" then turning to the stranger, he said, with a faint smile—"It is not every man whose children are so ready to sacrifice themselves for him. What did you propose to do, Mark? I should like to hear."

"I propose to employ some funded property which I possess, (no matter how,) in clearing the estate of all debt. Then to take the management of it entirely into my own hands; on that condition only will I move a finger in this business."

"What!" exclaimed Mr. Underwood, half rising, and turning paler than before, with anger. "What, Mark! you would dispossess your own father during his lifetime—make yourself master here?"

"If I do not, sir, a stranger will. Am I not right?" Mark spoke calmly, in a business-like tone.

Mr. Underwood groaned.

"You must listen to reason, sir;—Master—nay, tyrant as you have been. You are no longer a young man, or a strong one. You are not so well able as you once were to manage your affairs. Your present difficulties show it." Here he glanced suspiciously at the stranger. "You should resign your sway gracefully. You have reason to be glad that your misconduct, misfortune, I will say, need not be known beyond ourselves. The world knows only this, that you find your health breaking and give up the property to me. I grant you a proper annuity and —"

"And bed and board under your hospitable roof;—in this very house—eh?" cried Mr. Underwood, with suppressed rage. The stranger laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Not precisely so," replied Mark, still quite calm. "I intend to be master in my own house. I inherit somewhat of your own taste for power. It would not suit me to have you, or any relations but my own wife and children, beneath my roof. But, I do not forget that, at your age, it would be painful to live anywhere else than at Milford. I have thought that you would like to spend the last years of your life where, if I mistake not, the happiest hours of your youth were spent, viz. at the Grey Tower. You love Miss Grey as well as any of your own children—she will watch over your declining years—which will be prolonged by your freedom from worldly anxieties. I have spoken to you in a fair business-like way, as man to man, but I have not been unmindful of your comfort."

"Have you thought of Miss Grey's comfort, Mark? She does not live alone. What would Mrs. Ward and Philip say to the intrusion of a tyrannical old man into their happy home?" Mr. Underwood spoke in the same deeply satirical tone.

"As to Philip, he will have nothing to say to it.

In a few months he will be on his way to India. We have procured a cadetship for him. Mrs. Ward also will have nothing to say to it; for she will then be my wife."

A slight movement of the eyebrows was the only sign of surprise evinced by Mr. Underwood, though, to say the truth, he always suspected Mark of an attachment to Miriam.

"You have so carefully provided for your father, it is not to be doubted that you have given some thought to your brothers and sisters," said Mr. Underwood; "may I ask how you mean to dispose of them?"

Unmoved by the indignant sarcasm in his father's tone, Mark replied—

"I have not been unmindful of them. My sisters are, I think, in a fair way of being provided for by marriage. Mr. Bang is ready to marry Rachel to-morrow, and Mr. Crypt meditates asking your consent to marry Leah. Mary is so pretty that there is not much likelihood of her remaining on our hands long, and if she does, why, Philip Ward will be glad to have her. Martha would have been Mrs. Shepherd long ago if it had not been for her sense of duty to you. As to Jack, he has led too idle a life to make him fit for much work yet, but I shall use my influence to put him in a fair way of providing for himself in London, the place to which he most desires to go."

Mark ceased speaking, and his father looked at him in silence for some time. He was completely puzzled by this new manifestation of character, as well as very angry at it, as it affected his own dignity. Gideon Underwood might lay down power of his own free will, he might even submit to lose it as a consequence of his own error, but he could not bear to have it wrested from him by one of his own children. True, Mark had shown some degree of consideration for all belonging to him; but he had shown no affection. As yet, Gideon Underwood could not ask himself, "What have I ever done to win the affection of this my son? I have brought him up to do my will in all things." He could see the lamentable defects of Mark in relation to himself, he did not see so clearly what had been his defects in relation to Mark. Stung to the quick with a sense of Mark's calculating, unfeeling conduct, he said at length,—

"Having listened to your plans for the family, you will not think it impertinent if I ask what are your resources. You speak of your property and your influence. With whom have you influence, and whence do you derive your property? Before I tell you whether I can or cannot entertain your proposal, it is my duty to be satisfied on that point."

Mark balanced the pen again, and after a moment's silence, spoke as follows,—

"Since you insist on knowing, I will not deceive you. I hold that every man has a right to avail himself of all the natural and worldly advantages which he may possess. I have a brother, an elder brother, who has acquired wealth and station in the world—"

"The brother whose birthright you are anxious to take possession of," interrupted Mr. Underwood, with a contemptuous indignation which he could not repress.

"Yes. My brother David, whom you have disinherited. He has made his fortune in the world, and unlike many men, has not been backward in offering assistance to the less fortunate members of his family. I have kept up an occasional intercourse with him ever since he left us."

"In opposition to my express commands!"

"Yes, father. Unreasonable commands will never be obeyed, if they can possibly be evaded. You ought to know that by this time. I speak to you as man to man, now. I was curious to know how David got on in the world; and when he offered me assistance, I accepted it, feeling sure that you were losing money, and that unless I took care of myself, I should be ultimately cast penniless on the world."

"So, Mark, you tell me, with an unblushing face, that you have taken from David some of his hard earnings. True, he has been successful as a writer of books, I am told; but if he has made money, it must have been with severe labour; and his own brother should be the last person to take advantage of his generosity."

"It is not as an author that David has made money. It would be long before he attained wealth in that way. You do not know that David has shown himself a sensible man of the world. He has turned his fame and his good looks to account. He married a heiress several years ago."

Mr. Underwood looked up astonished. "How do you know that? Who told you so? I can scarcely believe that without strong evidence."

"Nay," said Mark; "it is true. I saw an account of the marriage in a newspaper. Besides, he wrote to me at the time—and to you also; but you treated that letter like all the rest. This gentleman, probably, can support what I say. Is it not true, sir, that David Underwood, the well-known author, married an heiress some time ago?"

"It is perfectly true," replied the stranger.

The expression of pain and disappointment on Mr. Underwood's face was not lost upon either of the spectators.

"The news does not seem to give you pleasure, sir. Yet most fathers would rejoice at such a marriage for their sons," said Mark. "It is a good thing for the family, as you will find, in time."

Mr. Underwood glanced angrily at Mark, and then pushing back his chair, began to pace up and down the room. The stranger stood leaning against the high mantel-piece, and looked from beneath his bushy eye-brows from the father to the son.

"Do you call it a good thing for our family, Mark, that it should be disgraced by such an act? I can scarcely believe it of David. He was ambitious, but there was no worldliness, no meanness in his composition when he left this place. My son David marry for money—for station! Alas! alas! It is time the name were passing away."

"Why, father, you live so secluded a life in this valley, that you have not yet shaken off the romantic notions of youth. Why should not a man marry for money?" asked Mark quietly.

The stranger advanced a step, and there was a profound inelancholy in his voice, as he spoke these words in reply to Mark's question,—

"Why should not a man marry for money? I will tell you, Mark Underwood. Because it was not for money, for worldly aggrandisement that God ordained marriage. Why should not a man marry for money? Because by doing so he loses his own self-respect, and becomes a liar, a deceiver, a perjured wretch. He who does this thing, is no better in the eye of God and of all good men, than he who seduces a woman to her own dishonour, and then leaves her to the tender mercies of the world. Why should not a man marry for money?" he continued earnestly, "because the titles of husband and of wife are high and honourable, sacred to the best human feelings, and belong not to the money-market. They are titles which belong to God's service on earth, not to the service of Mammon. The man who can do this is incapable of any truly good thing; anything worthy to be called good by the true and wise among men. He is without the peculiar feeling towards women, which sanctifies and elevates all that is earthly in the great passion of youth. Young man, speak not so lightly of marrying for money."

"I speak but as the world speaks," said Mark.

"What world?" asked the stranger in the same lofty tone. "The low-thoughted men who grope ever on the earth in search of the things thereof? Nay, that is doing them too much honour. They may think themselves the world; but they are blinded by ignorance and conceit, and sensuality, and cannot see that though they are great in numbers, they are small in influence. Consciously or unconsciously to themselves they are compelled to yield to, to admire, nay, to subserve the world of nobler men. God has willed it so. Those to whom he has given reason, and who use their reason only to 'live more brutishly than any beast,' can never possess real power among our race, though they may have heaped up vast stores of the wretched pomps and vanities, and the lowest pleasures of earth. They do not constitute the world. One real man, of noble acts and instincts, will give the law to a thousand such half-men; who have sold their heavenly birthright for a mess of pottage. If they seem to triumph and rule, it is but seeming. Such men constitute not the world, the world that God watches over, and moves onward with his guiding hand, and loves. Do not speak as they speak about marriage or about anything else,—or your words will not be wise."

Mr. Underwood stopped to listen. Mark winced at these words. The low and selfish nature shrinks always from contact with noble souls. It hates the sense of inferiority forced upon it, and struggles to get rid of it.

"Nay! I did not mean to provoke a sermon," he replied with a sneer. "You have romantic notions. I confess myself a very unromantic person."

VOL. XV.

"I never knew any good come from a serious confession of that kind," said the stranger. "No man is very good who is very unromantic, in the sense in which you use the word. You may trust my experience of the world. It is what you call romance in men that is the only enduring reality about them. Their social station, their fame, their wealth, what they seem to the eye of those who do not know them; their external graces, their agreeable and disagreeable vices, their mere conventional morality, all these things which are not what you call romantic, pass away; they never touch the soul or can make the true life of a man. While noble aspirations, generous devotion, love and self-forgetfulness, what you smile at as romance, really make a man's life on earth, which is but his preparation for life in heaven."

"I am glad to have caused such a display of eloquence," said Mark, rising; "but I came here to speak of business. Whether it be romantic or unromantic, wise or foolish, noble or ignoble to marry for money, it does not become me to find fault with such an act; I have been saved from beggary by it, and shall be able to save you also," he added, looking at his father, who, with a scrutinising gaze was examining the stranger's face. "We, at least, should not blame my brother David because he made a marriage for money."

"You speak falsely, you know not what you say," interrupted the stranger, in a clear low tone. "Your brother, David Underwood, did not marry for money."

"I thought you admitted that he did, just now? Did you not say he married an heiress?"

"Yes. He married an heiress; but not for her money."

"For love then, think you?" And Mark laughed a short, dry laugh. "I and my father know better than that. He was in love with some one else. I, for my part, think he did well. The heiress, probably, liked him, and he liked her money. But, it is not a subject in which I am versed, this of love and marriage. It has led us from the matter in hand. You have questioned me as to my plans, father; and you have said I should know the true state of your affairs."

"That is easily known, Mark. I am utterly ruined."

"Ruined?—How?"

"The Grange and all belonging to it is the property of another. I have lost it all. It is now the property of Admiral Underwood. Nay, hear me out," continued the old man, stopping directly in front of Mark, and looking sternly into his face. "If I had not been compelled to give it up, to pay an overwhelming debt—if I had had a choice in the matter, I would rather have let it pass into other hands, even into those of Admiral Underwood, (though I hate that branch of the family,) than yield it up to you on your conditions. They are disgraceful to us both. I would rather have forfeited this old place than hear a son of mine make such a proposal to his father. Oh! Mark! Mark! I am well punished for my past severity to your brother. But I will not shrink from the rest of my painful task. I had to tell you and all the others—you, first, because I looked to you for comfort and support in telling the humiliating truth to them—I had to tell you that not only have I deprived myself and my family of all property; but that—

"Well, sir, well—what more?" asked Mark with anxiety, for his father seemed unable to proceed.

"I have lost the Grey property, too,"—he said, at length.

"The Grey property! one half of which Miss Grey has so lately settled on her sister?" exclaimed Mark with fury,—"It cannot be that you have turned swindler, and cheated those two women, father?"

"Hush! hush!" interposed the stranger stepping forward with authority and drawing the old man's arm within his own. "This is unseemly language in the mouth of a son. I know your father's conduct. Swindling and cheating are not to be found in it—he is an honest man, thank God. But what are you, Mark Underwood?—your conduct I know also. Swindling and cheating are to be found there.—Nay, nay. No threats—unless, indeed, I fail to make good my words."

"You cannot," said the enraged Mark, whose cheek was now blanched; as he raised his hand to strike the offender.

"Hold!" cried the other. "Know me, before you strike. I am your brother, David." And throwing aside the black wig and heard he stood before them, as fine a specimen of Saxon manliness as one could wish to see.

Mr. Underwood glanced from one son to the other, and sinking on the nearest chair, covered his face with his hand.

Mark on his side betrayed great emotion, though of a different kind. If his father's astonishment was mingled with sorrow, Mark's was mingled with fear. He could not meet his brother's eye.

They formed a striking contrast to each other as they stood thus confronted. Mark's handsome, florid and somewhat sinister face looked blank and cowardly. David's strongly marked features, beautiful with genius and the traces of past sorrow, gleamed with the light of feeling. Both were tall and well-limbed, but David's bearing was that of a man of education and refinement, whose habitual associates are noble and gentle in the true old meaning of the words.

He looked once with respectful pity on his father, and then turning again to his brother, spoke these few words in a low tone,—

"Mark; you have forced this upon me by your unmanly, unfilial conduct to our father; I could stand by no longer and hear such words addressed to him by you. Said I not rightly that the words swindler and cheat (you used them first,) may be justly applied to you? That property, which you speak of as derived from me, and with which you would secure to yourself what I have a better right to than you, and which you know I prize beyond the finest estate in the country,—for what purpose was it made over to you? If you will not tell our father, I will.—Father! I have from time to time made over considerable sums to Mark to be used by him for your benefit. I dared not communicate with you myself. These, it seems, he has appropriated. Other sums which I sent him to be expended on the Grey estate for the benefit of Mrs. Ward and her son, to whom I have heard it would be bequeathed by Miss Grey on her decease, he has also appropriated. Intending, if I mistake not, to secure the Grey estate for himself by marrying Mrs. Ward, since he cannot marry her sister."

The scorn on David's upper lip looked beautiful, because it was tempered with ineffable pain and pity, as he gazed on Mark's averted face. There was a silence between the three, and no one stirred for the space of a minute, when Jack's voice was heard without, calling,

"Mark! Mark!"

The sound was a relief; it broke the oppressive stillness, and Mark said sullenly,—

"I am called. Another time we will discuss this matter further. In the meantime you are welcome to the Grange once more, David. Perhaps my father's ruin may be averted yet."

And without another word or look he left the room, and closed the door behind him.

(To be continued.)

ROMANCE OF LIEE.

THE TRIAL OF MATTHEW V. HARTY AND STOKES.¹

IN this very ably-reported trial, there is ample matter for any quantity of fiction an author might please to spin, or a publisher to issue. The fact is a romance. A staid elderly physician educates, and so, to a certain degree, provides for, and then turns upon the world, a natural son,—a youth of considerable talent; but, judging from circumstances developed in the progress of the trial, painfully sensitive, and subject, as overtaxed brains frequently are, to morbid fits of depression. He had won for himself honourable distinction in Trinity College, but the fag of teaching, and its anxieties, for a time shattered, certainly without overturning, his reason. He did not know that Dr. Hartly was his father; he had been taught to look up to him as his guardian; but experience proved him to be one who fed and tortured alternately. The youth was fond of music, and had taken a fancy to study phrenology; these two pursuits, and the possession of a fine voice, which tempted him to sing "I'm afloat," (when, poor fellow he was anything but afloat within the walls of far-famed Derry) at a musical rèunion, were finally taken hold of by his father and a certain "Mr. Stokes," and linked with the nervousness of a sensitive mind, determined that father to put him into Swift's Hospital as a lunatic. The various opinions of the medical men visiting that institution during his incarceration, painfully prove how little time and trouble they bestow upon the investigation of "cases;" taking it too frequently for granted, that because a man is placed there, he must be insane, and listening with an agonizing apathy to protestations of sanity, as proofs of the reverse. That the father in his old age should seek to double his sin by injuring the offspring to whom he had denied a legal name, is a fact painful to contemplate. The very scholarship won by the young man's industry and ability did this unnatural parent seek to apply to his maintenance in a mad-house!

(1) "Authentic report of the trial of Matthew v. Hartly and Stokes, reported by S. N. Ellington, Jun. Esq., and W. P. Carr, Esq., Barristers-at law." James McGlashan, Dublin.

The case called forth the keenness, the sagacity, and the eloquence of the Irish bar; the raking questions and brilliant retorts flashed with the lightning which we had well-nigh deemed had passed from our courts altogether.

Mr. Whiteside, Mr. Napier, and Mr. Richard Armstrong conducted the prosecution; and Mr. Martley, Mr. George, and Mr. John E. Walshe, the defence.

The best point urged for the defence, was, that if Professor Maccullagh, (who in a fit of temporary insanity, some time ago, destroyed himself,) had been subjected to restraint for a time, we should not now have to lament his loss,—ergo, the restraint in which Mr. Matthew was placed, may have preserved his life!

To all persons curious in the development of facts, to all who are interested in the study of the mysterious coming and going of human intellect, this trial cannot fail to be deeply interesting. We quote a few of Mr. Whiteside's eloquent words from his introductory address:—

"Having described the facts of the case, I will now draw your attention to the nature of the proof which I will lay before you; the nature of the defence, and the question of damages. As to these proofs, they will consist of the evidence of persons who knew this young man from his very infancy—of one who is now in the Church, and who had been at school with him. We will prove the literary distinctions the plaintiff has obtained, and these are never conferred unless they have been earned by the sweat of the student's brow. We will produce proof that he had competed for the position of a sizar, and the Jury should remember that many a great man has fought his way from that position in the battle of life, and reached a station of honour and distinction. Such might have been the fortune of my client. The defendant has endeavoured to destroy that chance; but the verdict of the Jury will redeem and compensate him for all he has lost and suffered. Imagine, if you can, the position of such a person—unfriended, alone, without relatives, without friends—the defendant exhibiting towards him at one period a precarious, harsh, mysterious, and unaccountable behaviour; and then when he had obtained a position, coming forward and resuming his power over him. In the madhouse the plaintiff said—

"I am not mad; I would to Heaven, I were!
For then, 'tis like, I should forget myself."

Madness would have enabled him to have forgotten his wrongs. He behaved like a rational man—he conversed as such—thought and felt as such. He appealed to the doctors, and appealed in vain: he appealed to the Board of the Hospital, and appealed in vain; he appealed to the defendant for mercy in vain; but at length he awakened the friendship of a generous young man, and the defendant, fearing the consequence of his acts, and knowing that though the laws might be baffled and evaded, they are strong and powerful to protect the weak and punish the oppressor, he thought it better to remove the plaintiff from the madhouse. If all the doctors in Dublin, rank and file, were examined, I am sure the Jury would not declare that my client was insane, unless the truth convinced them that he was so; and there is not a man in the jury-box who is not panting to redress the wrong which my unfortunate client has endured. If men could do with impunity such acts as those which the defendant has committed, the law and justice of the country are at an end. What was the defence? What was madness? It was very difficult to define it—what was it? To be nothing else but mad.' Shakspeare, who best knew the workings of the human heart, had thus described it, and his was a language, and his sentiments and thoughts were such, that for ever they will be the wonder and delight of men. Mad, indeed, would be the plaintiff if he did not appeal for justice, and endeavour to vindicate himself for the sufferings of his life, the like of which, I believe, have never before appeared in any work of fiction. The defence is, that the plaintiff was mad. The defendant should prove it. It was not enough to prove that the plaintiff was eccentric, indolent, or apathetic; no, the averment is that he was a dangerous lunatic. You shall have this dangerous lunatic in the box; you shall hear his narrative from his own lips, and judge of his demeanour. I will produce him, and let my learned friend lay bare his conscience, and test his reason. I ask that he shall be tried according to the principles of that law, which has been most shamelessly and infamously violated. I understand that the other side have been ransacking the kitchen of the University, the bag-man, the coal-man, to furnish evidence against the plaintiff—'Come one, come all.' Let us have Foley as large as life; and if Foley can prove all that it is said he can prove, let him come forth. It is a matter of fact, and this should be proved. What distinguishes man from the brute creation? The possession of reason. What makes him the master of the universe? The will of God giving that reason; and to deny him the possession of that which elevates him above the savage, strips him of whatever makes life dignified and desirable. The plaintiff has been falsely imprisoned—he has been illegally inveigled into Swift's Hospital; the defendant has treated him not merely with injustice, but has heaped upon him accumulated wrongs and insults, and has never apologised for these wrongs. He did all he could to blast his prospects, and to destroy his hopes; and the plaintiff is now compelled to appear before a jury of his countrymen to ask for what the oppressed and injured never sought from a jury in vain—justice. Damages! What can you give him that could compensate for the wrongs which he has suffered? Can you recompense him for the solitary agony of the cell, the language of insult, reproach, and contumely, the oppression heaped upon him? Oh! no, you cannot: but you can evince to the world your indignant sense of the misconduct of the defendant by giving that large and ample measure of compensation which the wrongs of the plaintiff require, and which, as humane and discriminating men, you would give and expect to receive, if you yourselves appealed to a jury of your countrymen."

We wish we had space to extract Mr. Napier's reply after the examination of the witnesses for the defence. He said most truly, that the overtaxed and overstrained mind "needs repose; it requires to be removed from the toils of intellectual labour, and to feel some of the gentler influences of home;" for after all, perhaps, in the simplicities of Christian life, there may be larger restoring powers than under the superintendence of Mr. Cuning. "Those whose labours are connected with the brain require the most delicate treatment, and the greatest regard to those nice springs of action which are amongst the mysteries of our existence."

This is perfectly true, but this young man never experienced the "gentler influences of home," never was warmed by a mother's kiss, or cheered by a mother's blessing; his life, but for his studies, would have been hopeless; and how many lives are aimless, simply because there is no one for whom to love and to work! To a generous, a sympathising heart, self does not excite to the nobler class of exertion; and the youth's father's conduct was at times so harsh, and at all times so contradictory, that even if the plaintiff had known that he was his father, he could not have turned to him for the repose and tenderness his sensitive nature so peculiarly required.

We know that diseases of the brain are far more numerous than they are believed to be. We are well aware that much of the temper, the indecision, the inconsistency with which we tax our fellow-creatures, proceeds from incipient disease of this most delicate and frequently overworked organ.

We are convinced that the whisperings and mystery which take place, whenever a person is supposed to have "something the matter with his head," are the result of ignorance, or a prejudice based on ignorance, and that many suicides might be prevented by a calm and straightforward application of proper means, and gentle, but firm restraints; which are necessary in their various degrees, in every illness, whether of the head or the inferior members of the body; but it argues either wickedness or insanity on the part of a relative, who would thrust a person, subject only to occasional depression, and with every nerve strung to the highest pitch of sensibility, into the madman's cell. That this youth maintained his reason after such treatment, is almost miraculous. The jury gave a triumphant verdict for the plaintiff, with a thousand pounds damages. Thus the tardy, undecided, doing and undoing father, is compelled to render justice to his son, by the very means he had taken to obliterate him from the ranks of human nature.

THE POET OF HAWTHORNDEN.

We have always felt great interest in turning over the leaves of an old book, and in tracing the feelings (however presented in an uncouth garb) which have at every period given the charm to works of genius. The antiquated guise in which we sometimes find them, excites a sensation, in some degree resembling that which we experience in meeting with a dear familiar friend in some foreign land; or like the pleasure with which we contemplate the charms of the courtly beauties in the stiff brocades and quaint fashions, transmitted to the painter's canvass. Among the books for which we sought, we looked for a long time in vain for "The Works of William Drummond of Hawthornden, consisting of those which were formerly printed, and those which were designed for the press, published from the author's original copies. Edinburgh, printed by James Watson, in Craig's Close, 1711. Folio." The book was not to be found in the public libraries in London, but we were at last favoured with a sight of it in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. It contains his poetry and prose; and is not merely a sufficient evidence of his ability and industry, but a record of feelings, remarkable for tenderness and delicacy: his poetical effusions have the great charm of letting us into his character, and without entering into details, giving the clue to the vicissitudes of his life.

Sir John Drummond of Hawthornden was descended from an ancient family, and was a man held in great estimation and respect for worth. His gifted son William, was born in the year 1585, and in the midst of the romantic scenery of Hawthornden, with all its interesting traditions, he received his earliest impressions. The very name of Hawthornden sounds musical to our ears, and no one could visit the favoured spot without feeling at once that it was a "meet Nurse for a poetic child." The ancient house, with its mullioned windows, and clustered chimneys and gables, forms a picturesque object, standing on the edge of a stupendous cliff, which overhangs the river as it flows along, separating it from an opposite cliff, clothed like it with rich hanging woods. A precipitous path along the ledge of the rock leads to a cavern hollowed in it; this is said to have been the poet's favourite haunt: the seat which he occupied, and the table by which he sat, are still to be seen there; here he would retire to study and compose, and it is told, that it was here, after a severe fit of illness, that he wrote the Cypress Grove, a composition described as "an excellent and pious work." Other nooks among the rocks, besides the poet's haunt, have their interesting associations; four small rooms, said to have been excavated before the time of Wallace and Bruce, are supposed to have furnished these heroic men with a secure hiding place in their time of need; two of the chambers are dark, and the others lit from an opening in the rocks, which looks outside as if a stone had been accidentally misplaced. The descent to the bank of the river is long and steep, but when it is reached, the scenery compensates for any fatigue; the waters rush through the rocks, which have fallen scattered among them, with an impetuosity which shows that obstructions but increase their force; and they foam, and dash, and brawl, as if impatient of delay. From every chink of the overhanging rocks, a variety of wild plants and bushes, mingling with the shining fern and purple heather force their way and glint among the foliage of the trees. The love of retirement, which is remarkable in the imaginative, may have been increased in Drummond by his delicacy of constitution; but be that as it may, from very childhood he loved the most secluded paths among the rocks and glens, and would gladly have passed his days in those solitary wanderings and lonely musings; but he was destined for more active life by his father; he received his education at the High School, in Edinburgh, where he became distinguished for great acquisitions. When his education was completed, he was sent to France, where he remained for four years; he studied law, which was to be his profession, and made great proficiency in the pursuit. With what feelings he had left Hawthornden, we can gather from the following extract:—

"What sweet delight a quiet life affords,
And what it is from bondage to be free,
Far from the madding world's hoarse discords,
Sweet, flow'ry place, I first did learn of thee.
Ah! if I were mine own, your dear resorts
I would not change with prince's stateliest courts."

After his father's death he gave up the study of the law, and returned to Hawthornden: when time softened the affliction occasioned by his loss, his native scenery resumed its influence over his feelings, and to a mind so naturally reflective, the retirement in which he indulged was the highest enjoyment;—he thus contrasts its calm repose with the hollow pleasures of the Court:—

"Thrice happy he, who, by some shady grove,
Far from the clamorous world, doth live his own;
Though solitary; who is not alone,
But doth converse with that eternal love—
Oh, how more sweet is bird's harmonious moan,
Or the hoarse sobbings of the widow'd dove,
Than those smooth whisp'rings near a prince's throne,
Which good make doubtful, do the evil approve!
O! how more sweet is Zephyr's wholesome breath,
And sighs embalm'd, which new-born flow'rs unfold,
Than that applause, vain honour doth bequeath!
How sweet are streams, to poison drunk in gold!
The world is full of horror, troubles, slights;
Woods' harmless shades have only true delights."

He was soon to experience feelings more fervid than those which the sweet solitudes of Hawthornden could inspire. It fell one day that he saw the beautiful daughter of a neighbouring gentleman, of an ancient family and great worth. (Cunningham of Barnes.) Captivated at once by her charms, her image took possession of his imagination; but he tells the story of his changed feelings far better than we could give it—so it is fitter to let him speak for himself:—

"Ah me, and am I now the man whose muse
In happier time was wont to laugh at love,
And those who suffer'd that blind boy abuse
The noble gifts were given them from above—
What metamorphose strange is this I prove!
Myself now scarce myself I find to be,
And think no fable Circe's tyranny,
And all the tales are told of changed Jove.
Virtue hath taught, with her philosophy,
My mind into a better course to move:
Reason may chide her full, and oft reprove
Affection's power: but what is that to me,
Who ever think, and never think on ought
But that bright Cherubim, which thralls my thought."

The lover's imagination had not played him false in the estimate of the gifts and graces with which it had adorned the fair girl; her tastes and feelings were in such accordance with his own, that on a nearer acquaintance the most perfect sympathy lent its charms to their intercourse. Passionately in love, he sang her praises through the woods and glens. His noble sentiments and varied accomplishments; his exquisite skill in music, and his passionate devotion, soon found their way to her heart, and won its tenderest affection. Then what happy days were theirs, in the full enjoyment of present felicity, and in forming plans for future happiness. The wedding day was fixed, but ere it came she fell ill of a fever, and on its very eve she died. An attempt to describe the grief of one of so much sensibility would have been a vain task; but we learn that as soon as the stunning effects of the blow had in some measure passed away, he felt that some effort was absolutely necessary. The scenes, so much loved, recalled but the visions of departed happiness, mournfully contrasted with blighted hopes and unavailing regret; so he resolved to leave Hawthornden, and to seek in foreign travel to give a new turn to his distracted thoughts. Poetry had been so long the natural outlet for his feelings, that they again found vent in effusions of great pathos, effusions which must have constantly opened the deep springs of sorrow, but which we may hope soothed them, at the same time, into a gentler current. He travelled through Germany, France, and Italy, visiting, as he went, their most celebrated universities. Years passed on in these wanderings, before he could bring himself to return to Hawthornden. The emotion with which he found himself there again may be conceived but not described: that his early love was ever cherished most passionately in his remembrance is evinced by his constantly recurring to her in the most affecting passages of his poetry. The wild burst of agony with which he conjures her to look from heaven, to which abode he believes her translated, and to have pity on his tears, is the true language of grief: few lines have ever fallen in our way more touching than his "Address to Spring;" and the "Apostrophe to his Lute," with which it concludes, awakens the sympathy of all who know the powerful associations which are linked with music. The airs which we remember to have heard in company with one we loved, those which were the especial favourites, or which may have responded to their touch, or been accompanied by their voice, need not to be recalled by sound, for they ever float upon the memory in all their pathetic sweetness. Part of the poem runs thus:

"Sweet spring, thou com'st, but ah! my pleasant hours
And happy days with thee come not again;
The sad memorials only of my pain
Do with thee come, which turn my sweets to sour;
Thou art the same which still thou wert before,
Delicious, lusty, amiable, fair;
But she, whose breath embalm'd thy wholesome air,
Is gone: nor gold, nor gems can her restore."

The first production of Drummond's, which brought him into notice, was his elegy on the death of Prince Henry, eldest son of King James the First; it has often been said, that nobody could read it without being reminded of "Lycidas," and it has been observed too, that Milton's sonnets are remarkable for a similarity in their flow and spirit to those of the poet of Hawthornden. It is supposed that Milton greatly admired Drummond's writings, and his sympathies may have been so strongly excited, as to have given unconsciously, to some of his minor compositions, a resemblance at which he had never aimed. His nephew and pupil, Philips, expressed himself in the highest terms with regard to Drummond's writings, and it has been thought that the estimation in which he held them was but a reflection of his uncle's opinion; "his poems," says Philips, "are the efforts of a genius, the most polite and verdant that ever the Scotch nations produced." His prose writings were much valued, and it is thus Philips speaks of his history of the seven Jameses. "Had there been nothing else extant of his writings, consider but the language, how florid and ornate it is,—consider the order and the prudent conduct of the story, and you will rank him in the number of the best writers." The elegy on the death of Prince Henry impressed Ben Jonson so strongly with an idea of the author's genius, that he made his way to Hawthornden to see him; it has been stated that he accomplished the journey on foot; that he was not disappointed, may be inferred from his having remained with Drummond for three weeks. Seated on the rocks in the midst of the romantic scenery, these gifted men would converse for hours together. Notes of their conversations are found in Drummond's works, and are sufficiently curious; in his confidential intercourse, Jonson must have been sensibly touched by the sympathy of the poet, for he talked to him on the very subject which interested him the most—the early death of his eldest son, a child of great promise, and inexpressibly dear to him. He detailed the remarkable circumstances which had occurred at the time of his loss; as the plague had broken out in London, and he had left the boy exposed to the contagion of fever, it is not strange that uneasy dreams and vivid imaginations should represent what he most dreaded. But he was strongly impressed with the belief that what he described had been no idle phantasy; he went on to tell, "that when the king came to England, about the time that the plague was in London, he, being in the country, at Sir Robert Cotton's house, with old Cambden, saw in a vision his eldest son, then a young child, and at London, appear unto him with the mark of blood upon his forehead, as if it had been with a sword, at which, amazed, he prayed unto God; and in the morning he came unto Mr. Cambden's chamber to tell him, who persuaded him it was but an apprehension, at which, he should not be dejected. In the meantime, there came letters from his wife of the death of that boy in the plague: he appeared to him, he said, of a manly shape, and of that growth, he thinks, he shall be at the resurrection."

Many years had passed away, since the one he had so much loved had been laid in her grave, and Drummond was now in his forty-fifth year, when he chanced to see Margaret Logan, (the granddaughter of Sir Robert Logan.) Struck by her resemblance to his early love, his feelings became deeply interested, and he wooed and won her:—there is every reason to think that he soon loved her for her own sake, and that in the calm enjoyment of domestic life, surrounded by his wife and children, he found a consolation for the disappointment of his early hopes and more passionate attachment. He scarcely could ever have left home; and indeed seems to have had a horror of a sea voyage; for he says in a letter to a friend, when speaking of it, "A part of Noah's judgment, and no small misery, that us Islanders cannot take a view of God's earth, without crossing the stormy, breaking, and deceitful sea." In the same letter he mentions the pleasure which he had in the game of chess. From all that is incidentally gathered, there is every reason to think that the companion whom he had chosen made his home a happy one: enthusiastically attached to King Charles, he espoused his cause most warmly, and his thoughts and his pen were constantly employed in its service; but to his lasting honour it may be said, that Drummond appeared alike divested of partiality and prejudice, at a time when reason might have been blinded by excitement; he could plainly see and point out the errors of Government, and he could tolerate the opinions which differed from his own. His writings were directed to the maintenance of peace, and none ever served his Sovereign with more devoted zeal, or with clearer views of his true interest. The deep concern which he took in the royal cause, exposed him to great hostility when the Civil War broke out; the last proof which he gave of his affection for Charles was indeed an affecting one. When he found that his royal master was beleaguered, he fell into a deep melancholy; he languished but for a few months, and then died. The last lines which he is supposed to have written, run thus:—

"Love, which is here a care
That wit and will doth mar,
Uncertain truce, and a most certain war;
A shrill tempestuous wind
Which doth disturb the mind,
And like wild waves, all our designs or move.
—Among those powers above
Which see their Maker's face,
It a contentment is, a quiet peace,
A pleasure void of grief, a constant rest.
Eternal joy which nothing can molest!"

Drummond was buried in the church of Lasswade, in the neighbourhood of Hawthornden. Lasswade is indeed a most fitting spot for the last resting place of the poet: its quiet pastoral beauty; the river gliding gently on, seeming in its flow to tell of repose and peace; and the lovely scenery by "sweet glen and greenwood tree," through which it bends its way, make Lasswade, with all its pleasant paths, one of the most lovely spots which can be met with anywhere. Nor can we forget that it was here Scott spent some of his happiest hours; it was his favourite haunt in boyhood, and here the first days of his married life, and some succeeding summers were passed, in the indulgence of the simple tastes which so often mark minds of the highest stamp. He loved to trim the garden of his cottage, to cultivate its flowers, and train its creeping plants; he constructed a rustic arcolway as an entrance to his humble abode. "Nor," I have heard him say, Lockhart tells, "was he prouder of any work than of this." The romantic solitudes by the banks of the Esk, where he delighted to stroll—Roslin with its rocks and glen,—and sweet Hawthoruden, influenced his mind in no common degree, and first called forth those powers which were to charm the world, in the fine ballads which would alone have sufficed to immortalize his name. M. A.

"Where Jonson sat in Drummond's silent shade."

IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE AUTUMN OF 1811.

FROM THE LETTERS AND MEMORANDA OF FREDERIKA BREMER.

First Impressions of England two years since—Autumn life—England at the time—Spring life—Effects of Free-trade—New Institutions for the people in the cities—Liverpool—"Ragged Schools"—Visit to a Temperance Meeting—Three classes of poor—Princes Park—The Manufacturing Districts—Fire-worshippers, ancient and modern—The cry of the children—Improvements—Manchester—Visit to the Cotton Factories—The subject of conversation in Manchester—Education of the people—The late visit of the Queen—The popularity of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert—The cause for this—The true power of the Monarch—Birmingham—Steel-pen manufactory—Prosperity of Birmingham—Birmingham and St. Hieronymus—The working people in the manufacturing districts—The Chartist—Dangers—Future Prospects.

It is two years since I first found myself in England. When I was in England in the autumn of 1819, the cholera was there. A dense, oppressive atmosphere rested over its cities, as of a cloud pregnant with lightning. Hearses rolled through the streets. The towns were empty of people; for all who had the means of doing so had fled into the country; they who had not were compelled to remain. I saw shadowy figures, clad in black, stealing along the streets, more like ghosts than creatures of flesh and blood. Never before had I seen human wretchedness in such a form as I beheld it in Hull and in London. Wretchedness enough may be found, God knows, even in Stockholm, and it shows itself openly enough there in street and market. But it is there most frequently an undisguised, an unabashed wretchedness. It is not ashamed to beg, to show its rags or its drunken countenance. It is a child of crime; and that is perhaps the most extreme wretchedness. But it is less painful to behold, because it seems to be suffering only its own deserts. One is more easily satisfied to turn one's head aside and pass on. One thinks, "I cannot help that!"

In England, however, misery had another appearance; it was not so much that of degradation as of want, pallid want. It was meagre and retiring; it ventured not to look up, or it looked up with a glance of hopeless beseeching—so spirit-broken! It tried to look respectable. Those men with coats and hats brushed till the nap was gone; those pale women in scanty, washed-out but yet decent clothes,—it was a sight which one could hardly bear. In a solitary walk of ten minutes in the streets of Hull, I saw ten times more want than I had seen in a ten months' residence in Denmark.

The sun shone joyously as I travelled through the manufacturing districts; saw their groups of towns and suburbs; saw their smoking pillars and pyramids towering up everywhere in the wide landscape;—saw glowing gorges of fire open themselves in the earth, as if it were burning,—a splendid and wonderfully picturesque spectacle, reminding one of fire-worshippers, of ancient and modern time, and of their altars. But I heard the mournful cry of the children from the factories; the cry which the public voice has made audible to the world; the cry of the children, of the little ones who had been compelled by the lust of gain of their parents and the manufacturers to sacrifice life, and joy, and health, in the workshops of machinery; the children who lie down in those beds which never are cold, the children who are driven and beaten till they sink insensibly into death or fatuity,—that living death; I heard the wailing cry of the children, which Elizabeth Barrett interpreted in her affecting poem; and the wealthy manufacturing districts, with their towns, their fire-columns, their pyramids, seemed to me like an enormous temple of Moloch, in which the mammon-worshippers of England offered up even children to the burning arms of their god,—children, the hope of the earth, and its most delicious and most beautiful joy!

I arrived in London. They told me there was nobody in London. It was not the season in which the higher classes were in London. Besides which, the cholera was there; and all well-to-do people, who were able, had fled from the infected city. And that indeed might be the reason why there seemed to me to be so many out of health,—why that pale countenance of want was so visible. Certain it is, that it became to me as a Medusa's head, which stood between me and everything beautiful and great in that great capital, the rich life and physiognomy of which would otherwise have enchanted me. But as it was, the palaces, and the statues, and the noble parks, Hampstead and Piccadilly, and Belgravia and Westminster, and the Tower, and even the Thames itself, with all its everchanging life, were no more than the decorations of a great tragedy. And when in St.

(1) It cannot be expected that all readers will entirely agree with Miss Bremer in the opinions which result from her Impressions of England; neither, perhaps, will her statements be at all times admitted as indisputable. Her contributions cannot fail to be universally interesting; as they proceed, they will be no doubt instructive, and prove exceedingly attractive to the readers of this Journal, as exhibiting the fresh and earnest feelings of a distinguished and highly-gifted foreigner in reference to our customs, condition and institutions.

The Editor considers it right to print Miss Bremer's communications without change or comment; fully concurring in the generous spirit and upright mind of the admirable and popular writer, as well as in the clearness of her observation and the general soundness of her judgment.

It may be well to add, that Miss Bremer's MS. was received by the Editor on the eve of the number being put to press.—Ed. S. L. J.

Paul's, I heard the great roar of the voice of London,—that roar, which, as it is said, never is silent, but merely slumbers for an hour between three and four o'clock in the morning;—when I heard that voice in that empty church, where there was no divine worship, and looked up into its beautiful cupola, which was filled by no song of praise, but only by that resounding, roaring voice, a dark chaotic roar, then seemed I to perceive the sound of the rivers of fate rolling onward through time over falling kingdoms and people, and bearing them onward down into an immeasurable grave!—It was but for a moment, but it was a horrible dream!

One sight I beheld in London which made me look up with rejoicing, which made me think "that old Ygdrasil is still budding." This was the so-called metropolitan-buildings; a structure of many homes in one great mass of building, erected by a society of enlightened men for the use of the poorer working class, to provide respectable families of that class with excellent dwellings at a reasonable rate, where they might possess that which is of the most indispensable importance to the rich, as well as to the poor, if they are to enjoy health both of body and soul—light, air, and water, pure as God created them for the use of mankind. The sight of these homes, and of the families that inhabited them, as well as of the newly-erected extensive public baths and wash-houses for the same class, together with the assurance that these institutions already, in the second year of their establishment, returned more than full interest to their projectors, produced the happiest impression which I at this time received of England. These were to me as seed of the future, which gave the promise of verdant shoots in the old tree.—

Nevertheless, when I left the shores of England, and saw thick autumnal fog enveloping them, it was with a sorrowful feeling for the Old world; and with an inquiring glance of longing and hope, I turned myself to the New.

Two years passed on—a sun-bright, glowing dream, full of the vigour of life!—it was again autumn, and I was again in England. Autumn met me there with cold, and rain, and tempest, with the most horrible weather that can be imagined, and such as I had never seen on the other side of the globe. But in social life, everywhere throughout the mental atmosphere, a different spirit prevailed. There, I perceived with astonishment and joy, there it was that of spring.

Free-trade had borne fruit, and under its banners manufacture and trade had shot forth into new life; the price of all kinds of grain had fallen, bread had become cheap. This tree of liberty, planted by Cobden and Peel, had, with a strong and vigorous vitality, penetrated, as it were, the life of the English people, and I heard on every hand the sighing of its leaves in the free wind. The Crystal Palace was its full-blown, magnificent blossom;—and like swarms of rejoicing bees flew the human throng upon the wings of steam, backwards and forwards, to the great world's blossom; there all the nations met together, there all manufactures, there all industry, and every kind of product, unfolded their flowers for the observation and the joy of all . . . a Cactus grandiflora, such as the world had never till then seen.

I perceived more clearly every day of my stay in England, that this period is one of a general awakening to a new, fresh life. In the manufacturing districts, in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, everywhere, I heard the same conversation among all classes; prosperity was universal and still advancing. That pale countenance of want, which had on my first visit appeared to me so appalling, I now no longer saw as formerly; and even where it was seen stealing along, like a gloomy shadow near to the tables of abundance, it appeared to me no longer as a cloud filled with the breath of cholera, darkening the face of heaven, but rather as one of those clouds over which the wind and sun have power, and which are swallowed up, which vanish in space, in the bright ether. . . .

The low price of grain, the consequence of free-trade, has produced this change: and it was universally acknowledged. The only objection I heard brought against the low price of corn was this, "The people are become proud and careless; I have seen great pieces of bread thrown out into the streets!"

Yet bread alone had not really done all this; a nobler bread is required for man in order that he may fully derive the benefit even of the outward material bread. Nor had free-trade alone done all this either; there is also another power besides this which has been operative in that general awakening, in that wholesome spirit which I perceived in England.

If this power were to be symbolized by art, it would present us with a female figure—a beautiful woman with a child at her breast, is the symbol which art makes use of, to express human love. And perhaps, art is right in so doing. And perhaps it is the female principle in human nature, which, in the present new life in England, enables the man's hand to accomplish the work; because from the most remote antiquity, has a male Deity been chosen to represent trade, and navigation, and mining, and all occupation of the earth. But, so says one of the oldest sagas of the world—when the divine life revealed itself on the earth, a divine pair came forth. In a lotus-flower which ascended from the waters of the Nile, were born at the same time Osiris and Isis, and together they went forth to bless the earth.

I saw the truth of this saga confirmed by what I beheld in England. But in speaking of this, I shall especially linger on the new proofs thereof, in the new Institutions which promise a more beautiful future to the human race; not upon the old and insufficient, however good they may be, but upon the new, because it is upon the new that my eye has been especially directed.

Let me linger, in the first place, on works of human love—the female figure, with the child at her breast; because these are they which lay the foundation of all others.

In Liverpool, I visited the so-called Ragged Schools—the schools where are collected from the streets vagabond, neglected and begging children, who are here taught to read and so on,—who here receive the first rudiments of instruction, even in singing. These schools are, some of them evening, others day schools, and in some of them, “the Industrial Ragged Schools,” children are kept there altogether; receive food and clothing, and are taught trades. When the schools of this class were first established in Liverpool, the number of children who otherwise had no chance of receiving instruction, amounted to about twenty thousand. Right-minded, thinking men, saw that in these children were growing up in the streets, those “dangerous classes,” of which so much has been said of late times; these men met together, obtained means to cover the most necessary outlay of expense, and then, according to the eloquent words of Lord Ashley, that “it is in childhood that evil habits are formed and take root; it is childhood which must be guarded from temptation to crime;” they opened these ragged schools with the design of receiving the most friendless, the most wretched of society’s young generation—properly, “the children of rags, born in beggary, and for beggary.”

I visited the Industrial Ragged School for boys, intended for the lowest grade of these little children, without parents, or abandoned by them to the influences of crime. There, I saw the first class sitting in their rags, upon benches in a cold room, arranging with their little frost-bitten fingers bristles for the brush-maker. The faces of the boys were clean; many of them I remarked were handsome, and almost universally they had beautiful and bright eyes. Those little fingers moved with extraordinary rapidity; the boys were evidently wishful to do their best; they knew that they by that means should obtain better clothing, and would be removed to the upper room, and more amusing employment. I observed these “dangerous classes”—just gathered up from the lanes, and the kennels, on their way to destruction; and was astonished when I thought that their countenances might have borne the stamp of crime. Bright glances of childhood, for that were you never designed by the Creator! “Suffer little children to come unto me.” These words, from the lips of heaven, are for ever sounding to earth.

In the upper room a great number of boys were busy pasting paper-bags for various trades, confectioners, etc. who make use of such in the rapid sale of their wares; here, also, other boys were employed in printing upon the bags the names and residences of the various tradesmen who had ordered them. The work progressed rapidly, and seemed very amusing to the children. The establishment for their residence, and their beds, were poor; but all was neat and clean, the air was fresh, and the children were cheerful. The institution was, however, but yet in its infancy, and its means were small.

Half-a-dozen women in wretched clothes sat in the entrance-room with their boys, for whom they hoped to gain admittance into the school, and were now, therefore, waiting till the directors of the establishment made their appearance.

These gentlemen kindly invited me to be present at the examination of these mothers. The women were brought in one at a time, and one and all were made to tell her history, and to explain her circumstances. The examination was carried on with earnestness and precision. The result of all, however, was, that there was not one of the women now present who had a right to the assistance which they desired. On one or two occasions I could not help admiring the patience of the directors. Above all, it seemed to me, that these mothers needed to go to school even more than their children.—When will people come to regard in all its full extent the influence of the mother upon the child? When will people come to reflect on the education of mothers in its higher sense? My conductor in Liverpool, Mr. B—, the noble and kind Home Missionary,¹ recognised one of these women, and related to me the history of herself and her husband—a horrible history of drunkenness, which had almost ended in suicide.

Later in the day I visited the evening school for girls, also of the ragged class, and heard there a remarkably sweet and beautiful song. Later still I accompanied my friendly conductor to a temperance meeting, held in the same building, and which meets every Thursday, and where the Missionary was accustomed to meet and converse with the poorest brethren of his congregation. The wind blew, and the rain poured down. I was astonished, however, to see when we entered, that the room was filled with people who evidently had not much to defend themselves with from the wind and rain. The benches were filled both with men and women. It became crowded and very hot. Mr. B— opened the meeting with a speech about the dangers and consequences of drunkenness, and as he warmed in his subject he related, yet without mentioning any name, the history of the mother whom he had this day seen, beseeching that public charity would take charge of her son. The assembly, which during the moral treatise they had just heard had evidently become somewhat drowsy, woke up at once during the relation of that story, and when the narrator arrived at the catastrophe, in which the intoxicated woman, urged on by the madness of thirst, drank up half-a-bottle of oil of vitriol, a general expression of horror might have been heard, especially from the lips of the women.

When this relation, which was full of strong vitality, was ended, Mr. B— read a poem written by a working man in praise of temperance, which had the effect of again lulling the auditors—and myself even—into an agreeable doze. We all woke up again, however, when Mr. B—, in a jocular manner, begged of Mr. J— to stand up, and tell us something about “that Great Exhibition in London” which he had lately been to see. Mr. J—— did not, however, stand up, because Mr. K—— wished to speak first. Accordingly, being encouraged to do so by Mr. B——, a stout-built man of about sixty came forward; he was dressed in coarse, but good clothes, and had an open countenance, over which played a smile of humour. He mounted the platform, and was greeted by the assembly with evident delight. He related his own history, simple, but full of the warmth of life, in that strong-grained, wit-interspersed style of popular eloquence, full of heart and humour at the same time, which our cultivated orators would do well to study, if they wish to make a living impression on the people. He related how he, in his younger years, never tasted brandy, but he became a seaman, and began to drink, that he might look manly among his fellows; how, by degrees, he acquired the power of swallowing more strong liquor than any of them all, fell into crime, misery, and shame; how he became converted, and again temperate, and how he had not now for fifteen years tasted spirits, and had ever since remained in good health and good circumstances.

(1) A minister paid by the community for devoting himself exclusively to its poor, and one worthy of the confidence reposed in him.

This was the substance of his story; but how the narrative was interspersed with merry conceits, which excited universal amusement, and with energetic proverbs—to which Mr. B——, beyond any one else, gave the highest applause—how cleverly “Mr. Halcobol” was brought in, and how contemptuously “the long-necked gentleman, Mr. Halcobol in the bottle,” was treated, and with how much animation all this was done and received—must have been heard to have been fully imagined. The speech was concluded by recommending “total abstinence” as the only means for insuring a perfect change of life.

After this there entered a little throng of children with joyful faces, the same whom I had already heard sing in the upper room of the house; these children were the so-called “Band of Hope”—children who had taken the pledge to abstain from all strong drinks themselves, and to promote the advancement of temperance by all the means in their power, for which they received printed cards containing their pledge, together with symbolical devices, proverbs, etc. That little “Band of Hope” struck up with their clear voices, fresh as the morning, various songs, among which one in particular, “The Spindle and Shuttle,” was received with great delight, all present joining in the chorus. Hymns and patriotic songs were also sung by “The Band of Hope,” and now and then the company joined in with the children. Before the assembly separated this evening, several went forward, and took the pledge. Among these was a man and his wife. They took each other by the hand. The woman with her other hand held her handkerchief over her left eye; it might be seen, nevertheless, that this eye was black, probably from the husband’s fist.

What had influenced them to this? What had operated upon these rude natures?—induced them to break loose from habits of drunkenness,—to turn from the pleasures of hell to those of heaven? What was it that had operated on all here so awakeningly, so livingly? Could it be the discourse they had heard? could it be the poem in praise of temperance? Nothing of the kind. I saw them go to sleep during these. I became sleepy myself. No, that which operated here so livingly,—was the life itself. It was that living narrative of the unhappy woman; it was the sailor’s history of his own life, his battles with “Mr. Halcobol;” it was the songs of the children, the pure, dewy-fresh voices of the little “Band of Hope.” All these it was which had operated upon, which had awakened their minds, had animated their brains, warmed their hearts; this it was which had impelled the husband and wife, hand in hand, to come forward and consecrate themselves to a new marriage, to a better life. Individual experience of suffering, of joy, of sin, of conversion, of love and happiness, must be told, if the relation is to have any power over the human heart; life itself must be called into action if we would awake the dead.

I could not but remark at this meeting, how cordial and familiar an understanding seemed to exist between the leader, Mr. B——, and the assembly, and which arose in part from his own peculiar character, and in part from his intimate acquaintance with his hearers. In the same way, his continual intercourse with these people, and his knowledge of their everyday life, is an excellent help to him in giving force to the sermons which he preaches among them. I shall not forget the effect produced by his story of the woman and the bottle of vitriol.

A few days later I visited, with the same friendly man, some different classes of poor people,—namely, the wicked and the idle; they who had fallen into want through their own improvidence, but who had now raised themselves again; and the estimable, who had honourably combated with unavoidable poverty. In one certain quarter of Liverpool it is that the first class is especially met with. Of this class of poor in their wretched rooms, with their low, brutalized expression, I will not speak; companion-pieces to this misery may be met with everywhere. Most of those whom I saw were Irish. It was a Sunday noon, after divine service. The almshouses were already open in this part of the town, and young girls and men might be seen talking together before them, or sitting upon the steps.

Of the second class I call to mind, with especial pleasure, one little household. It was a mother and her son. Her means of support, a mangle, stood in the little room in which she had lived since she had raised herself up again. It was dinner-time. A table, neatly covered for two persons, stood in the room, and upon the iron stand before the fire was placed a dish of mashed potatoes, nicely browned, ready to be set on the table. The mother was waiting for her son, and the dinner was waiting for him. He was the organ-blower in a church during divine service, and he returned whilst I was still there. He was well dressed, but was a little, weakly man, and squinted; the mother’s eyes, however, regarded him with love. This son was her only one, and her all.

And he, to whom mother Nature had acted as a step-mother, had a noble mother's heart to warm himself with, which prepared for him an excellent home, a well-covered table, and a comfortable bed. That poor little home was not without its wealth.

As belonging to the third and highest class, I must mention two families, both of them shoemakers, and both of them inhabiting cellars. The one family consisted of old, the other of young people. The old shoemaker had to maintain his wife, who was lame and sick, from a fall in the street, and a daughter. The young one had a young wife, and five little children to provide for; but work was scanty and the mouths many. At this house, also, it was dinner-time, and I saw upon the table nothing but potatoes. The children were clean, and had remarkably agreeable faces; but—they were pale; so was also the father of the family. The young and pretty, but very pale mother said, "Since I have come into this room I have never been well, and this I know—I shall not live long!" Her eyes filled with tears; and it was plain enough to see that this really delicate constitution could not long sustain the effects of the cold, damp room, into which no sunbeam entered. These two families, of the same trade, and alike poor, had become friends in need. When one of the fathers of the family wanted work, and was informed by the Home-missionary who visited them that the other had it, the intelligence seemed a consolation to him. Gladdening sight of human sympathy, which keeps the head erect and the heart sound under the depressing struggle against competition! But little gladdening to me would have been the sight of these families in their cellar-homes, had I not at the same time been aware of the increase of those "Model Lodging-Houses," which may be met with in many parts of England, and which will remove these inhabitants of cellars, they who sit in darkness, into the blessing of the light of life,—which will provide worthy dwellings for worthy people. But of this I shall speak somewhat later, in connexion with other new institutions for the advancement of the health, both of body and soul, of—all classes.

"For no one for himself doth live or suffer."

For myself, I was well provided for by English hospitality, and enjoyed an excellent home in the house of the noble and popular preacher, J. M——. With him, and his wife (one of those beautiful, motherly natures, who through a peculiar geniality of heart is able to accomplish so much, and to render herself and everything that is good twofold, in quite another manner to that of the multiplication-table, which merely makes two and two into four)—with them and their family I spent some beautiful days amid conversation and music. There, in the neighbourhood of their house, I saw also one of those English parks, whose verdant, carefully-kept sward, and groups of shrubs and flowers, give so peculiar and so attractive a charm to the English landscape. Add to this a river-like sheet of water; swans, groups of beautiful children and ladies feeding them on the banks, the song of birds everywhere amongst the shrubs; scattered palaces, and handsome country-houses—and everything looking so finished, so splendid, so beautiful and perfect, as if nothing out of condition, nothing in tatters or shabby was to be found in the world, Such was the impression produced by the Prince's Park, which was laid out by a wealthy private gentleman, Mr. J——, on the birth of the Prince of Wales, the eldest son of Queen Victoria, and thrown open to the public with only this single admonition exhibited, in large letters, in various parts of the park, "It is hoped the public will protect that which is intended for the public enjoyment."

But I must leave this enchanting Idyll, and hasten into the manufacturing districts; and, first of all, to Manchester:—

In my imagination Manchester was like a colossal woman sitting at her spinning-wheel, with her enormous manufactories; her subject towns, suburbs, villages, factories, lying for many miles round, spinning, spinning, spinning clothes for all the people on the face of the earth. And there, as she sate, the queen of the spindle, with her masses of ugly houses and factories, enveloped in dense rain-clouds, as if in cobwebs, the effect she made upon me was gloomy and depressing. Yet even here, also, I was to breathe a more refreshing atmosphere of life; even here was I also to see light. Free-trade had brought hither her emancipating spirit. It was a time of remarkable activity and prosperity. The work-people were fully employed; wages were good, and food was cheap. Even here also had ragged-schools been established, together with many institutions for improving the condition of the poor working-classes. In one of these ragged-schools the boys had a perfectly organized band of music, in which they played and blew so that it was a pleasure—and sometimes a disadvantage, to hear them. The lamenting "cry of the children" was no longer heard from the factories. Government had put an end to the cruelties and oppressions formerly practised on these little ones by the unscrupulous lust of gain. No child under ten years old can now be employed in the factories, and even such, when employed, must of necessity be allowed part of the day for school. Every large factory has now generally its own school, with a paid master for the children. The boys whom I saw in the great rooms of the factories, and with whom I conversed, looked both healthy and cheerful.

Two ideas were impressed upon my mind at this place: how dangerous it is, even amid a high degree of social culture, to give one class of men unrestrained power over another; and how easily a free people, with a powerful public spirit, and accustomed to self-government, can raise themselves out of humiliating circumstances. This spirit has done much already in England, but it has yet more to do.

Upon one of those large gloomy factories in Manchester, I read, inscribed in iron letters, "THE GREAT BEEHIVE;" and in truth, a good name for these enormous hives of human industrial toil, in which people have sometimes forgotten, and still forget, that man is anything more than a working bee, which lives to fill its cell in the hive, and die. I visited several of these huge beehives. In one of them, which employed twelve hundred workpeople, I saw, in a large room, above three hundred women sitting in rows winding cotton on reels. The room was clean, and so also were all the women. It did not appear to be hard work; but the steadfastly-fixed attention with which these women pursued their labour seemed to me distressingly wearisome. They did not allow themselves to look up, still less to turn their heads or to talk. Their life seemed to depend upon the cotton thread.

In another of these great beehives, a long low room, in which were six hundred power-loom, represented an extraordinary appearance. What a snatching to and fro, what a jingling, what an incessant stir, and what a moist atmosphere there was between floor and ceiling, as if the limbs of some absurd, unheard-of beast, with a thousand arms, had been galvanized! Around us, from three to four hundred operatives, women and men, stood among the rapid machinery watching and tending. The twelve o'clock bell rung, and now the whole throng of workpeople would go forth to their various mid-day quarters; the greatest number to their respective dwellings in the neighbourhood of the factory. I placed myself, together with my conductor, in the court outside the door of the room, which was on lower ground, in order that I might have a better view of the workpeople as they came out.

Just as one sees bees coming out of a hive into the air, two, three, or four at a time—pause, as it were, a moment from the effects of open air and light, and then with a low hum, dart forth into space, each one his own way; so was it in this case. Thus came they forth, men and women, youths and girls. The greater number were well dressed, looked healthy, and full of spirit. In many, however, might be seen the expression of a rude life; they bore the traces of depravity about them.

As labour is now organized in the factories at Manchester, it cannot easily be otherwise. The master-manufacturer is not acquainted with his workpeople. He hires spinners; and every spinner is master of a room, and he it is who hires the hands. He is the autocrat of the room, and not unfrequently is a severe and immoral one. The operatives live in their own houses, apart from everything belonging to the master-manufacturer, with the exception of the raw material.

In the country it is otherwise; there the master manufacturer may be, and often is, a fatherly friend and guardian of his people. And where he is so, it is in general fully acknowledged. The character which each manufacturer bears as an employer, even in Manchester, is perfectly well known. People mention with precision the good, the worthless, or the wicked master. I visited factories belonging to some of these various characters, but perceived a more marked difference in the manners and appearance of the masters themselves, than in the appearance and condition of the workpeople. At the present moment the difference could not be very perceptible, because the general demand for hands causes the circumstances of the lower classes to be generally good. But, as before remarked, the patriarchal connexion between master and servant, with its good, as well as its evil consequences, no longer exists in the manufacturing towns of England. Employer and employed stand beside each other, or rather opposed to each other, excepting through the requirements of labour. The whole end and aim of the Manchester manufacturer—when he is not subjected to machinery, and lives merely as a screw, or portion of it—is, to get out of Manchester. He spins and makes use of all means, good or bad, to lay by sufficient money to live independently, or to build himself a house at a distance from the smoky, restless town, away from the bustle—away from the throng of restless, striving workpeople. His object is to arrive at quiet in the country, in a comfortable home; and having attained this object, he looks upon the noisy, labouring hive, out of which he has lately come, as a something with which he has no concern, and out of which he is glad to have escaped with a whole skin. Such is the case with many—God forbid that we should say, with all!

Have you read "Mary Barton," a so-called Manchester-story? If you have not done so, then read this absorbing, affecting description of the dark side of the life of the Manchester operative, which is universally acknowledged to be true, and not overdrawn. The work has given to its author, Mrs. E. Gaskell, a high place among the young writers of England. Whilst in the beautiful country-house of this amiable lady, and seeing the sun-bright expression of her countenance, and listening to the cheerful tones of her voice, I could not help marvelling that this affecting description of the dark side of human life had been given by her. But God created the sun in order that it might shine into darkness. I beheld his sun still more potent, still more glowing, in another eye in England, which has revealed a darker depth in the life of the working-classes, and flashed forth, with the might of genius, lightnings from the congregated clouds—a glance which has flung over this agitated chaos the thunder-bolts of judgment, and the beautiful morning-flush of his own longing. I saw it in Charles Kingsley's eye, the young spiritual warrior, the author of "Alton Locke" and "Yeast," novels which have attracted, and still attract, a great deal of attention in England, and together with Elizabeth Gaskell's descriptions, have powerfully contributed to turn the attention of the public upon the life and condition of the working classes.

But neither books, nor schools, nor model-dwellings, nor any efforts of genius, nor of human love, could avail to improve fundamentally the condition, and to remove the mischief here; not all the outstretched hands of brotherly kindness could avail, if they are not met by another movement, apparently insignificant in itself, but in reality all-powerful, the movement in the working classes,—that of—helping themselves in an effectual manner. Of this movement I shall speak more at large.

Two subjects of conversation occupied the people of Manchester very much at this time. The one was the question,—a vital question for the whole of England,—of popular education. The people of Manchester had begun to take the subject into serious consideration, and had come to the conclusion that there might at once be adopted a simple system of education by which, as in the United States, every one should receive in the people's school practical and moral instruction, and that religious instruction should be left for the home or for the Sunday teaching. The willingness to thus act in concert which has been shown by the clergy of the Established Church in Manchester, is a good omen to the various religious sects united in this work. All things considered, it seems to me that there is at this moment in England the most decided movement towards a new development, a new life as well in theoretic as in practically popular respects; and it is more apparent in the Established Church than in any other religious body.

The second great subject of conversation as well in Manchester as in Liverpool, was Queen Victoria's expected visit. The Queen had announced her intention of visiting the great towns of the manufacturing districts, in company with Prince Albert, in the middle of the month, and they were accordingly expected in a few days. Several of these towns had never before seen a crowned head within their walls, and this, in connexion with the great popularity of the Queen, and the liking and the love which the people have for her, had perfectly enchanted the inhabitants of Manchester. They were preparing to give a royal reception to their lofty guests. Nothing could be too magnificent or too costly in the eyes of the Manchester people which could testify their homage. The whole of the district, now that the Queen was expected, was said to be "brimful of loyalty," and the whole of England was at this time, both in heart and soul, monarchical. Opposition against the royal family exists no longer in England; the former members of this opposition had become converted. On all hands there was but one voice of devotion and praise. Wonderful! yes, incomprehensible, thought I, when I was informed that the Queen had requested not long since to have a grant from parliament of 72,000*l.* for the erection of new stables at her palace of Windsor, and the same year 30,000*l.* for Prince Albert to repair his dog-kennels, and now again, just lately, 17,000*l.* for the erection of stables at a palace which the Queen has obtained for her eldest son, and of which he will take possession on attaining his majority. Thus 119,000*l.* for stables and dog-kennels.

What? 119,000*l.* for stables and dog-kennels; for the maintenance of fine horses and dogs, and that at a time when Ireland is perishing of hunger or emigrating in the deepest distress; when even in England so infinitely much remains to be done for humanity, so much untold good might be effected for the public with this sum? Queen Elizabeth was accustomed to say that she considered her money best put out when it was in the pockets of her subjects, and she scorned to desire any great project for her own pleasure. Queen Victoria desires, year after year, immense grants for her stables and kennels; desires this of her people, and yet, for all this, is homage paid to her,—is she loved and supported by the people in this extraordinary manner! Parliament grumbles, but consents to all that the Queen desires, fully consents without a murmur, because it loves her. Such projects would otherwise be dangerous to the power of the monarch. Such projects overturned the throne of Louis Philippe—have undermined many thrones. But the light foot of this Queen,—a well-beloved little foot it ought to be,—dances again and again on the brink of the dangerous abyss, and it gives not way. But how is this possible? What is it that makes this Queen so popular, so universally beloved by the people, spite of the desire for stables and dog-kennels, unnecessary articles of luxury when hundred thousands of her subjects are in want even of the necessaries of life; want even the means to secure a home and daily bread?

Thus I asked, and thus they replied to me:—

The English people wish that their royal family should live with a certain degree of state. They are fond of beautiful horses and dogs themselves, and it flatters the national pride that the royal personages should have such, and should have magnificent dwellings for them. The character of the Queen, her domestic and public virtues, and the influence of her example, which is of such high value to the nation, causes it to regard no sacrifice of money as too great for the possession of such a Queen. England is aware that under the protection of the throne, under the shadow of the sceptre of this Queen, and the stability which it gives to the affairs of the kingdom, she can in freedom and peace manage her own internal concerns, and advance forward on the path of democratic development and self-government, with a security which other nations, even republics, do not possess. England is willing to be protected by the throne, and prefers it with its parasites, to the bloody banner of freedom, which it sees in the neighbouring country across the channel, driven by every changing wind.

Hence it is that the reigning family now upon the English throne presents a spectacle extraordinary upon this throne, or upon any throne in the world. The Queen and her husband stand before the people as the personation of every domestic and public virtue! The Queen is an excellent wife and mother; she attends to the education of her children, and fulfils her duties as sovereign, alike conscientiously. She is an early riser; is punctual and regular in great as well as in small things. She pays ready money for all that she purchases, and never is in debt to any one. Her court is remarkable for its good and beautiful morals. On their estates, she and Prince Albert carry everything out in the best manner, establish schools and institutions for the good of the poor; these institutions and arrangements of theirs serve as examples to every one. Their uprightness, kindness, generosity, and the tact which they under all circumstances display, win the heart of the nation. They show a warm sympathy for the great interests of the people, and by this very sympathy are they promoted. Of this, the successful carrying out of free-trade, and the Exhibition in the Crystal Palace, projected in the first instance by Prince Albert, and powerfully seconded by the Queen, furnish brilliant examples. The sympathies of the Queen are those of the heart as well as of the head. When that noble statesman, the great promoter of free-trade, Sir Robert Peel, died, the Queen shut herself in for several days, and wept for him as if she had lost a father. And whenever a warm sympathy is called forth, either in public or in private affairs, it is warmly and fully participated by Queen Victoria and Prince Albert. That which the English people require from their rulers, is not merely formal government, but a living interest in their affairs.

In confirmation of this opinion regarding Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, which I heard everywhere, and from all parties in England, a number of anecdotes of their life and actions were related to me, which fully bore it out.

This universal impression, universally produced by the sovereign who, properly speaking, can govern nothing—because it is well known that the monarch of England is merely a nominal executor of the wishes of the people, a hand which subscribes that which the minister lays before it in the name of the people; this great power, in a Queen, without any political power, made me ask myself,—

“Is not this the dawn of the highest sovereign power, the true, the spiritual monarchy? The ideal of all true government! The commencement of a new, of a supreme power in the state!”

Monarchs and their people no longer bear the same relation to each other as in the time when, for example, Charles the Ninth put forth his demands, with the addition,—

“Do it, and be off with you!”

This injunction to do a thing, and then take themselves off, can no longer be given to the people by the King, but by reason. The people have arrived at years of discretion, and the monarch is the executor of their laws and their wishes. He is so in England, it is said. Yes, he is so, but he is evidently something more at the same time. He must be something infinitely more in the work itself, the highest on earth. The King and Queen of a people are appointed by “the grace of God and the voice of the people,” to represent the people’s highest moral desires, feelings, and character. They must stand before the people and advance before the people, in the glory of pure human virtues; they must stand before the people and above them as examples, as bright, guiding stars; and the people must look up to them in reverence and love, as they would look up on high: they must be led by them because they cannot help it; for we all suffer ourselves to be led by that which we admire; for it is a principle in all of us human beings to obey that which we greatly love.

In truth, a regal power or dominion worthy of possession! Higher there is none, excepting that of God. But even this is of the same kind.

But that which is requisite is no light matter; it is great. Much is demanded from the individual, and yet nothing more than any true human being is equal to. Neither genius nor great natural gifts are necessary. Nothing but earnestness and a large heart. It is also evident that the time is approaching when no other kingly power will be valued on earth, when the crown and sceptre of the sovereign will be intellectual and moral power.

At such a time it will be an easy matter for a good king and queen to become popular. Freed from the trouble and responsibility of taking an active part in the contested questions of the realms, they may, in the brightness of private and public virtue, go in advance of their people, and thus through history in advance of all people—objects of admiration and of imitation! A popularity worthy of the noblest to strive after.

The power of popularity on the throne! In the sway which Queen Victoria and Prince Albert hold over the English people one may already see how mighty this is! In truth, far mightier than King Charles’s “Do this and be off with you.”

From Manchester I travelled to Birmingham. I saw again the land of the fire-worshippers, their smoking altars, in tall columns and pyramids, towering above the green fields; saw again the burning gulfs yawning in the earth, and—saw them now with un-mixed pleasure. I heard no longer, amid their boiling roar, the lamenting cry of the children; I heard and saw them now only as the organs of the public prosperity, and rejoiced over them as proofs of man’s power over fire and water, over all the powers of nature; the victory of the gods over the giants!

The sun burst forth from between rain-clouds as I arrived in Birmingham, England’s—nay the world’s—workshop of steel-pens, nails, steel, tin, and brass wares of all kinds.

If Manchester is a colossal woman at her spinning-wheel, then is Birmingham a colossal smith.

In Birmingham I visited a steel-pen manufactory, and followed from room to room the whole process of those small metal tongues which go abroad over all the world and do so much—evil, and so much good; so much that is great, so much that is small; so much that is important, so much that is trivial. I saw four hundred young girls sitting in large, light rooms, each with her little pen-stamp, employed in a dexterous and easy work, especially fitted for women. All were well dressed, seemed healthy and cheerful, many were pretty; upon the whole, it was a spectacle of prosperity which surpassed even that of the mill-girls in the celebrated factories of Lowell in North America.

Birmingham was at this time in a most flourishing condition, and had more orders for goods than it could supply, nor were there any male paupers to be found in the town; there was full employment for all.

In Birmingham I saw a large school of design. Not less than two hundred young female artists studied here in a magnificent hall or rotunda, abundantly supplied with models of all kinds, and during certain hours in the week exclusively opened to these female votaries of art. A clever respectable old woman, the porter of the school-house, spoke of many of these with especial pleasure, as if she prided herself on them in some degree.

I saw in Birmingham a beautiful park, with hot-houses, in which were tropical plants, open to the public; saw also a large concert-room, where twice in the week "glees" were sung, and to which the public were admitted at a low price: all republican institutions, and which seem to prosper more in a monarchical realm than in republics themselves.

I met with a surprise in Birmingham; that is to say, I was all at once carried back fifteen centuries into the Syrian desert of Chalsis, and there lived a life so unlike Birmingham and Birmingham-life, that just for the sake of contrast, it was very refreshing. The thing was quite simple in itself, inasmuch as one evening I accompanied an amiable family, who resided in Birmingham, to a lecture, which was given by a young, gifted preacher, on the old Church-father, Saint Jerome (Hieronymus).

The subject of the lecture, which was extempore, and delivered with much ease and perspicuity, was evidently not intended to recommend to his auditors, but rather to repel them from an ascetic and contemplative life. Saint Jerome was delineated as a noble fool, a curiosity in human nature, and was to be deplored as a sacrifice to perverted reason, by no means to be imitated. The true end of humanity was not to be attained by flying from city life, and burying oneself in a desert for study and self-mortification; that end was rather to be attained in the busy city, than in the isolated existence of the wilderness; and so on. Such was the lecturer's moral. But upon me his arguments made an impression considerably antithetical to that which he intended. I saw this warrior of the third century devoured by a burning thirst of light and knowledge, of purity for his whole being; saw him wander out, seeking the wells of life; saw him, separating from the agreeable circles of city existence, roam on amid catacombs and the tombs of martyrs; saw him seeking in Gaul, and on the Rhine, and there finding—Christianity. Saw him there, after being baptized, with his Bible under his arm, retire into the deserts of Syria, and there, in the burning sands of Chalsis, bury himself for a number of years, amid exegetic studies and severe deeds of penance. I heard him, even at the time that he, according to his own words, "watered his couch with his tears," and while he was given over, and regarded as a fool by his friends, still reproach those friends for having chosen the worse part, that of the life of enjoyment in the city, and break forth in transport, "O! silent wildernesses, flower-strewn by Jesus Christ! O! wild solitudes, full of his spirit!"

I saw him, after his conflict was accomplished, go forth out of the desert with his Bible, enter Rome publicly, and unsparingly chastise the crimes of the proud city. I saw the haughty ladies of Rome first start, then bow themselves to the severe judgment of the teacher; saw Marulla and Paula renounce the dissipated life of Rome, and follow the preacher; found convents and Christian institutions in accordance with his views; saw him grow in the combat with the spirit of the age, till he stood as a founder of the greatest power on earth—that of the Christian Church. The fool, who had buried himself in the sands of Syria, and done battle with himself during solitary days and nights.

Ah! this fool, this glowing son of the desert, as he now stood forth to view, through the veil of fifteen centuries, grew greater and greater in my eyes, till, finally, he expanded himself over the whole of Birmingham, with all its factories, workshops, steel pens, and the like, as a colossus above an ant-hill.

But I know that it is not right to compare incomparable greatnesses, and the human race has its august arena of operation for all the forms of its life,—room for both St. Jerome and Birmingham. It is not necessary, however, that they should stand in opposition; they may extend brotherly hands to each other, like spiritual and material powers—like Balder and Hodder, to dwell together upon the new and glorified earth—and the sacred teacher was by no means a stranger in the noisy Birmingham; that I saw in the amiable family which I became acquainted with there, and in the institutions which I visited in their company.

From Birmingham I had determined to go for a few days to Stratford-on-Avon, before I went to London, in order to secure a view of the Great Exhibition, the last week of which was at hand. I was, therefore, obliged to leave the manufacturing districts earlier than I wished; but before quitting them on paper, I must say a few words on their population, on their artisans, etc.

These belong almost entirely to the class of what are called Chartists; that is, advocates of universal suffrage. They are this, through good and through evil; and the resistance which their just desire to be more fully represented in the legislative body, has met with from that body, has brought them more and more into collision with the power of the state, more and more to base their demands in opposition, even to the higher principles of justice: for they overlook the duty of rendering themselves worthy of the franchise by sound education. But the fault here, in the first place, was not theirs. Growing up amid machinery and the hum of labour, without schools, without religious or moral worth; hardened by hard labour, in continual fight with the difficulties of life, they have moulded themselves into a spirit little in harmony with life's higher educational influences, the blessings of which they had never experienced. Atheism, radicalism, republicanism, socialism of all kinds will and must flourish here in concealment amongst the strong and daily augmenting masses of a population, restrained only by the fear of the still more mighty powers which may be turned against them, and by labour for their daily needs, so long as those powers are sufficing. And perhaps the American slave-states are right where they say, in reference to this condition of things;—"England lies at our feet—England cannot do without our cotton. If the manufactures of England must come to a stand, then has she a popular convulsion at her door." Perhaps it may be so; for these hosts of manufacturing workmen, neglected in the beginning by society, neglected by church and state, look upon them merely as exacting and despotic powers; and in strict opposition to them, they have banded together, and established schools for their own children, where only the elements of practical science are admitted, and from which religious and moral instruction are strictly excluded. In truth, a volcanic foundation for society, and which now, for some time past, has powerfully arrested the attention of the most thinking men of England.

But into the midst of this menacing chaos light has already begun to penetrate with an organizing power; and over the dark profound hovers a spirit which can and will divide the darkness from the light, and prepare a new creation. Of this, however, anon.

I sought the manufacturing towns, from a sense of duty, and the commands of conscience. I was anxious to see this side of human life. But this done, I thought I might do something for my own pleasure I was in England chiefly for this purpose. I must follow the impulse of my heart; I must make a pilgrimage to the grave of Shakspeare. For the older I have become, the more that I have lived and learned, the more valuable have two good artists become to me—the more have I had to thank—Beethoven and Shakspeare.

From Birmingham I travelled, on the morning of the fourth of October, by the railway to Leamington, and thence alone in a little carriage to Stratford-on-Avon.

SCRAPS.

GEORGIAN BEAUTY.

By a Georgian female is usually understood a tall, slender creature, of voluptuous figure, wrapped in ample rich apparel, with thick black hair, long enough to entwine its glossy fetters round all hearts of men, with an open, noble forehead, and a pair of eyes within whose dark mysterious magic circle the secrets of all delights of sense and soul lie spell-bound. Her gait is luxury. Joy goes before her, and admiration follows her. The flowers on which she treads look upwards, trembling with delight as they die, and exhale their fragrance as an offering to the beauty.

With such ideas do strangers usually come to Georgia and—find themselves singularly undeceived. Travelers who with expectations raised so high, set foot on a land surrounded by history and tradition with a nimbus of wonder, either obstinately abide by their previously-formed opinion, or hastily pass to the other extreme, and find to their amazement everything filthy, ugly, loathsome. The truth lies in the midst. The people of Georgia, taken as a whole, are undeniably one of the most beautiful races of people on the earth; but although I am a great lover of women, I must in this case give, with unconditional preference, the palm to the male sex. Herein all those cultivated inhabitants of Georgia who have eye, taste, and an impartial judgment, agree with me. Nay, I must add to this, that of that higher beauty which exists where spirit, heart and mind are reflected in the eye, there are in the Caucasus few traces to be found, among women as well as among men. I have had a fair chance of seeing all that Georgia contains of womanly beauty, but have never beheld a face that has fully satisfied me, although the graceful costume of the fair inhabitants of the land contributes very much to the heightening of their charms. The face is altogether wanting in that nobler spiritual expression which lends to our fair countrywomen an enchantment all their own. These can still awaken love and gain hearts, even when the time of their bloom is long since past; in a fair Georgian, on the other hand, with the freshness of youth fades everything away. The eye, which always, notwithstanding its seeming fire, has breathed nothing but repose and inactive voluptuousness, acquires a faint expression; the nose, already in itself somewhat overstepping the bounds of beauty, appears, in consequence of the early sinking cheeks, of so unnatural a size, that many imagine its dimensions actually grow with years! and the bosom, which in this land plays certainly no hidden part, acquires too soon a flaccid character—appearances, which, among us, occur more seldom, more imperceptibly, and in far more limited proportion. If we put to this account the custom so prevalent in Georgia among young and old, of laying on white and red paint, it is easily seen that such and similar arts of the toilette, too striking as they are to the eye, can only tend to lessen the good opinion of the beholder.—Bodenstedt's Morning Land.

BE SOMETHING.—Don't be a drone. You may rely upon your present possessions, or on your future prospects; but these riches may fly away, or hopes may be blighted; and if you have no place of your own, in such case, ten to one you will find your path beset with thorns. Want may come upon you before you are aware of it, and, having no profession, you find yourself in anything but an enviable condition. It is therefore important that you should be something. Don't depend upon fortune, for she is a fickle support, which often fails when you lean upon her with the greatest confidence. Trust to your own exertions.

IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE AUTUMN OF 1851.FROM THE LETTERS AND MEMORANDA OF FREDERIK BREMER.

II.

Stratford-on-Avon.

It was a most glorious afternoon! The air was delightful. The sun shone with the softest splendour upon the green cultivated meadow-land, divided into square fields, each enclosed with its quick-set fence; and within these, small farmhouses and cottages with their gardens and vine-covered walls. It was altogether a cheerful and lovely scene. Westward, in the far distance, raised themselves the mist-covered Welsh mountains. For the rest, the whole adjacent country resembled that which I had hitherto seen in England, softly undulating prairie. There will come a time when the prairies of North America will resemble this country. And the work has already begun there in the square allotments, although on a larger scale than here; the living fences, the well-todo farmhouses, they already look like birds'-nests on the green billows; for already waves the grass there with its glorious masses of flowers, over immeasurable, untilled fields, and the sunflowers nod and beckon in the breeze as if they said: "Come,—come, ye children of men! The board is spread for many!"

The glorious flower-spread table, which can accommodate two hundred and fifty millions of guests! May it with its beauty one day unite more true happiness than at this time the beautiful landscape of England. For it is universally acknowledged, that the agricultural districts of England are at this time in a much more dubious condition than the manufacturing districts, principally from the fact of the large landed proprietors having, as it were, swallowed up the small ones; and of the landed possession being amassed in but few hands, who thus cannot look after it excepting through paid stewards, and this imperfectly. I heard of ten large landed proprietors in a single family of but few individuals: hence the number of small farmers who do not themselves possess land, and who manage it badly, as well as the congregating of labourers in houses and cottages. The laws also for the possession of land are so involved, and so full of difficulty, that they throw impediments in the way of those who would hold and cultivate it in much smaller lots.

The young barrister, Joseph Kay, has treated this subject explicitly and fully, in his lately published work "On the Social Condition and Education of the People."

I, however, knew but little of this canker worm at the vitals of this beautiful portion of England, at the time when I thus saw it, and therefore I enjoyed my journey with undivided pleasure.

In the evening, before sunset, I stood before Shakspeare's house.

"It matters little being born in a poultry-yard, if one only is hatched from a swan's egg!" thought I, in the words of Hans Christian Andersen, in his story of "The Ugly Duckling," when I beheld the little, unsightly, half-timbered house in which Shakspeare was born; and went through the low, small rooms, up the narrow wooden stairs, which were all that was left of the interior. It was empty and poor, except in memory; the excellent little old woman who showed the house, was the only living thing there. I provided myself with some small engravings having reference to Shakspeare's history, which she had to sell, and after that set forth on a solitary journey of discovery to the banks of the Avon; and before long, was pursuing a solitary foot-path which wound by the side of this beautiful little river. To be all at once removed from the thickly populated, noisy manufacturing towns into that most lovely, most idyllic life, was in itself something enchanting. Add to this the infinite deliciousness of the evening; the pleasure of wandering thus freely and alone in this neighbourhood with all its rich memories; the deep calm that lay over all, broken only by the twittering of the birds in the bushes, and the cheerful voices of children at a distance; the beautiful masses of trees, cattle grazing in the meadows; the view of the proud Warwick Castle, and near at hand the little town, the birthplace of Shakspeare, and his grave, and above all, the romantic stream, the bright Avon, which in its calm winding course seemed, like its poet-swan—the great Skald,—to have no other object than faithfully to reflect every object which mirrored itself in its depths; castles, towns, churches, cottages, woods, meadows, flowers, men, animals. This evening and this river, and this solitary, beautiful ramble shall I never forget, never! I spent no evening more beautiful whilst in England.

It was not until twilight settled down over the landscape that I left the river-side. When I again entered the little town, I was struck by its antique character as well in the people as in the houses; it seemed to me that the whole physiognomy of the place belonged to the age of Shakspeare. Old men with knee-breeches, old women in old-fashioned caps, who with inquisitive and historical countenances, furrowed by hundreds of wrinkles, now gazed forth from their old, projecting doorways; thus must they have stood, thus must they have gazed when Shakspeare wandered here; and he, the black-garmented hump-backed old man who looked so kind, so original and so learned, just like an ancient chronicle, and who saluted me, the stranger, as people are not in the habit of doing now-a-days,—he must certainly be some old rector magnificus who has returned to earth from the sixteenth century. Whilst I was thus dreaming myself back again into the times of old, a sight met my eyes which transported me five thousand miles across the ocean, to the poetical wildernesses of the new world. This was a full-blown magnolia-flower, just like a magnolia grandiflora, and here blossomed on the walls of an elegant little house, the whole of whose front was adorned by the branches and leaves of a magnolia reptans, a species with which

(1) Continued from p. 128.

I was not yet acquainted. I hailed with joy the beautiful flower which I had not seen since I had wandered in the magnolia-groves of Florida, on the banks of the Welaka (St. John) and drank the morning dew as solitary as now.

Everything in that little town was, for the rest, à la Shakspeare. One saw on all sides little statues of Shakspeare, some white, others gilt—half-length figures—and very much resembling idol-images. One saw Shakspeare-books, Shakspeare-music, Shakspeare engravings, Shakspeare articles of all kinds. In one place I even saw Shakspeare sauce announced; but that did not take my fancy, as I feared it might be too strong for my palate. True, one saw at the same place an announcement of Jenny Lind-drops, and that did take my fancy very much, for as a Swede I was well pleased to see the beautiful fame of the Swedish singer recognised in Shakspeare's town, and having a place by the side of his.

Arrived at my inn, close to Shakspeare's house: I drank tea; was waited upon by an agreeable girl, Lucy, and passed a good night in a chamber which bore the superscription "Richard the Third." I should have preferred as a bed-room "The Mid-summer Night's Dream," a room within my chamber, only that it was not so good, and Richard the Third did me no harm.

I wandered again on the banks of the Avon on the following morning, and from a height beheld that cheerful neighbourhood beneath the light of the morning sun. After this I visited the church in which were interred Shakspeare and his daughter Susanna. A young bridal couple were just coming out of church after having been married, the bride dressed in white and veiled, so that I could not see her features distinctly.

The epitaph on Shakspeare's grave, composed by himself, is universally known, with its strong concluding lines,—

"Bless'd be the man that spares these stones,
And cursed be he that moves my bones."

Less generally known is the inscription on the tomb of his daughter Susanna, which highly praises her virtues and her uncommon wit, and which seems to regard Shakspeare as happy for having such a daughter. I thought that Susanna Shakspeare ought to have been proud of her father. I have known young girls to be proud of their fathers,—the most beautiful pride which I can conceive, because it is full of humble love. And how well it became them!

For the rest, it was not as a fanatical worshipper of Shakspeare that I wandered through the scene of his birth and his grave. I owe much to this great dramatist; he has done much for me, but—not in the highest degree. I know of nobler grouping, loftier characters and scenes, in especial a greater drama of life than any which he has represented, and particularly a higher degree of harmony than he has given; and as I wandered on the banks of the Avon, I seemed to perceive the approach of a new Shakspeare, the new poet of the age, to the boards of the world's stage; the poet who shall comprehend within the range of his vision all parts of the earth, all races of men, all regions of nature,—the palms of the tropics, the crystal palaces of the polar circle,—and present them all in a new drama, in the large expression and the illuminating light of a vast human intelligence.

Shakspeare, great as he is, is to me, nevertheless, only a Titanic greatness, an intellectual giant-nature, who stands amid inexplicable dissonance. He drowns Ophelia, and puts out the eyes of the noble Kent, and leaves them and us to our darkness. That which I long for, that which I hope for, is a poet who will rise above dissonances, a harmonious nature who will regard the drama of the world with the eye of Deity; in a word, a Shakspeare who will resemble a—Beethoven.

On my way from Stratford to Leamington I stopped at Warwick Castle, one of the few old castles of the middle ages in England which still remain well-preserved, and which are still inhabited by the old hereditary families. The old Earl of Warwick resides now quite alone in his splendid castle, his wife having been dead about six months. Two days in the week he allows his castle to be thrown open for a few hours for the gratification of the curiosity of strangers. It is in truth a magnificent castle, with its fortress-tower and its lofty grey stone walls, surrounded by a beautiful park, and gloriously situated on the banks of the Avon,—magnificent, and romantically beautiful at the same time.

In the rooms prevailed princely splendour, and there were a number of good pictures, those of Vandyke in particular. I remarked several portraits of Charles the First, with his cold, gloomy features; several also of the lovely but weak Henrietta Maria; one of Cromwell, a strong countenance, but without nobility; one of Alba, with an expression harder than flint-stone,—a petrified nature; and one of Shakspeare, as Shakspeare might have appeared, with an eye full of intense thought, a broad forehead, a countenance elaborated and tempered in the fires of strong emotion; not in the least resembling that fat, jolly, aldermanic head which is commonly represented as Shakspeare's.

The rooms contained many works of art, and from the windows what glorious views! In truth, thought I, it is pardonable if the proprietor of such a castle, inherited from brave forefathers, and living in the midst of scenes rich in great memories, with which the history of his family is connected,—it is pardonable if such a man is proud.

"There he goes!—the Earl!" said the man who was showing me through the rooms; and, looking through a window into the castle-court, I saw a tall, very thin figure, with white hair, and dressed in black, walking slowly, with head bent forward, across the grass-plot in the middle of the court. That was the possessor of this proud mansion, the old Earl of Warwick! How solitarily he walked there! how bent towards the sun-lighted, green earth which covered his wife, and so soon would cover him! He mounted his horse, and now made a better and more cheerful appearance. And thus the lord of the castle rode through the high-arched castle-portal, but his appearance was neither proud nor stately.

In the little town of Warwick everything bears the name and arms of the Warwicks,—the inn, the shops, the churches, the old tower; a reflection of the feudal times which I was glad to have seen in all its peculiarities.

From Leamington I travelled by railway to London.

III.

London.—Police in London, in England.—Visit to the Crystal Palace.—The Great Exhibition.—The Swedish Department.—The Little Machine.—The greatness of England.—The last days of the Exhibition.—Prince Albert.

THE same evening that I arrived in London, between fifty and sixty thousand persons arrived there also by the various railroads. It was the last week of the Great Exhibition in the Crystal Palace, and all those who had not yet seen it, and all those who wished yet once more to see it, hastened to avail themselves of this last week, after which it was to be closed. It was with difficulty that the railway-trains could get along this evening, they were so many in number, and followed so closely one upon another. The train by which I travelled was compelled to stop many times by the way, being warned by the red lights, which, like a pair of flaming eyes, met us on the railroad, and by the red light which was fixed upon the poles of the electric telegraph-wires which run beside it, and which betokened "danger." When these glowing eyes disappeared, and the red light in the air was changed into green, we might then safely proceed. It was, however, not until two hours after the usual time that we arrived in London,—that great, crowded, noisy, now more than ever over-crowded, animated, noisy London. I was quite alone; I knew none of the gentlemen who had travelled in the same carriage with me; I had no one to meet me, to assist me in the throng and crush of people at the railway-stations, where on this particular evening people were obliged to hurry more than ever, because the train by which they had arrived was obliged to get out of the way of others which were about to arrive. I was fortunate not to need it, and said to a gentleman who was so kind as to inquire if he could be of any service to me, "Be so good as merely to call hither one of the police."

One of these is always at hand, and so it was at this time; he took charge of me and my things in the polite manner, called a carriage for me, conducted me to it, assisted me to get my luggage, and demeaned himself altogether as a perfect gentleman. Within ten minutes I found myself, without the slightest difficulty, speeding away from the station in a compact little carriage, which merrily and lightly conveyed me to my destined quarters in London, in the noisy, crowded West Strand. I must here express my admiration and my gratitude for the excellent police in London, and everywhere in England, as they have now been organized since the time of Sir Robert Peel, and which remain as a living memory of the genius of this great statesman. I had observed them already on my first visit to England, but had not been able during that short time to pay the same attention to them as on this occasion. I had observed gentlemen slowly walking along the streets of the various towns I visited, dressed in closely-fitting, and remarkably well-cut, dark clothes, with the coat collar handsomely embroidered with silver lace, and wearing black hats, and white gloves; I had noticed them on account of their costume, but still more for their fine figures and good appearance, for their handsome, grave, and frequently noble countenances, often pale, but always commanding respect. It seemed to me that I had scarcely ever seen men more resembling gentlemen; I observed also that they answered in the kindest manner every one who applied to them for information, and that they appeared desirous of rendering every assistance in their power. I inquired, "Who are these gentlemen who wander everywhere about the streets, who make such a handsome and respectable appearance, and who are so kind to people?"

"They are policemen," was the answer which I received; they were in fact what we in Sweden call police-servants.

Ah! I had accustomed myself to think of such in connexion with jolly red faces, stupid or arrogant demeanour, great staves, and nothing to command respect except now and then a badge exhibited as if to say, "Beware of the royal Swedish police!" And I thought there was good reason why people should beware! But I had never before seen, as now in England, the police moving about as the representatives of legalized order, showing themselves on all hands as noble agreeable objects, as perfect gentlemen, for whom people must have respect, and in whom they could put confidence. And I saw also how universally they were esteemed and obeyed, these men of order, in their white gloves, without badges, without staves. This delighted me. This was a great idea nobly carried out—this representation of the order-maintaining power, well calculated to inspire respect towards itself. But I did not understand to its full extent the whole value of this until I now travelled hither and thither alone in England, and always found myself received, served, protected in the most perfect manner by these gentlemen of the police—I cannot call them servants—and without their ever receiving from me anything but—my thanks. It is strictly forbidden them to receive money; and travellers are warned by boards fixed up at the stations, and printed in large letters, against giving money to any of their servants, because any who are known to receive it will be immediately dismissed from their employment. I had not in the beginning paid particular attention to this, but I soon saw, by the police, it is true, but quick manner with which these gentlemen drew themselves back from the offered reward, that the prohibition was no jest.

This excellent police causes England to be the country where, in all the world, a lady can most easily travel alone. Hence it comes, that arrangements at the stations for the convenience of the travellers are worthy of a cultivated and noble social condition;—and the same prevails, also, everywhere throughout the United States of North America, even in the wildest parts through which railroads are carried. In France and Germany they are shamefully regardless in this respect; and in Germany the grand-looking officials throng about the railways, begging for a "Trinkgeld" (drinking-money), which is a shameful thing it seems to me, in men who are paid by the state.

These gentlemen of the police in England are polite, are ready to assist not alone the well-dressed and those who have a respectable appearance. No! they show to the lowest, even to the worthless themselves, a kindness and a propriety of manner which is admirable, and which makes them esteemed both by high and low.

It was Saturday evening when I arrived in London, and on Monday I visited the Exhibition in the Crystal Palace. The morning was beautiful; the clouds had taken wing and fled through the expanse of heaven before the careering west-wind. It was amusing to see the crowds of people who, in long rows, and with their garments fluttering in the wind, streamed through Hyde Park towards the Crystal Palace, which is situated on one side of the park, and which now glittered in the sun, with all its hundreds of flags waving and beckoning in the brisk morning air—a gay, refreshing sight! I had heard critical tongues compare the Crystal Palace to a great—birdcage. And there is a something in the form as well as in the airiness of its construction which do remind one of a so-called coop-cage. But it is, in any case, a cage in which all the birds of heaven found room, and it much more resembles a magic castle out of the fairy-tale world than any other castle on earth. I expected to have seen it more brilliant in appearance, but the white canvass hangings with which the exterior of the Crystal Palace was covered, in order to prevent the too strong effect of sunlight within, gave it rather a dull than brilliant appearance.

Of the throng of carriages, great and small, which moved along in four lines, upon the great road on the outside of Hyde Park and towards the Crystal Palace, I say nothing, because the quiet activity of the police and their presence at every point made it a matter of small importance. There was no need to have a moment's uneasiness either for one's own or other people's safety. The police cared for all, like a higher, calm law of order. All that was needed was a little patience. Less from want of this than from a desire to enjoy the morning air, and to have a view of the approaching concourse of people, I alighted from the carriage, and went on foot through a portion of that beautiful park up to the palace. This, with its immediate environs, covers about twenty-six English acres.

I wished to enter at the end nearest to which was the Swedish department, and my friendly conductor, Mary Howitt, led me in by the western entrance. And soon we stood in the great nave, 1,848 feet long, 79 wide, and 64 feet high, where all people met, and rightly so. There, on one side, just at the beginning of the nave stood—SWEDEN, and opposite to it, on the other side, RUSSIA—little David and great Goliath, as I like to call them.

There was a time—just at the opening of the Exhibition—when our little David presented himself at this great congress of nations in his shepherd's raiment, in all simplicity and deshabille; and the Swedes in London who saw it, were deeply shocked and ashamed, and kept in the nave, as far as possible from the Swedish department, in order that nobody might call to them and inquire, "Is that all which you have to show?"

No indeed! He did not make a great show, that little King David, more especially just opposite to the great Goliath, who had come in his most splendid attire, proud and magnificent. But—it was not so very bad, and it did not matter so much to those who know what our King David—or to speak in pure Swedish—who know what the Swede is. Because there is no fear for the Swede, when he comes to the pinch; that we all know, and the world knows it too. But he has a sort of—may I say it?—an excellent inability of going to market, of puffing off himself and his, which is not to be blamed, and which I like; and a sort of bear-like winter-sloth in rousing himself, when it has nothing to do with any contest of life and death,—which is not so good, but yet which is perhaps excusable when it merely has reference to self-display.

But yet little King David ought to have reflected that it was better not to have shown himself at all in the royal halls of the stranger, than to have shown himself there in his every-day attire, in his simple shepherd's dress. And he did so reflect in a little while, and went home again and returned and showed himself, without splendour it is true, but in such guise that he might with honour maintain his place in any company whatever.

But how much more honourable might not this place have been, if Sweden had only rightly understood the intention of this the World's Exhibition, and had seriously entered into it! how much—yes indeed, twenty times richer, have been the native mechanical exhibitions which we have occasionally had in Stockholm. And if we had sent hither scenes from the life of the Swedish people, and of Sweden itself in figures and pictures—what peculiarity and beautiful individuality of life might not Sweden have exhibited, as a nation among the nations. And even as it was, Sweden exhibited, in her small dimensions, a beautiful and rich individuality of character, much more so than the giant opposite to her.

There—in the middle of the nave, stood the lofty porphyry vase of Sweden, the only one of its kind in the World's Exhibition, and so placed as to rule over, as it were, the whole of this portion of the building, and to be seen from all sides. There also was the great cannon, with its peculiar mechanism, which attracted the attention of all connoisseurs, and which had, besides this, great memories connected with it; because in the great battles of the world, the Swedish cannon had thundered with honour in the cause of popular freedom. And at the foot of that altar-like erection, in which the flowers of Emma Furstenhoff hung drooping on a ground of green velvet, so naturally and so life-like, especially the apple-blossom, that the king of flowers, Linneus himself, might have mistaken them for the living ones, lay knotted rods of iron, knotted whilst the iron was cooling, which seemed to bear witness that the strength of Thor and Stårkodder yet lived in the North. True it is that these knotted bars of iron came from Norway, but the Swedes and the Norwegians are brothers, and the iron and the giants belong to them alike.

I saw too that much attention was given to a Swedish covered carriage, or, more properly speaking, to the skeleton of one, and to some particularly beautiful Swedish cabinet-work, as well as to some new discoveries in articles manufactured of iron, &c. &c.

That which most struck my eye after the Swedish porphyry vase, and that which delighted me, was a little Swedish spinning-wheel with its yellow flax upon the distaff, and which stood quite cheerfully outside the Swedish department, the Swedish banner hanging high above it, and before it the altar with flowers and knotted iron, and among many beautiful works of Swedish industrial art.

Right, thou little King David! Thou art not ashamed of thy shepherd-attire, nor of thy shepherd-life, when thou thyself comest clad as a prince to the meeting of the princes. Thou bearest in the one hand the sceptre, in the other thy shepherd's staff, and thou regardest them alike with honour; thou unitest thy shepherd and thy kingly life with a cheerful and a willing mind! It is good, and it is done like a king.

The giant over the way, the great Goliath, does not do so. When he came forth in his pomp and glory, and displayed his doors, and his tables, and his urns of brilliant green malachite, set in frames of gold,—and beautiful and magnificent they were,—there is no denying that, although the former often were wanting in harmony, and the superabundance of gilding gave an impression of cold splendour, of a something gaudy, of a want, a deficiency through it all;—when, I say, he advanced forward to display himself in the Great Exhibition before all the people, then banished he into the background,—into a great dark department behind him,—everything which belonged to the peculiar popular life of his dominions. He was ashamed of the poor common people of his realm, and their labours and their industry were sent afar off into the dark. Not so King David. Close beside his silver ore and porphyry, placed he the Swedish peasant's greatest labour and enjoyment,—the spinning-wheel, with its distaff of flax, and held them forth, in honour due, before all people at the great meeting of the peoples.

The spinning-wheel with its flax! How much did it not say to me of that Swedish life, that quiet, grave, every-day life. How many pictures out of this life did there not present themselves to my soul—pictures especially out of the female life of Sweden. The thread of life, of the great as well as the little life, is spun more leisurely in Sweden than anywhere else in the world, especially for women. And almost all women spin in Sweden. The spinning-wheel is the symbol of household industry in Sweden. Countesses spin for the sake of amusement, and to pass away the time during the long winter twilight. The wives of the clergy spin in the country, with their young maidens and women-servants around them, by the crackling fire in the large room of the house. The fine young lady in the town spins also in the forenoon, and dances at the ball in the evening; spins because it is pleasant and useful to do so; not unfrequently spins cloths for the tea-table of her father's house or for her own future home, and listens, perhaps, the while, in spirit to the ballad, which every mother's daughter in Sweden has heard sung beside her cradle,— “Spin, spin, daughter mine,

To-morrow comes the bridegroom thine,
And gives thee a gold ring.”

And the peasant farmer's wife and daughter and maid-servant, they spin, they spin with all their might! They spin the clothes of the family, sheets, table linen, coverlets and bed-ticking; they spin from morning until night; from youth till the latest old age. The old woman's last earthly comfort in Sweden, her means of livelihood and her life's pleasure, is—her spinning-wheel.

It is especially in the northern provinces of Sweden that you can observe properly the prevalence of the spinning-wheel and the manufacture of linen. I seemed to see the handsome and populous peasantry of Helsingland and Norrland sitting in their spinning-rooms, men and women, spinning, spinning through the long dark winter evenings, by the light of the crackling pine branches, while the storms roar and the northern lights dance without. I saw again the old couple, as I once saw them there, man and wife, who sat spinning together in a little room, as they had spun together there for above fifty years,—through the marriage, the silver marriage, the gold marriage,—had thus spun through half a century together, and looked as if they might, in the same way, spin out the whole hundred years; a still life, delightful, or—terrible!

And now I missed again, in this Exhibition, pictures from that still-life genre, pictures such as Tideman's; landscapes, such as Gude's. But not one picture, not one image of the folk-life of Sweden, or of the picturesque popular costumes, was there, to give to foreigners an idea of it.

China had sent pictures where the people, the life, and the labours of China were delineated in the Chinese style; upon Chinese tea-canisters you saw the Chinese plucking the tea-tree, and preparing the tea. Hindostan had sent representatives of the whole of its life, of its festivals, its courts of justice, its business, houses, gardens, all its daily life, in admirably-executed little figures, and plastic pictures. Tunis had done the like, and other eastern countries; but the people of Scandinavia had merely sent their wares, their productions, and their ornaments. Denmark had sent some noble pieces of statuary, but not her living forms from Amager and Høvedø! Sweden had sent her porphyry, her spinning-wheels, with the flax on the distaff, but not her Dalecarlians, her people of Bleking or of Scania, nor her Laplanders with their reindeer. Norway had sent her knotted iron, her silver ore from Königsberg, but no pictures of her sublime scenery—not the mountain huts of Telemark with the Telemark people! Pity!—pity beyond repair!

At the same time, many of the people of the Western nations exhibited a similar deficiency in this respect, while the incessant and crowding throng of people around any representations of actual popular life, showed that these, more than anything else, attracted the interest of the public.

There was one thing in the Swedish department which was wholly overlooked by the multitude,—which arrested the notice only of a few men of science. It was a little thing apparently, and yet it is probable, yes it might certainly be asserted, that nothing in this World's Exhibition, nothing amid all wares, inventions, and precious productions of all nations there displayed, is destined to create so great an epoch in the affairs of the world, to give so totally new a career to trade and navigation, and to the whole progress of mankind, as this little thing, conceived in a Swedish head, and carried into effect by a Swede.

This thing is a machine called a "Caloric Engine." The object of the machine is to substitute hot air for steam, as a motive-power, and to perform by that power all that is now done by steam at an infinitely less cost. It is many years since this discovery originated in the mind of Captain John Ericson, then in Sweden, and principal of the Military Academy at Marieberg. It became the grand object of his thoughts; he carried it with him to England,—carried it with him and pondered over it in silence, while he worked out, and brought to bear, many other mechanical improvements; amongst these, screw-propellers for vessels. When he had completed a screw-vessel, he invited a number of distinguished Englishmen to make a sea voyage with him in this vessel. They came, but treated the matter coldly, and merely said—"It is an interesting discovery." "Do you see nothing more in it?" demanded Ericson. "No, nothing more," was the reply.

An American sea-officer came to Ericson, and said, "Will you permit me to make a voyage in your screw-vessel?" Ericson agreed, and they went. "I have seen enough," said the American; "and we will cause your name to resound on the Delaware." Ericson complied with the invitation, and went over to the New World. His screw-vessels very soon were ploughing the waves of the Delaware, and his name was spread over the United States with great renown. But Ericson himself continued to live still and retired in New York, in a course of incessant industry endeavouring to acquire fortune, by which he could be able to carry into effect the new discovery which he made.

Attempt after attempt failed, year after year went by, and still Ericson continued labouring with the same zeal, the same invincible perseverance, the same hope.

Many years had passed over, and still lived Ericson in the same stillness, well known to the public as a man of extraordinary ability, and the originator of various fine mechanical improvements, but yet only fully recognised by a very few in America, whether natives of the States or his own countrymen, in his true greatness. One of the latter, my noble and learned friend, Professor P. E. Bergfalk, said to me as we met in New York, "Here lives in retirement a countryman of ours, who carries within himself, and will soon make public one of the greatest discoveries of the age." The prophecy was speedily fulfilled. At the eleventh or twelfth attempt, Ericson might exclaim—"Eureka! I have found it!"

The little caloric engine which was shown in the Swedish department of the Crystal Palace was the first proof of Ericson's discovery which came to Europe. In November 1851 a public trial was made of the new engine. The result was—the complete triumph of the finer, the more ethereal element, over the grosser one:—the victory of caloric over steam. Caloric, it is said, demanded five-sevenths less fuel than steam in order to produce the same effects; and that which crowned the conquest was, that by the application of caloric vanished all danger of explosions and other accidents which attach to the use of steam both by land and water.

It is easy to perceive the effects of the new principle of movement upon the action of the world. I will only mention one, which I cannot think of without the intensest joy. It is, the facility which it will afford to all, even to the poor, for travelling. Before long, all will be able, occasionally, to enjoy the refreshment of free movement; all will be able some time to see a great portion of God's beautiful world,—will be able, through travel, to cast away sorrow, to improve health, renew strength, extend their views, live, learn and enjoy, as I myself have done, and cannot feel sufficiently thankful for. . . . How gladdening, how divine, to become the promulgator of such an earthly gospel to mankind! See! This is found concealed in one of the many overlooked machines in the little Swedish department of the World's Exhibition.

Did the fortunate discoverer require the vast soul-room of the New World for the accomplishment of his invention, in order to breathe and work in freedom? Was his fatherland—was Sweden, too narrow for him? It would grieve me had he found it so: but it rejoiced me to hear that he had said—"If I succeed in my discovery, then—but not before—I shall return to Sweden."

There is a relationship between mother and son so great and holy that we cannot compare it with any other.

This is remarkable in this little people, cast by fate high up towards the polar circle, cut off from the great world—this little people of three millions of Swedes. We lack much which makes other nations great, which qualify them to take the initiative in the world's development. We want still religious freedom, the noblest of all freedom. We want, at the same time, freedom of thought, freedom of conscience in its highest objective form: we want this, with all its ennobling, fertilizing life. We lack the mighty public spirit which perpetually wakes, and knows how actively to convert the time of peace into a time of glorious victories; the public spirit which can remove mountains by faith—that penetrating, discriminating faith in its own powers and the will of Providence; the spirit which never despairs, and never gives way before difficulties and discouragements; which without hesitation sacrifices individual advantages to a clearly perceived public benefit. We lack this still. We lack—ah! we lack much; but great men we do not lack: men who, from time to time, come forth from the dark home by the iceberg, and work in the world and in the epochs of science, and stamp upon them the impress of their genius. From Odin down to our own time, this series of Ynglingar—immortal youths in the world of spirit—intellectual vikings, who have caused the name of Sweden to circulate round the world with honour; and it is remarkable that these men have always achieved their victories through a quality which is regarded as a fundamental deficiency in the Swedish national character—perseverance.

Our great warriors, statesmen, and men of science, have all conquered through their perseverance—through that have won what they desired. To read their history is to read the history of the power of perseverance. Ericson's life is another example of this kind; a splendid testimony to the power of persevering labour united with genius. We close this episode, which will not seem long to Swedes, with the wish that our great countryman may soon return to his people and his fatherland.

It was a general people's day, a so-called shilling day, on which I first visited the Exhibition. In the course of this day it was visited by from one hundred and seven to one hundred and eight thousand persons; and the spectacle which this life of the people presented was not one of the least interesting features of the Exhibition. The concourse of people, especially as one surveyed it from the upper galleries, reminded one of a disturbed ant'-nest. One could not move in it without being incessantly pushed and jostled about. I endured this on this day for full five hours; but never have I been less rudely pushed, more gently treated in a crushing crowd of people; never beheld a more friendly, inoffensive, good-humoured disposition amongst those that pushed and were pushed,—that is to say, in each and all,—than here in this vast throng of people, of all classes and in all kinds of clothes, both handsome and mean.

Only once, in the upper gallery, had I a lively anticipation of being crushed to death. A dense mass of people formed themselves on one spot where many ways met, and this every moment increased through the fresh living streams from all sides. Some evidently ill-disposed people, men and women, who kept together in a knot, pressed violently and jeeringly on the throng, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the close-packed and crushed multitude. Forced against the balustrade, and supporting myself against a pillar, I was neither able to move from the spot nor scarcely to breathe, while I felt, that the moment was approaching when some accident must happen; and some old ladies and gentlemen, who were sitting with pale, anxious countenances near me, were evidently of the same opinion, for in the middle of the throng people began to shriek and strike. But just as I fully comprehended all the horrors of this moment, my kind companion said to me, "Don't be afraid! the police are there. Police! All will soon be right again!"

The word "Police! police!" went like lightning, like a liberating spell from mouth to mouth. I saw white-gloved hands moving in the air over the heads of the human mass, and at the same moment the crush gave way—there was air, space, motion. The people streamed off by different ways, and myself and Mrs. Howitt could gain the stairs which we had been endeavouring to reach, and descend into the vast space at the bottom, where, notwithstanding the immense multitude, you ran no danger of such a crush.

The Duke of Wellington was also this day in the Crystal Palace, which he was in the habit of often visiting; but this time he could not support the pressure, which was greater than it had ever been before. Two policemen were obliged to take the old Field Marshal betwixt them, and assist him out of the crowd and the Crystal Palace again. The people, who recognised him, made way for him with hurraha.

It was especially in the so-called Transept, the splendid central space running directly across the Crystal Palace, that you could best see and enjoy the popular life. Here, between the two huge elm-trees, which in full freedom stretched forth their giant arms under the crystal vault which they seemed to support; here, amid the glittering, splashing water-works, where the crystal jets issued from the glass fountain; where the groups of living trees and plants from all zones stood wet with the dew from the fountains; where the groups of superb birds and insects, the admirable artistic productions of human hands, shone amongst the green leaves; here, you saw people of all classes sitting on the benches, upon steps, or at the feet of marble statues, which in a vast circle, stood like silent spectators of the moving, busy scene. Here you saw old men and women, in poor clothes, sit and eat together out of their provision-baskets, old and poor as themselves. Here, young mothers were sitting, and nursing their children without any constraint, in the neighbourhood of elegant ladies and gentlemen, who were treating themselves to ices and other refreshments, which were to be found in plentiful abundance, set out on tables and counters covered with snow-white cloths, within the splendid iron-gates of the Transept. And there, in that outer gallery, were again fresh groups of flowers and green shrubs; and here sate people together at small tables, and ate and drank together in social ease.

Here, in this middle portion of the palace, were comparative rest and peace; a kind of still-life of actual beauty. Here, by the murmurs of the springing waters, surrounded by Swedish pines and tropical palms,—here I enjoyed my most charming hours in the Exhibition, refreshed by repose, by the thoughtful kindness of friends, and by coffee and bread-and-butter, the staff of life during the journey through the Crystal Palace. How charming here to listen in tranquillity to the hum of the vast multitude, to the sound of music from the organs and pianos, which here and there throughout the hall were touched by skilful hands! To see the sunbeams play on the up-springing waters, and from the moving ocean of people to lift the eyes to the statues around, representing life's great moments of strength or joy in ideal beauty! I came, by chance, repeatedly to seat myself by a marble statue at one end of the transept, representing Time. It was the old half-awakened ideal of time—the primeval old man with his hour-glass and scythe; which I can by no means perceive to be a profound conception, for nothing strikes me so much in the living time, as its eternal youth, its Pheenix character. And the old man did not here attract my notice on his own account, but it was a flock of small gnats that perpetually kept up a dance around the head of the ancient one, as if they would allure him to look up, and imbibe more joyous thoughts. They came from the living, verdant shrubs, from the springing waters of the fountains, behind the old one's back, and the little winged creatures sang of life and eternal youth, eternal spring-time over the head of stony Time, and the sun beamed on the glad some flock, as if he smiled in approbation of their dance.

Charming was it to watch the groups of people who sat enjoying the gifts of life in concord. It was family-life on a magnificent scale. Just opposite to me I saw a little group of two gentlemen and a lady. The gentlemen offered the lady alternately to drink from their cups, and she drank; a trifling circumstance, but it pleased me, for the three, who were neither young nor handsome, had an expression of a beautiful humanity. Were they relatives, or only friends? A pure, beautiful friendship, a fraternal relationship betwixt persons of different sexes, is a sight rare and beautiful, and one in the futurity of which I trust.

(To be continued.)

NELLY NOWLAN'S EXPERIENCE IN SERVICE AND OTHER MATTERS.

COMMUNICATED BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

NELLY NOWLAN'S aunt bore up against her niece's banishment (as she called it) with fortitude; some of her neighbours said—What a comfort it must be to be well rid of the girl, who was such a torment to her—and to be receiving an occasional five or ten shillings instead of the vexation she caused her, by refusing so decidedly the best match in the country—the very best offer a poor girl could have; for every one knew that no thought of emigration ever disturbed

(1) Continued from p. 13.

"Tom's" mind; that he lived—wonderful to tell in Ireland!—upon a little freehold of his own, and held his own, without debt or danger; he was fortunately placed, also, in the unpicturesque but comfortable County Wexford—a county I have so often mentioned, that I am almost ashamed to do so now; it seems—no matter how many lands I see—as if I had little to say of any, except Wexford! however, so stands the fact. "Tom" was a denizen of the Barony of Bargy; but Nelly's "people" belonged to the county of Limerick; and Nelly herself drew her first breath on "Shannon's flow'ry banks;"

this, perhaps, accounts for her having more earnestness and enthusiasm in her composition than falls to the lot of a mere "Wexford girl," who is in general as steady, neat, orderly and care-taking, as if born on the Saxon side of the water; in fact,—though I believe the "real ould ancient original Irish" would hardly consider it a compliment,—the Wexford lasses, particularly those of the baronies of Forth and Bargy, are, as I have said before, in their customs, manners, and language, far more Saxon than Celt.

Nelly's aunt was a wonderful flax-dresser; she had a great deal of knowledge about flax, in all its several stages; sowing, growing, steeping, beetling, carding, hackling, spinning! She was, in short, a flax oracle, and was more generally called the "flax woman," than anything else. She was so very wise, was Nelly's aunt, that if she had lived in old times, the neighbours would have thought she had something to do with fairy flax, and every one knows that is very different from the flax manufactured for good, honest, homely, prosperous purposes.

She had been a beauty in her youth; a soft, delicate sort of beauty. She had still fair flaxen hair, and large, light, loving blue eyes, with long dark lashes; she was not old, except in manner; and those of her neighbours and employers, staid settled housekeepers, who had found Nelly too giddy,—and if truth must be told, too monopolizing of the attentions and affections of the "lads of the village," to the great discomfiture of their own blooming, solid, Barony-of-Forth daughters,—never hesitated to say, that if they were young men, they knew who they should look after—not that giddy Nelly; her face wasn't of the lasting kind—nothing but foolish red and white; no ruse, or nothing but a "spud;" no eyes—to talk about—and a regular Munster mouth. Yes, to be sure the teeth were good—that is, white enough; but who in their senses would ever set any store by teeth—the last to come, and the first to go, of all gifts. Now the flax-woman had fine melancholy features; it was as good as a "sarmin" to look in her face—never took a partner from any of the girls at a dance—never threw a "sheep's eye" after any of the boys, or expected to be walked home with, or stood betwixt a promised pair by moonlight or sunlight, which Nelly was always doing, in her heedless sort of way—laughing and jesting with all, yet caring for none. But the great secret, after all, of poor Nelly's unpopularity with her own sex, was her popularity with the other; nothing injures a woman so effectually with the generality of women, as her being held up as a pattern to them by the "lords of the creation." "Nelly danced so well." "Nelly Nowlan was such a good scholar." "Nelly had such mother-wit." "Nelly was such a clever manager; she'd make a new gown out of an old one." "No matter what Nelly had on, it looked well." "Nelly's voice was as loud as a blackbird's, as sweet as a linnet's, and like the Robin's, always heard in gloomy weather." This last was the schoolmaster's opinion, and his was considered "the best authority." Not but Nelly had some friends among the women; Mary Brien, the blind girl, knew that every Sunday Nelly would call for her, and lead her carefully and tenderly to the Chapel.

Tom—poor Tom's affections were first drawn towards Nelly by the attention she paid his motherless girls;—of course "the neighbours" all said "she had a motive in it," and so she had, the most benevolent motive in the world! and when she fairly refused her elderly lover, they all shook their wise heads, and said, "there was a reason for it!"

Nelly's aunt did not in the least mind walking into Wexford, only to inquire at the Post-office if there was an "English letter" for her—hope shortened the journey, but every disappointment increased its length.

When, at last, the next letter arrived, the affectionate creature read it through her tears.

"MY DEAR AUNT,—I have often longed to turn my pen to the paper, but no one, only the Almighty, knows how hurried, and hustled, and bothered I am, getting myself up to understand everything, or to make believe to do so, which comes to much the same thing for a while anyhow, which I daresay you don't understand, and so best for you, Aunt dear!

"I'm with the lady still, and likely to remain, for she's both kind and helpless, and is well enough to do without a nurse (she says), though if I'm not that no one ever was. She's not fractious, poor dear! only humoursome, and does not care to stay long in one place—restless-like; I have my trials with her too in many little ways—I didn't want her to know I could read, because she might ask me to read prayers and things contrary to my religion, but unfortunately, I said, I could write, and that let her into it—she was 'cute enough to know that I must read first.

"We were a while in a place, they call it by the name of Bath; it's a mighty unnatural city, where the could water comes up out of the earth in a continued boil, and you wouldn't see a carriage with a pair of horses in a week's walk, for it's the men are horses there and draw the sick creatures, that bathe in, and then drink, the hot water, up and down the hills, and you'd think it a holy place, for every second gentleman you meet is a priest or minister; yes, indeed, they must be a mighty delicate set of gentlemen in England, for there's a power of them in Bath. My mistress never meddles with my religion, only folds her spectacles in the Bible and leaves it in my way—but I take no notice. I can hardly expect you to believe me, but the water comes as I tell you hot out of the earth; there must be a fire under it somewhere, but who can tell where that fire is, or who looks after it? The inhabitants, I'm sure, live in greater terror of an explosion than they let on to the poor innocents that do be looking after their health; and maybe that's the reason they fill up the town with the Clergy to keep all quiet; sure its them we send for ourselves when anything unnatural is going on; if you mind' when the underground noises were heard in Castle Croft, they sent for his Reverence Father Joyce at once, and kept him ever so long about the place, and no one heard a stir of noise since! so maybe, the holy men are useful that way in Bath, to keep down the spirits of the waters in their right place.

"I told you my lady was fidgety-like, and she very soon got tired of Bath and would come to London. Now dear, I'll leave it to another time to say what I've got to say about London,—and remember, sure if I wrote for a hundred years, I could not insene you into what it is, or what it is like. Aunt, it's full up of people! underground, overground, high up, down low—people,—people in misery and sin, people in plenty and pleasure; it's never still by day or night, for at night, the very breathing of such thousands and thousands of people, is like to stifled thunder; it's full of a pale withered-up sort of life in one place, and it is blooming like a fresh May morning only a stone's throw from the same, in another; it's a city of contradictions—it's the grandest place upon the face of the earth, if it was only for the multitudes of living immortal creatures it contains, and it's the meanest place in the universe:—they make money out of the very scrapings of the streets!—and bless your kind heart! it's yourself that would be troubled to see the people driving on, and on, and on for ever, without rest, and all so solid like. And, Aunt, but it's lonesome to be surrounded by such thousands of people without knowing one of them from Adam, only all black strangers, no one to bid you good morrow morning, or say, God save you; for their manners are not our manners; they're a fine kind-hearted people, but they're mortal fearful you should think so. The first lodging we were in, I thought to be very kind and mannerly to the mistress of the house, and so when I met her the next day I dropped her a curtsy,—and says I, 'The top of the morning to ye, Ma'am;' well, instead of returning my civility, she told my mistress I'd insulted her; you see they're an unaccountable people, but it's not that I wanted to write about. Aunt dear, I know you're anxious about how I get on with my 'duty,' and I took your advice and resolved to walk in my own way, and when I told my mistress I'd like to get leave to go to my duty, she told me she was well satisfied with the way I was going on, I was doing my duty perfectly; so I thanked her for her good opinion, but said I wanted to make a clean breast, if I could find out a proper Clergy to make it to; and then she smiled her faint quiet smile, just for all the world like a thread of moonlight, and said, she understood how that what I meant by 'duty,' was going to the Priest, to confession, and gave me leave to go next Sunday to first Mass. So I got my instructions where to go, and set off with a light heart. To be sure it did me good to enter a place of my own worship again, and the music was just wonderful—only they made me pay a shilling for a seat, think of that! but I'd have paid ten, if I had it—to get in, my heart warmed so. And the tears came to my eyes, when I see the fine men serving on the altar and such fine blessed candles—all wax. And the râle bowing and turning; and little boys in their little albs that keeps all the saints' days, running about the streets, the darlings, in all sorts and kinds of mischief. Oh, I was so delighted, and so thankful, and the music and the velvet, and the painted windys with the sun shining through them, and the beautiful things, put me a-past all judgment—if I could have had you there just to see what a picture it was! But by'n by, I heard one of their Reverences in the pulpit, though I was so bewildered I never saw him go there, and I said to myself, 'Mass can't be half over yet,' thinking it was soon for the sermont,—and then I thought again may be it was the difference of the country, and looking round I saw all the ladies had crosses on their Prayer-books, and that set me right again, for I was sure none but ourselves would have that. Then the Organ and the little boys in their little albs began again; and I was fairly transported, for never had I heard such music—not singing-music, but talking-music it was. Oh my heart beat quick with joy, to think how I had got into the right place, and how in the very thick of a nation of heretics, there was everything natural like to my own faith. I cried down tears of joy, and indeed others did the same. Then another priest—a fine man intirely—got up into another pulpit, and gave us I must say a fine sermont, I never could desire a better—and it's the truth I'm telling you,—he spoke of fasts, and saints, and gave out the sarvices on next Saints' days—and reminded us of confession. Oh, Aunt darling, don't you or Father Joyce think bad of it if I say, and its true as if they were the last words I should write in this world—that no holy Priest of Rome could pay greater honour to the saints than himself; or insist finer on confession and fasts, or bow with more devotion to the altar; I don't care who gainsays it, but he was a fine man. Oh glory! says I, ain't I in luck? ain't I blessed? ain't I happy? and I thought to myself I'd make bold to ask a fine grand old waiting gentleman, who carried his head high, and was all over fine: I asked him where I could get spaking with any of their reverences? and he said some of the sisters were in the vesty then, as they were going to change the hour of vespers, and, indeed, he was mighty civil, and said if I wanted to ask a Christian question I might wait there, and he took me near the little room where they keep the vestments, and presently a fine, grand lady came out, and I heard her complain how she caught cold at Malins, and one of their reverences came out and bid her good day by the name of 'Sister Mary,' and then the grand ould waiting gentleman bustled on bowing, (not to the altar, but to the lady,) and called out for Lady Jane Style's carriage. I had a great mind to call out 'Whist,' for I thought it no way to be shouting for carriages at the open door of a holy place. Well; one young priest passed, and another, backing out and making obdience to their Shooparier: and then came two more ladies—'sisters,' no doubt, and then another priest. Oh! how my heart would have warmed to them, only they seemed somehow only half way, and at last the Shooparier himself came, and I thought any one could see he was the râle thing; he was the very stamp and moral of Father Joyce, and no Cardinal could be more stately—there was a lady, sweet-faced and gentle-looking with him, but when I fell on my knees and asked to speak with him she smiled and went on!

(1) Remember.

"He bid me stand up, and asked what I wanted.

"To make a clean breast, your reverence, whenever it's conveyment to you, night or day. Your time is mine, holy Father, and I would not delay you long, for I've kep' watch over my thoughts and actions; though, for all that, I'm a grade sinner.' I spoke as partly as ever I could to the kind gentleman; well, he asked me if I wanted to be a sister, and I said, No—I'd no inclination for a Nunnery, good or bad; and then, 'My good girl,' he says—quite solid-like, 'what is it you do want?'—and something quare came over me, at the changing of his countenance; and I makes answer, 'May be your Reverence would tell me the time for giving it: and as I like to be prepared and do the thing decent, would your Reverence tell me the charge for absolution in this town?'

"Now, Aunt, I put it to you, could anything be purtier, or fairer spoken than that? but his white cheek flushed—he turned on me in anger, only he could not bould a black look for a minute, and he says—

"Do you take me for one of the blind priests of Rome?'

"Indeed I did, sir,' I made answer, 'how could I help it?' the words came to my lips quite natural—though my heart was beating with what I can't tell, to think of his speaking that way of the holy Fathers, and he treading as hard as ever he could on their heels—and then the look of pity he threw on me!

"Poor creature, poor creature,' he says. 'You come, I see, of a benighted race.' Well, I was bothered. He walked gently on, and the very sweep of his coat, from head to tail, had a priestly swing with it; and then he turned back and looked at me so gently. 'Have you been often here?' he says. Well, I gave him another curtsy, but not so low as the others.

"No, sir,' I answered, (I did not 'your Reverence' him that time,) 'and I won't trouble you again.'

"You do not trouble me,' he says. 'I only wish you trod in our paths.'

"I'd rather keep to my own, sir; and then I'll make no mistakes.' Well, he was a quiet gentleman, for he smiled at that. And he says again, 'I would like to question you a little;' and he was going on only I stopt him. 'Question Father John Joyce, if you please, sir; I'll give you his address—he always answered for me, and always will, that's my comfort.' And the name of my own blessed priest gave me strength. 'He always answered for me,' I repeated, 'and for my people; he knows what he's about, and would scorn to mislead any poor girl,—it's too bad, so it is, to be situated this way, that I can't tell the differ between a holy priest and a protestant minister.' Well, that settled him, as I thought it would; and he walks right away, and the pale beautiful lady in black, that had been leaning against a pillar like a statue, takes his arm; and the stout goold laced old gentleman beckons me on, not crossly. So I says, 'Which of the sisters is that?' And he gave a chuckle of a laugh. 'That's his wife,' he says.

"Oh! holy Moses," says I, 'look at that now! HIS WIFE!' And I thought of the candles and crosses and bowings; and all the saints he ran over; and the little boys in their little albs, and everything so like the right—and yet the wrong; 'his wife, and he a PRIEST! let me out of the place,' I says, 'for it's a sin and a shame; neither one thing nor another; all a delusion; let me out;' and then I stopt. 'Maybe he's not a priest at all!' I inquired, looking at the stout old gentleman, 'and if he's not, what is he?'

"I'll tell you, young woman," he answers, and he makes believe to whisper; and then it came on me like a flash of lightning, that I had got into neither the one nor the other, but into a half-way house!

"And have you none of them in Ireland?" he inquires.

"Now, Aunt dear, that bothered me as much as anything, how that stout old gentleman knew I was Irish. I never told him so, and I am as well dressed as any English maid can be; you would not know me, (though I was always so nice,) I am so improved; and yet he says, 'Have you none of them in Ireland?' and I answered quite proudly, 'No, sir; we've the rare thing there!' and that settled him. I saw he was ashamed of himself, and of all the gongs on—creeping, creeping towards our holy church, and yet pretending to talk of its blindness; yet we ought to be content, for if they're let to go on as they're going, it's asy told where they'll stop, for the time's coming, as I heard at Moorfields, where everything was to my satisfaction, and I found the rare priest at last, though not so fine a man as our own dear Father Joyce, the heavens be his bed! and may he and the holy saints keep sin and heart-sorrow from you, my darling Aunt! you who watched over me with as much as a mother's love. It's the spring-time now, and I often dream of the Bohreens, and the wild-bird's song, and then again I feel as if the whole shadow of the mountain was over me like a shroud; but it isn't long that lasts—as the song says,—

"Hope will brighten days to come,
And memory gild the past."

(To be resumed.)

HENRY IV. AND GABRIELLE D'ETREES.

THE picture from which this engraving is taken was painted by R. Westall, and exhibited by him at the Royal Academy in 1829, under the title of "The first interview of Henry IV. with the fair Gabrielle." It is a work composed of much elegance, and more spirit than is often found in the pictures of this artist, who sometimes sacrificed power to a refined treatment, so as to produce insipidity.

Had the "fair Gabrielle" lived before the Troubadours became an extinct race, her beauty, accomplishments, and untimely death, would have roused the spirit of poetry in these wandering minstrels; as it is, they have furnished matter for song to the Romantics of France, who have caused her praises to be echoed through the green valleys of Picardy. By what means Henry the Great first heard of her, history does not inform us, but we learn from Father Mathieu, when the king was engaged in war, in 1590, he once stole away from Attichy, while pursuing the Prince of Parma, and went, for the first time, to see the beautiful maiden at Couvres. He contented himself with eating some bread-and-butter at the gate of her father's house, that he might not raise any suspicions in the mind of her parent. This, it may be presumed, is the point in the history that forms the subject of Westall's picture.

Gabrielle D'Estrées, as the French historian Sully writes her name, was of an ancient family in Picardy, and married, subsequently, as it would seem, to Henry's introduction to her, M. D'Avermal, Lord of Liancourt. This act her father compelled her to, but the monarch found means of setting it aside, and she became his favourite, and was created, in succession, Marchioness of Monceaux, and Duchess of Beaufort. Exercising vast influence over the king, notwithstanding he possessed almost every quality that constitutes greatness of mind, there is no doubt he would have made her his wife, had it not been for the earnest remonstrances of his minister, Sully, who urged upon him the feeling of indignity with which such an alliance was likely to be received by the French noblesse; a marriage of this nature would, in all probability, have roused the two parties,—the Catholics and the Protestants, to unite in open rebellion against him. It may not, perhaps, be too much to affirm that Henry's violent attachment to Gabrielle, who was a Catholic, operated strongly to induce him to renounce the Protestant faith in 1593; and it is certain that, in 1598, she sent an emissary to the Pope to intrigue with the king's agents at Rome, who were commissioned by Henry to solicit the dissolution of his marriage with Margaret, sister to Charles IX. The negotiations, however, came to nothing.

There was something very tragical in the death of the Duchess of Beaufort, as she was always called after her elevation to the title. She was highly superstitious, ever consulting the astrologers of the time, who, although she paid them well, never foretold her anything that was agreeable. Hence she was very frequently oppressed with melancholy, and would sometimes retire from the gayest company to pass the night weeping over some unfortunate prediction. Shortly before the Easter-week, in the year 1599, she was staying at Fontainebleau, suffering under an usual depression of spirits. The king expressed a wish that she should leave him for the holidays, and return to Paris. They parted under mutual feelings of distress; "Madam de Beaufort," says Sully, "spoke to the king as if for the last time; she recommended to him her children, her house at Monceaux, and her domestics. His majesty listened, but instead of comforting her, gave way to a sympathising grief. Henry would not so soon have parted from her, if the Marechal D'Ornano, Roquelaure, had not taken him away by force." She arrived in Paris, and on Maunday Thursday, after attending evening service in the church of St. Antoine, was suddenly seized with violent convulsions, from which she did not recover. She expired on the morning of Good Friday, and it is reported that her features were so distorted as to defy recognition. The fanatics of the time remarked that God's judgment was especially visible in the sad manner of her death, which seems altogether to have been so mysterious as to lead to the supposition that poison was administered; but whether this were the case, or the general tribute of nature under a more mysterious and terrific form than usual, was never clearly ascertained, as most of the circumstances were concealed even from the king himself.

Such was the termination of the brilliant and ambitious career of "La Belle Gabrielle," which unquestionably teaches a moral not to be lost sight of; while every reflective mind must appreciate the arguments used by the prime minister of Henry, Sully, to reconcile his royal master to so heavy an affliction: for the royal favourite was by no means unworthy of the distinction she enjoyed; the good qualities of her heart and mind had elevated her scarcely less than the beauty of her person. "I recalled to his remembrance," writes Sully, in his Memoirs, "some of those passages in the Holy Scriptures wherein God, as a Father and Master, requires that confidence and perfect resignation, the effect of which is to inspire a Christian with a contempt for all sublunary things; to which I added such as might incite to the acknowledgment and adoration of Divine Providence as well in deep misfortunes as unexpected success. I made no scruple to represent to him that the accident which now gave him all this affliction was among the number of those which he would one day look upon as most fortunate."

It is not a little remarkable, that one in the position of Gabrielle D'Estrées should have made so few enemies: even Sully, whose duty to his king and country compelled him to oppose her elevation to the throne for political reasons, speaks of her as a woman who, by a thousand good qualities, was worthy of a king's affection; and D'Aubigné, a writer who cannot be supposed to have had much sympathy with one of her creed and in her position, "wonders how she could have lived so like a queen for so many years, and that with so few enemies: the necessities of state were the only enemies she had to contend against." She used with great moderation her power over the king, and often gave him very good counsel. The ordeal of a female court-favourite is rarely encountered without leaving some traces of evil influence behind; Gabrielle passed through it unscathed in her own person, save by the one error of her life, atoned for, to the world, by her many virtues. She was one of those bright spirits of whom universal history furnishes frequent examples, whose lives serve both as beacons and warnings, and who seem to have been sent into the world—to quote the oft-repeated line of the poet—

"To point a moral, and adorn a tale."

VISIT TO A HAREM AT TUNIS.

BY A LADY.

I HAD long wished to see a Moorish harem, and therefore gladly accepted an invitation to accompany a small party to visit the bride of one of the richest Moors in Tunis. As soon as we entered the house, we were conducted upstairs to that part assigned to the female members of the family; while the gentlemen remained below to pay their respects to the bridegroom; they would have had great pleasure in congratulating his fair partner also, but this, of course, could not be allowed. After passing through a long gallery, we were ushered into a spacious and handsome room, at the upper end of which the youthful bride was seated, surrounded by ladies, many of whom were her near relatives. Her mother came forward to meet us, and ordered seats to be placed for us near the bride, who sat with downcast eyes, and without the least sign of life, save a slight heaving of the chest. It would be impossible to give you an adequate idea of the richness of her dress. The ground of the upper robe was bright green striped with white, and so thickly embroidered with gold that you could scarcely distinguish the original, and the under one was much handsomer, being white, brocaded with gold.

The quantities of diamonds and pearls which adorned her person made her appear quite dazzling. Her head-dress was a kind of green shashea, entirely covered with large pearls, and placed to lean backwards on her head; strings of pearls depended from it, and drooped over her forehead and ears. The former was painted with henna, in resemblance of two bands crossing it just above the eyebrows; her fingers also were deeply dyed with the same, and adorned with rings of great value; her neck and wrists were loaded with pearls, and the diamond ornament which covered her chest was of immense size; her anklets were very thick, and of solid gold, and her slippers were of wrought gold, studded with diamonds.

This description may appear exaggerated; but when we consider that she was a lady of rank, and that it is the custom in this, as well as in other unsettled countries, to vest one-third of their property in valuables, and that on the occasion of a marriage they borrow jewels from their friends, you cannot be so much surprised.

Although the bride's dress was rich in the extreme, that of a young and beautiful lady, who sat near her, pleased me better: her robe was of silver brocade, and her head-dress composed entirely of diamonds. The young ladies do not allow their hair to be seen, but the married ones wear theirs cut short just above the chin, and smoothed down with a kind of hard pomatum, or bandoline, which gives it the appearance of being braided, and is, I think, very becoming.

We had not remained long when a singing woman made her appearance, and amused the bridal party by chanting the praises not only of the bride, but of all her companions; this she accompanied with strange gestures of the body, and occasionally stopped short in the midst of her panegyrics to give the usual "Lu, lu, lu," which chorus was immediately echoed by the numerous slaves and persons in attendance, when she would again begin, with renewed vigour, to declare the beauty and attractions of the bride; telling her, that even we, who were strangers, had come to behold her beauty, to admire the lustre of her black eyes, the snowy whiteness of her neck, &c. &c. As soon as this was ended, we were taken into another apartment, where a little Abyssinian girl was dancing with great spirit to the singing, or rather humming of a woman, who accompanied herself by beating with the hand upon a bright tin coffee-pot: this was the only music they had; and the company appeared perfectly satisfied with it.

I was glad to see that the bride had been allowed to leave her throne, and form one of the party; for she must have been very much fatigued by sitting so long in one position; her heavy head-dress, too, had been exchanged for a coronet of pearls.

When we proposed going, we were pressingly invited to remain and dine with them. Accordingly, we did so; and although I cannot say that our appetites were gratified, our curiosity certainly was. We were delighted to find ourselves seated on low cushions at an eastern table, with about fifty Moorish ladies, who treated us with great kindness and respect. One in particular was very friendly and communicative, and alleged as a reason for being so, that she knew something of European manners, her father having had his head cut off by the Greeks. The lady next her begged her not to speak on such an unpleasant subject at dinner. One of the ladies was black, yet the favourite wife of a very wealthy Moor. The dining table was long and narrow, covered with a white cloth, and a profusion of cakes and sweetmeats. Large round dishes, filled with soups and other messes, were placed at certain distances, and although some of them were not very palatable, and each person dipped her fingers into the one before her, we did our best to show that we admired their tastes by partaking of them as freely as possible. They were anxious to know why we did not eat with our fingers, and take large mouthfuls, as they did, in order to grow fat; "but," said they, "you sit at high tables, and eat with knives and forks, taking small pieces, which is the reason that you remain so thin."

After dinner we went back to the room that we first entered, and, seated on the floor, at one end of it, we saw a woman dressed in black, whom we at first supposed to be a widow, but we soon perceived she was a fortune-teller, and was busily engaged in revealing future events to several fair and anxious inquirers, who listened to her with profound attention. After coffee had been handed round, we took our departure, highly pleased with our reception, but we could not help remarking, that although our kind entertainers had the appearance of cheerfulness while their different amusements were going on, yet, as soon as these ceased, their countenances assumed an expression of discontent, which plainly proved that riches, without liberty or education of any kind, are not sufficient to promote happiness. Neither is their religion calculated to raise their minds from the follies of this evil world, and fix them upon another and a better, whose inhabitants enjoy the purest and most refined pleasure.

LIFE IN PRAIRIE LAND.

CHAPTER X.

"Sit with me here," said Mary, "in this dark, unfinished room. It has been the theatre of some of the scenes which I shall endeavour to delineate, and do not prepare yourself for any high-wrought romance. My story is one of reality too palpable to be recurred to, even now, without the most painful emotions. It is one of the many I could relate illustrative of the trials which sometimes wait on the settler in new countries. But you were down at the graves to-day, and have already guessed the import of what is to follow, so I will begin in my own way.

"I must premise that, from our first settling here, we have been under the necessity (often a pleasant one) of entertaining many strangers, for the most part gentlemen, who come to view the country. Persons landing at any of the river towns in our vicinity, and wishing to spend a few days or weeks for that purpose, were generally referred to us; and when they came, it was impossible to deny them such a home as we had to share with them. It has been a severe burthen to us females, overtasked as we have been with the cares of our own families and the arduous labours which the imperfection of the mechanic arts imposes on the good housekeeper of new countries; but we could not, and often did not wish to escape from it. When we moved into this house, most of these persons came to us, probably because my family was smaller than Mrs. R.'s, and my house larger. Sometimes such gussets have been attacked with fevers, and lain on the threshold of death for weeks, requiring such care and attention as only an accomplished nurse, otherwise unemployed, could give. I have, in such cases, had to divide my time and ability between them and my family, watching by night and working by day, till they have recovered, and gone from our roof bearing the recollection, that humanity is not always confined to the homes in which physical refinement contributes so much to the comfort of the afflicted. Happily, no one of these wayfarers ever expired among us, though I have many times lived in the daily expectation of such an event. We watched one young stranger on that bed for ten weeks, during three of which we expected each day would terminate his sufferings and our hope. But he recovered to thank us, and bless his Maker for the energies which had borne him safely through the fierce conflict.

"But this is not my story. I relate these events merely to convey some idea of the claim which strangers have to our hospitality, and of the feeling which links us as brethren to those who are homeless and friendless in our land. This feeling breaks down all the barriers of ceremony wherewith we are restrained in more populous regions. It brings strangers together without the frigid medium that makes them mere objects of sight to each other; it seats them at your table and invites them to partake of whatever your home affords, with a freedom and genuineness that make the recollection of the cold and heartless ceremonies of more artificial society sickening.

"Such was the feeling that opened our doors to the solitary man whom you see still among us. But he came not thus alone. When he landed, three years ago this spring, at the place you left a few days since, he was accompanied by a young wife. They had set out together from one of the eastern cities, to seek happiness and fortune at the west. Having no definite place in view, they landed at P—, and there the young bride remained, while her husband visited the interior in search of a spot where they might make their home. He came to our neighbourhood, and finding a piece of land which he liked, about a mile beyond us on the prairie, returned and brought his wife to see it. They stopped at our house, and I was more than willing they should find a home here till their own was ready to receive them.

"Mrs. K. was a dark-haired woman, with an eye that made her whole face glow when it was lighted up with pleasure or expectation. She was rather above the middle stature, with a well-formed person, and a clear, happy voice. It was easy to see that her husband, silent and grave as he was, loved her with a strength that is rarely surpassed in man. They seemed to me a happy couple. They boarded a few days in our family, and then commenced housekeeping in this room. She was a pleasant companion, and being nearly of my own age, and possessing a cultivated mind, there soon grew up a warm friendship between us. Each could enliven the solitary hours of the other, and during the long days when our husbands were at work, we were much together.

"Their farm progressed quite rapidly; one or two fields were broken by the plough, a house built, and an enclosure made around it the first season. The next spring they removed. Their place, as I said, is about a mile east of this; it is further out on the prairie, and commands a beautiful view to the south and south-east. It was delightful, after they removed there, to see near us another tenanted home. You cannot appreciate this feeling till you have passed a deserted one on some wide prairie. A sign of life, about one of the thinly-scattered houses here, stirs the heart with joy, though you have never seen its inmates; but a deserted prairie home, with smokeless chimney and curtainless windows, is one of the loneliest objects on which the eye can rest.

"A new source of joy cheered the young wife in her labours. She was soon to become a mother; and what task sweeter than to prepare her dwelling for the expected guest. She toiled faithfully and patiently, as if her hands had been trained to it from childhood; and her labour was directed by a capacity that made it effective. Her rough house grew into a pleasant habitable abode, and the young harvest springing around, gave cheering promise for the coming season. I saw her often after their removal, and always found her happy and rejoicing in the prospect before her.

"On the 24th of April of that year, there commenced the most remarkable series of storms ever known in the country. They occurred daily and sometimes twice a-day, till the last of June, accompanied by the most terrific thunder and lightning ever witnessed. You may judge of the terror they inspired, when I tell you, that much as I loved the conflict of the elements before, the roll of thunder even now always produces a temporary faintness and nausea; then it completely overcame me. Language can convey no idea of those terrible days. The storms gathered with such fearful rapidity. A small cloud would be seen somewhere,

"When all the rest of heaven was clear," and in a moment the deluge was upon us. It seemed as if another flood were coming to purify the earth. The falling of the rain was frightful, to say nothing of the lightning that cleft the atmosphere, and the crashing thunder that followed so close upon it, that the tread of the latter seemed to extinguish the light of the former.

"These terrible scenes, following each other without the intermission of a day for more than two months, seemed to blight the country. The prairies were saturated, and in many places submerged, and yet the rain came. Sometimes when it had stormed thus all night, the sky would be clear till noon, and the sun pour his rays upon the steaming earth, till vegetation seemed scalded. Perhaps, just as dinner was set, a little cloud would gather in the west, or a faint roll of thunder strike the ear. My appetite would vanish in an instant; and with blanched face and trembling limbs, we would set away the meal untasted. The men always came in, though they were generally drenched before they reached the house. But such was our terror, that we could not have remained alone. When a shower commenced, we knew not that its termination would see us alive. One flash and thunder-peal, I remember, were so awful that they brought us all to our feet with pale faces, and eyes that looked as if they were gazing on death. When the shock had passed, and we found that we could still move, the people of each house rushed to the doors, expecting to see the other on fire. But the lightning had rifted that large oak, the stump of which still stands about midway between them. After a while we ceased all employment when these awful periods came, and sat like people awaiting their doom. I have never seen anything of the sublime or terrible that approached the storms of those seventy days.

"But the consequences were still more dreadful. The earth was filled with water, and every little hollow upon the prairies became a stagnant pool to engender disease; so that after the fierce storm-demon had scourged us and departed, the silent pestilence rose from the green plains that smiled beneath his reign, and stalked resistless among their inhabitants.

"It was a critical period for my friend. The new cellar beneath their house had been half-filled with water, and I dreaded extremely its effect on her health. But there was no way to escape it, except to leave the house, which was scarcely thought necessary, while the danger seemed so remote. She preserved her spirits and energy through all, till her husband was prostrated by the fever. Then came her time of trial. Except the labourer who had assisted her husband on his farm, they were alone, and ours was the nearest family with which they had any acquaintance. I rode over nearly every day after my work was done, and frequently spent the night with her. There was a long period of dreadful suspense. The same disease was raging elsewhere with a fearful malignity, and it was impossible, for many days, to say whether hope or fear predominated. I knew that the effect on herself must be great, whichever way the scale turned. When the excitement was removed, she must sink. It was even as I dreaded. She was attacked long before the recovery of her husband, and both lay helpless; dependant on the skill of their hired man and the kindness of neighbours. I watched with them every alternate night for several weeks, and spent a part of almost every day there, after she was brought to her bed. Her attack commenced with a fever and terminated in a premature confluence. The babe that had been so long and joyfully expected, was thrown heedlessly aside, and all attention concentrated on the sinking mother—but vainly. She survived only till the third day; and the first time her husband left his house, was to follow his wife and child to the little spot you visited to-day, beneath those trees. His grief was appalling. Sickness had blanched his dark face into a ghastly hue, and drawn deep furrows in his cheek, which were immovable as if chiseled in granite. He had seen little of her lately, for his mental faculties had been partially suspended while she was watching by his couch; he knew she had been with him, but in terrible affliction which he had not soothed. Her last days were days of intense mental suffering, which he had not alleviated; and, finally, her life had closed in fierce agonies, which he had been compelled to witness, but could neither share nor relieve. He seemed to be a stranger to himself in these new circumstances, that had so suddenly changed the aspect of his whole life.

"Her grave was the first that had been made among us. We selected the spot for its quiet beauty, and the repose which its situation promised the dead, even when all who are interested in them pass away. When we arrived at the tomb, it seemed impossible for him to resign her without one more look. The lid of the coffin was removed; he gazed a brief moment, bent over it, imprinted one long kiss on the cold brow, and turned away. The mother and child were lowered, the grave filled—and thus departed the stranger who had come among us so recently, filled with hope and joy. His home was now too desolate to be endured. All that had made it home was gone for ever. He returned to us sick, dejected, melancholy; all the brightness which had gathered round his life turned to darkness—all his hope to despair. The house now stands untenanted, a cheerless sight to us who have known its better time. He spends his days at work on his farm, and his evenings as you see. But, notwithstanding his misfortunes, he still loves our country, and will, I think, remain in it."

CHAPTER XI.

OUR next door on the left was a grocery—(groggery would be the truer name, but what lady can ever make up her mind to write it?) Many a day's tranquillity and many a night's rest did this horrid place destroy. All the influence which the respectable portion of the community could bring to bear upon it, failed to mitigate its character or check the abominations daily enacted in it. The sights and sounds of the poor wretches who frequented it often compelled me to forsake and close the front of my house; but it was vain to seek seclusion from them in my small tenement; their sickening shouts and groans reached one everywhere. Sometimes these diabolical orgies lasted two or three days and nights without pause, and then a time of comparative quiet followed. The master-spirit among those who shared in their scenes, was the individual who kept the shop. His ceaseless habits of drunkenness had made him one of the most disgusting of human spectacles. With a face enormously bloated beyond its natural proportions, eyes bleared and watery, white lips, parched and mottled with bright red spots, and palsied limbs, the miserable wretch, not yet thirty-five years of age, crept about, a warning, one would have thought, to those who congregated about him. But here they assembled, two or three miserably lost spirits from the eastern states, and as many Kentuckians of the lowest class; and here, hand in hand, they led each other to ruin. Sometimes the citizens would acquire influence enough over one of the band to keep him from the spot for a period, but they seized on him again at the first opportunity, and made him pay for his respite by a deeper plunge than ever. There was one unfortunate man highly connected in one of the principal cities of the east, where he had left a wife and two interesting children. He had fallen among these wretches soon after his arrival, but had several times been restrained, partly by his better feelings, partly by the remonstrances of his friends. Every one who knew him mourned over the waste of a man who possessed so many of the elements of usefulness and happiness. Early in the autumn, he received a letter from his wife, appealing to him, as her husband and the father of his children, to return to them or make provision for them to come to him. It touched the right chord in him; he resolved to become a temperate man. And he persevered in this resolution till the beginning of November with every promise of success. Accident at length threw him into the clutches of these fiends. They dragged him to their place of sacrifice, and compelled him to taste, nay, to drink, till he was again without self-control or reason. His friends, who had watched him with deep interest, seizing every opportunity to strengthen his good resolutions, called on the master demon, and begged that he would let him go; that he would not supply him with the means of self-destruction. He answered their remonstrance with curses, and assured them that as long as he had liquor and "Mac" had money, the latter should have what he wanted. On Saturday evening there was deep drinking in this miniature hell. The carousal held till morning opened, and at a late hour the various inmates set out reeling and stumbling toward home, or whatever lodging chance might bring them. The Sabbath opened clear and bright. A light frost had crisped the grass; the red sun came up the eastern sky, curtained with mist and smoke; soft winds crept over the embrowned forests and plains, and all nature seemed to be filled with a kind of sad joy. I shall never forget that morning. The holy quiet which rested on the earth contrasted strongly with the fierce and harrowing sounds of the previous night. I looked out just as the sun was rising. The smoke began to curl slowly upward from various chimneys, and a few early risers were abroad inhaling the air freshened by the frost which yet lay upon the grass. They looked as if care were dismissed, and man as well as nature was to enjoy a holy day. When the family who had sheltered poor "Mac," notwithstanding his many deviations, ascertained that he had not returned to the house, they despatched a person to the grocery, to bring him home. But he was not there! The miserable proprietor reported as nearly as his half conscious state and drunken recollections would permit, that he left there about two o'clock.

"You'll find him," said he, "under some fence or the side of a house, fast enough, I'll warrant you; for he was drunk when he went away; he wanted to git off afore he took the last drink, but we made him go it!"

There was an unfinished house some distance below, and thither they went, thinking it probable that he had crept in there to sleep. But he was not to be found. They were wondering where he could have gone, when one of them, happening to pass near the open well, glanced into it, and was horrified to discover the figure of the lost man in the bottom, partly covered with water. He was immediately removed, and measures taken to resuscitate him, but life was utterly quenched. Another coroner's inquest was held. A rude coffin was nailed together, and the remains were deposited the same day in the earth. I see now before me the thrilling events of that day, faint as is this picture of them. I feel again the overpowering emotions we experienced when reflecting on the fate of this unwilling victim to the vices of others. The poor wretch, half conscious, notwithstanding the maddening potations that had been forced upon him, stumbling along in the dark night for a place of rest, thinking possibly of his broken vows, and of the faithful wife and children whose hearts would bleed could they know his situation; half resolving, perhaps, that he would still save himself, and never touch again the fire that had so nearly consumed his soul—all these thoughts and feelings, faintly recognised, passing through the mind that had bowed reluctantly to its renewed degradation, and all cut short by the brief and sudden plunge which ended in almost instant death! What an entrance into eternity! what a fearful leave-taking of the fair earth! what an introduction to the mighty future! For days my mind was busied with his last thoughts, and the fearful struggles he must have made to recover his hold upon life. I could not dismiss them.

If everything connected with this terrible place had been painful and disgusting before, it will readily be conceived that they were incomparably more so now. The groans seemed the dying agonies of fiends, the shouts their exultations. The reeling forms and bloated faces seemed more deeply lost than ever. But they did not remain long: public indignation was so roused at the destruction of a man who had naturally so much to win esteem and respect, that the grocery was doomed from the day of his death. Pity it could not have been before; but people require something which would startle the blind and deaf, to rouse them to action in such matters. Even now public opinion barely permitted individual action, but did not aid it. The licence which conferred the power to do all these things was revoked, the shop broken up, and the miserable wretch who had kept it driven to seek another place of abode. He lingered about some time in his degradation, till at last one of his brother masons took him to his house in a neighbouring town, and by some means induced his reformation. When I last saw him, I scarcely recognised him. But improved as he was, he still bore the stamp of a degraded, wretched man.

(To be continued.)

Chronicle of Æthelfred.¹

BOOK THIRD.

ALREADY have I, Æthelfred, recorded, in my unconnected and unwise-like fashion,² that as soon as the winter broke up, we began to be harassed by the Danes. In those evil days, there was no safety to be relied on, in religious houses; for these relentless pagans cared not a whit for consecrated ground, but pillaged and burned abbeys and monasteries all along the coast. When I consider what the state of England then was, I think that, let things hereafter fall out as ill as they may, they can never be much worse than they then were; or at least, not till the end of the world, when we know that a greater contest will ensue between the powers of light and darkness than has ever yet befallen. My father, with the concurrence of Alfred the prince, conveyed my mother and myself, with all our women, to a certain tower or stronghold, built by the Romans, of three stories in height, with a winding stair, such as we have not yet skill to build; and belonging to the Earl of Berks. Herein we found not only the earl's mother and sisters, but our own dear Æthelswitha; together with as many women and children as could be crammed within the walls; to say nothing of sheep, oxen, calves, goats, and fowls, that were the necessary but disagreeable companions of our confinement. Here, however, we were thankful to ensafe ourselves; while the pagans advanced upon the royal vill of Reading, and scoured the country for plunder. They were attacked and beaten by the Earl of Berks in a very fierce battle at Englefield Green, four miles from Windsor; and one of their notable and detestable chiefs was slain by the earl's own hand, to the great elation of us all; I catching the tone from his mother and sisters, and vain-glorious with the best of them. Short was our triumph: four days afterwards, King Æthelred and Alfred the prince attacked them like lions at Reading, but were repulsed; and the brave Earl of Berkshire³ was slain. The grief of his mother and sisters was endless: but, what was very moving, they conceived that my loss was greater than theirs, which in verity it was not, though for company's sake I wept very plentifully. Alfred the prince worked off his grief and rage in the best way possible for us all, by attacking the pagans four days thereafter in the most infuriate manner, at Aston in Berkshire; not supported on this occasion, I am sorry to say, in the way he should have been, by the king his brother, who took to his prayers in a very questionable manner, though quoting the precedent of Moses and the children of Amalek. Sorry should I be, the head of a religious house, and of considerable reputation for my piety, to say anything detrimental to the character and motives of a prince held in so great esteem by the clergy; and the power which an author possesses of bestowing untold-of celebrity or obloquy upon those who come under their judgment, should make him or her extremely careful how it is expressed; especially in a matter so private and sacred as prayer: but the more we hold by the real thing, the more jealous we are of its simulation; and when King Æthelred might have been on his knees all night, and availing himself of many casual opportunities afterwards, 'twas a shame of him, I think and will say, when day brake, to persist in keeping in his tent, and leave his brother to bear the burthen and heat of the day. The end of it was, that as Æthelred would in no case come out, Alfred the prince got all the glory as well as the toil; for he winnowed the Danes like chaff, and though the ground was very disadvantageous to him, he drove them off it completely, and pursued them towards their head-quarters till dark.

I shall never forget the glad-like sound of his horn winding under our window that night! He had come all across the country at the price of immense fatigue after such a day, and reached our stronghold a few hours before daybreak. Æthelswitha, starting from her sleep beside me, cries, "That's his horn!" and puts her head out. He cries from below, "Have you a corner in the tower, think you, for me?" She makes answer, "I hardly think we have . . . wait a little while; we will see;"—and, drawing in her head, hastily commences dressing, and I do the same; concerting between us all the while, how we may bestow him with any convenience. Meantime, dogs bark, men begin to wake and start to their arms; and, by the time we gain the common hall, all is astir and in confusion. We unbar the door, Alfred the prince comes in, gay and yet toilworn, and in the first place stumbles over sundry fatha of firewood that lie within the threshold, then salutes Æthelswitha, makes for the hearth, and talks and laughs while we revive the dying embers and warm some cakes and ale: finally, falls asleep on a tressel, without missing pallia or cortinas. We did not see him again of long time.

A fortnight after this, King Æthelred and Alfred the prince fought the pagans at Basing, but were routed by them, to our great dismay and sorrow. As one misfortune commonly treads on the heels of another, it came to pass that King Æthelred thereafter fell sick, took to his bed and died, to the great regret of the monks, in spite of their saul-scent.⁴ They buried him in Wimborne Minster, within the walls; which, indeed, was once a common privilege enough, though, now, from a regard to common sense and care for the general health, it hath become restricted to the clergy, and to persons of notable godly lives. Much people assembled to accompany his exequies, and many tears were shed for him by the priests. If I should also add, by the people, it would sound well, but would not be the truth, which a woman of my notorious sincerity is bound to speak at all times unless she holds her peace. Nor can I aver that his death was more regretted by myself than the demise of any crowned head must needs be

(1) Continued from p. 68.

(2) These self-depreciating expressions continually occur in the monkish chronicles, and are not so much to be taken for indications of humility as for ornamental figures of speech, or what were meant for snail.

(3) Many counties were called shires before Alfred's reign.

VOL. XV.

(4) Money paid to the clergy when a death occurred.

by every loyal subject, which sometimes is very little; our affections not being under our own control, but depending greatly on the conduct and character of others. This event was indeed one of those dispensations which deserve much more thankfulness than sorrow, both from the kingdom in general and my own family in particular; for hereupon, Alfred the prince became Alfred the king, and my mother's dream respecting the exaltation of Ethelswitha was verified, which I mentioned at the beginning of this chronicle, and which, surely, no one reading with the least attention can have forgotten; but if they have, they had better look back for it. That the honour and glory of this accession to the throne might not puff us up with dangerous exultation, it was wisely ordained that the honour and glory should for a time be extremely little, and that no other advantage whatever should come of it, but on the contrary, harassing cares, deadly danger, and oppressive responsibility. For the pagans, like snakes that have been scotched but not killed, were now swarming round us with horrid fury; and, possessed with the idea that Alfred the king could make no head against them, now that his brother was defunct, did absolutely substantiate the same by giving him a desperate beating at Wilton Hill. I have heard clerks who had studied at Rome tell of some famous heathen prince or deity, I forget which, who every time he was thrown to the ground gathered fresh strength; and thus it seemed to fare with Alfred the king, who, in the words of the prophet Micah, might exclaim, "Rejoice not over me, O mine enemy! when I fall, I shall arise." However, the wicked and unholy answer which the Danes would seem to make in their hearts was, "And if you do, you shall fall again;" so the only question to be settled was, who should hold out the longest; or, as we say in playing at scaccorun, which should get the last move.

This most tiresome warfare, which might have been settled as well by one trial of strength as by fifty, to the great saving of life, trouble, time, temper, arms, and wearing apparel, continued throughout the summer and great part of the autumn; when some providential successes accorded to Alfred the king, who by this time had learnt feelingly enough that victory came not by his own arm, since that he never spared,—some providential successes, I say, enabled him to get the upper hand of the pagans for a while, and to make his own terms with them, which were, that they should immediately depart out of his coasts. And though they, with that disregard for all good faith, and habitude of mendacity for which these unbaptized wretches are above all unconverted people distinguished, only drew off to London, to ensconce themselves there comfortably through the winter, till the fighting season returned; yet this pause, this breathing-time, was very refreshing to our souls. As sayth good Zacharye, we had "helth fro' oure enemies, and fro' the hounds of alle men that hatiden us;" and we had time to look about us and recover ourselves, and lay our plans, and thresh our corn, and sow a little wheat during the open weather, and even to make merry a little; but above all, to look up to heaven and pray. It seemed as though heaven were listening to us, now that the earth was silent, and that the voice of devout supplication had all the greater means of being heard. About this time, Ethelswitha brought forth the first of her many children, who was called Ethelfleda, after myself, which I always held to be a very pleasing compliment. Alfred the king now began to feel himself a king in right earnest; and the court being more like a court than it had behoved to be for some time, and my long-promised visit to it being remembered, I was summoned by my good sister to hold my god-daughter at the font, and spend the remainder of the winter in Winchester; which summons I right readily obeyed.

Having lived a removed life the greater number of my days, which were none of the longest, I had indulged in many a dream by day and by night of the deliciousness of a court life, the which I now looked to see verified; but it turned out quite differently from what I had expected, save as regarded Ethelswitha's affection and kindness. In the first place, Alfred the king was king after a very different sort from King Ahasuerus, of whom we are told that he gave a feast unto his people that lasted a hundred and fourscore days; after which, he and his intimates did nothing but drink the sweet and eat the fat for seven days more, under heall-wafrits of blue, fine linen, and purple. Alfred the king ruled after a very different fashion. Gladlike would he have been, such was now the largeness of his heart and his tenderness for the poor, to have had the wherewithal to feast his subjects, from the greatest unto the least, for a hundred and eighty days, or even for one day,—to have set the wine and ale running, and had an ox roasted whole in every town and thorpe. No such days for lavish expenditure had he; more the pity! Every man was thankful for a meal when he got it, without inquiring too curiously when he should have another. Holy Neot, indeed, who was then much at court and for ever preaching to and at the king, did enlarge much on his hardness of heart in not relieving every case of distress that came in his way, and whencesoever he had an ache or pain, insisted that it was a judgment upon him; but I trow the good man, who could be both sweet and bitter, rather exceeded in this matter, though with perfect good intention; and, had he himself been in the young king's place, would have found it hard to do more than he did. In truth, who ever did as much, one way and another? He was ever wakeful, ever careful, ever afoot, ever crowding into his little breathing time whatsoever he could for the benefit of his kingdom.

When I reached Winchester, I found houses building and rebuilding on all sides; not after the old, rickety fashion, but good, substantial edifices of wood and stone. Every isern-smith and treow-whirt¹ that was craftlike was secure of full employment and good wages. Goldsmiths, seolfersmiths, glaziers,¹ and artificers of every description were in high request; and in spite of the troubled times, many came from beyond seas. The certitude and readiness of the king's payment made his integrity esteemed of all. His credit stood high; for even kings are in good or bad credit, like the veriest merchants, according as they pay their bills and keep their promises; and though there was at the outset a hard run upon his exchequer, yet the money went in a circle and came round again. For why? the isern-smiths and stone-masons being punctually paid, could in their turns pay for their meat and drink, instead of running up scores at the ale-helun; the bakers, brewers, and so forth could pay their taxes and fines in due season, without reviling the collectors or slipping out of sight to hide among their stuff; people that had buried their money and plate dug it up again; and thus, as I say, the coin of the realm was current, and the more fitly for being round instead of clipped, ran merrily back into the treasury. "The rolling hælfing doubles as it goes." This is the true end and course of money, in pursuing which, it blesses both giver and receiver. And thus it fell, that all his doings being ordered in the same wise-like and honest spirit, the king came of all men to be relied on; and the confidence in him shortly became such, that most, and at length all the Saxon kings round about him, voluntarily put themselves in subjection under him, and made him, in fine, head and master of all England. This bloodless victory over their hearts and minds was dearer to him, I wot, than many a victory over the Danes. He conquered the pagans by the assistance of others: he won his brother kings entirely by what he was. Howbeit, the more he deserved men's confidence and commendation, the less he seemed to think of his own merits. He never appeared to measure himself by this and that person, or to think, "Of how much more worth am I than King Buhrd?" or king any other; but to have some invisible, indwelling standard, to which he never could come up. As to his devotions, he not only attended all the daily services of the church, and received the holy communion every morning, but he often arose by night to pray alone and unscen. Now this course of life, so full of business, care and forethought, had in the space of a few months already made King Alfred a very different man from what he was when he kissed Ethelswitha at the castle gate; and the incessant strain on his mind made him look many years older than he was; so that I was altogether disappointed of regaining the merry companion who had helped me to empty the honey-pot and to tell stories of Morvidus and Gocmaggot. In place of this was some one wiser, busier, graver, yet far dearer to those who knew him, of whom it might literally be said, that happy were his men, happy were his servants, which stood continually before him and heard the words of his mouth. As to his thirst for knowledge, it was insatiable. I must confess, that in all this time, he had not yet found leisure to learn to read with anything like fluency, save from a little Psalter he had carried in his bosom from boyhood;² the words in which, from continual application to them, he knew at sight. Howbeit, he caused others to read to him continually, myself among the rest, whom he thought fit to commend for a pleasant voice; and hence it cometh that there is no word, even the longest, that I cannot with the utmost certainty read off. This is an accomplishment that Ethelswitha would gladly have shared with me; however, she never gave the same time and mind to it, having so many other ways of pleasing herself and the king, and so many other duties to attend to; nor is there need for a queen to read at sight, or have stefen-craft³ like a bishop or abess. Those wiselike clerks, however, who behaved to be the most frequently exercised in this office, not only on account of their fluency, but of their natural and acquired wisdom, beyond what a woman has any opportunity of ascertaining, whether she has in her or not,—were Wenefrith, bishop of Worcester, a man most excellently skilled in holy writ, whom the king employed to translate Pope Gregory's Dialogues into Saxon;—Plegmund, archbishop of Canterbury, a devout and scholarlike man;—Ethelstan and Werewolf, the king's chaplains, both of them erudite and pious, and of great service to myself in many things, especially in acquiring the rudiments of Latin; howbeit, they were too exclusively churchlike, if an abess may say so; all, Mercian men;—Grimbald, provost of St. Omer's;—John the priest;—and last, not least, the king's cousin, holy Neot, who was frequently about the court, scattering seed, as he said, by the way-side, and trying to make the dry bones live. I remember, in special, one evening, when the king was indisposed and lying on his couch, after having been bled by advice of his leech, we heard a bustle without, and, on asking at the king's desire what it meant, were told that Neot had just arrived. He had come, not with any pomp or retinue; but afoot, like the holy apostles, after preaching by the way in towns, villages, castles, and in the open country: as it is written, "A mule for the priest, a mare for the bishop, and his own sandalled feet for the saint." There was never⁴ any assumption of sanctity about him, but the good man had a kind of natural dignity of carriage, and a mien which carried with it the beauty of holiness whether he would or no; add to which, he had a penetrating yet gentle look, a clear skin, a good eye, and something in his general aspect that was very engaging. Though he took no more heed to his looks than a man of his age and profession was likely to do, yet nature kept her own; and the goodness of his aspect, which spare living improved rather than impaired, was the true counterpart of the disposition that dwelt within. He was wont, by reason of his constant prayerfulness,

(1) Blacksmith and carpenter, i. e. tree-worker.

(1) "Even in the seventh century, Boniface, abbot of Weremouth, procured men from France, who not only glazed church windows, but taught the Anglo-Saxons the art of making glass for windows, lamps, drinking vessels, &c."—Sharon Turner.

(2) "Clerc he was good enow, aþ yet, as telleth me, He was mo' than ten years old ere he conned his a, b, c."

(3) The art of letters.

(4) We have no means of comparing this account with the life of Neot in the Cottonian Manuscripts.

wherever he sat, unconsciously to hold his hands turned up on his knees; as, indeed, I have read, was the habitude of another good man, to wit, King Oswald, who died praying for his enemies: whence the common and well-known proverb, "Lord, have mercy on their souls! as quoth Oswald, falling to the ground."

Holy Neot, being brought, at the king's commandment, into the royal chamber, cried, "My son, I am grieved to find you ill at ease; they have acted indiscreetly to use the æder-seax¹ on the fourth day of the new moon, which, we have Archbishop Theodore's word for it, is highly dangerous. However, our prayers may avert the evil consequences, as did those of good Bishop John in the case of the nun Coenberga. I had hoped to find you sufficiently at ease to take pleasure in hearing me read some portion of the manuscript of the venerable Bede, which you charged me to procure for you."

"Have you brought it?" cries the king, half raising himself on his couch, "begin at once then, if it liketh you; for, if it doth not find me easy, it may leave me so. Let me look at it, and handle it a little, though I cannot read it."

Thereupon Neot took the book, which was a thick one, from his vest, and stepped with it to the king, who turned it over and over, and then gazed on it awhile, with much complacency; and I observed the contraction of his brow gradually disappear as he did so; nor did it return all the while Neot was with us. So precious is the love of letters, even though it be a love without knowledge, in its power of taking us out of ourselves!

The good Neot, after a little prefatory discoursing, commenced reading with great unction: the king insisting on his sitting upon a setl at his side. The outset I did not much note; there was somewhat, I remember, about the pains the venerable man had been at to secure information, orally and in writing; and much about the shape and size of this our island, its being stocked with game and fowls, grain, vines, and all manner of trees; and its being engirt with salt seas, containing seals, dolphins, whales, and all manner fishes.

After this, came somewhat about the landing of Julius Cæsar; and this and that battle; and this and that heresy; and at length the writer behaved to tell how the Britons, sore prest by their enemies the Picts and Saxons, (that's ourselves,) sent to Gaul to request aid of good Bishop Germanus. What followed, was very savoury and edifying. It seems that it was about Lent, when the good Bishop came over; and he took advantage of that holy season to ply the people much with exhortations and sermons; inasmuch that they, pricked at heart for their ungodliness and departure from the faith, flocked in crowds to him to be baptized. A little rustical church was hastily erected of wattles and green boughs in the midst of the camp; the soldiers were foremost among the newly converted; and, whereas they were of late the victims of despondency and despair, they now were, to a man, animated with faith and courage. The scouts announcing the immediate approach of the enemy, Germanus declared to the Britons that he himself would be their leader. He viewed the country round about, and drew up his inexperienced troops in a hilly field, still known as Maes Garmon, the field of Germain. A multitude of fierce enemies soon appeared, whom, as soon as Germanus descried, making for the field in orderly array, he instructed his men simultaneously to repeat his war-cry, whatever it might be, in a loud voice, directly he should give the word; and, the enemy advancing securelike, as thinking to take them by surprise, the bishop thrice cried out "Hallelujah!" The hills immediately sent back the echo of his men's voices on all sides, which reverberated from rock to rock, and made it seem as though every cleft and chasm held its ambush of warriors; nay, as though the very skies took up the cry: and the enemy, struck with sudden dread, and believing themselves hemmed in by an innumerable multitude, fled in disorder, casting away their arms as they went, that they might run the lighter. Many were swallowed up by the river which lay across their path, into which they madly cast themselves in their precipitate and witless flight; and their spoils were gathered up by the Britons, who remained masters of the field, without the loss of a single man.

"I think, my son," says Neot, closing his book, "that, not to speak irreverently, here is one of the finest victories related in history, since Jehoshaphat went forth with his people against the army that was like the sand on the sea-shore for multitude. And yet how little we hear it talked of, now! Just because the Britons beat us, and we Saxons were beaten. May many such a victory as this,—undertaken, I mean, in the same faith and spirit, be written in our annals!"

"And did the Saxons make no head against them afterwards?" inquired the king.

"By no means," returned Neot. "The man of God, having thus won the day by faith without force, settled the affairs of the island and established general tranquillity. He then left the country, followed by the blessings of a re-converted and grateful people. Is it not in Bede?"

"I wish I could beat the Danes as easily," quoth the king. "I believe I might cry Hallelujah to them throughout the longest day, without making any impression on them."

"Germanus did not cry Hallelujah to them," returned Neot, "it was in a very different quarter, my son, that he looked to make an impression. We read, in Chronicles, of the sun's ruddy shining on pools of water being made the instrument of salvation to a people that called on their God. Another time, a great host was discomfited by the sound of a going in the tops of some mulberry-trees."

"What was that other victory you were speaking of," interrupted the king, "that was obtained by a man with a long name?"

(1) Vein-knife, i.e. lance, which they used very clumsily.

"Jehoshaphat, king of Judah," returned Neot. "A man of God obtained access to him, and bade him have no fear of the multitude that was coming up against him; 'for,' quoth he, 'the quarrel is not yours, but the Lord's. To-morrow morning, go down against them, as they come up by the cliff:—you will find them at the end of the brook, hard by the wilderness—and ye shall have no need to fight your own battle. You have kept unto God, and he will keep unto you. Stand still, when you have set yourselves in array, and ye shall see what is the manner of his salvation, when he takes a matter in hand.' So the king did as he was bidden. In the grey of the morning, he stood by the wayside overlooking his host, as it filed past him, twelve hundred thousand strong, in orderly array, every man hearty, faithful, and full of cheer; and, quoth he, 'Hear me now, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem! Believe in the Lord your God, and so shall ye be established: believe also in his prophets, and so shall ye prosper.' And so, then he placed in advance of them the singers unto the Lord, who went forward praising the beauty of holiness; and when the enemy came in sight, the singers burst forth in a chorus that was re-echoed by twelve hundred thousand men, 'For his mercy endureth for ever!' With one accord fled their enemies. Happy the land that has a godly king!"

"And happy the king, Jew or Christian," rejoins King Alfred, "that has the Lord for his God. If I ever obtain any considerable advantage over these poor pagans, for as evil as they be, I will baptize every head of them, and stand sponsor for them myself. I would sooner they were converted than confounded."

Another time, I remember the king said he should like his people to hear the Scriptures read in their own tongue, at every market-cross; nay, to be able to read them for themselves, beside their own hearths; and he thought the time might come, though not in his days, yet sooner or later, nevertheless. Holy Neot and he argued this point at some length. If I went into their various discourses at large, I should never have done. Also many of his bricfer and more familiar colloquies with myself are all in my heart, but need not to be set down, save here and there by the way. For example, I remember expressing unto him one day, my surprise that he was up and doing, so many hours in the twenty-four; and said,

"How is it, my brother, that you need sleep so little?"

After a moment's thought, he replied, "Perhaps, because I eat so little!"

"But how is it you need to eat so little?"

"Perhaps, because I drink so little."

"But how is it you need to drink so little?"

"Perhaps, because I think so little."

But I laughed, and said, "Ah, my king, that answer will not stand."

Then he said, "You have reason, my sister. They who would have much thought, much wisdom, much knowledge, much holiness, must sleep little, eat little, drink little, and moreover, talk little of foolish matters: howbeit, to talk with such men as Neot and Plegmund is nearly or quite as good as reading wise-like books. Hold it for sooth, Ethelfled, that we Saxons commonly feed too heavily, women as well as men: and, if you would neither sleep heavily, nor pray heavily, nor have heavy eye, heavy tongue, heavy thought, heavy heart, nor heavy foot, continue to fare as lightly as you do now. And this I say," added he laughing, "not out of regard to saving my bread and cheese!"

It is not to be thought strange of me, that I should dwell somewhat at large on the history of this winter, which, for happiness and unhappiness, was the most eventful of my whole life. I read and studied much under the king's chaplains, and learned by rote many long Saxon and Latin poems, both sacred and secular; to wit, some of Bede's hymns and epigrams, Aldhelm's Acrostic in hexameters to the Abbess Maxima; certain portions of his poem wherein he describes and lauds forty-four female characters, who led single lives; a few rhymed hexameters addressed to Boniface by an Anglo-Saxon lady, named Leobgitha, and chiefly remarkable, I think, for being written by a woman; some verses by Cæna, which rhyme in the middle of each line—an ingenious trick, and no more—some much prettier and simpler rhymes to Aldhelm, by a pupil who loved him much, running thus,— "Vale, vale, fidissime, Phile Christi charissime,

Quem in cordis cubiculo
Cingo amoris vinculo."

Also that pleasing religious sonnet of Alcuin's, beginning, and another on death, beginning, "O mortalis homo," which I admire as much now, as I did then; but, prettiest of all, his address to his cell, on leaving it for the world. I think his description of his reluctance to leave that peaceful retreat, embowered in lilies and roses of his own planting, with apple-trees in blossom, full of singing birds, and with meadows gently sloping to the water-side, spread with fishermen's nets, and shut in by a little wood—had something to do with my falling in love with the idea of a religious life.

"Qui coeli cupit portas intrare patentes;"

I also read the Song of Judith, the life of St. Cuthbert, and of sundry pious women . . . a little, but not much of the Bible, which I have since deeply regretted I was not then put in the way of reading more of. But I read whatever my tutors chose for me: at first, chiefly to please the king; and afterwards, to relieve my mind of certain dull thoughts and useless wishes, for which, indeed, there is no remedy like study.

If I were to mention all the good offers of marriage I had during this winter at court, you, whoever you may be, who are now reading this Chronicle, would certainly be surprised. In truth, I never had a grain of vanity in my composition; or else, when I have heard other women bragging among themselves of their distinctions in this particular, (women professing religion, too, I give you my word for it!) I should have told them oftener than I have done, that, an' if I were so minded, I could, outboast them all. I make it a matter of conscience never to believe such personal details, be they narrated never so modestly; and therefore shall certainly never expose myself to the humiliation of having my own word doubted, veracious as it is. There is a kind of madness, I wot, among a great many women in this respect: they seem quite forgetful that the whole sum of the matter is, they have done the best they could for themselves, or what they thought the best at the time. Every barber prates not; every maiden mates not; Æthelswitha and the king gave me credit for being much more attached to the memory of the late Earl of Berks than in sooth I was; albeit I esteemed him far more dead, than I ever had done living; seeing, by the comparison of him with all my other suitors, what his uncommon merit had been; and as I had not thought him good or winsome enough to care much about, save freondlic,¹ it was probable I might look about me from Hokeday to Yule, without finding one who pleased me better. It may possibly be asked, why did I not espouse Earl Osric, now that he had succeeded to his brother's estate and dignity? If such an inquiry should indeed by any possibility suggest itself, I may make answer that Earl Osric had turned out quite differently from what many people had expected of him. This youth, like many another, was one of those nuts that have a very indifferent kernel. Albe, he could scarce tell his stafcen-row,² yet, by reason of his goodly person and carriage, he had, by the late King Ælhelred, been prematurely made miles, and invested with a purple garment and gold-sheathed sword. I think Absalom the son of David could not have been more conceited upon it, nor made a more pitiful use of his outward recommendations. He took the lead among the youths who set up for poor imitations of Alfred, aping the semblance while they missed the substance, and making many a poor, silly maiden as true an idolater in her heart, as any of our old, benighted forefathers, who worshipped wigs.³ Howbeit, it was not by aping the trick of his speech, nor the fashion of his gait, nor yet by parting their hair evenly down the middle, and letting it diffuse itself gracefully over their shoulders, nor yet by wearing two-forked beards, that they had any chance of being mistaken for King Alfred. They had better have slept under fewer bedd-reaffles, and have left them sooner in the morning, and have eaten less, and drunken less, and studied more, and prayed more, if they had meant to be like him. However, I am wasting my time by writing about Earl Osric, who, in sooth, has little or nothing to do with my story. Short confessions, few comments: suffice it to state, that the lady he took to wife this winter was of merit commensurate with his own, which some people even then thought very little. Had I, Æthelfled, been cognizant of the reasons on which they grounded this opinion at the time, it might have saved me some disappointment; but,—too late we cry out, "Had I wist there was a wolf-pit." Young people should always have the truth told them quite simply, when circumstances permit it; which is oftener than many old folks think. To a woman of my reflection, it appears quite evident, I say not whether or no it is the fruit of experience, that a young girl is extremely likely to get rid of an unfortunate affection, much sooner than she would do otherwise, if her good mother talk it over with her quietlike, and freondlike, without acrimony. Otherwise, her heart consumes itself, or, if she be not of a close turn, she seeketh the comfort of some friend, who is, perhaps, facen-leas;⁴ or, it may be, of her maid.

If it be asked, where was my mother at this time? I reply, that she had been summoned home somewhat suddenly, about Yule-tide, to nurse my father in the foot-ail;⁵ and that during her previous sojourn at the court, she had been much more occupied about Æthelswitha's infant than about her own youngest daughter. And hereupon, I, the abbess of a religious house, must and will say what will doubtless be highly offensive to every married woman who comes to hear of it, and this for the sake of the younger persons of my own sex, who may, it is just possible, benefit by it, while I shall reap nothing but obloquy . . . I, Æthelfled, declare and aver, that babies are all very well in their place, which is the cradle; but that innumerable mothers do, in toying with them and incessantly supervising them, notoriously neglect their duty to their older daughters, their growing and just grown up girls, to whom no one else can supply their place; whereas their place in the nursery may be very well filled by the foster-mother and maids of the chamber.

Had my wise and good mother been at hand and at leisure to see whither the course I was taking would end, I, Æthelfled, might have been spared the shedding of some salt tears; as it befel, I took my own path, seeing my way very little before me; refusing this good match and the other, till, one day, I was a little stunned by hearing my sister in reply to the expressed surprise of the noble lady Adeleve, that the lady Æthelfleda did not marry, quite composedly make answer that I preferred going into a nunnery. It had never struck me before that I must do either the one or the other, and it took me so by surprise that I had not a word to proffer, but I could think of nothing else all the following night. I had of late taken much pleasure in reading of the good people recorded in Bede, their pious lives and alms-deeds, and their being from time to time carried up to heaven in a trail of glory, with celestial singing like holy Chad, or like that Kentish maid who heard the angels say one to another, "We have come to fetch the little gold piece." I had mused how Erkengota, niece of the abbess of Brie, lay a-dying, when those who were nursing her heard the sound as it were of a great unseen multitude entering the monastery, and soon after, just as she breathed her last, heard most transporting music ascending into the air and gradually dying away; and how, on looking out, they perceived or thought they perceived the night to be lighter than common, with somewhat of a milky path fading away. Also, of that sweet nun, called Edith, in the monastery of Barking, who was so beloved by a little boy, who, by reason of his tender age, was bred up among the sisters. He, dying of the plague, eagerly called out thrice, when in the article of death, "Edith! Edith! Edith!" which convinced all who heard it, that her time would be short; and, in truth, she sickened out of hand, and dying the same day, followed the little innocent who had called her, into the heavenly country. Also, how another sister of the same community called to those about her death-bed to put out the light; and, on their neglecting to do so, said unto them, "Well I wis you think me raving, but I can tell you that I see this house filled with so glorious and heavenly a beam, that your candle, in comparison with it, is but darkness!" And how another, named Tortgith, who for nine years had been sore bedsted, had a vision of a woman wrapped in a fair linen cloth, drawn gently upwards by golden cords; which was explained soon after by the good abbess dying.

(1) Like a friend. (2) Alphabet. (3) Idols.

(4) Deceitful; a maker of lies. (5) Gout.

These and suchlike tales, I say, I had mused over and delighted in, and believed with a heartier faith than, perhaps, I can boast now; and sometimes, when vexed or saddened by this or that cross, I had bethought me, how good and blessed a thing it must be to be shut in and hidden away from a naughty world, and to be in peace and quietness for ever. But this had been all in a vague and general way; and betokened more impatience of my present yoke, than capability or vocation for one far heavier; therefore, when the alternative was suddenlike presented to me in all its awfulness, it is little wonder that I lay awake, as I have already said, all the night. What stung me was, that Ethelswitha should appear to think the matter so simple, and have so quietly settled it in her mind to be contented therewith. I wondered whether it were the same with Alfred the king, or whether he would be very much surprised and grieved to hear such a thing mentioned. It occurred to me whether I should not at once show I had a mind of my own, by quietly consenting to espouse one of my many suitors; but, on reviewing them in my mind, one after another, it appeared to me that no conventual retirement could be so nauseous as to pass the remainder of my days with any one of them; besides which, I had, with the openness of an honourable woman, made each of them perceive himself to be so disagreeable to me, as that I could not now, with any show of consistency, call them back. These reflections occasioned my pillow to be wetted with some hot tears; and I ended, when day brake, by resolving to trust a little longer to what chance might bring forth; in the hope that some foreign prince or other, equal to all I thought a husband ought to be, might yet appear at court. Just to see, however, how Alfred the king would take it, I contrived in a day or two, as if by accident, to let fall the words, "When I go into a nunnery." To my no small mortification, he gravely and calmly answered, "If such be indeed your final resolution, Ethelsfede, I can have nothing, certainly, to say against it; but, on the contrary, should recommend your withdrawing a little more from the secular pleasures which must needs be distasteful as well as hurtful to you, and to take all the means in your power, which at present are very great, to pursue those studies and duties which will, hereafter, make the sum of your happiness. Tell me, however, are you quite avised, young as you are, of having chosen well, and of knowing your own mind? Our laws are very gentle towards women, and very careful of them—they may possess, inherit, and transmit their lands at their own free will; they may sue in courts of justice; they may sit in the Witen-Gemot and Shire-Gemot; they may marry at their own choice after fourteen, and they can only be devoted to recluse lives at their own free will. But, if our laws render them independent of their friends' control, our customs give them the benefit of their friends' advice and judgment. Do nothing precipitate, my sister Are you quite sure of your own mind in this matter?"

But I wiped away a tear, and would not say.

(To be continued.)

COLLEGES, NEW AND OLD.

It is curious and interesting to remark how fashion pervades all our pursuits, and influences us in every conceivable matter: we have just been struck by five or six advertisements in the Times, all showing that it is indispensable, at present, that every large day-school for girls should be designated as a "College." Everything is arranged to suit this new nomenclature; the writing-master becomes the "Professor of Calligraphy;" the watchful care of the Governess is superseded by the "Professor of Moral and Mental Philosophy;" and "Mistresses" in any branch are by common consent discarded, as if it were a recognised fact in these Colleges, that no woman can know anything. Besides a dislike to the thing itself, as a trifling with the good sense of that large portion of the public who have daughters to educate, we feel it a sort of innovation on the word as already borne by some of those Institutions one so loves and reveres;—Chelsea College, one of the glories of our country; the less known, but very useful, Emanuel and Queen Elizabeth Colleges, also for the young and old; and still more, as applying only to one sex, Bromley College, where the widow of many a man who has "spent and been spent" in the holiest of all labours, passes her days in a peaceful contemplation of their blessed re-union; and Whittington College, which opens its many hospitable doors, not only to widows, but to those who have borne the burden and heat of the day, uncheered by the happy cares of a married life, unscathed by the deep sorrow of its close.

Perhaps there is no class of Institution which so attaches the best sympathies of our nature, as that which provides for the aged, especially for aged women. There are but few of us who have not the privilege of recollecting that most endearing tie, the mother who looked on our childhood. How pathetic always seems the sentence :—"I never knew my mother!"—How we yearn with tender pity over the motherless child!—and happy indeed are they who have seen that most beloved form, battling cheerily with Time, and assuming year by year a calmer, sweeter, holier beauty. In these asylums for the aged, we idealise the objects of our own gratitude, our own fond affection, our earliest, happiest recollections; and for our mother's sake, tend and cherish those who, sharing her sex, her feebleness, also seem to share her claims on our care.

Taught from her very infancy to look up to others, to consider that she is to be protected—forbidden, by all the usages of society, to be self-dependent; it seems a strange and unnatural thing that a woman should be allowed to live, to work, to suffer, and to die alone. Yet, is not this the lot of very, very many women? How many have we seen, forced to abandon the "clingingsness" which is her very nature, and to stand upright, and alone; unshrinkingly and unmurmuringly working to live, and living to work, not for herself only, but for those nearest and dearest to her: nor is this a lot to mourn over while health and strength aid the willing hand, and the sense of usefulness fills the thankful heart. But when age creeps on, throwing its shadow before, over the dimming eye, the weakening frame, the less buoyant spirit, and the weary begins to long to be at rest, a blessed thing it is to think that there are places—though still a very, very few—where rest can be found.

We would cordially recommend all who enter into these feelings, to pay a visit to one, bearing the unpretending, but most significant title, the Asylum for Aged Governesses, at Kentish Town. There they will see our idea of what such a home for aged gentlewomen should be. There each has her own small, but comfortable bed-room, with its hoarded relics telling of the Past, and its large Bible, speaking of the Future; but the sitting and eating rooms are in common. This is to us a very decided improvement on the small, single house; for poverty is, no doubt, a trial, and as every trial brings its temptation, so lonely poverty must be selfish. How shall she who has great difficulty to make her pittance meet her wants, turn her thoughts from that sad problem? The most generous-hearted woman alive will wish for,—ay, and take, if she can,—the larger half of the umbrella, when she has on that only bonnet which she has no means to replace! But at this Asylum, such feelings are, as much as possible, rendered dormant. All have the same comforts, the same care, the same kindness; and the blessed effects are visible. Illness or trial to the sister or brother of one inmate, throws a gloom over every face; a piece of good fortune to one, brightens many eyes; and that sweet word "We"—that word without which this fair world, in its sinless beauty, was still imperfect—is a common sound. Well do we remember the touching words of one then a candidate for the well-deserved comforts she now enjoys: "You cannot tell what it is to live quite alone. I long to go home, and find some one there; and to feel sure that when the time comes that my head will want a shoulder to rest on, it will find one!" May it be long before she needs it!

There is one circumstance which will, we think, strike most persons who visit this pleasant home, as it did us; and that is, that many of the old ladies look younger than their baptismal registers have shown them to be. We were at first greatly surprised. There is no question of the wear and tear of their profession. We do not now speak of the adventitious disagreeables, which are every day becoming less common, and will, as the march of intellect progresses, surely become obsolete—but of the actual employment, Teaching. Our towns abound with tender and anxious mothers—they fondle their children in health, and nurse them in sickness—they work for them—they will sacrifice anything and everything for them—but how very, very few feel that they can teach them! The labour, the dim routine of the schoolroom, the untiring patience for the dull, the gentle firmness with the obstinate, all that most tries the temper, the spirits, and the health, is the portion of the governess! The governess, who has not the tie of motherhood to sweeten the weary task—not the knowledge that evening will bring the husband and the father, and the tiresome pupil of the morning will turn into one of the darlings of the cheerful fireside, redolent of home happiness. We knew, too, that there was scarcely one of these old ladies who had not evidenced the depth of her affections by her self-denying struggles for those dear ones with whom, as a consequence, she could seldom share that blessed and familiar intercourse which makes all labour light. But when we came to talk to some of the party, the mystery was solved—the cosmetic is "peace." True, they have laboured long and arduously, but it is over; and the world's cares and turmoils, its harassing and wearing trials, are fading in the distance;—true, they have suffered separation, and anxiety and bereavement; but those they loved are gone, where they are going; and the calmness of evening is gild'd with the rays that betoken a brighter and more cloudless morrow.

There was another visitor there besides ourselves, a merry-looking little fellow, belonging to one of the Ladies' Committee, who was enjoying one of his greatest treats in a visit to his aged friends—and apparently he was a very welcome guest, one of those playthings which we never outgrow;—his little arm was thrown fondly round the neck of one just seventy years older than himself!

We came away touched and gratified, yet haunted painfully by one still recurring thought. These nineteen ladies are indeed comfortably and happily provided for, but nineteen must necessarily bear a very small proportion to the numbers in this great metropolis who are now past work, and are, too probably, ending a life of praiseworthy exertion in poverty and bitter dependence. The question rings even now sadly in our ears—"Nineteen provided for—WHERE ARE THE REST?"

THE RECLUSE,

A STORY OF THE COAST OF FRANCE.

I.

THE large peninsula situated between the mouths of the Loire and Vilaine is indented by several bays, round which are found distinct colonies unmixed by time or close vicinity; the most striking difference exists on the north-west, at the boundary between the ancient county of Nantes and that of Vannes. In Piriac, for instance, you will find on one side the peaceable blood of Nantes united to the rich Saxon blood, whilst on the other you meet with the turbulent and warlike inhabitant of Vannes. The north side of the bay presents tranquil countenances, urbane manners, a slow and musical language; on the south are found men of fierce appearance, of aggressive habits, and of hurried speech. The former will reply to reproach by an apology, the latter by abuse, or even blows. On both north and south you find the same lack of industry. Content with the produce of his fishing, or the fruits of his small plot of ground, the Piriacais accepts the station that chance has allotted him in the world, not because he likes it, but because it is for him. Require not from him any unusual effort unless you intend to repay him a hundred-fold for it, for he would reply to you in the words of the Peruvian Indian: "For copper, I open my eyes; for silver, I turn round; but, to induce me to rise, you must employ gold."

This was especially the case some years since, before the peaceable bathers, who had been driven from Pornic, Pouliguen, and Croisic, by the increase of inhabitants, went to seek solitude and liberty among the rocks of Piriac. Before there was a regular road opened, visitors were obliged to make their journey with caravans of mules, as in the "sierras" of Spain; now, however, there are numerous conveyances between the peninsula and the main land. In the sixteenth century, the inhabitants of the neighbouring Roman Catholic towns, when conversing with, or catechized by the celebrated priest, François Baron, on the subject of this ancient Protestant retreat, used to say, "Pire-y a-t-il?" whence arose, according to the literati of the country, the name of Piriac.

Thanks to the visitors from the Loire-Inférieure and l'Île-et-Vilaine, the inhabitants of the once Protestant village are now becoming more civilized; houses are prepared for the reception of their passing guests, a kind of market is established, and several bathing-houses and machines are to be seen; but during the Restoration nothing of the kind was in existence. Piriac was known only through the anti-quaries of Nantes, who had never visited the spot, although they published a description of it in the "Lyceé Armoricain." Thanks to them, a rock since named the Tomb of Almanzor, (a corruption of Almanzor, the Victorious,) from the fact of one of the officers of the Spanish garrison (established there in 1590) being buried near it, was transformed into "a druidical altar, with gutters formed for the reception of the blood of the victims;" a few pieces of tin and pewter, which had been cast on shore by the tide, were converted into "mines formerly worked by the Carthaginians;" and the village of Penhareng, thus named on account of the herrings (harengs) which abound in those parts, was poetically changed to the "promontory of harangues." These remarkable discoveries were well received, and credited, more especially as no one took the trouble to ascertain their verity. Even if any stranger, a lover of solitude, chanced to visit the isolated village, the inhabitants made no effort to retain him. If he wanted to stop, he must be contented with the general fare, and not expect any attention or assistance from them; inoffensive, but inert, they would not think of altering their mode of life on his account. Not an offer of services, not the smallest piece of information about the neighbourhood would he receive; he must go and seek fish from the fisherman, milk from the farm-yard, and bread from the bakehouse. Everything was granted with an air of surprise; for they could not understand why people, who had vines and lands of their own, should come and take other people's wine and bread.

One man alone in the village did not reason thus, and was always ready to serve the new comers; it was Lewis Marzon. Born of an unknown father, and of a mother whose tenderness did not make up for her vices, he was left an orphan at the age of eighteen, with a younger brother, whose origin was as obscure as his own. He had neither boat nor land; he followed no trade, and lived only on what he could gather from the sea or shore,—sea-weeds taken from the bottom of the little pools, fish caught by line, or shells detached from the rocks. Whilst the others reaped on the ocean, he gleaned what he could on the shore; hence he obtained, in contempt, the name of "the sea-shore gleaner." It was only at a later period that the arrival of a few visitors afforded him a means of subsistence. If a messenger was wanted to go to Guérande—a bather required, whose experience would prevent danger—a guide who knew every nook and corner of the bay, Marzon was always ready. However, his zeal, instead of gaining him friends among his companions, appeared rather to procure him their contempt. In the opinion of men capable only of understanding and following a certain routine of daily occupations, his variety of abilities appeared inconsistency, and his quickness they deemed cunning. Marzon had an instinctive enmity towards tradition, ever limited and unchanging, which he felt without comprehending, and the malevolent contempt he experienced inspired him with painful timidity; so that he enjoyed but little sympathy with the rest of the villagers.

Nevertheless, in the midst of this general dislike, Marzon had obtained the affection of a stranger, who resided in the little isle of Met, about two leagues from Piriac. No one knew why Leo Marillas, a native of the Basses-Pyrénées, had made his way to that desert island. He had come from Bayonne on board a fishing vessel, settled at Croisic, and lived for many years on a small trade in cattle. He was of a melancholy, irritable temper, ever apprehensive of evil, and manifestly disgusted with the society of other men. During the discussion about the right of pasturage in the isle of Met, which had remained uncultivated and untenanted since the English cruisers had driven away the inhabitants, Leo Marillas went to visit the spot, and, attracted by the wild appearance of the island, he easily obtained permission to farm it. He had lived there for ten years, cultivating one corner of the isle, and letting out the rest for pasture-land to the inhabitants of the opposite shore, who took their cattle to him in spring, and returned for them in the month of July, when the grass was beginning to turn brown, and the spring water to become scarce; the money he received for this land forming the largest portion of his revenue.

Our narrative commences just at the latter period; and many were engaged in re-embarking their cattle for the Continent in the two boats generally employed for that purpose. These were owned by Goron and Lubert, called "Long Mark;" men, who, though very different in age and disposition, were seldom separate from one another. The former had embarked when very young in a man-of-war, on quitting which he became a fisherman. The wandering and adventuresome life of a seaman was not only habitual but necessary to him, and the only redeeming feature he could find on terra firma was the public-house. In addition to the violent temper of the county of Vannes, of which he was a native, he possessed a supreme contempt for all who did not live upon the ocean like himself. As to Lubert, he was a kind of savage, as strong as a whale, vicious as a shark, but incapable of carrying into effect a single resolution. Hence Goron was accustomed, as he used to say, "to bring him to the oar."

Whilst the two proprietors were embarking the cattle, Lewis Marzon, who always acted as agent between the island farmer and the labourers of the Continent, was settling the accounts with the latter; he soon returned to Leo's cabin with the money he had received. This hut was constructed at one extremity of the isle, of the ruins of the old farm which had been burnt by the English; it consisted simply of a ground-floor covered with a thatched roof. At a few steps on the left was the pond for watering the cattle, which now appeared almost dry; a little beyond was seen a well surrounded by four large pieces of granite, and on the little mound facing Piriac was a flag-staff for signals. The remainder of the island was one extensive meadow encircled by rocks, and a beach beyond which raged the ocean. One glance was sufficient to enable the beholder to view the entire extent of the isle, on which not a tree, not a shrub, nor even a tuft of heath was visible. Here and there appeared a few tall thistles, covered with a species of grey snail in such immense numbers that they resembled petrified branches. The field cultivated by Marillas may have presented a more verdant aspect, but, being situated at the other extremity of the island, it was concealed by the enclosure with which it had been surrounded to protect it from the incursions of the cattle.

Marzon found his friend seated on the threshold of his hut, on a portion of a capstan, the remains of some shipwreck which had been cast on shore by the tide. Notwithstanding the heat of the day, he was dressed in thick cloth trowsers, a very warm jacket, a striped woollen shirt, and a white cap, which entirely covered his ears. Over his shoulders was hung a heifer's skin, the head forming a kind of hood. Yet the first touch of fever caused Marillas to shiver beneath these hot garments. He extended his icy hands to the sun, and his gloomy face was agitated by convulsive movements.

After giving him the money he had received, Marzon inquired after his health.

"You see," replied Leo in his harsh native accent, "there is ice in my veins! If I were in my native land, I should have thought that a wizard had risen during the night, and carried off all the heat of my blood for the benefit of some rich old miser in the town; but here there are no sorcerers, so that cannot be the case."

"Would it not be better to go over to Piriac, and call the doctor?" inquired Lewis.

"The doctor? no, indeed!" returned Marillas; "since I live like the wolves, I must recover like them, without any doctor except patience."

"That is certainly a very useful thing," said his companion, "but you may, perhaps, require aid also; you are very lonely here, Marillas."

"Lonely!" repeated the Bearnais, "do not you see all these sea-gulls flying about over the cottage. When you are gone, they will come and eat at my feet, and talk to me. Then, I have Debrua,¹ but, good heavens! I don't see it Where can it be?"

"Your tame cobrian?" inquired Marzon; "I left it down there by the side of the boats. It is an ill-tempered creature, let me tell you, Marillas; it tries to bite everybody."

"Except myself," said the invalid, with a smile of satisfaction; "but I must confess I am much amused at your ideas; you people on the Continent complain of Debrua, and yet he imitates your example, does he not? He pays you by attacking you with his beak for the shot you have deposited in the bodies of his comrades. You denominate that ill-temper; I call it justice. Man is a cruel animal; he can no sooner stand than he begins throwing stones at the dogs and

(1) "Debrua" is the name the Bearnais give to Satan; they often apply it in jest to animals of black plumage.

(2) "Cobrian," a species of raven.

sparrows; as soon as he sees anything living, he wishes to deprive it of life; it is his instinct."

"And you have followed this instinct like the rest of the world, Marillas," said Lewis, smiling; "for, if I remember rightly, you told me you were a good sportsman."

"When I lived on the Continent . . . Yes, at that time I imagined that I had a right to destroy all that did not bear the human face. On coming here, I even purchased a gun; you may see it yet hanging near the door."

"And did you never use it?" inquired Marzon.

"Once only, the first day. When the vessel had gone away, and I was left alone, I went round, gun in hand, like Robinson Crusoe, to examine my territories; the sea-mews, sea-gulls, and cobriants, who had never been alarmed by huntsmen, came down and almost perched on my head, and flew round me as if they were doing the honours of the island, and wanted to show it to me. At first, I thought only of the pleasure I felt in looking at and hearing them; it was company for me; but when I reached the coire espagnole, I remembered that I had a gun. Mechanically I aimed, and three of the birds fell into the sea. At the sound of the report, the rest had all dispersed. I saw them soon descend once after another to the spot where their companions had fallen, rest on the wave as if expecting them again, and then fly away, sending the air with their cries. A few minutes afterwards there was not a bird in the island."

"But they returned in the evening?" said Lewis.

"Neither in the evening nor on the following day," replied Marillas; "my rock became a desert on which no living creature was to be seen,—where I heard no sound but that of the waters dashing on the stony beach. At first, I did not trouble myself about it; but gradually solitude appeared to affect my spirit. I became melancholy; I looked in vain to the four quarters of the globe; nothing was to be seen but the clouds which hastened past the island, and the sea which foamed beneath. At length, on the sixth day, two sea-gulls appeared on the coire anglaise. I dared not approach, lest I should frighten them; but in the evening I went to scatter some corn on the rock. The following day appeared the sea-mews, then the cobriants. Afterwards they all came back, as you may see; I have regained my companions, and I can assure you I am in no hurry to send them away again!"

"I can understand that," replied Marzon; "when a man has no other company, he is satisfied with that of birds; but you would find better companions on the continent."

"Ha! you think so, do you?" exclaimed the Béarnais; "and pray who should I find there, eh?—good-for-nothing scoundrels who destroy one another? I can see enough of them here—I have only to look at the fishes."

"Come, come, Marillas, you are in one of your gloomy moods to-day," said the youth smiling; "there are good Christians everywhere."

"And pray have you ever had the good fortune to meet any of that kind," inquired Leo ironically, "you, who are despised because you know not the name of your father?"

"It is a severe trial," said Lewis sadly; "but I try to bear it without complaining."

"I do not complain of my fever either. What a man cannot prevent, he must bear with in silence; but, in the long run, that produces an incurable wound, I know something about that myself, seeing I am, like you . . . of unknown origin."

"You, Marillas?"

"Yes, and they so often reproached me for it in my native country, that at last I left my home. But one gets accustomed to anything. Then, death must come some time or another, and free us from the troubles of this life. You can now understand why I prefer the society of sea-fowl to that of men."

"I do indeed understand, my dear Leo," replied Marzon, evidently interested in his companion's history; "for sometimes I myself have thought I should like to take refuge in some uninhabited island, and hear no more of abuse."

The Béarnais looked steadily at him.

"Indeed!" exclaimed he suddenly; "well then, my man, what prevents your coming here? There is room for two in the hut, and you know I shall not grudge you your food."

"You are very good, Marillas," returned the youth; "but I am not alone, you know: there is a boy down there who cannot yet do without his brother."

"Julius!" resumed the invalid; "he can accompany you; we shall soon find him a stool and a plate. Of all the people I have met with, both here and in my own country, you are the only one who was ever kind to me; let us see if we three cannot form a matelottage.¹ You shall have your share of the profits, and the saints punish me if I do not take care that it is the largest part."

"May God reward you for your generosity!" exclaimed the young man, visibly affected; "ever since I can remember, no one has acted so kindly towards me; you are the first who spoke to me like a parent and a friend; and, were I to live as long as the rocks on your island, Marillas, I should never forget your kindness, and to the day of my death I shall thank you from the bottom of my heart."

"Then it is settled, you will come?" interrupted the Béarnais.

Marzon looked embarrassed, and replied hesitatingly:

"I should like; yes, indeed I should like to do so, but one gets notions . . . then there are some things . . . and when one is accustomed . . . so that, you understand, I cannot . . ."

The piercing eye of the invalid was fixed on Lewis, who blushed, held down his head, and stopped short.

"I understand that your speech is rather unintelligible," said Marillas; "but tell me, have you any more profitable speculation in prospect?"

(1) Matelottage, an association peculiar to sailors.

"None," answered Lewis without raising his eyes.

"What keeps you on the continent, then? It is neither interest, occupation, nor pleasure?"

Lewis shook his head.

"Then, it is certain," exclaimed the Béarnais, "it must be a woman."

Marzon started and looked behind him, as if afraid of being overheard. The invalid drew the skin more closely round him with an expression of contempt.

"A woman!" repeated he satirically; "I might have known it; I ought to have guessed it. As soon as birds have feathers, they fly to the bird-lime directly. And pray who is your lady-love? Some one in a much higher rank than yourself, I suppose? Well, I shall hear more of it soon. I did the same kind of thing when I was young . . . I hope, at least, you have made a good choice, Lewis, and that the young lady is as beautiful as a fairy."

"She is a good girl, and one whom you would like if you knew her, Marillas," said Marzon with returning courage.

"You think so, do you?" said the Béarnais, laughing. "Yes, yes, my boy, you have of course drawn a prize; that is always the case at your age. I hope you have not overrated the value of the article. Goron will tell me in a little while."

"For goodness' sake, do not mention it to Goron," exclaimed Lewis in evident terror; "neither to Goron nor to 'Long Mark.'"

"What is she to them?" asked Leo.

Then, as if suddenly recollecting something, he added:

"Ha! ha! I remember, Goron had a daughter brought up at Guéraude, by an aunt, who died about a year ago, when the girl was obliged to come home."

Lewis made a sign in the affirmative.

"Then it is she who has caught you in her net?" continued the invalid; "but I fancy . . . yes . . . I am sure I have heard some one say that she was betrothed to Lubert."

"That is her father's wish, but Annette never gave her consent."

"Because she prefers you, I apprehend? Bravo, I see your tale is perfect in every part. Secret attachment! Thwarted love! That may last a long time So may the father's opposition! Well, you must take your chances, poor fellow; I do not ask you to come and live with me; remain on the continent. Indeed, I can do without companions, since I have Debrus; but he has not come back yet . . . Where can he be?"

"Your 'cobriau?' Here it is," exclaimed the harsh voice of Lubert, who just then appeared from behind the hut. Approaching Marillas, he threw the bird at his feet. The Béarnais looked at the extended wings, half-opened beak, and stiffened limbs of his pet, and stooping down, took it in his hands to examine it more minutely; then suddenly starting, he exclaimed—

"But he is dead!"

"So much the better," observed Long Mark, quietly; "well! I expected it."

"You!" interrupted Leo, with flashing eyes and trembling voice; "then you know how it happened? There is blood on his wings! Debrus has been killed!"

"Well, don't lose your temper for such a trifle," returned the sailor, shrugging up his shoulders.

"Who did it? Answer me. Who did it?" inquired the Béarnais, rising.

Lubert cast on him a look of brutality, mingled with insolent ferocity.

"Who? indeed!" repeated he, "some one whom the bird was annoying. He was always at my heels, pecking my legs; to quiet him, I gave him a kick, and—he never stirred afterwards."

The rude laugh which accompanied this speech was interrupted by Leo's suddenly seizing him by the neck.

"Then, it is you!" exclaimed he in a voice trembling with grief and anger: "you have killed an animal which was unable to defend itself; you have killed it at my very door, and now you bring it to me dead! Wretch that you are! Did you imagine I should not avenge his death, and punish your base cruelty?"

"One moment at least, one moment!" stammered the giant sailor, startled by this unexpected violence. "Loose me, Marillas! anybody would think I had killed one of your family."

"Say rather, the whole of my family, brute! savage!" returned Leo; "the whole of my family, do you hear? for he was my sole friend, my sole companion."

"Well! so much the worse!" interrupted the sailor rudely; "I tell you to let me go."

And as the Béarnais still retained his hold, he added,—

"You will not! thunder and lightning! do not plague me like your bird, or—"

He seized the invalid's hands, and freed his own neck, and then threw him off so violently, that Marillas fell to the ground. Rising quickly, he seized his gun, and aimed it at Lubert, and would have killed him on the spot had not Marzon rushed forward and snatched the gun from him. Just at that moment, happily for all parties, Goron and the peasants arrived at the cottage. They all joined in endeavouring to calm the Béarnais; but he was too much buried in grief and rage to listen to them. Leaning against the wall of his hut, the dead bird at his feet, his hand resting on his gun, Leo presented so terrible an appearance, that the men were afraid to approach him.

"Go away," exclaimed he. "And you, Lubert, remember that sooner or later the weak are avenged! Once more, go away; the island is mine—it is my property; begone from my sight, or by the God who made us, I will fire upon you as thieves and murderers."

There was something so wild in his manner, that they instinctively obeyed. Marzon attempted to approach, but Leo, pointing to the door, added: "All! every one of you!" And as soon as they had crossed the threshold, he darted to the entrance, and harried it within.

Goron, Lubert, and the peasants held a council for a few moments to determine how they should act. Lewis called Marillas several times, but the only answer he received being a fresh order to depart, he and his companions determined to set sail and return to Piriac.

II.

A few days after Goron's visit to the isle of Met, his daughter Annette was spinning at the door, which opened on the garden behind their cottage. Her father had just left her to join Lubert at the "Sardine d'Argent" tavern, and Marzon, who had been awaiting his departure, no sooner saw him turn away from the door, than he carefully scaled the wall which surrounded the garden, and descended on the opposite side. On seeing him, the young girl made a gesture of surprise, so evidently feigned, that no one could have been deceived by it.

"Dear me, how you frightened me, Lewis," said she, with a smile that belied her words; "is that the way you come into people's houses? What would the neighbours say if they could see you?"

"You know, Annie, that the neighbours are in the fields, and you never yet forbade my coming in by the wall."

The young lady having nothing to say in reply, devoted herself in a most exemplary manner to the disentangling of her thread, which task she performed by the aid of her pearly little teeth. Louis, meanwhile, seated himself on a stool at her feet, and remained absorbed in contemplation. Annette appeared embarrassed by his gaze, and in order to divert his attention, asked Marzon where his little brother Julius, whom she had just seen passing the cottage, was going. The young man replied that he had sent him to Lerat to learn if any one was going to fish near the isle of Met on the following day. "I am anxious about Marillas," added he; "when we left him the other day, he was very ill, and I am afraid lest anything should happen."

"Do not give way to such fancies, Lewis," said Annette; "if the Béarnais found he was dangerously ill, would he not have hoisted the signal of distress?"

"Indeed, I do not know; when we went away, he was full of sorrow, on account of his cobrian, and Marillas is not like other people. The idea of death would trouble him less than the thought of asking a favour from any one he does not like. If he is really offended with the people on the continent, he may probably die there in his solitude without raising his signal, or seeking aid from others in any way. For my own part, I should never cease to regret his death, for no other man living has shown me so much kindness; he is like a brother to me, Annie, and it was only the other day he gave me a most sincere proof of his affection."

"In what manner?" inquired the young girl.

"By offering Julius and myself a part of his cottage, with a share of his profits."

"And you refused his offer?"

"Does that surprise you, Annie?" said the youth, looking earnestly at her.

Annette blushed deeply, and cast down her eyes.

"Every one acts according to his own will and pleasure," returned she, spinning more diligently than ever.

"My pleasure!" repeated Marzon; "do you think it would be my pleasure to leave the village while you remain in it? For Heaven's sake, do not talk so, Annie; you know very well that if it is my interest to be on the island, it will always be my happiness to remain here."

And perceiving that she was about to interrupt him, he added quickly:

"Do not fear my speaking again of my attachment. The other day I told you all that I had so long kept in my own heart. You answered me; now I can be silent, and await a more favourable occasion; but, if you do not want to drive me mad, do not speak as if we were nothing to one another, Annie, I entreat you."

"Well, be it so," replied the young girl laughing, to conceal her emotion, "especially as you do not yet read sufficiently well for me to discontinue my instruction."

"It is not for want of trying, at any rate," said Marzon, drawing from his pocket a Paroissien, the tattered binding and discoloured leaves of which testified to long usage.

"Although it is a sacred book, and my mother (God forgive her!) always used it, I never thought of it until you took it to teach me how to read, but since then it has never left me, and you may see I have marked every lesson."

Thus saying, he opened the volume, and showed her between almost every leaf, blades of grass, and dried leaves and flowers. Annette smiled.

"Let us see whether you have been very industrious, Lewis," said she, motioning to the young man, who brought his stool nearer, and seated himself at her feet.

The old volume was placed on the young girl's knees, and opened at a page adorned by a picture of the Virgin with the seven swords in her heart. Whether it happened intentionally or by chance, it was the marriage-service. Annette pointed with her bobbin to the lines, as Marzon read with much hesitation:

"O God! look with favour upon thine handmaid about to be united to her husband; she implores thy protection. Grant that her marriage may be one of peace and love. May she be amiable as Rachel, wise as Rebecca, faithful as Sarah... Lord, thou hast been merciful unto us, thou hast had pity upon us, enable us to live to thine honour and glory." The young man raised his eyes to Annette, saying with a smile:

"It is not I who speak, Annie, it is the book; but you see that Providence itself appears to encourage us."

"Be quiet, Lewis," replied his fair instructress, shaking her head, "Providence does not trouble itself about such trifles, and our fate depends upon people who have very different ideas from ours."

"I know it, I know it but too well," resumed Marzon, "your father (God be merciful to him!) always hated me as if I had injured him; but one cannot always hate an innocent youth who seeks only to love you. Therefore, provided you retain me a place in your affections, Annie, I shall not despair. God brings everything to pass in his own time; it is for us to exercise patience: everybody must await his time."

"Yes," said Annette sadly, "but everybody has not a 'Long Mark' to interfere with them."

The young man started, and the blood rushed to his usually colourless face.

"Has he spoken to you then?" inquired he in a low and hurried voice.

"Not himself," replied Annette, with a contemptuous movement of the shoulders; "do you imagine 'Long Mark' would know how to speak to a woman? But some one has spoken for him."

She then told him how frequently her father had annoyed her by speaking of their neighbour, whom he was so eager to have for a son-in-law. Although Marzon, like everybody else, had suspected Goron's intentions, he appeared overwhelmed by this information, and his fair companion, whose only intention was to render him less confident of success, soon perceived that she had gone too far. She then tried to revive his courage; but, as it generally happens, the young man, having once yielded to despair, remained buried in grief, and refused to hear of consolation. He contrasted his poverty with the opulence of his rival, the contempt which had ever been his portion with the awe inspired by "Long Mark;" then, he recalled all the misery and suffering he had experienced from his childhood, and came to the conclusion that happiness and he were never intended for companions. He added that if, as was most probable, he should be compelled to relinquish a hope by which alone he had long been supported, he saw no reason why he should still drag on an existence which would henceforth be only a burden to him.

This sudden change from the most sanguine expectation to the deepest despair, although so common and endlessly-recurring an event, occasioned poor Annette serious alarm. She was attempting to calm his sorrow, by gentle reproaches and by proving that there was yet good cause for hope, when the voice of her father was heard from without: she rose hastily, surprised and alarmed by so speedy a return, and motioned to Marzon, who instantly darted into the garden. Almost at the same moment, the street door was opened, and Goron entered followed by Lubert.

Although the sitting at the "Sardine d'Argent" had been shorter than usual, the heightened colours, loud voices, and unsteady movements of the two men, proved that they had not wasted their time. Yet this semi-intoxication produced a different effect upon each of them. With Annette's father, it seemed to render his usually imperious temper doubly tyrannical; with Lubert, it changed to stupidity. The young girl, on glancing at their faces, held aloof, as if hoping to escape them; but "Long Mark" perceived her, and pointing towards her, exclaimed with a rude laugh:

"There she is, master, there she is!"

"Then, keep her, fellow," returned the fisherman, lighting his pipe.

Lubert was about to follow his instructions to the letter, and attempted to seize the young girl, but she escaped from him with an exclamation of terror. He turned towards the sailor with an air of pitiful awkwardness.

"Well! you see she does not like it!" said he disconcerted.

Annette had gained the door, and stood on the threshold ready to escape.

"If a respectable girl cannot remain here without being annoyed," exclaimed she, in a voice trembling from indignation rather than terror, "she will find some house more secure."

"What is that?" cried Goron, with an ominous frown; "where is the respectable girl who would seek any house but that of her father?"

Annette attempted to answer, but he interrupted her by continuing in a still louder tone:—

"Silence! I command you! shut the door and come here; we want to talk. Sit down, Lubert; a glass of spirits will brighten our ideas."

He placed a bottle of brandy and two wine-glasses on the table; "Long Mark" sat down opposite him, whilst the young girl, who had slowly obeyed her father's injunction, stood at a little distance, looking anxiously at the two sailors.

"Well then," said Goron, beginning by a transition not uncommon with him, and always connecting what he was about to say with what had been the subject of his thoughts, "there is no need for further delay, let us come to an understanding as speedily as possible. Come here, Cobriau, and let us talk like Christians."

Annette felt a little comforted when she heard her father call her by this name, which she had received in her childhood on account of her black hair. She approached with a faint smile.

"You have not forgotten," resumed Goron, "what I told you about 'Long Mark's' intentions towards you? Well, he is still anxious to have you; he wants to arrange the business to-day; we have been talking about it, and if any one attempts to oppose the match, he will be a rascal. Is it not so, Mark?"

"A mean rascal!" repeated Lubert, delighted that his imagination had been so fertile as to produce an adjective.

"Therefore, you see," continued Goron, "we only inform you of the matter out of kindness, but we cannot have any opposition or delay, because we are in a hurry."

"Very much so," added Lubert.

"Now I advise you to set towards him as you ought to do, for you will have no cause to regret it; he could fill a bag as long as himself with six-livres pieces, and he will give you finer clothes and ornaments than any woman in the place. Did you not say so, Mark?"

"And I will do it, too!" added the sailor, who was decidedly in a brilliant mood.

"Then, it is settled; adieu-vat," now embrace each other."

Lubert extended his arms to draw the young girl towards him; but Annette, who had hitherto remained mute and motionless with astonishment, started back with so expressive a gesture that the fisherman once more stopped short.

"Do not be in such a hurry, Lubert," said she, turning pale; "before marrying a girl, it is necessary to obtain her consent."

"And do you mean to say you want to refuse Lubert?" exclaimed Goron, fixing his eyes on her.

The young girl could not endure that look; she trembled, but answered in a low voice:—

"The meanest creatures are free to choose their own masters, and my father will not refuse to dedicate me to the Virgin, if it is my wish."

"Your wish!" repeated the sailor, angrily; "is it ever a girl's wish not to be married? Away with your falsehoods! Come, let us hear what reason you have for refusing 'Long Mark'? Did I not tell you he had more than enough money to keep you comfortably? is he not the finest fellow in the place, and one who knows salt water too?—for I could pardon your refusing a farmer; but a true sailor, the devil take me if I think of allowing such a thing! You are to marry him, do you hear? and to prove that we are in earnest, I may as well tell you that you are to go with us to the 'Curé' in a quarter of an hour."

"I will not go!" said Annette, gaining strength from despair.

Goron seized his daughter's arm, drew her roughly towards him, and bringing his heated face into close contact with her's, exclaimed with compressed lips:

"You say!"

"I say," replied Annette firmly, "that I would rather be killed!"

The sailor rose with so violent a movement, and so tremendous an oath, that Lubert himself trembled; Annette closed her eyes, expecting the blow, but stood firm on the same spot. Whether he was awed by her firmness, or was still master of himself, Goron stopped, and his raised hand descended without having struck his daughter. He made up for it by expending his vocabulary of abuse and insult upon her. Annette's strength, which had hitherto appeared to increase with the peril of her situation, now suddenly forsook her. She had been prepared for violence of action, and now found herself surprised, as it were, by this storm of words. The tears filled her eyes and chased each other rapidly down her cheeks; she buried her face in her apron. Far from being softened by her emotion, Goron seemed to find in it a fresh cause of anger.

"Bravo! that's it, cry now, obstinate creature!" exclaimed he, "cry as if all the rivers that supply the sea were in your heart; but it is only water, you see, and a sailor cares not for it. Ha! you want to oppose me, eh? Well! plague it! we'll see about that. We must find out which is the strongest, my will or your foolish fancy! for it is evident, since you can give no reason, that you only want to brave my authority. Is it not so? Answer me. Has not Lubert everything necessary to make a woman happy? . . . unless, indeed, she is looking elsewhere."

And as this last supposition appeared to enlighten him suddenly, he added in a still louder tone:

"Ha! I'll stake my life that's the reason. Come, tell me, have I guessed? yes, or no? Will you answer?"

He had snatched away the apron that covered poor Annette's face, and she appeared with downcast eyes, blushing with confusion, and attempting to turn away her head. Goron struck his hands together and resumed quickly:—

"Ha! then, that's the secret; there is a lover behind the scene! But what is his name? eh? . . . Is it Moreau 'Grain d'Orge,' Ermon 'La Soif,' or Richard 'Le Glorieux?' I have never seen you talking to any of them."

"No, it is always Lewis Marzon who stops to speak to her," said Lubert, without understanding the force of his own observation.

At the name of Marzon, the young girl was unable to conceal a movement which her father observed.

"Lewis Marzon!" exclaimed he.

His look seemed to penetrate Annette's soul.

"Can it be he? Yes, yes, now that I think of it, the beggar is always here; it is he who brings the water and digs the garden, and out of gratitude, she teaches him to read. I dare say, now, he was in the garden when we came in; I heard the door shut."

He advanced toward the entrance opening on the garden, when he suddenly perceived the Paroissien that Marzon had left behind him on the stool.

"Here is his book!" exclaimed he, taking it up, "and, God forgive me! it is left open, where he was reading . . . at the marriage-service! . . . Wretched girl! then it is indeed true! This is your chosen one! a vagabond living upon the alms of the ocean! a coward whom a sailor would break like a straw! And you dared to expect that I would have such a son-in-law! I would rather take you to the top of one of the highest rocks, and send you head foremost into the sea."

"Do as you please," said Annette, who had some of Goron's blood in her veins, and always became bold when threatened.

"Be silent! fool-hardy girl," interrupted her father, incapable of restraining himself any longer; "your turn will come later—I am going to settle Marzon's account first. Come, Mark, this is your business as much as mine."

(1) A sailor's word, indicating that everything is ready and the vessel is to start.

Lubert rose; Annette, in alarm, placed herself before them to interrupt them, and exclaimed, "What are you going to do?"

"A benefit to society in general, by ridding the country of a worthless scoundrel," replied Goron, buttoning up his waistcoat, as he always did when preparing for a decisive action. "We are going to watch for my boat at the Turbale, and if we find the beggar on our road, woe betide him!"

"Woe, indeed!" repeated Mark, extending his gigantic fists in a menacing attitude.

Annette, with clasped hands, endeavoured to arrest her father's progress; but he pushed her quickly aside and went out, followed by Lubert. His daughter remained for some moments as if petrified; she knew by experience all that was to be feared from Goron's anger. Twice already his violence had brought him before the magistrates, and Marzon might be the victim of his impetuosity. "Long Mark" himself, although naturally indolent, might be led by example: he was generally inert, but when once roused to action, his power was not to be withstood. Annette fell on a seat, her hands folded on her heart, her cheeks inflamed, and her eyes filled with tears, and murmured an inarticulate prayer; then rising hastily, she passed her hand across her eyes;—she had just remembered that this was the hour for Marzon to be at the rocks of Castelli. In bringing home the cow, she could easily pass that way, see Lewis, and thus prevent his encountering her father and Lubert. Her determination was instantly made: she set out on her expedition, taking care to choose a quiet road, that she might escape the notice of the neighbours.

(To be continued.)

PICTURES OF SWEDEN.¹

A PICTURE in words must needs be a poetical description. Such, accordingly, is the character of these sketches of Swedish life and scenery by the Danish poet, Andersen. He depicts only objects of poetical interest—scenes of natural grandeur, historical institutions, buildings of ancient date and dignity, spots of pastoral beauty and seclusion—and of these little is presented save the impressions which they severally excited in himself. Legends and historic incidents are introduced into the delineation, but everything appears under the lights and shades of fancy, and is coloured by the hues of a poetic feeling. Sentiment rather than observation would seem to be the author's tendency. His book will have few charms for those very "practical" people who delight only in "facts." There is nothing of what is called "useful information" in the whole work. It is a record and illustration of the beautiful.

Behold the intending traveller, brooding over the thoughts and fancies which a delightful spring time has quickened in his brain, and listening to the suggestions of a rambling inclination. The sunshine of the lengthening day sheds gladness within his mind, and solicits him with gentle promises to go abroad and see the world. The birds warble, and he essays to interpret their song; and thus he reproduces it in a free translation:—

"Get on my back," says the stork, our green island's sacred bird, 'and I will carry thee over the Sound. Sweden also has fresh and fragrant beech woods, green meadows and corn-fields. In Scavia, with the flowering apple-trees behind the peasant's house, you will think that you are still in Denmark.'

"Fly with me," says the swallow; 'I fly over Holland's mountain-ridge, where the beech-trees cease to grow; I fly further towards the north than the stork. You shall see the vegetable mould pass over into rocky ground; see snug, neat towns, old churches and mansions, where all is good and comfortable, where the family stand in a circle around the table and say grace at meals, where the least of the children says a prayer, and morning and evening sings a psalm. I have heard it, I have seen it, when little, from my nest under the caves.'

"Come with me! come with me!" screams the restless sea-gull, and flies in an expecting circle. 'Come with me to the Skjærgaards, where rocky isles by thousands, with fir and pine, lie like flower-beds along the coast; where the fishermen draw the well-filled nets!'

"Rest thee between our extended wings," sing the wild swans. 'Let us bear thee up to the great lakes, the perpetually roaring elvs (rivers), that rush on with arrowy swiftness; where the oak forest has long ceased and the birch-tree becomes stunted. Rest thee between our extended wings: we fly up to Sulitelma, the island's eye, as the mountain is called; we fly from the vernal green valley, up over the snow-drifts, to the mountain's top, where thou canst see the North Sea, on yonder side of Norway. We fly to Jemteland, where the rocky mountains are high and blue; where the Foss roars and rushes. Up to the deep, cold-running waters, where the midsummer sun does not set; where the rosy hue of eve is that of morn.'

That is the bird's song, according to our poet's interpretation. However, he declines to sit upon the stork's back, or between the wings of the wild swans. "We will go forward," says he, "with steam, and with horses,—yes, also on our own legs, and glance now and then from reality, over the fence into the region of thought, which is always our near neighbourhood; pluck a flower or a leaf, to be placed in the note-book—for it sprang out during our journey's flight: we fly and we sing. * * Sweden! thou land of deep feeling, of heart-felt songs; home of the limpid elvs, where the wild swans sing in the gleam of the Northern Lights; Thou land, on whose deep, still lakes, Scandinavia's fairy builds her colonnades, and leads her battling, shadowy host over the joy mirror!

(1) "Pictures of Sweden." By Hans Christian Andersen, Author of "The Improvisatore," &c.—Bentley, London.

Glorious Sweden, with thy fragrant Linnæus, with Jenny's soul-enlivening songs! to thee will we fly with the stork and the swallow, with the restless sea-gull and the wild swans. Thy birch-woods exhale refreshing fragrance under their sober, bending branches; on the tree's white stem the harp shall hang: the North's summer wind shall whistle therein!"

Even so. In reading these pages we have seemed to hear it—that gentle summer wind, breathing a mild, Northern poetry. And now we will take the reader to some of the choicest spots which the poet visited, and he shall see how pleasantly and sweetly they are pictured. Let us go to old Vadstene—a place of ancient palaces, and of a flourishing convent, where once the good St. Bridget ruled, and in whose decayed and dilapidated sacristy, it is said, her bones are now resting.

"In Sweden," says our author, "it is not only in the country, but even in several of the provincial towns, that one sees whole houses of grass-turf or with roofs of grass-turf; and some are so low that one might easily spring up to the roof, and sit on the fresh green sward. In the early spring, whilst the fields are still covered with snow, but which is melted on the roof, the latter affords the first announcement of spring, with the young sprouting grass where the sparrow twitters: 'Spring comes!'

"Between Montola and Vadstene, close by the high road, stands a grass-turf house—one of the most picturesque. It has but one window, broader than it is high, and a wild rose-branch forms the curtain outside.

"We see it in the spring. The roof is so delightfully fresh with grass, it has quite the tint of velvet; and close to it is the chimney, nay, even a cherry-tree grows out of its side, now full of flowers: the wind shakes the leaves down on a little lamb that is tethered to the chimney. It is the only lamb of the family. The old dame, who lives here, lifts it up to its place herself in the morning, and lifts it down again in the evening, to give it a place in the room. The roof can just bear the little lamb, but not more—this is an experience and a certainty. Last autumn—and at that time the grass-turf roofs are covered with flowers, mostly blue and yellow, the Swedish colours—there grew here a flower of a rare kind. It shone in the eyes of the old professor, who, on his botanical tour, came past here. The professor was quickly up on the roof, and just as quick was one of his booted legs through it, and so was the other leg, and then half of the professor himself—that part where the head does not sit; and as the house had no ceiling, his legs hovered right over the old dame's head, and that in very close contact. But now the roof is again whole; the fresh grass grows where learning sank; the little lamb bleats up there, and the old dame stands beneath in the door-way, with folded hands, with a smile on her mouth, rich in remembrances, legends, and songs; rich in her only lamb on which the cherry-tree strews its flower-blossoms in the warm spring sun.

"As a background to this picture lies the Vettern—the bottomless lake, as the commonalty believe—with its transparent water, its sea-like waves, and in calm, with 'Heyring,' or fata morgana, on its steel-like surface. We see Vadstene palace and town, 'the city of the dead,' as a Swedish author has called it—Sweden's Herculaneum, reminiscence's city. The grass-turf house must be our box, whence we see the rich mementos pass before us—memorials from the chronicle of saints, the chronicle of kings, and the love songs that still live with the old dame, who stands in her low house there, where the lamb crops the grass on the roof. We hear her, and we see with her eyes; we go from the grass-turf houses, where poor women sit and make lace, once the celebrated work of the rich nuns here in the cloister's wealthy time.

"How still, solitary, and grass-grown are these streets! We stop by an old wall, mouldy green for centuries already. Within it stood the cloister; now there is but one of its wings remaining. There, within that now poor garden, still bloom Saint Bridget's leek, and once rare flowers. King John and the Abbess, Ana Gylte, wandered one evening there, and the king cunningly asked: 'If the maidens in the cloister were never tempted by love?' and the abbess answered, as she pointed to a bird that just then flew over them: 'It may happen! One cannot prevent the bird from flying over the garden; but one may surely prevent it from building its nest there!'

"Thus thought the pious Abbess, and there have been sisters who thought and acted like her. But it is quite as sure, that in the same garden there stood a pear-tree, called the tree of death; and the legend says of it, that whoever approached and plucked its fruit would soon die. Red and yellow pears weighed down its branches to the ground. The trunk was unusually large; the grass grew high around it, and many a morning was it seen trodden down. Who had been there during the night?

"A storm arose one evening from the lake, and the next morning the large tree was found thrown down; the trunk was broken, and out from it there rolled infants' bones—the white bones of murdered children lay shining on the grass.

"The pious but love-sick sister, Ingrid, this Vadstene's Heloise, writes to her heart's beloved, Axel Nilsun—for the chronicles have preserved it for us:—'The brothers and sisters amuse themselves in play, drink wine, and dance with one another in the garden.'

"These words may explain to us the history of the pear-tree: one is led to think of the orgies of the nun-phantoms in 'Robert le Diable,' the daughters of sin, on consecrated ground. But 'judge not, lest ye be judged.' We will read sister Ingrid's letter, sent secretly to him she truly loved. In it lies the history of many, clear and human to us:—

"I dare not confess to any other than to thee, that I am not able to repeat my Ave Maria, or read my Paternoster, without calling thee to mind. Nay, even in the Mass itself thy comely face appears, and our affectionate intercourse returns to me. It seems to me that I cannot confess to any other human being—the Virgin Mary, St. Bridget, and the whole host of Heaven, will perhaps punish me for it. But thou knowest well, my heart's beloved, that I have never consented with my free-will to these rules. My parents, it is true, have placed my body in this prison, but the heart cannot so soon be weaned from the world.'

"How touching is the distress of young hearts! It offers itself to us from the mouldy parchment, it resounds in old songs. Beg the grey-haired old dame in the grass-turf house to sing to thee of the young, heavy sorrow; of the saving angel—and the angel came in many shapes. You will hear the song of the cloister robbery; of Herr Carl, who was sick to death—when the young nun entered the corpse-chamber, sat down by his feet, and whispered how sincerely she had loved him, and the knight rose from his bier and bore her away to marriage and pleasure in Copenhagen. And all the nuns of the cloister sang: 'Christ grant that such an angel were to come, and take both me and thee!'

"The old dame will also sing for thee of the beautiful Agda and Oluf Tyste; and at once the cloister is revived in its splendour, the bells ring, stone houses arise—they even rise from the waters of the Vettern: the little town becomes churches and towers. The streets are crowded with great, with sober, well-dressed persons. Down the stairs of the town-hall descends, with a sword by his side, and in fur-lined cloak, the most wealthy citizen of Vadstene, the merchant Michael. By his side is his young, beautiful daughter, Agda, richly dressed and happy; youth in beauty, youth in mind. All eyes are turned on the rich man—and yet forget him for her, the beautiful. Life's best blessings await her; her thoughts soar upwards, her mind aspires; her future is happiness! These were the thoughts of the many—and amongst the many there was one who saw her as Romeo saw Juliet, as Adam saw Eve in the garden of Paradise. That one was Oluf, the handsomest young man, but poor as Agda was rich. And he must conceal his love; but as only he lived in it, only he knew of it; so he became mute and still, and after months had passed away, the town's folk called him Oluf Tyste (Oluf the Silent).

"Nights and days he combated his love; nights and days he suffered inexpressible torment; but at last—one dew-drop or one sun-beam alone is necessary for the ripe rose to open its leaves—he must tell it to Agda. And she listened to his words, was terrified, and sprang away; but the thought remained with him, and the heart went after the thought and stayed there; she returned his love strongly and truly, but in modesty and honour; and therefore poor Oluf came to the rich merchant and sought his daughter's hand. But Michael shut the bolts of his door and of his heart too. He would neither listen to tears nor supplications, but only to his own will; and as little Agda also kept firm to her will, her father placed her in Vadstene cloister. And Oluf was obliged to submit. She was dead to him and the world. But one night, in tempestuous weather, whilst the rain streamed down, Oluf Tyste came to the cloister wall, threw his rope-ladder over it, and however high the Vettern lifted its waves, Oluf and little Agda flew away over its fathomless depths that autumn night.

"Early in the morning the nuns missed little Agda. What a screaming and shouting—the cloister is disgraced! The Abbess and Michael the merchant swore that vengeance and death should reach the fugitives. Lindköping's severe bishop, Hans Brask, fulminated his ban over them, but they were already across the waters of the Vettern; they had reached the shores of the Venern, they were on Kinakulla, with one of Oluf's friends, who owned the delightful Hellekis.

"Here their marriage was to be celebrated. The guests were invited, and a monk from the neighbouring cloister of Husaby was fetched to marry them. Then came the messenger with the bishop's excommunication, and this—but not the marriage ceremony—was read to them.

"All turned away from them terrified. The owner of the house, the friend of Oluf's youth, pointed to the open door, and bade them depart instantly. Oluf only requested a car and horse wherewith to convey away his exhausted Agda; but they threw sticks and stones after them, and Oluf was obliged to bear his poor bride in his arms far into the forest.

"Heavy and bitter were their wanderings. At last, however, they found a home; it was in Guld Kroken, in West Gothland. An honest old couple gave them shelter and a place by the hearth: they stayed there till Christmas, and on that holy eve there was to be a real Christmas festival. The guests were invited, the furrery set forth; and now came the clergyman of the parish to say prayers; but whilst he spake he recognised Oluf and Agda, and the prayer became a curse upon the two. Anxiety and terror came over all; they drove the excommunicated pair out of the house, out into the biting frost, where the wolves went in flocks, and the bear was no stranger. And Oluf felled wood in the forest, and kindled a fire to frighten away the noxious animals and keep life in Agda—he thought that she must die. But just then she was the stronger of the two.

"Our Lord is mighty and glorious; He will save us!" said she. "He has one here on the earth, one who can save us, one who has proved, like us, what it is to wander amongst enemies and wild animals. It is the King—Gustavus Vasa! He has languished like us!—gone astray in Dalecarlia in the deep snow! he has suffered, tried, knows it—he can and he will help us!"

"The King was in Vadstene. He had called together the representatives of the kingdom there. He dwelt in the cloister itself, even there where little Agda, if the King did not grant her pardon, must suffer what the angry Abbess dared to advise: penance and a painful death awaited her.

"Through forests and by untrodden paths, in storm and snow, Oluf and Agda came to Vadstene. They were seen: some showed fear, others insulted and threatened them. The guard of the cloister made the sign of the cross on seeing the two sinners, who dared to ask admission to the King.

"I will receive and hear all," was his royal message; and the two lovers fell trembling at his feet.

"And the King looked mildly on them; and as he long had had the intention to humiliate the proud Bishop of Lindköping, the moment was not unfavourable to them; the King listened to the relation of their lives and sufferings, and gave them his word that the excommunication should be annulled. He then placed their hands one in the other, and said that the priest should also do the same soon; and he promised them his royal protection and favour.

"And old Michael, the merchant, who feared the king's anger, with which he was threatened, became so mild and gentle, that he, as the King commanded, not only opened his house and his arms to Oluf and Agda, but displayed all his riches on the wedding-day of the young couple. The marriage ceremony took place in the cloister church, whither the King himself led the bride, and where, by his command, all the nuns were obliged to be present, in order to give still more ecclesiastical pomp to the festival. And many a heart there silently recalled the old song about the cloister robbery, and looked at Oluf Tystic, praying:—
'Christ grant that such an angel were to come, and take both me and thee!'"

There are other legends and romantic stories associated with the crumbling walls of Vadstene, all of which are beautifully related by the author, but if the reader desires to see them we must refer him to the book. Pleasant will be the hour to him when he sits down to read it. For the present he must be content to take another quotation of our selection—one somewhat differing in manner from the foregoing, inasmuch as it deals not with the recollections of the past, but exhibits a phase of Swedish life now actually observable. It is our author's description of his visit to the provincial town of Sala; and though the reader, perhaps, may think he has noted nothing very particularly worthy of a traveller's attention, we doubt not the sketch will be accepted as being nevertheless graphic and amusing. It has, to say the least of it, a pleasing, picturesque effect, in proper keeping with the author's plan of picture-writing.

"Sweden's great king, Germany's preserver, Gustavus Adolphus, founded Sala. The little wood close by, still preserves legends of the heroic king's youthful love—of his meefing here with Ebba Brahe.

"Sala's silver mines are the largest, the deepest, and the oldest in Sweden; they reach to the depth of one hundred and seventy fathoms, consequently they are almost as deep as the Baltic. This of itself is enough to awaken an interest for a little town; but what is its appearance? 'Sala,' says the guide-book, 'lies in a valley, in a flat, and not very pleasant district.' And so truly it is: it was not very attractive approaching it our way, and the high road led directly into the town, which is without any distinctive character. It consists of a long street, with what we may term a nucleus and a few fibres. The nucleus is the market-place, and the fibres are the few lanes, diverging from it. The long street—that is to say long in a little town—is quite without passengers; no one comes out from the doors, no one is to be seen at the windows.

"It was therefore with pleased surprise that I at length descried a human being: it was at an iron-monger's, where there hung a paper of pins, a handkerchief, and two tea-pots in the window. There I saw a solitary shop-boy, standing quite still, but leaning over the counter, and looking out of the open door. He certainly wrote in his journal, if he had one, in the evening: 'To-day a traveller drove through the town; who he was, God knows, for I don't!'—yes, that was what the shop-boy's face said, and an honest face it was.

"In the inn at which I arrived, there was the same grave-like stillness as in the street. The gate was certainly closed, but all the inner doors were wide open; the farm-yard cock stood uplifted in the middle of the traveller's room and crowed in order to show that there was somebody at home. The house, however, was quite picturesque: it had an open balcony, from which one might look out upon the yard, for it would have been far too lively had it been facing the street. There hung the old sign and creaked in the wind, as if to show that it at least was alive. I saw it from my window; I also saw how the grass in the street had got the mastery over the pavement. The sun shone brightly, but shone as into the bachelor's solitary room, and on the old maid's bums in the flower-pots. It was as still as a Scotch Sunday—and yet it was a Tuesday. One was disposed for Young's 'Night Thoughts.'

"I looked out from the balcony into the neighbouring yard: there was not a soul to be seen, but children had been playing there. There was a little garden made of dry sticks; they were stuck down in the soft soil and had been watered; a broken pan, which had certainly served by way of watering-pot, lay there still. The sticks signified roses and geraniums.

"It had been a delightful garden—alas, yes! We great, grown-up men—we play just so: we make ourselves a garden with what we call love's roses and friendship's geraniums; we water them with our tears and with our heart's blood; and yet they are and remain dry sticks without root. It was a gloomy thought; I felt it, and in order to get the dry sticks in my thoughts to blossom, I went out. I wandered in the fibres and in the long threads, that is to say, in the small lanes, and in the great street; and here was more life than I dared to expect. I met a herd of cattle returning or going—which, I know not, for they were without a herdsman. The shop-boy still stood behind the counter, leaned over it and greeted me; the stranger took his hat off again, that was my day's employment in Sala.

"Pardon me, thou silent town, which Gustavus

Adolphus built, where his young heart felt the first emotions of love, and where the silver lies in the deep shafts—that is to say, outside the town, 'in a flat, and not very pleasant district.'

"I knew no one in the town; I had no one to be my guide, so I accompanied the cows, and came to the churchyard. The cows went past, but I stepped over the stile, and stood amongst the graves, where the grass grew high, and almost all the tombstones lay with worn-out inscriptions. On a few only the date of the year was legible. 'Anno,'—yes, what then? And who rested there? Everything on the stone was erased, blotted out like the earthly life of those mortals that here were earth in earth. What life's dream have ye dead played here in silent Salå?"

"The setting sun shone over the graves; not a leaf moved on the trees, all was still—still as death, in the city of the silver-mines, of which this traveller's reminiscence is but a frame around the shop-boy who leaned over the counter."

One passage more, to show how Andersen paints scenery, and then we must terminate our pickings. It is a forest scene in midsummer, and, to our thinking, it is charmingly described.

"Midsummer raises its leafy arbour everywhere, yet it is most flush in the forest, it extends for miles around. Our road goes for miles through that forest without seeing a house, or the possibility of meeting travellers, driving, riding, or walking. Come! the ostler puts fresh horses to the carriage; come with us into the large woody desert: we have a regular trodden way to travel, the air is clear, here is summer's warmth and the fragrance of birch and lime. It is an up and down hill road, always bending, and so, ever changing, but yet always forest scenery—the close thick forest. We pass small lakes, which lie so still and deep, as if they concealed night and sleep under their dark, glassy surfaces.

"We are now on a forest plain, where only charred stumps of trees are to be seen: this long tract is black, burnt, and deserted, not a bird flies over it. Tall, hanging birches now greet us again; a squirrel springs playfully across the road, and up into a tree; we cast our eye searchingly over the wood-grown mountain-side, which slopes so far, far forward; but not a trace of a house is to be seen; nowhere does that bluish smoke-cloud rise, that shows us here are fellow-men.

"The sun shines warm, the flies dance around the horses, settle on them, fly off again, and dance, as though it were to qualify themselves for resting and being still. They, perhaps, think 'nothing is going on without us; there is no life while we are doing nothing.' They think as many persons think, and do not remember that Time's horses always fly onward with us!

"How solitary it is here! so delightfully solitary! one is so entirely alone with God and one's self. As the sunlight streams over the earth and over the extensive solitary forests, so does God's spirit stream over and into mankind; ideas and thoughts unfold themselves, endless, inexhaustible as he is, as the magnet which apportion its powers to the steel, and itself loses nothing thereby. As our journey through the forest scenery here, along the extended solitary road, so, travelling on the great high-road of thought, ideas pass through our head. Strange, rich caravans pass by from the works of poets, from the home of memory, strange and novel, for capricious fancy gives birth to them at the moment. There comes a procession of pious children with waving flags and joyous songs; there come dancing Mænades, the blood's wild Bacchantes. The sun pours down hot in the open forest; it is as if the southern summer had laid itself up here to rest in Scandinavian forest-solitude, and sought itself out a glade where it might lie in the sun's hot beams and sleep: hence this stillness as if it were night. Not a bird is heard to twitter, not a pine-tree moves; of what does the southern summer dream here in the north, amongst pines and fragrant birches?

"In the writings of the olden time, from the classic soil of the South, are sagas of mighty fairies who, in the skins of swans, flew towards the North, to the Hyperborean's land, to the east of the north wind; up there, in the deep, still lakes, they bathed themselves, and acquired a renewed form. We are in the forest by these deep lakes; we see swans in flocks fly over us, and swim upon the rapid elv and on the still waters. The forests, we perceive, continue to extend further towards the west and the north, and are more dense as we proceed: the carriage-roads cease, and one can only pursue one's way along the outskirts by the solitary path, and on horseback. . . .

"Woodland solitude! what images dost thou not present to one's thoughts! Woodland solitude! through thy vaulted halls people now pass in the summer-time with cattle and domestic utensils; children and old men go to the solitary pasture where echo dwells, where the national song springs forth with the wild mountain flowers! Dost thou see the procession? paint it if thou canst! The broad wooden cart laden high with chests and barrels, with jars and with crockery. The bright copper kettle and the tin dish shine in the sun. The old grandmother sits at the top of the load and holds her spinning-wheel, which completes the pyramid. The father drives the horse, the mother carries the youngest child on her back, sewed up in a skin, and the procession moves on step by step. The cattle are driven by the half-grown children: they have stuck a birch branch between ope of the cow's horns, but she does not appear to be proud of her finery, she goes the same quiet pace as the others, and lashes the saucy flies with her tail. If the night becomes cold on this solitary pasture, there is fuel enough here, the tree falls of itself from old age, and lies and rots.

"But take especial care of the fire, fear the fire-spirit in the forest desert! He comes from the unextinguishable pile, he comes from the thunder-cloud, riding on the blue lightning's flame, which kindles the thick, dry moss of the earth; trees and bushes are kindled, the flames run from tree to tree, it is like a snow-storm of fire; the flame leaps to the tops of the trees, what a crackling and roaring, as if it were the ocean in its course! The birds fly upwards in flocks, and fall down suffocated by the smoke; the animals flee, or, encircled by the fire, are consumed in it! Hear their cries and roars of agony! The howling of the wolf and the bear, dost thou know it? A calm, rainy day, and the forest-plains themselves, alone are able to confine the fiery sea, and the burnt forest stands charred, with black trunks and black stumps of trees, as we saw them here in the forest by the broad high-road. On this road we continue to travel, but it becomes worse and worse; it is, properly speaking, no road at all, but it is about to become one. Large stones lie half dug up, and we drive past them; large trees are cast down, and obstruct our way, and therefore we must descend from the carriage. The horses are taken out, and the peasants help to lift and push the carriage forward over ditches and opened paths.

"The sun now ceases to shine; some few rain drops fall, and now it is a steady rain. But how it causes the birch to shed its fragrance! At a distance there are huts erected of loose trunks of trees and fresh green boughs, and in each there is a large fire burning. See where the blue smoke curls through the green leafy roof; peasants are within at work, hammering and forging; here they have their meals. They are now laying a mine in order to blast a rock, and the rain falls faster and faster, and the pine and birch emit a finer fragrance. It is delightful in the forest."

From the extracts we have given, it will be seen what kind of book this is. We have nothing to offer in the way of criticism, further than to say, that the whole of it is written in the same picturesque and pleasant strain; that a cheerful and grateful feeling of enjoyment in the delights of nature and of existence is manifest in every sketch; and that the tone of the author's thoughts is eminently joyous, free, and humanizing. It is apparently his habit to make the best of everything; to look upon the world and its goings-on with calm eyes and a contented heart; and to use his poetic gifts for the purpose of illustrating and revealing the beauty and the goodness which are more or less in all things. A wise and genial philosophy pervades all his observations and reflections on human life and man's relations and destiny in the world; and we think it next to impossible for any one to read the book without deriving from it a measure of the mild and thankful spirit with which the author is inspired. If there is one defect in the work, it is perhaps a too continuous prettiness of phraseology, which has a somewhat palliating effect upon the reader when the book is read connectedly, an effect somewhat analogous to that of sweet confectionery on the palate when too liberally indulged in; but even this seems natural and not inappropriate to the author's style of treatment; and it is evident you are liable to just the same effect from running hastily over a gallery of paintings; whereas, if you steadily contemplate a single picture till you have taken in its entire beauty and intention, you get exactly what the artist desired to impart; and hence, perhaps, the way to use and enjoy such a book as this, is to read it at intervals, one or two sketches at a time, so that you may quietly and effectually realize the charm of each. Were it not that reading, like everything else, is now commonly gone through at railway speed, we should recommend to readers having leisure, a trial of the plan thus indicated.

A RAMBLE IN ETTRICK FOREST.

Ettrick's foreste is a fair foreste;

In it grows manie a seemlie tree;
There's hart and hynd, and dæc and rae,
And of a' wilde beastes grete plentie.

Sang of the Outlaw Murray.

THERE are few districts in Great Britain associated with so many interesting recollections of tradition, and song, and story, as the tract of country watered by the Ettrick and the Yarrow. The whole region abounds in legends and spirit-stirring tales. It has been from time immemorial the subject of Scottish song, and its beauties and traditions have been commemorated in the strains of Hamilton and Logan, of Hogg, and Scott, and Wordsworth. The ruined towers scattered throughout the district present a striking memorial of times long gone by, when "might made right;" while the countless flocks which now wander in perfect security amid those glens, where rude border reivers once found a refuge, proclaim the striking contrast between the character and condition of its past and present inhabitants.

"Dark and dismantled lies each ancient peel,
Their native turbulence resign'd, the swains
Feed their gay flocks along its heaths and plains."

This district was in ancient days a royal hunting-forest, and the Caledonian bull, the wild boar, the wolf, the red deer, "and of a' wilde beastes grete plentie," once roamed through its recesses. In more modern times it was the land of the Scotts, whose chief derives his territorial designation from a spot in one of its lonely vales, and it is now adorned by his magnificent ducal residence. The whole country around was, at one time, covered with natural wood; and so late as the middle of last century, a person might have walked from the town of Selkirk to Ettrick, a distance of eighteen miles, and never once all the way have escaped from the shadow of trees. But no vestige now remains of this primeval forest;

"The scenes are desert now, and bare,
Where flourish'd once a forest-fair,
Up pathless Ettrick, and on Yarrow,
Where erst the Outlaw drew his arrow."

though such is the nature of the ground, that trees spontaneously spring up, whenever any part of it is enclosed. The last sovereign that visited this district for the sake of the chase was Queen Mary; and her father, James V., was the first who began the system of converting the forest into a sheep-walk. The district is now entirely pastoral.

"The Forest," as it is still commonly called, may be approached either from the west by Moffat, on the Caledonian Railway, or from the east by Melrose, on the Hawick line. The latter is the preferable route, as it leads through the most interesting scenery, and affords an opportunity, in passing, to visit Melrose and Abbotsford.

The ancient, but decayed royal burgh of Selkirk, stands at the eastern extremity of the forest, and may be regarded as its capital; indeed it is the only town in the whole district. The citizens of Selkirk, like the rest of the men of the forest, greatly distinguished themselves at the Battle of Flodden. James IV. was so well pleased with their gallant appearance, that he knighted the town clerk, William Brydome, who commanded them, upon the field of battle. The brave knight was among the few survivors of that fatal day, and his sword is still in the possession of his lineal descendants; and a pennon taken by one of the citizens from an Englishman is, or was lately, kept by the successive deacons of the weavers. There are few readers of Scottish song who are not familiar with the singularly beautiful and pathetic ballad, "The Flowers of the Forest," which commemorates, in a strain of simplicity and tenderness that has rarely been equalled, the calamities sustained by the inhabitants of Ettrick Forest, through the fatal battle of Flodden.

"Alas! that Scottish maid should sing
The combat where her lover fell!
That Scottish bard should wake the string,
The triumph of our foes to tell!"

In revenge for the gallant manner in which the citizens of Selkirk had behaved on that disastrous occasion, the English laid the town in ashes. As a compensation for this misfortune, and a reward for their valour in the battle, James V. bestowed upon the inhabitants by royal charter, among other important privileges, permission to till one thousand acres of the common lands belonging to the burgh, "for strengthening and bigging of the samyn for the wele of us, and of lieges repaired thairto, and defence against our auld innemys of England." An ancient tradition affirms, that the few survivors of the Battle of Flodden, on their return home, found at the side of Lady-wood Edge, the corpse of a female, wife to one of their fallen comrades, with a child sucking at her breast, and that in memory of this incident the present arms of the burgh bear a female, holding a child in her arms, and seated on a sarcophagus, decorated with the Scottish lion; in the background, a wood.

At the time of the battle, and for centuries afterwards, the principal trade carried on in Selkirk was the manufacture of a sort of brogues with a single thin sole, termed "single-soled shoon." Hence the inhabitants of the town are designated "the sutors of Selkirk," and to be made a sutor of Selkirk is the ordinary phrase for being created a burgess. A singular custom is observed at conferring the freedom of the burgh. A birse composed of four or five bristles, such as are used by shoemakers, is attached to the seal of the burgess' ticket. When a new burgess is admitted into the community of the sutors, the birse passes round with the cup of welcome, and every elder brother draws it through his mouth before it reaches the happy neophyte, who, of course, pays it similar respect. This is called licking the birse, and is regarded as an act of respect to the craft who rule the roast in Selkirk. Sir Walter Scott, who was Sheriff-depute of Selkirkshire, on being made a sutor, is said to have used the precaution of washing the beslobbered birse in his wine, but was compelled volens volens to atone for that act of disrespect, by drinking off the liquor.

An exception was made, however, in the case of Prince Leopold, when he was made "a sutor of Selkirk," on the occasion of his visit to that ancient burgh in 1819. "His Royal Highness," says Sir Walter Scott, "received the civic honours of the Birse very graciously. I had hinted to Bailie Lang, (the chief magistrate of the burgh,) that it ought only to be licked symbolically on the present occasion; so he flourished it three times before his mouth, but without touching it with his lips, and the prince followed his example as directed."

The cognizance of the sutors forms the subject of an amusing letter from Sir Walter, to the Duke of Buccleuch, who had consulted him about the design of a piece of plate which his grace was about to present to the burgh of Selkirk. "I have proceeded in my commission about the cup. It will be a very handsome one. But I am still puzzled to dispose of the birse in a becoming manner. It is a most unmanageable decoration. I tried it upright on the top of the cup; it looked like a shaving brush, and the goblet might be intended to make the lather. Then I thought I had a brilliant idea. The arms of Selkirk are a female seated on a sarcophagus, decorated with the arms of Scotland, which will make a beautiful top to the cup. So I thought of putting the birse into the lady's other hand; but, alas, it looked so precisely like the rod of chastisement uplited over the poor child, that I laughed at the drawing for half-an-hour. Next I tried to take off the castigatory appearance, by inserting the bristles in a kind of handle, but then it looked as if the poor woman had been engaged in the capacities of housemaid and child-keeper at once, and, fatigued with her double duty, had sat down on the wine cooler, with the broom in one hand, and the bairn in the other. At length, after some conference with Charles Sharpe, I have hit on a plan which, I

(1) There is an old song called "The Sutors of Selkirk," which is always called for by the inhabitants on carnival occasions, and is supposed to allude to the Battle of Flodden, and to the different behaviour of the sutors and of Lord Home on that occasion.

"Up wi' the Sutors of Selkirk,
And down wi' the Earl of Home,
And up wi' the braw laird
That sew the single-soled shoon."

(2) Lockhart's Life of Scott, vol. iv. p. 307.

think, will look very well if tolerably executed, namely, to have the lady seated in due form on the top of the lid, and to have a thistle wreathed around the sarcophagus, and rising above her head, and from the top of the thistle shall proceed the birse. * * The following lines are humbly suggested for a motto, being taken from an ancient Scottish canzonetta—

"The sutor gas the sow a kias;
'Grumph !' quo' the sow, 'It's a' for my birra."

At the present day the sutors are still the predominant craft in the town, and not long ago one whole street was filled with them; whence the popular rhyme—

"Sutors aye, sutors twa, Sutors in the Back Row !"

which, being cried at the top of one's voice in the said street, was sufficient to bring sutors, sutors' wives, and sutors' bairns, and all that ever lay in sutors' arms, out like a nest of hornets, and the offender would alone have to thank his heels if he escaped as comfortable a lapidation as any man could desire to have his bones blessed withal, on a summer's day.¹

The famous battle of Philiphaugh, which completely ruined the cause of Charles I. in Scotland, was fought in the immediate vicinity of Selkirk. The scene of the battle is a large level plain upon the northern side of the Ettrick, which here makes a large sweep to the southward and winds almost beneath the lofty bank on which the town of Selkirk stands. On this plain Montrose posted his infantry, and, for their protection, threw up some trenches on each flank, which are still visible. He himself took up his quarters in the town of Selkirk along with the cavalry, in such a state of security, that he is said to have employed the night before the battle in writing to the king that he had not a single armed enemy in Scotland. Meanwhile, General Leslie, who had been recalled from England by the danger of the parliamentary cause, was already within a few miles of his camp, and taking advantage of a thick mist, he advanced next morning towards Philiphaugh without being descried by a single scout. The surprisal was complete. The first intimation that Montrose received of the presence of his enemy was the noise of the conflict. Throwing himself upon a horse the instant he heard the firing, he galloped from Selkirk across the Ettrick and made a desperate but fruitless attempt to retrieve the fortune of the day. When all was lost, he fled up Yarrow and over Minch-moor, and never drew bridle till he arrived at Traquair, sixteen miles from the field of battle. As the fugitives found refuge in the mountains which were impervious to the victorious cavalry, the number slain in the field did not exceed three or four hundred. But the Royalists were completely broken and dispersed, and were never again able to make head against their adversaries. It is worthy of notice that this memorable engagement, which terminated the career of Montrose, and decided the fate of the country, was the last field that was fought in Ettrick Forest, the scene of so many bloody actions.

At the head of Philiphaugh, the Yarrow comes out from "Newark's birken bower" to join the Ettrick. At the confluence of these streams about a mile above Selkirk is Carterhaugh, the scene of the fine fairy ballad of "Tamlane." On this haugh, the peasantry point out those electrical rings which superstition supposes to be traces of the fairy revels. Here they allege were placed the stands of milk and of water in which Tamlane was dipped in order to effect his disenchantment, and upon these spoils they affirm the grass will never grow. Miles Cross, where fair Janet waited the arrival of the fairy train, is said to have stood near Bowhill, about half-a-mile from Carterhaugh.

"In no part of Scotland," says Sir Walter Scott,² "has the belief in fairies maintained its ground with more pertinacity than in Selkirkshire, ("the Forest.") The most sceptical among the lower ranks only venture to assert that their appearances and mischievous exploits have ceased, or at least become infrequent, since the light of the gospel was diffused in its purity. One of their frolics is said to have happened late in the last century. The victim of elfin sport was a poor man, who being employed in pulling leather upon Peatlaw, a hill not far from Carterhaugh, had tired of his labour and laid him down to sleep upon a fairy ring. When he awakened he was amazed to find himself in the midst of a populous city, to which, as well as to the means of his transportation, he was an utter stranger. His coat was left upon the Peatlaw, and his bonnet, which had fallen off in the course of his aerial journey, was afterwards found hanging upon the steeple of the church of Lanark. The distress of the poor man was in some degree relieved by meeting a carrier whom he had formerly known, and who conducted him back to Selkirk by a slower conveyance than had whirled him to Glasgow."

In December, 1815, Carterhaugh was the scene of a famous football match between the men of Yarrow, headed by the Earl of Home, with the Ettrick Shepherd as his lieutenant, and the sutors of Selkirk, commanded by their chief magistrate, Mr. Clarkson. The Duke of Buccleuch, with the principal gentry of "The Forest," and an immense concourse of spectators, assembled on Carterhaugh to witness the match. The ancient banner of the Buccleuch family, a curious and venerable relique, emblazoned with armorial bearings, and with the word "Bellendaine," the ancient war-cry of the clan Scott, which was always displayed when the chief took the field in person, whether for the purpose of war or sport, was carried on the occasion by the eldest son of Sir Walter Scott, who rode over the field suitably mounted and armed. This singular renewal of an ancient military custom was celebrated in Scott's "Lifting of the Banner."

"From the brown crest of Newark its summons extending,

Our signal is waving in smoke and in flame,
And each forester blythe, from his mountain descending,

Bounds light o'er the heather to join in the game ;

(1) Chambers' Picture of Scotland, vol. i. p. 146.

(2) Border Minstrelsy. Introduction to the Tale of Tamlane.

Then up with the banner! let forest winds fan her!
She has blazed over Ettrick eight ages and more;
In sport we'll attend her, in battle defend her,
With heart and with hand like our fathers before;" &c.

and in an excellent ditty by Hogg, entitled "The Ettrick Garland to the Ancient Banner of the House of Buocleuch"—

"And hast thou here like hermit grey
Thy mystic characters unroll'd
O'er peaceful revellers to play,
Thou emblem of the days of old?
All hail! memorial of the brave,
The liegemen's pride, the border's awe!
May thy grey pennon never wave
On sterner field than Carterhaugh!" &c.

The vale of Yarrow parts off from the head of Philiphaugh towards the right, that of Ettrick towards the left. Turning up the latter, which at this place is bare and uninteresting, the first object worthy of notice that occurs is Oakwood, a tall tower perched on the top of a steep bank on the south side of the Ettrick. Oakwood, which has from time immemorial been the property of the Scotts of Harden, is believed to have been the residence of Walter Scott, the hero of the pathetic ballad called "The Dowie Dens of Yarrow." It is supposed also to have been the mansion of the famous wizard, Michael Scott, whose magical exploits are so vividly portrayed in the Lay of the Last Minstrel,¹ and the remembrance of which still lingers among the superstitious legends of the Scottish peasantry. Two or three miles further up the glen stands the village of Ettrick-brigend, which presents nothing worthy of notice; and about six miles further up are the ruins of the tower of Tushielaw, upon the brae which rises from the north bank of the river, opposite to the spot where the Rankleburn joins the Ettrick. This important border fortress was the property of a branch of the powerful clan Scott, and in 1539, when James V. undertook that memorable expedition through Ettrick Forest and the adjoining districts which proved fatal to so many of the border marauders, Tushielaw was the residence of Adam Scott, who was so distinguished a freebooter that he was usually called the King of the Border. But James, after executing summary vengeance upon Cockburn of Henderland, another celebrated reiver, crossed the hills into Ettrick, surprised the laird of Tushielaw before intimation could be sent him of his danger, and hanged him before his own gate. The elm-tree on which the unlucky freebooter so appropriately terminated his career, still exists among the ruins of the castle. It is called the gallows-tree, and according to tradition, the King of the Border was in the habit of summarily suspending from it the unfortunate vassals, who incurred his royal displeasure. This popular story is confirmed by the fact that along the principal branches of the tree, there are yet visible a number of nicks or hollows, over which the ropes had been drawn with which the savage chief performed his numerous executions.

Opposite to the ruins of Tushielaw, the vale of Rankleburn recedes back into the dense mass of hills. In this vale is the lonely farm of Buocleuch, supposed to have been the original property of the chiefs of the Scott clan, and here it is alleged

"Old Buocleuch the name did gain,
When in the cleuch the buck was ta'en."

A tradition preserved by Scott of Satchells gives the following romantic origin of that name. Two brothers, natives of Galloway, having been banished from that country for a riot or insurrection, came to Rankleburn in Ettrick Forest, where the keeper, whose name was Brydone, received them joyfully on account of their skill in winding the horn, and in the other mysteries of the chase. Kenneth M'Alpin, then king of Scotland, came soon after to hunt in the Royal Forest, and pursued a buck from Ettrickhaugh to the glen now called Buocleuch, about two miles above the junction of Rankleburn with the river Ettrick. Here the stag stood at bay, and the king and his attendants, who followed on horseback, were thrown out by the steepness of the hill and the morass. John, one of the brothers from Galloway, had followed the chase on foot; and now coming in, seized the buck by the horns, and being a man of great strength and activity, threw him on his back, and ran with his burden a mile up a steep hill to a place called Cracca-cross, where Kenneth had halted, and laid the buck at the sovereign's feet.

"The deer being curce'd in that place

At his Majesty's demand,
Then John of Galloway ran apace,
And fetched water to his hand.

The king did wash into a dish,

And Galloway John he wot:

He said 'Thy name now, after this,
Shall ever be called John Scott.

"The forest and the deer therein,

We commit to thy hand;

For thou shalt sure the ranger be,

If thou obey command.

And for the buck thou stoutly brought

To us up that steep heuch;

Thy designation ever shall Be, John Scott in Buck's-cleuch."

In allusion, it is said, to this incident, the Buocleuch arms formerly bore a hunting-horn, and had a hound and a buck for supporters.² In the fastnesses of this remote wilderness, where scarcely a human habitation is now to be seen, and where no voice is to be heard but the occasional bleating of the flocks, or the whirr of the heathcock, or the scream of the plover, "the Scotts,"

"A hardy race who never shrink from war,
Here fix'd his mountain home—a wide domain,
And rich the soil, had purple heath been grain."

Proceeding onward along the banks of the stream, we perceive the ruins of the old baronial castle of Thirlestane, and close beside it, the modern mansion of the same name; the residence of Lord Napier. This nobleman, whose judicious and most praiseworthy exertions have literally converted the wilderness into a

(1) Canto II. St. 13 See also notes.

(2) Lay of the Last Minstrel, Canto VI. St. 8 and notes.

fruitful field, is a lineal representative of the old family of the Scotts of Thirlestane, and some antiquaries of no mean authority consider him as now the male representative of Buccleuch. He has succeeded to the title of Napier by maternal right. Sir John Scott, his lordship's paternal ancestor, who flourished in the reign of James V., was honourably distinguished for his fidelity to his sovereign, when that unfortunate monarch was deserted by all the rest of his turbulent nobility. When James had mustered the military array of the kingdom at Fala with the purpose of invading England, and was, as is well known, disappointed by the obstinate refusal of his peers, Sir John Scott alone declared himself ready to follow the king wherever he should lead. In memory of his fidelity, James granted to his family a charter of arms entitling them to bear a border of fleurs-de-luce similar to the tressure in the royal arms, with a bundle of spears for the crest; motto, "Ready, aye ready."¹ The grandfather of the present peer was notorious for a certain nervous sidget, as to all points of form, as well became, perhaps, an old Lord of the Bedchamber and High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Kirk. An amusing instance of his lordship's precision in small matters is mentioned by Lockhart, in his Life of Sir Walter Scott. Lord and Lady Napier had arrived at Castlemilk in Lanarkshire, with the intention of staying a week with Lady Stewart; but next morning, it was announced that a circumstance had occurred which rendered it indispensable for them to return without delay to their own seat in Selkirkshire. It was impossible for Lady Stewart to extract any further explanation at the moment; but it turned out afterwards that Lord Napier's valet had committed the grievous mistake of packing up a set of neckcloths which did not correspond in point of date with the shirts they accompanied. It was owing to this worthy nobleman, who was Lord Lieutenant of Selkirkshire, that Sir Walter Scott, who held the office of sheriff of the county, became a resident on Tweedside.

About a mile beyond Thirlestane stands Ettrick Kirk, with its little hamlet, the birth-place of the Ettrick Shepherd. The surrounding hills are lofty and dark, and the loneliness of the scene is almost painfully impressive. In the beginning of last century, the minister of this parish was the celebrated Thomas Boston, one of the brightest ornaments of the Church of Scotland, whose writings have exercised a powerful influence on the character of the Scottish people, and still form a portion of the household volumes of the peasantry, who hold his memory in the greatest reverence.

Crossing the hills which bound the vale of Ettrick on the right, we descend over the Merecleuch head, into the vale of Yarrow, by a scarcely visible track termed the King's road, supposed to be the route by which James V. invaded this wild district in his memorable justiciary excursion, so well remembered in tradition and song, for its unsparring severity. At the head of the vale is the celebrated sheet of water called St. Mary's Loch, the western extremity of which is connected, by a stream of only a few hundred yards in length, with a smaller lake called the Loch of the Lowes. On the peninsula between the two lakes stands a small hostelry which bears the name of its landlady, Tibby Shiels, whose agreeable country fare and moderate charges render her comfortable little mansion a favourite resort of anglers and sportsmen, who resort here in great numbers during the summer and autumn months. "It is hardly possible," says an experienced tourist, "to conceive anything more truly delightful than a week's ruralizing in this pleasant spot, with the means of so much amusement at the very doors, and so many interesting objects of sight and sentiment lying closely around." The whole district is redolent of the Great Minstrel—his writings, and the incidents of his life. St. Mary's Loch, and the Loch of the Lowes, were among the most favourite scenes of his excursions with his friends, and his fondness for them continued to the end of his life. A few miles to the westward is the "dark Loch Skene," a mountain lake of considerable size, pre-eminent over all the lakes of the south of Scotland for the impressive gloom and sterility that surround it. The stream which forms its outlet, after a short and hurried course, falls from a cataract of great height and gloomy grandeur, called, from its appearance, the Grey Mare's Tail. The savage and solitary character of the surrounding scenery is graphically described in the introduction to the second canto of Marmion; and it was the scene of one of the earliest excursions which the author, during his residence at Ashiestiel, made with Mr. Skene, Sir Adam Ferguson, and the Ettrick Shepherd. "In our ascent to the lake," says Mr. Skene, "we got completely bewildered in the thick fog which generally envelopes the rugged features of that lonely region; and as we were passing through the maze of bogs, the ground gave way, and down came horse and horsemen, pellmell into a slough of peaty mud and black water, out of which, entangled as we were with our plaids and floundering nags, it was no easy matter to get extricated. Indeed, unless we had prudently left our gallant steeds at a farmhouse below, and borrowed hill ponies for the occasion, the result might have been more than laughable. As it was, we rose like the spirits of the bog covered cap-à-pie with slime, to free themselves from which our wily ponies took to rolling about on the heather, and we had nothing for it but following their example. At length, as we approached the gloomy loch, a huge eagle heaved himself from the margin and rose right over us, screaming his scorn of the intruders, and altogether it would be impossible to picture anything more desolately savage than the scene which opened as if raised by enchantment, on purpose to gratify the poet's eye; thick folds of fog rolling incessantly over the face of the ink waters, but rent asunder, now in one direction and then in another, so as to afford us a glimpse of some projecting rock or naked point of land or island bearing a few craggy stumps of pine, and then closing again in universal darkness upon the cheerless waste. Much of the scenery of Old Mortality was drawn from that day's ride." Among the wild and savage mountains so strikingly described by Mr. Skene, the sturdy champions of the Covenant found an asylum when they were chased like wild beasts by a ruthless persecution, from every other part of the country.

(1) See Lay of the Last Minstrel, Canto IV. St. 8.

Passing round the head of St. Mary's Loch, we cross the Megget, an excellent trout stream, which here falls into the lake. A short way up the vale are the remains of Henderland Castle, once the property of Cockburn, a celebrated border freebooter, who was hanged over the gate of his own tower by James V. in the course of that memorable expedition in 1529, which was fatal to Johnnie Armstrong, Adam Scott of Tushielaw, and many other marauders. Tradition says that Cockburn was surprised by the king while sitting at dinner. A message was sent in, requesting him to come out and "speak to a gentleman." The reply was, that the laird was at dinner, and could not come out. A second and more pressing message was despatched, and a similar but more surly reply was returned. On the third message being sent in, Cockburn cried in a rage, that he would not come out for even "the Laird o' Ballengeich himsel'." The royal messenger was then sent in to order Cockburn to come out to the Laird o' Ballengeich. On hearing these terrible words, the poor man went out like a condemned criminal, and was immediately hung up over his own gate. Meanwhile, Marjory his wife leaped out at a back window, and ran to a sequestered recess in the glen, where a small stream called the Henderland Burn falls over a rocky chasm. Here she found a place of concealment till the king and his party were gone. The waterfall is called the Dow-Linn, and the place is designated the Lady's Seat, where she is said to have striven to drown, amidst the noise of the falling waters, the shouts which announced the close of her husband's existence. The following beautiful and pathetic ballad, called "The Lament of the Border Widow," is said to have been composed on this tragic incident.

"My love he built me a bonny bower,
And clad it a' wi' lilye flour;
A brawer bower ye ne'er did see,
Than my true love he built for me.

"There came a man by middle day,
He spied his sport, and went away;
And brought the king that very night,
Who brake my bower, and slew my knight.

"He slew my knight, to me sae dear;
He slew my knight, and poin'd his gear;
My servants all for life did flee,
And left me in extremitee.

"I sew'd his sheet, making my mane;
I watched the corpse, myself alane;
I watched his body, in the auld day;
No living creature came that way.

(1) King James V. was in the habit of sojourning incognito among his subjects under the title of "the Laird of Ballengeich," taken from a place near Stirling Castle.

(2) Poinded, attacked by legal distress.

"I took his body on my back,
And whiles I gaed, and whiles I satte;
I digg'd a grave, and laid him in,
And happ'd him with the sod sae green.

"But think na ye my heart was sair,
When I laid the moul' on his yellow hair?
O think na ye my heart was was,
When I turn'd about, away to gae!

"Nae living man I'll love again,
Since that my lovely knight is slain;
Wi' ae lock of his yellow hair
I'll chain my heart for evermair.

In a deserted burial-place which once surrounded the chapel of the castle, the grave of this unhappy couple is denoted by a large stone bearing the following half-obliterated inscription:—

HERE LYES PERYS OF COCKBURNE, AND HIS WYFE MARJORY.

The adjacent country, which now hardly bears a single tree, is celebrated by Lesley as in his time affording shelter to the largest stags in Scotland.

Continuing our journey along the margin of the loch, we pass a miniature church, picturesquely situated on a rising ground commanding a beautiful view of the lake. About half a mile further on, and about the same distance from the road, is the ancient burying-ground of St. Mary's Kirk, but the church has long ago disappeared.

"But though, in feudal strife, a foe
Has laid Our Lady's chapel low,
Yet still beneath the hallow'd soil
The peasant rests him from his toil,
And dying, bids his bones be laid
Where erst his simple fathers prayed."

At a short distance to the north of the burying-ground is the grave of Mass John Birnam, the former tenant of the chapelry—

"That wizard priest, whose bones are thrust
From company of holy dust."

The most conspicuous of the simple monuments in this small but interesting burial-place, commemorates the virtues of the late Rev. Walter Grieve of Ettrick,—"the best model," says Chambers, "of an old Anti-Revolution Divine that Scotland shall ever see in these latter degenerate days, who after railing against popery for sixty years with a zeal and energy in which there was no affectation, was by a singular chance interred in the very chancel of St. Mary's Kirk, and, consequently, amid the ashes of its former Popish incumbents." This worthy old clergyman, who was a very good man and had a most venerable and apostolical benignity of aspect, was a preacher of the Cameronian sect, and long ministered to a very small remnant of "the hill-folk," scattered among the wilds of Ettrick. He at one time thought of occupying a cottage on the Abbotsford estate, greatly to the satisfaction of its proprietor: but the project was never realized. "I cannot tell you," says Scott in a letter to his friend Willie Laidlaw, who was Mr. Grieve's nephew, "how delighted I am with the account Hogg gives me of Mr. Grieve. The great Cameron was chaplain in the house of my great-something grandfather, and so I hope Mr. Grieve will be mine. If, as the King of Prussia said to Rousseau, 'a little persecution is necessary to make his home entirely to his mind,' he shall have it, and, what persecutors seldom promise, I will stop whenever he is tired of it. I have a pair of thumbkins also much at his service, if he requires their assistance to glorify God and the Covenant."

From the elevated spot on which the burial-place is situated, a remarkably fine view is obtained of "lone St. Mary's silent lake." The description which Sir Walter Scott gives, both of the loch and of the scenery which surrounds it, is exquisitely true to nature:—

"—nor fen nor sedge
Pollute the pure lake's crystal edge.
Abrupt and sheer the mountains sink
At once upon the level brink;
And just a trace of silver sand
Marks where the water meets the land.
Far in the mirror bright and blue,
Each hill's huge outline you may view;
Shaggy with heath, but lonely, bare,
Nor tree, nor bush, nor brake is there,
Save where of land yon slender line
Bears 'thwart the lake the scattered pine.
Yet even this nakedness has power,
And aids the feeling of the hour;
Nor thicket, dell, nor copse you spy,
Where living thing conceal'd might lie;
There's nothing left to fancy's guess,
You see that all is loneliness:
And silence aids—though the steep hills
Send to the lake a thousand rills;
In summer tide so soft they weep,
The sound but lulls the ear asleep;
Your horse's hoof-tread sounds too rude,
So stillly is the solitude."¹

The whole scene indeed is wild and lonely in the extreme, and there are few who have visited this famous spot who will not sympathize with the feelings expressed by Sir Walter Scott in a letter to Joanna Baillic. "I assure you," says he, "I have felt really oppressed with a sort of fearful loneliness, when looking around the naked and towering ridges of desolate barrenness which is all the eye takes in from such a height; the patches of cultivation being all hidden in the little glens and valleys, or only appearing to make one sensible how feeble and inefficient the efforts of art have been to contend with the genius of the soil. It is in such a scene, that the unknown author of a fine but unequal poem, called Albania, places the remarkable superstition which consists in hearing the noise of a chase, with the baying of the hounds, the throttling sobs of the deer, the halloos of a numerous band of huntsmen, and the 'hoofs thick beating on the hollow hill.'"

The scene is indeed indelibly associated with the recollections of Scott, and there were few of his visitors whom he delighted to honour, who did not pay it a visit under his guidance. Skene, Morritt, Washington Irving, Davy, all speak with delight of their excursions to Yarrow Braes and St. Mary's Loch—their illustrious guide repeating every ballad or legendary tale connected with the scenery.

"During the month of August, 1823, one of the happiest in Scott's life," says his biographer, "Miss Edgeworth spent a fortnight at Abbotsford, and Sir Walter must needs show her, not Newark only, but all the upper scenery of the Yarrow, where 'fair hangs the apple frae the rock,' and the baskets were unpacked about sunset, beside the ruined chapel overlooking St. Mary's Loch—and he had scrambled to gather blue-bells and heath-flowers, with which all the young ladies must twine their hair—and they sang, and he recited, until it was time to go home beneath the softest of harvest moons."

Reluctantly quitting this fascinating spot, we resume our ramble round the lake. Near its eastern extremity, where the Yarrow issues from it, are the ruins of the old tower of Dryhope, the birth-place of Mary Scott, celebrated in song by the title of the "Flower of Yarrow." She was married to the famous "Wat of Harden," whose character and marauding exploits have been commemorated by his illustrious descendant in the "Lay of the Last Minstrel." By their marriage contract, the father-in-law, Philip Scott of Dryhope, was to find Harden in horse-meat and man's meat at his tower of Dryhope for a year and a day, but five barons pledged themselves, that at the expiry of that period the son-in-law should remove, without attempting to continue in possession by force—a caution strikingly illustrative of the times and of the character of the contracting parties. In the vicinity are the remains of a very ancient tower, called Blackhouse, standing in a wild and solitary glen upon the Douglas-burn, a mountain torrent which joins the Yarrow after passing a craggy rock called the Douglas Craig. This wild spot, now a part of the Traquair estate, formed one of the most ancient possessions of the renowned family of Douglas, and is said by popular tradition to be the scene of the fine old ballad of "The Douglas Tragedy." Seven large stones, erected upon the neighbouring heights, are shown as marking the place where the seven brethren were slain, and the Douglas-burn is averred to have been the stream at which the lovers stopped to drink: so minute is tradition in ascertaining the scene of a tragical tale which, considering the rude state of former times, had probably foundation in some real event.² Our readers will perhaps learn with greater interest, that the farm-house which stands adjacent to the old tower, was the early home of Scott's dear friend, William Laidlaw, and that James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, spent ten years of his life at Blackhouse, in the service of Mr. Laidlaw's father. Lockhart says he has the best reason to believe that the kind and manly character of Dandie Dinmont in "Guy Mannering," the gentle and delicious one of his wife, and some at least of the most picturesque peculiarities of the menage at Charleshope, were filled up from Scott's observation of the Laidlaw family, with whom he first became acquainted in one of his early ballad-hunting excursions among the braes of Yarrow. The Ettrick Shepherd spent the greater part of his somewhat chequered life in this vicinity. Altrieve, where he died, stands at a short distance on the opposite bank of the Yarrow. He obtained the gratuitous life-rent of this small farm from the late Duke of Buccleuch; but, says one who knew him well, "he could not withstand the attractions of Edinburgh, which carried him away from Altrieve for months every year, and when at home, a warm and hospitable disposition made him convert his cottage into an unpaid hostelry for the reception of endless troops of thoughtless admirers; and thus, spite of much help and much forbearance, he was never out of one set of pecuniary difficulties before he had begun to weave the meshes of some fresh entanglement. In pace requiescat. There will never be such an Etttrick Shepherd again!"

(2) Canto IV. St. 2.

(3) Border Minstrelsy, Part II. The Douglas Tragedy.

(1) Marmion: Introduction to Canto II.

Our route now lies along the northern bank of the Yarrow, and through the midst of that famous vale which has been the subject of more verse than Tcmpe itself. There is hardly a cottage in it that has not its legend, or a cleugh that is not famed for some act of romantic chivalry, or tenanted by some supernatural being, or sanctified by the blood of some martyr. The oldest of the poetical effusions on this celebrated district is the ballad entitled "The Dowie Dens of Yarrow," which commemorates a duel being fought between John Scott, of Tushielaw, and his brother-in-law, Walter Scott, third son of Robert Scott of Thirlestane, in which the latter was slain. The alleged cause of the quarrel was the lady's father having proposed to endow her with the half of his property, upon her marriage with a warrior of such renown. Two tall unhewn stones, standing at the distance of a hundred yards from each other to the west of Yarrow Kirk, commemorate the fatal scene. The traditions and beauties of Yarrow have also been celebrated by Hamilton of Bangour, and by Logan, and in still later times, by Wordsworth, in his three exquisite poems, "Yarrow Unvisited," "Yarrow Visited," and "Yarrow Revisited."

"Where was it," says he, in the second of these poems—

"that the famous Flower
Of Yarrow Vale lay bleeding?
His bed, perchance, was yon smooth mound,
On which the herd is feeding;
And haply from this crystal pool,
Now peaceful as the morning,
The water wraith ascended thrice
And gave his doleful warning.

Delicious is the Lay that sings
The haunts of happy lovers,
The path that leads them to the grave,
The leafy grove that covers;
And pity sanctifies the verse
That paints by strength of sorrow
The unconquerable strength of love;
Bear witness rueful Yarrow.

That region left, the vale unfolds
Rich groves of lofty stature,
With Yarrow winding through the pomp
Of cultivated nature;
And rising from those lofty groves,
Behold a Ruin hoary,
The shattered front of Newark's Towers.
Renowned in Border story.

Fair scenes for childhood's opening bloom,
For sportive youth to stray in,
For manhood to enjoy his strength,
And age to wear away in."

In the lower part of the vale, as Wordsworth intimates, the Yarrow winds among hills of no great height, gently swelling and green to the summits, in some places finely wooded, but generally naked, and well suited to the pasture of flocks. At the mouth of the vale Newark Castle rears its grey massive form; and with the dark-wooded hills, rising closely around on both sides, has an appearance truly striking and romantic. It occupies an eminence overhanging the Yarrow, opposite to the farm of Foulshiels, the birth-place of Mungo Park, the celebrated African traveller. According to tradition, it was in the court-yard of this castle that Leslie, the victor at Philiphaugh, abused his victory and tarnished his arms, by slaughtering in cold blood many of the prisoners whom he had taken. Adjoining the castle is a little mount covered with trees, where according to tradition the hero of "The Sang of the Outlaw Murray" was slain by Buccleuch, or some of his clan. Anne, Duchess of Buccleuch and Monmouth, is said to have been brought up in this castle, and for this reason, probably, "the Great Minstrel of the Border" has chosen to make it the scene in which the "Lay of the Last Minstrel" is recited in her presence and for her amusement. All around are the scenes commemorated in that delightful poem: "Sweet Bowhill," a seat of the Duke of Buccleuch, Newark-heath, Harewoodshaw, Carterhaugh, and "Blackandro's oak." Blackandro and Newark-heath were the scene of the Abbotsford hunt in 1820, so graphically described by Lockhart, when the venerable author of "The Man of Feeling," spectated though he was, saw the first sitting hare, gave the word to slip the dogs, and spurred after them like a boy; and Sir Humphry Davy plunged neck-deep into a treacherous well-head, which, till his horse was floundering in it, had borne all the appearance of a piece of delicate green turf. When Sir Humphry emerged from his involuntary bath, his habiliments garnished with mud, slime, and mangled water-cresses, Sir Walter received him with a triumphant encore! But the philosopher had his revenge, for, joining soon afterwards in a brisk gallop, Scott put Sibyl Grey to a leap beyond her prowess, and lay humbled in the ditch, while Davy, who was better mounted, cleared it and him at a bound.

A little way below "Newark's stately tower," the Yarrow flows out from its "birchen bower" to join the Etttrick; and having thus completed the circuit of "The Forest," we retrace our steps to the ancient burgh of Selkirk, repeating, as we pass along, the verses of Wordsworth:—

"Flow on for ever, Yarrow stream
Fulfil thy pensive duty,
Well pleas'd that future bard should chant,
For simple hearts, thy beauty:
To dream-light dear, while yet unseen,
Dear to the common sunshine,
And dearer still, as now I feel,
To memory's shadowy moonshine!"

• SUCCESS AND FAILURE.

THERE is a pleasant story told in "Trusler's Memoirs," apropos of the idolatrous respect for riches which forms so prominent a feature in the English character, and of the habit which has so long prevailed amongst us of estimating the moral and intellectual status of the man according to the amount of his worldly substance. "This sordid habit of thinking," says the writer, "was finely hit off by a keen fellow of a neighbouring nation, who had carried on business in London and failed. Sitting in a coffee-house one day, when a few wealthy citizens were discussing some money concerns, and observing him very attentive, one person turned aside and said to him, 'What's your opinion, sir, of the matter?' 'S' blood, sir,' returned he, peevishly, 'what opinion can a man have in this country who has not a guinea in his pocket?'"

Since the period when this incident was supposed to have occurred our national idolatry of wealth has certainly not diminished. To make the advice worth anything it is still held that the adviser should have the guinea in his pocket. Nay, we fear, that the highest wisdom, if found in company with low estate and penury, would now have less chance than ever of being recognised or heeded. Who that has any experience of the world's ways has not often felt the especial applicability to our own times of the pungent truth which a modern dramatist, peculiarly distinguished for his clear-sighted practical wisdom, has put into the mouth of a calculating politician?

"Prosperity

Is warranty of wisdom with the world;
Failure is foolishness."

With the thoroughly worldly-minded, (and what a large class of human beings may be included under that designation?) success will sanction anything; will affix the stamp of respectability on the most disreputable doings, and magnify the most transparent folly into the highest wisdom. But having, for our own part, occasionally taken the liberty of differing from the world, that is, from the mass of men and women who think and act in multitudes without reference to individual feeling or opinion, we have thought fit to investigate for ourselves the ordinary causes of prosperity and failure; and, as the result of our investigations, we venture to present the reader with two or three sketches from life, which we doubt not may be easily paralleled by similar instances within every one's experience. We will only add that they tend to confirm the notion which we had long since formed, that the most prosperous people are not always the most deserving, and that failures are frequently made by the very best, most estimable, and most intelligent of mankind.

Our friend Ralph Heywood has failed at the bar, though few aspirants to forensic distinction have started with more flattering prospects of success. He began with a brilliant career at the University; worked hard afterwards as a law student; patiently attended the chambers of an eminent conveyancer, and of a no less distinguished special-pleader; and was called to the Bar amidst the favourable prognostics of admiring friends, who knew his abilities, and who loved him for his modesty, worth, and genius. He had unfortunately no private income, and it may be asserted that he had little prudence; for as soon as he thought his bark was fairly launched upon the world's waters, he married an amiable but portionless girl, who loved him with her whole heart and soul, and looked up to him as a paragon of greatness and perfection. But when every one about him prophesied success—when he knew that he should do all in his power to deserve it—and when he reflected on his powers of endurance, and his professional and other attainments—how natural in a young man of twenty-six were those feelings of buoyant, overweening confidence! How cowardly would it have been to have yielded to "the saucy doubts and fears" which assailed him on the threshold of fame! Heywood is now an Australian emigrant, far from his English friends, and cut off for ever from the alluring prospects of his early manhood. His tale is soon told. With all his ability, he found the avenues to business closed against him. Anxious for employment, and requiring a provision for the passing hour, his heart soon sickened with disappointments and hope deferred. He had too modest and sensitive a spirit, and too delicate notions of propriety, to force himself on by the coarse expedients resorted to by meaner minds, and he was neglected by those who had promised patronage and support. As month passed after month, and year after year, his difficulties thickened, his mind lost its cheerful and healthful tone, and he became known amongst his friends as a failure. For some time a reportership on a legal periodical formed almost his sole means of subsistence, and the future appeared to him so dark and lowering, and fraught with such formidable dangers, that he made up his mind to withdraw from his profession and try his fortune elsewhere and in other pursuits.

Although, strictly speaking, poor Heywood had had no chance, (or even the ghost of it,) many shrewd reasons were given by his worldly-minded friends for his want of success. His manifold accomplishments were spoken of as impediments to his progress, and he was accused (heaven knows with little reason!) of haughtiness and reserve. Above all, his imprudent marriage was strenuously condemned, and it was hinted that if he had married a few thousands, instead of a girl without a penny, or, still better, had allied himself to the daughter of some metropolitan attorney in decent practice, his fate would have been very different. Perhaps in this last conjecture his friends were right; but whatever they may say or think, we make bold to state, that amidst all his difficulties and embarrassments the one act of his life which Heywood has never regretted is his aforesaid marriage. In his bitterest hours of tribulation and disappointment, his affectionate wife supported and consoled him with cheerful and hopeful prophecies of better days, and, unchanged by their reverses, at the present moment she gladdens with her smile his distant place of exile, and is more to him, as he daily feels, than friends or country, or even satisfied ambition could have been.

(1) "Philip van Artevelde," by H. Taylor. Part II. Act V. Sc. 2.

Robert Somers, as we choose to call him, (another gifted and valued friend of ours,) may be also numbered amongst the world's failures, though we know of no one worthier of success, or who worked harder for it. He was characterised from boyhood by unceasing activity of mind, by an ardent and earnest spirit, and above all by that quality of self-reliance which is so often the distinguishing attribute of genius. We remember, and not without a pang of sympathy, his youth of self-denying industry; how intensely he applied himself to studies of the abstruser sort; how patiently and firmly he "shunned delights and lived laborious days," sedulously avoiding the most innocent amusements, and even the society of congenial friends. Nor was Somers a mere plodder. Every one who was brought into contact with him traced in his remarks the force of original genius, and it was prophesied by all who knew him that he would make a figure in the world. We thought so ourselves, and to this day firmly believe that he ought to have succeeded in the path—perilous as it was—which his ambition had marked out for him. The success of a few early attempts induced him to look on literature as his proper vocation, and we were not surprised at his resolution. His tastes, habits, character, and attainments eminently qualified him, we believed, for a distinguished position in the world of letters, and we thought that the day was not far distant when he would be numbered amongst the intellectual luminaries of the nation.

How it happened we know not, but we lost sight of Somers for several years. One gloomy November day our own avocations took us to that great resort and rendezvous of the literary tribe, the Reading Room of the British Museum. The day was too dark and foggy for ordinary readers to pursue their researches with convenience, and the place was nearly deserted. At a very early hour in the afternoon the deepening shadows put an end to our labours, and we rose to depart. Only three or four readers then remained; a few attendants were listlessly awaiting the hour of closing; and an air of melancholy sadness pervaded the place,—a dreary, awful stillness, which was only broken by the sound of a solitary pen travelling over paper at a rapid pace. An irresistible impulse led us to turn towards the spot from whence the sound proceeded; and looming through the darkness we beheld the figure of a man, apparently still busily engaged, in the dim twilight, on his daily task. He was sitting within a few yards of us, but bent over his papers in such a way that we could not discern even the outline of his features. At length, seeming to feel that we were watching him, he raised his face,—a wan, haggard, solemn face it was, with a gentle and patient expression, which smote us to the heart. Half ashamed of our impertinent curiosity, we were hastily departing, when the same feeling which had influenced us at first, induced us to turn back for the purpose of taking a parting glance at the form and features which had so mysteriously interested us. By this time he had risen from his seat, and was arranging his books and papers with a sigh, as though he regretted that the premature twilight had interrupted his labours. We saw that his apparel was mean—even shabby—that his frame was bent, and his face pale and sickly; and so powerfully did his appearance appeal to our sympathies and compassion that we felt we could have given worlds to speak a few kind words to him. Nevertheless, we should have certainly passed out without doing so had we not heard his voice, giving some directions to an attendant, in a mild, gentle, patient tone, relative to the books on which he had been employed.

That voice awoke a thousand reminiscences, and broke the spell which bound us. We knew him then: it was Somers,—and in a moment a mutual recognition had taken place. What was he engaged in? we asked. How had the world gone with him? What were his prospects and views in life? He of whom we had prophesied such brilliant things,—who had been destined, as we had believed, to a career of glory and distinction,—of whom we had often thought,—wondering, by the way, that the world brought us no tidings of him through its public channels of information,—what had been his fate and portion? Poor Somers! We hung upon his lips with rapt attention, as he told his simple story. We learned that his talents had been pronounced unmarketable, that he had written works extolled in reviews and appreciated by an intelligent and discriminating few, but which instead of leading to fame and competence entailed on him insolvency and ruin. Deeply versed in every branch of ancient and modern literature, a proficient in mathematical science, and endowed with no ordinary powers of original thought and facility of composition, he had, however, failed to command the attention of the public, and to secure the patronage of publishers. The latter found that there was no magic in his name; his productions—some of them most elaborate and careful works—remained on his hands, unpurchased and unpublished; and with a heavy heart he was constrained to look around him for some occupation which would furnish him with the means of daily subsistence.

A mathematical tutorship in a school was the first thing that offered; beneath the drudgery of which his spirit soon gave way, and he sank into a state of hopeless despondency. Loss of animal spirits was soon followed by the loss of health, and he wasted away under the insidious attacks of a "grievous slow-consuming maldy," which unfitted him for constant employment. Again, from sheer necessity, he reverted to the literary profession; no longer, indeed, as an original author, but as a bookseller's hack and drudge of all work. He was now busily engaged on the translation of a German work, for which he was to be paid at the liberal rate of seven shillings per sheet. "It's hard work," he said, "in my state of health and spirits, to finish three sheets a-week: last week I managed to do but one,—and it will soon be all over with me. I have struggled manfully. My career is unstained by any mean or unworthy action: would that all those who have outstripped me in the race could say as much!" His flushed face and ghastly smile, as he uttered these words, revealed to us the fate which awaited him; and as we grasped his hand at parting we thought how very possible it was that our friend's want of worldly success might be partly traced to that unaccommodating integrity of heart and soul, which, however much it might have impeded his progress to fame and affluence, had ennobled and supported him in all the vicissitudes of fortune.

But, since it may be urged that the cases we have cited are of rather an exceptional nature, let us turn to the more beaten paths of life for another instance of undeserved failure. Our two friends, the barrister and the man of letters, may be said to have looked too high, to have miscalculated their means and opportunities of making a figure in the world, and hence disappointment, heart-burning, and ultimate ruin. Be it so. Our list of failures is not yet complete, and the next instance which we take the liberty of quoting is certainly not open to the same objection.

Among the friends who, in the course of a not uneventful life, have been brought within the sphere of our intercourse, we have reason to remember a straightforward, intelligent, manly fellow (Philip Stansfield by name), in whose career we were induced from various circumstances to feel a strong interest. When we first knew him, he had just left Christ's Hospital, in which far-famed seminary he had been noted as an assiduous student, and had become the inmate of a home where he was idolized. No wonder:—for he was "the only son of his mother, and she was a widow." Albeit, we can safely testify, that his gentle, unassuming and amiable disposition, would have endeared him to any circle. He was clever, too; sharp, shrewd, inquiring, earnest, diligent in all he undertook, and most desirous of succeeding in the world, for his mother's sake as well as his own. After many consultations with intimate friends, much advice taken, and many questions asked, it was resolved that he should be educated as a surgeon. How faithfully and industriously Philip laboured to acquire a knowledge of his profession, we need not say,—he did all that man could do, and succeeded in passing his examination most creditably; but there his success ended. He went out into the world, and failed. His mother sunk the small capital, on the interest of which she had mainly depended, in the purchase of a country practice in a thriving town in the pleasant county of Surrey, where she was soon settled with her son. That he did not succeed there was no fault of Philip's; but somehow or other the few patients who were attached to the practice he had purchased dropped off one by one; we don't mean to say they all died, but they passed into the hands of other practitioners. The new doctor was intrigued against, slandered, and maligned by jealous rivals, whose vulgar natures were susceptible of no feelings of delicacy or honour. immeasurably superior to his opponents in character, demeanour, and attainments, our friend soon found that he was no match for them in cunning and coarse manoeuvring. The fact was, they felt his superiority, and hated him in proportion to their fears.

Perhaps, if Philip Stansfield had condescended to adopt the policy of his opponents, he would have been in the end victorious; but he pursued the even tenour of his way, consoled by the hope, which amounted almost to a conviction, that the world would do him justice in the long run. Alas for human hopes and expectations! In the long run, perhaps, the highest wisdom must succeed, but a very long run it often is. The most successful of Stansfield's opponents was a Mr. Jonathan Jolter, uniformly designated and described as Doctor Jolter. Jolter was as great a blockhead as ever imposed on the public in the medical or any other profession; but he had amassed a large fortune by a career of successful imposture, had a great many hard words at command, which he used and misused on all occasions, and appeared withal so thoroughly well satisfied with himself, that his demeanour inspired others who knew no better with a marvellous confidence in his wisdom. Now, if Stansfield were summoned to a consultation with Jolter, he found that he had no other means of making his superiority apparent than by denouncing and exposing Jolter's ignorance and presumption, and this he shrank from doing; whilst Jolter, on the other hand, less scrupulous and delicate, would treat him on such occasions with an air of impertinent condescension, and would take care as soon as he had departed, to hint in a private and confidential way, that the young practitioner was a mere pretender, without an atom of experience, and wofully unacquainted with the mechanism of the human frame. Nor was Jolter the only rival who unfairly assailed his reputation. Many sapient sneers were levelled at him by a certain smart young surgeon, who had good family connexions, kept a blood horse, and rode after the hounds, and who called forth many an empty laugh by ridiculing Stansfield's kindness to the poor, and by describing his "foolish" attention to some wretched outcast whom the aforesaid surgeon, in defiance of his duty as the Union doctor, had cruelly neglected.

The last that we heard of our friend was that he had been compelled to quit this unpromising and disagreeable locality, and had established himself in a populous district of the metropolis,—we are sorry to say, sadly reduced in circumstances, and with health and spirits much impaired. His mother died some time since, but Stansfield continues unmarried. He had hoped, indeed, and intended to have married an amiable young woman, to whom he was much attached, but poverty formed a bar to their union, and he shrank from making one whom he loved so tenderly a partaker of his misfortunes. He still works hard, and strives incessantly to retrieve his position. His patients, however, belong to the very poorest and humblest classes; and when they are unable to pay, Philip is not the man to press them harshly, or to forsake them in their need, because he suspects that they have not the means of remunerating him for his services. He has established a small dispensary, where advice is administered by him gratuitously to the very poor, on two days of the week at least, and many a wretched outcast has had reason to bless and thank him. May he be rewarded hereafter for all his unostentatious acts of charity and kindness! In this world, we fear, he must be pronounced a failure.

The instances of undeserved ill-fortune which we have laid before our readers have been selected at random, and present few features that are calculated to surprise the most ordinary observer. It is idle to assert that in this period of feverish and unscrupulous competition, prosperity can be safely regarded as a test of competency and character. The most substantially rewarded men of the age are certainly not those who are in advance of it in point of general intelligence; and the genius which after ages will delight to honour, need not expect to achieve a splendid fortune in its own.

Perhaps it is better that it should be so. Over and over again it has been observed, and observed most truly, that the highest qualities of the mind are better developed by adversity than by prosperity. The former is not only the best of teachers, but the test of true greatness. Nor should the vulgar prosperity which dazzles the eyes and excites the envy of the majority of mankind perplex and disturb the wise and true of heart. Of one thing we are tolerably certain,—that all men are not caught by its superficial glare and glitter, but that a discriminating minority will always exist who rate the gifts of fortune at their true value, and who will be ready to point out to the worshippers of Mammon the quality of the idol to which they bow. "We may see the small value God has for riches," says Pope, in one of his familiar letters, "by the people he gives them to." A more stinging sentence was never penned by the little hunch-back of Twickenham, or by any one else! To conclude. Whilst our readers, we are sure, will acquit us of any wish or intention to foster feelings of discontent, and to encourage impious and insane repinings at the decrees of Providence, we must emphatically repeat that although success is still esteemed by multitudes the only "warranty of wisdom," and though in the opinion of some folks, to be a prosperous man is to be in all respects a reputable and a deserving one, history, biography, and the experience of our daily life concur in proving that not a few of the best and noblest spirits that have adorned humanity have been in their generation numbered amongst the world's failures.

ROSTREVOR.

WE never see a picture or a sketch that brings before our eyes some portion of the lovely scenery to be found in Ireland, but a feeling of sadness arises with the admiration so much natural beauty involuntarily calls forth in the mind. It would seem, if the remark may be made without irreverence, that while Providence has lavished in profusion his richest gifts over the face of the country, so that, like the garden of Eden, man has only to dress and keep it,—scarcely to labour therein,—he has at the same time drawn such a curtain of darkness around it, as to dim and overshadow its loveliness, and mar the enjoyment of its occupants. A land that should bring forth ripe and luscious grapes, to speak metaphorically, brings forth only wild grapes; and broad tracts of land that should be "whitening for the harvest," are left unfurrowed by the ploughshare of industry. In fact, Ireland is like no other country that is, or ever was, in the history of the world—an enigma to the philosopher, a deep problem to the statesman, a melancholy subject of reflection to the philanthropist who would have all men happy and contented, so far as human means can make them. Possessing within itself all the materials for the highest state of civilization, contiguous to nations where such civilization, united with industry and order, is widely manifest, and peopled by inhabitants who have in themselves every faculty for the attainment of national, intellectual, and moral greatness, Ireland is still little more than a green waste, a wilderness where the thorns and briars cover a rich soil, requiring only the hand of the diligent and the careful to become a most fruitful field.

But our object here is not to discuss the social and political condition of the country, a theme that has occupied the pens of far wiser heads than ours have any pretension to be considered; still, we could not avoid writing a few of the thoughts which are ever uppermost in the mind, when aught connected with "ould Erin" comes before us. It is natural when one sees effects that we should look for causes; the connexion between the two is not always so distant as is supposed, and the fountain of evil is often much more easily discovered than purified, even when laid open to the most casual observer.

Mr. Creswick's beautiful little picture of Rosstrevor, which has called up the foregoing remarks, is a view of one of the most picturesque spots in the county of Down, lying on the borders of the Irish Sea, on the north-eastern side of Ireland. The whole of this county is distinguished for its beautiful undulating surface, which in the southern parts rises into magnificent mountains. This peculiar feature is somewhat oddly described in the old Survey of Down, taken in 1740: "The whole county is remarkable for its number of hills, being compared to wooden bowls inverted, or eggs set in salt; from whence it took the name of Down, which signifies a hilly situation." The village of Rosstrevor is not inaptly termed the "Montpelier of Ireland." It lies about seven miles to the right of the high road passing through Newry, from Dublin to Belfast. There are few places in Great Britain that offer stronger temptations to visitors who love the picturesque, enjoy the magnificence of nature, or desire tranquil and healthful retirement. Although completely open to the sea, it is approached only by mild southern breezes; the adjacent hills protect it completely on the north and east, and a promontory, covered with luxuriantly grown trees, sits between it and the west; villas, mansions, and cottages ornées, surround it on all sides, wherever the mountains have left small nooks of verdure; and streamlets innumerable are rippling down into the valley from the hill-sides.

The authors of one of the most entertaining and valuable works upon Ireland and its inhabitants,¹ thus describe a visit to this locality:—"We set out to climb the great hill of Clough Mor, one of the Mourne range; the one that hangs directly over Rosstrevor, sheltering it from all unkindly winds. . . We made our way to the mountain-top. That which from the valley seemed a peak, was a large flat of several acres, covered with wet moss. Immediately below us was the bay, with its innumerable tiny creeks; in one of which, just under shelter of the mountain opposite, lies the pretty town of Carlingford; and to the north, on the other side of a long flat that stretches out into the sea, is the bay, behind which lies the town of Dundrum. Beautiful Rosstrevor seemed as if sleeping at our feet. Behind us were the everlasting hills; and ocean-ward, the sight was arrested for a moment by a shadow upon the waters; this was the Isle of Man, very dimly seen; to the south, the Hill of Howth appeared distinctly. Looking inland, the mountains rose one above another over the bay; and the bay seemed so directly under us, that we fancied a stone thrown from the spot on which we stood, might have fallen into it; opening among the hills was a most rich valley, continued all the way to Lough Neagh, a distance of forty miles; and the lake, or rather a haze which indicates it, is clearly perceptible. In the foreground, carrying the eye beyond Rosstrevor, with the tall spire of its pretty church, the green verdure of its encompassing fields, and the fine foliage of its abundant trees, we trace the course of the river winding up to Newry, with the village of Warrenspoint midway. And still we had the mountains, look where we would, bleak and barren and rudely picturesque, with here and there the brown tracks of footways, and patches of cultivation, marking them as objects which industry was labouring to subdue."

Nothing more need be added to this painter-like description of Rosstrevor, which, with the engraving from Creswick's truthful picture, will convey to the reader as true a character of its scenery as pen and pencil can supply.

(1) "Ireland, its Scenery, Character, &c." Illustrated by Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall. Published by G. Virtue, London.

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.

BY JANE M. WILKINSON.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE RECONCILIATION.

THE door was closed, and they were alone—the father and the son. Had David returned less triumphant—with no victory in this world's battle-field to boast of, no service rendered, and no power to render future services, he would have waited where he stood until his father offered him pardon. As it was, his nice sense of right and generosity made him lay aside all pride. He waited but a moment before he sunk on his knees beside Mr. Underwood, and took his hand, saying,—

"Father! no wealth, no fame, no consciousness of good intention, can compensate to me for the want of your forgiveness, your blessing, and your love."

"Don't talk of forgiveness. My son!—my own David!—my deliverer!"

These words came in broken tones from the depth of the old man's heart, as he flung his arms round David, and sobbed convulsively. How sweet to both was that embrace! Then came the eager searching gazing into each other's face.

"How changed you are!"

"You are much older!"

"And you too!"

"Fourteen years!"

"They are much in the life of a man!"

"Let me hold you yet a little longer, my son! I bless you that you have lived to shame your father. I have been obstinate, vindictive. It is for me to ask forgiveness, David."

"Let us banish the word between us, father. There is no need of forgiveness where there is love, and I have never ceased loving you since that fatal night in the ruined turret."

"Is it so, my boy? And God suffered you to crown your generous outraged love with the act of last night. Truly, he deals with us according to our deserts. I drove you from me with blind rage, because you had obeyed the fine instincts of your nature, and loved such a one as yourself,—for Miriam Grey is a woman worthy of you, David. You I drove from me, with implacable fury, and cherished—that other—who has just revealed the baseness of his soul."

"Let us not speak of him now. There are excuses for him in the life he has led. Tell me of Miss Grey. Father! you cannot know how I loved that girl; what it cost me to renounce her!" And David rose from his knees, and began to walk slowly to and fro in the room.

"Yes, my son, I think I can tell what you felt for many years,—what you feel even now on coming back to these familiar scenes. As you loved Miriam, I loved her mother."

"And your love ended like mine. You married another woman."

"No, David. My love did not end when I married another. It is not ended now. Take that confession from an old man's heart. And you, my son? is your love for Miriam ended because you have married another?"

(1) Continued from p. 114.

David paused, and turning to his father, replied slowly,

"No, father, no; as far as I can understand the strange mixed feelings within me, no. Yet the heart of man is deceitful above all things; and I cannot be sure of myself in this matter. In any case, do not believe what you heard a while ago. I did not marry for money. I married my wife because we loved each other, and I still love her. Yet the sight of Miriam Grey has proved to me that my old love is only slumbering within me,—that it is not dead, as I believed. I have seen her this morning, alone, in the old place."

"Did she recognise you?"

"Yes. Father, Miriam and I must not meet again."

"I understand you, my son. Does Miriam know that you are bound to another?"

"She knows it now."

"I think her heart has never swerved from its early love."

"Never, father?" and David's eye brightened. "Ah! women are more constant than men."

"They have fewer temptations to change."

"So we men say to each other, and to our own hearts. But the words bring no healing to the painful conscience that we have changed."

"This is but a first meeting with her. After so long a separation, in the surprise you must have occasioned her, some excitement, some feeling akin to the old one must have agitated you both. See her again and again, and the old feeling will pass away and be converted into a new one. You are no longer boy and girl. Your wife—your children—"

"Father! Nor wife, nor children, nor the long years which have passed over us would avail to change the nature of my feeling towards Miriam. If I were to see her often, as of old, the olden love would return, for it was excited by no light and transitory qualities of woman's nature. Let me do Miriam Grey full justice—and myself. She is as lovely in my eyes as she ever was. If I were to know her intimately now she would become infinitely more lovely and glorious. I feel this instinctively—I feel how beautiful her life has been; how full of patient heroism, how noble in action and thought and feeling. Moreover, father, I feel that what you just now said is true, that her heart has never swerved from its early love. I cannot come to live here, at Milford, as I had hoped to do when you and I were reconciled. I have sworn to love and cherish another woman, I will not risk her peace nor the present integrity of my feeling towards her. The fond desire to dwell in the midst of scenes so dear to my recollection must be given up. I will not meet Miriam Grey any more. Harm has come already from seeing her."

His father grasped David's hand affectionately.

"Do what your conscience dictates. I will not urge you to compromise or tamper with it. Though within this brief space I have had visions of perfect re-union, here, in our native valley"—Then suddenly stopping short, he let fall David's hand, and resumed in an altered tone,—"I had forgotten! I think of myself as still master of the Grange. Let me pause to reflect on this new turn in my affairs. You, David, agent for Admiral Underwood; you wealthy! Ah! I see you return good for evil very nobly. You have saved me from the disgrace of losing all that our ancestors held so dear. I do not quite see my way through this business; but I feel sure of the result. Milford Grange will not pass away from the Underwoods of Milford. And it is to you, my neglected banished son, I owe this other deliverance. Tell me how it has happened, and what it is now my duty to do."

"I have kept up an occasional correspondence with Mark, as you know. Mr. Shepherd also wrote to me occasionally. Lately Sir Ralph Grey has been a frequent visitor at my house in London. Through him and his agent, Mr. Bang, and also through one or two other minor channels, I learned that you were in debt, that the farm was likely to be mortgaged beyond redemption. I induced Admiral Underwood to go to your lawyer's, and to offer a high price for the estate, in case it were to be sold. This he did for me: knowing your anger against me, I would not subject you to the annoyance of hearing that I was the purchaser, until I had come as I have now come, and sought your forgiveness. God was pleased to open your heart towards me last night, as a stranger, and this morning you receive me as a son. As your son, one who has much of this world's wealth, I may, without fear of offending you, set your mind at ease. It is I who bought the estate last night, and I now restore it into your hands; certain, that you will never again risk what, in fact, you only hold as steward for your children."

Saying these words, David took from his pocket the title-deeds and other law-papers, with which they had been busied the previous night, and laid them on the table before his father. The latter looked at them as if he could scarcely believe his eyes. At length he took them up, one by one, and examined them.

"The Grey property, too!—That is here!"

"Certainly it is, father. It was our duty to secure that first."

"And you, David?—you have a wife, one accustomed to the luxuries of life—and children. Have you been just to yourself, in this generosity to me? Are you rich enough to give away so much? Will it not cripple your own resources?"

"I am not rich enough to do this, and not feel the diminution of my income. But my wife and I are prepared for the change. We have agreed that a simpler, more primitive life for our children, will really be an advantage to them. We had determined to win you to receive us as a son and daughter, and then to establish ourselves somewhere in the neighbourhood, where we could live less expensively than we have done; where I should have leisure and quiet to pursue my avocations, and my wife and children should become acquainted with my family and early friends. Circumstances have occurred to make me desire a modification of my plan. We cannot live in or near Milford. It would be dangerous for me."

"How will you account to your wife for this sudden change of plan?"

"Very easily—By telling her the truth."

"The truth!—will not that be hazardous? Will any woman bear that, David?"

"Many women I know would. My wife is one. You shall see her. She is the soul of generosity. Say nothing to her, or ever again to me about obligations. There can be nothing of the kind between us. We are father and son once more, thank God!" And David laid his hand on his father's shoulder, and looked affectionately into his eyes. They were full of tears, and his frame shook with emotion. He tried to speak; but the words failed him.

"Sit down, father; all this talk has been too much for you. Sit down, and recover yourself. Shall I go away a little while?"

"Yes! yes!—Go! Leave me alone a short time. Let me understand all my happiness. Let me thank the great Giver of all Good."

"I will go to my sisters, awhile. May I tell them?"

"Tell them what you like—only come back soon to me, and bring them all; I want to see them. And David—you said I should see your wife? Send for her soon. Where is she?"

"She is at Torrington Hall. She said she should come over here this morning. She had a bold plan of forcing herself into your presence, if I had failed in softening your heart."

"Will she come, think you? I hope she will come."

"I think she will. Are you unwell, father?"

"No; only overwhelmed with my undeserved happiness. Go, and make the others glad."

CHAPTER XIV.

THE LONG LOST BROTHER.

"WHAT can that Strange Gentleman want with father, again, this morning?" said Rachel, giving the shirt she was mending a quite unnecessary fling in the excess of her curiosity.

The four sisters were all seated together in the breakfast-room, and Jack was wandering in and out doing nothing particular, except setting an old gun in order, and disarranging his sisters' work-boxes and baskets as they stood on the great table, round which they all sat diligently sewing,—or making believe to sew.

"What can he want with father, I wonder?" she exclaimed again.

"Now, I care a great deal more to know what father wants with him," said Jack.

"Mark has left them, has he not?" asked Mary.

"Yes. I was obliged to call him away. He looked very savage I know. I'm afraid that Strange Gentleman with the beard has put his nose out of joint."

"Mary, dear," whispered Martha to her next neighbour, while a dispute arose between Jack and Rachel, as to the gentleman's age, and the colour of his eyes. "Mary, you never told me what you overheard last night between Mark and the stranger, when you happened to be behind the curtain."

"No? Ah! So many things have happened since to put it out of my head again." And Mary's pretty face became radiant with a smile and a blush. "The Strange Gentleman asked Mark if he were in father's confidence in money matters, and Mark said 'yes.' 'Then,' said he, 'you will be prepared to hear my business.' 'You have come to demand payment of a debt, a heavy debt?' asked Mark. 'Precisely so,' said the stranger. 'I fear your father is deceived in some persons he employs. Do you not think so? How else can he be so much involved?' Mark did not answer directly, and when he spoke, I did not quite hear what he said, but it was something about 'speculating,' and 'Railroads.' It quite frightened me at the time. I did not know what I was doing for a long time." Martha looked very grave, but said nothing.

"Don't look like that, Matty, dear. Somehow I don't feel frightened about it now. I've a sort of confidence in that man. Depend upon it all will go right."

"Because Philip Ward has declared his love for you. Eh Mary?" And the sweet-natured Martha could not help smiling at this unconscious deduction of Mary's heart-logic. Jack's voice was heard overbearing Rachel's protest.

"I never said so, indeed I did not. Oh Jack! pray don't go and put that about, in fun."

"Oh, but you did though, you know you did! Did she not, now, Leah? I will be judged by you. You are a church-woman, sworn to all the thirty-nine articles, and the ten commandments and the belief; and you dare not bear false witness, if it was to save your life, or even Mr. Crypt's. What do you blush for, Leah? What have I said? I am a most unlucky fellow, to make my sisters turn as red as fire at every word I say."

"What are you talking about, Mr. Noisy?" asked Martha, endeavouring to distract Jack's battery of teasing from Leah and Rachel to herself; but it's range was wide enough to take in all of them.

"Why, Mrs. Parson, I was asking Leah to witness something that Rachel was saying about the Strange Gentleman. I think it fair that my friend, Bang, should hear how she is affected. She said, 'I feel as if I should love him very much if I came to know him. He has such a nice grand face; and the finest eyes in the world.' I hope Bang will like that, he with his green-gooseberry eyes."

"They are light blue," interposed Rachel; "but never mind. I don't mind a word you say. Go on, Noisy."

"Merçi, ma belle couturière!—you like French, I know,—you must, since you like this French gentleman."

"He is not French, I am sure; whatever he is," said Rachel, "he is not a bit like a monkey."

"Nor a tiger," suggested Mary.

"Nor a cock," said Martha.

"Well, Frenchman or not, he's a foreigner, and Bang hates foreigners. I've heard him say so fifty times; and what will he think when his sweetheart—what, won't that word suit you? his fiancée then? his betrothed? what, is that not the thing? his young woman then? Will that do? You deprive me of the use of language. Well, what will he say when he hears that his young woman talks of liking to throw her arms round a Strange Gentleman's neck, and kissing him on the forehead because his forehead is beautiful, she says, and she feels towards him like a sister?"

"And what will Bang say," asked another voice, "when he hears that the Strange Gentleman threw his arms round Rachel, and kissed her thus?"

And to Rachel's intense surprise, she found that she was actually folded in some one's arms, and received a fond kiss on her glowing cheek.

Every one started up and stared in amazement at the intruder, who had stolen in unperceived during the last few moments. Jack let fall his gun, and turning very red, advanced a step and exclaimed,—

"What do you mean, sir?"

David smiled, and looked delightedly all round the circle, without moving his arm from Rachel's waist.

"That is my sister, sir," exclaimed Jack; "what do you mean?" and he advanced with a threatening hand.

David only smiled the more. "I mean that I, on my side, feel towards her as a brother."

"Confound your impudence, sir!" and the threatening hand seized the offender's collar. David burst into a laugh.

Martha started at the sound of this laugh, and after giving one look into his face, sprang forward, threw her arms round him, and burst into tears while she faltered out,—

"David! David! is it indeed you, my dear, long-lost brother?"

"Yes! Martha, good darling Martha, whom I have thought of all these years, and longed so often to hold to my heart as I do now. And all you other dear ones whom I remember well! Do not stand so far off. Come to me! I am David, your eldest brother."

They crowded round him. It was as pretty a family group as one would wish to see, those six fine tall human beings, radiant with joy and affection. The mother's picture seemed to smile down upon them, and to bless the meeting. No one spoke, except to utter a few exclamations of surprise and joy. David examined them all attentively, taking each blooming face between his hands, and noting the alterations which time had made. When he came to Jack, he treated him as he had treated the girls, and laughed again,—his own musical, hearty laugh.

"Ah! Master Jack, I confess myself puzzled here. From five years old to nineteen. Let me see! what is there in you now that you had then? Where are the curly flaxen locks and the round apple face? The eyes are as bright and mischievous, and the flat as ready for a blow, as you showed a while since."

"I beg your pardon," said Jack, laughing; "but how could I have acted otherwise just now? But won't you sit down? Now, girls, make way for a chair. I think this meeting is too much for him."

In truth, David Underwood's face began to betray much emotion, and he was glad to take the offered seat. Martha fetched wine and Jack ran for water. David swallowed both with equal avidity. A few minutes sufficed to restore him to his usual state; or rather to bring him to an unusual state of gaiety and happiness.

"God bless you all! Don't get behind one another. Let me see every one of you. Ah! Martha, my oldest acquaintance! The others are all very well—young,—radiant; but you, you are my own sister, who used to run over the Fells with me. Kiss me, Martha dearest, and tell me you forgive me for keeping away so long. But you know"—

"Yes, I know. What I do not know is how you are here now. Father—you have had long interviews with him—and Mark—and Mr. Shepherd, and Miss Grey." "They all know I am here. My father has bidden me welcome. It is with his consent I am in the midst of you all."

"Then all that terrible misunderstanding is over. Poor father! He has always loved you—he has missed you every day since you went. How has he borne the surprise of your return?"

"Very well. It has made him happy. He has had other things to bear far more difficult. We will go to him, you and I, Martha. He should not be left alone too long. Let us go, now," and he put a strong arm round her, and kissed her careful brow.

"Oh, let us all come!" cried Rachel. "Poor dear father! We have not seen him to-day."

Martha shook her head,—"It will be too much for him. He feels deeply, though he tries to hide it."

"Stay here, dear ones," said David, affectionately, "and I will fetch you presently. I think he will be glad to see you all."

They all crowded round David and Martha as they went out from the room, and they watched them pass through the door of the back-parlour; then they returned and gazed at each other, and smiled. Jack flung various pieces of needle-work up to the ceiling, and shouted aloud with glee. Rachel danced about and embraced every one a dozen times. Leah held Mary's hand in silent joy. They each forgot their lovers for the moment.

"So that is David! I am so glad he is like that," said Mary.

"Yes, so like what we have so often fancied, only nicer," said Leah. "He does not look like a modern fine gentleman."

"No, indeed; nor like an ancient saint either," said Jack, looking archly at Leah.

"He's very handsome this morning. How was it his hair looked so dark last night? He looked altogether different then," said the simple Rachel.

Jack laughed derisively.

"Ah, Rachel, my girl! you would never do for the Detective Police Force. I will make the matter as plain to your mind as it is to mine, upon a very short consideration. David wore a black wig, a false black beard and eye-brows, and stained the skin of his face, when he came here last night, because, for some purpose or other, he did not wish any one here to know who he was. He was disguised again this morning when he came here."

"But he was not so well disguised when I walked with him to the Grey Tower," said Leah. "I discovered that his skin and hair were both fair during our walk. He stopped at the vicarage and renewed his disguise before he came on here."

"But when did he take it off, do you suppose?" asked Rachel.

"In my father's study, I should imagine," said Jack, smiling. "In all my life I never saw such a dear unimaginative girl! You might have supposed that for yourself. But now, Rachel, tell me, how do you like him best—as he was last night, or as he is now?"

"How can you ask such a question? As he is now, of course. Was I not right, too, when I said I felt towards him like a sister?"

"Well, on this occasion it has turned out so. I say, Rachel, what a fine aristocratic-looking fellow David is! He looks like a great lord."

"He looks like a great man, you mean," said Leah.

"Like a genius," said Mary.

"Yes! yes!—I grant that, too. But still his manners, his movements, his way of standing, are not like us. Mark is handsome, but he don't look like that; nor Philip, who is quite a flower of grace among us; Bang and I are worse mannered than Jemmy Sharpe in comparison. I feel it directly—but it does not make me uncomfortable. I like it. That's what I call breeding, and no mistake."

"He reminded me last night, and again just now as he moved and looked, of something Miss Grey was saying to us about one of the noble chivalric men of Queen Elizabeth's court. Do you remember what it was, Leah?" asked Mary.

"Was it not about Sir Philip Sidney, and 'high courage seated in a heart of courtesy'?"

"Yes, that was it. Don't you think ——" and Mary stopped suddenly, and drew back from the window where she had been standing. "Here is a lady just come within the gate, and one of the Torrington Hall servants is with her," she added, a little fluttered; for a visitor, and one she did not know, was rare at the Grange.

"You should not draw back in that way," said Leah; "she may have seen you. Come with me, and let us ask her to walk in."

But before they could step through the window the stranger stood before it, and bowed and smiled to the two girls.

She was a woman upon whom no one could look with indifference. Her face was not beautiful—it was the reverse of beautiful—i. e. as near the reverse of beautiful as any face instinct with love and intelligence can be. It was a face that disarmed criticism at once. You thought not, "How plain!" "How singular!" You thought, "How good!" "How full of genius!"

The bright brown eyes looked straight into your face, seeking your soul, and with no desire but to sympathise with it. Not looking cleverly to find out what you thought. A grand simple soul came out through those clear eyes. They may have known tears, but they would not give tears the mastery. She was a brunette, with a bright, fixed, healthy colour in her cheeks. Her dark hair was slightly tinged with grey, but, with that exception, everything about her appearance gave the idea of youth. A happier human face, with so much thought and feeling, it would not be easy to find; for, alas! happiness is seldom the lot of the thinking human being. The penalty we pay for an "intellectual being" is that we must have it full of pain. This lady was one who would not have exchanged her lot for that of any woman on earth. She was the wife of David Underwood, and a woman of genius!

She stood before the open window, looking in; her elegant figure, in the close-fitting riding-habit, sharply defined against the sky.

"May I come in?" she asked, in a full, rich voice that thrilled on the ear.

"Oh! pray excuse us, madam," said Leah, advancing. "Come in. We were a little startled."

The lady entered the room, and, to the surprise of them all, she was lame—very lame. But she betrayed no embarrassment on that account. She took the first seat she came to, and then addressed herself to Leah, who at a glance she saw was the eldest.

"My dear Miss Underwood, I have come unexpectedly, I find. You have not seen your brother, Dr. Underwood, this morning?"

"Yes; David has just left the room. He is with my father."

"That is well. Nay, tell me, you.—Is it well?"

"Yes, madam. My father and David are reconciled. It has made us very happy. You know him, I see—know him well."

The lady smiled—a smile so full of joy and tenderness that Jack, who felt physiognomy, and understood nothing of aesthetics, pronounced her the handsomest lady he had ever seen.

"Have you known him long, madam?"

"Ever since you ceased to know him."

"Is he really very famous in London, madam?" asked Jack, with a little mauvaise honte.

"Yes; famous among the best and wisest."

"Is it true that he goes to court—that he dines with the king?" asked Rachel.

"It is quite true. He is a man whom the king delights to honour."

"God save the king!" murmured Leah.

"Is it true that my brother David might have married many rich and beautiful ladies?" inquired the indiscreet Jack.

"It is true. At least I think so."

"And he has returned home to us all at last. And perhaps he intends to marry Miss Grey, and to stay among us. That will be glorious—beautiful—romantic!" said Rachel, clasping her hands.

"Yes!" said the strange lady, looking kindly at her. "It would be glorious—beautiful—romantic! but it is not true."

"How?"

"Your brother David is married—married to me."

They all drew back simultaneously, and fixed their eyes on that fascinating face as it was upturned to theirs. Before another word was uttered the door was thrown open, and David entered the room.

CHAPTER XV.

OLD LETTERS.

In the meantime the world without Milford Grange went on as usual. Nanny Post and her donkey proceeded along the valley, and stopped whenever it seemed good to either of them to stop. Sometimes, also, they were obliged to stop when it seemed good to neither; as, for instance, when Miss Shepherd sallied forth from the Vicarage garden and waylaid them, that she might pump Nanny's news under pretence of asking how "Jemmy was after that fall;" and that she might get a sight of her brother's letters before he saw them himself, under pretence of saving Nanny the trouble of getting off Bob's back. Nanny had no alternative as to the letters; she was obliged to give them up to "the curiousest lady as ever was," as she scrupled not to call Miss Shepherd in her own circle, defiant alike of syntax and social superiority. But as to the news—she had a right to do just as she liked about repeating that. In spite of all questioning and cross questioning, it was not much information "Miss Shepherd got out of her, that bout," as she told her old friend and special crony, Dame Bernard, when she reached the Tower, and delivered the packet with which Martha had entrusted her for Miss Grey.

"Sit down, Nanny. I'll just go and find Miss Miriam," said the old nurse. "Maybe she'll have a message to send back by you. I haven't seen her all the morning. You see, I've been very busy with the clap cake and the riddle bread, and never once gave it a thought till your coming minded me o't. Poor dear! poor dear! She'd got a headache and went to lay down without any breakfast, which was the worst thing she could do; but young things will be young, you know. I'll go and look after her, now."

Nurses always think of those they nursed as "young things."

"Where's her sister, Dame? where's Mrs. Ward?" asked Nanny.

"Ah, deary me! deary me! Young things will be young, Jemima Sharpe. Mrs. Ward's away o'er the fell side to Torrington Hall for some nonsense or other, though she knew it was baking day, and Miss Miriam not well and all. And now I come to think of it, she did say to me, 'Nurse Bernard,' says she, 'go up and see how Miss Grey is, in the course of the morning.' And away she went with her fine new white bonnet and parasol. Somehow she hasn't got much of the Grey blood about her—unless it's the blood of the Greys of Torrington Hall; and that's been aye different from our Grey blood of the Tower, here. Ah! well, well! It's a strange world we live in, Jemima Sharpe!"

"You may say that, Dame," was the reply; "you've lived in it longer than I have by twenty years; but I don't think you have ever seen such changes as we're like to have in Milford anon."

"Changes in Milford! What changes?" exclaimed the old woman in a sort of plaintive scream. "What's the matter? Is it about my dear children here? Anything to Miss Miriam, an' Mrs. Ward, and the boy?"

"No, no! Don't alarm yourself, Dame Bernard. There ain't nothing bad befallen them, as I knows of. There! there! Don't put yourself in a flutter. Go and do what you was going to do, and then come back here and we'll have a quiet talk; and I don't care if I do taste your new riddle bread, and a sup of a.c."

"Go!" said the old nurse, looking somewhat bewildered. "Where was I going? I think my memory is not as good as it was."

"Nonsense," said Nanny, cheerfully. "You're a young woman yet. Don't talk so. You'll live to dance at your lady's wedding yet."

"Na! na! Not at Miss Miriam's. I'm liker to weep at her burying, I reckon. She'll never be any man's wife—but only one; and he's clean forgotten her long ago. My bonny sightless bird! Ye chose a faithless mate, and one out o' your own degree,—like your sweet mother before y^e. What was I saying?" she asked again, after a pause.

"You were going to take this packet to Miss Grey. It's a heavy one. Perhaps it's got good news inside. I shouldn't wonder now if it said something about that runaway lover of hers."

"Na! na! She'll hear nought o' him while oak and ash grows. He's heard of her blindness, and didn't come. And if she did, she ha' nought to say to him now, I'll be bound. Ah well! It is a long lane that has no turning. Perhaps she'll alter her mind, and listen to Sir Ralph at last. He loves her poor eyes still. He's kept single for love of her this many a year, to my knowledge."

"And for love of himself, to my knowledge. A selfish careful body," said the unsentimental Nanny, half aloud, as the old woman hobbled away to seek her mistress.

When she reached the door of Miss Grey's chamber, she was obliged to pause, and pant for breath.

"Deary me! What a weary height! I'm getting old." Then she knocked at the door; but no answer came. Again she knocked—still no answer. "Poor child! can she be ill? Miss Miriam! Miss Miriam! come and open the door. Perhaps she's asleep; but I never knew her sleep in the daytime."

Again she knocked, and this time so violently, that Miriam, who was sleeping by the open window, just as we saw her last, awoke suddenly with a start and a loud cry.

"Ha! it is too late, too late! I cannot hear him now."

"What are you saying, my dear child? Open the door."

Miriam recognised old Bernard's voice, and mechanically moved to obey it. There was a strange feeling in her head, and a dull burning sensation in every limb, as she got down from the high window-seat, and dragged herself to the door.

"What do you want, Bernard?"

"I want to know how you are; and here is something from Mr. Underwood, my dear—letters, I think, they say it is. Open the door."

Miriam did so, and the old woman peered up into her face as she handed her the packet.

"Why, you've been asleep, I declare, and are as rosy as you used to be when you was a babe. You don't look ill. How you frightened me just now! There, wake up. You must wait till some one comes to read these letters. I'll come up and see you presently; but there's the clap-cake not all done yet, and so I must go. There's letters inside, I think she said." And the old woman hobbled away again, eager to hear Nanny's promised news.

"Letters!" thought Miriam to herself, as she closed the door, and turned her eyes on the packet which she held in her hand. "Letters? What care I for letters, or anything else? How shall I go on with life now? It is all dark—blank. What has come to me?"

She dragged her aching limbs to the old place by the window again, and sat straining her eyes over to the distant sea. Her hands had fallen listlessly into her lap, clasping the packet unheedingly between them. Awhile she strove hard to remember all that had passed between David Underwood and herself that morning.

"I recollect it all now distinctly. He is returned at last! He is married! But he said he had written to me—written! Perhaps there's more to bear yet. I must rouse myself and be strong."

Then, after a pause, she grasped the packet in her lap suddenly.

"Letters!" she said; "it contains letters! They are from him—from him, and I cannot see to read them!"

The human voice has seldom uttered a sound more melancholy than the tone of these few words pronounced by Miriam Grey. She sat with her sightless eyes fixed on the packet for some minutes, as if she were trying to believe in her own misfortune. Not see to read what he had written! It was hard to believe that God had afflicted her so. Then her slender fingers felt eagerly all over the packet, lingering on the seal. That she recognised at once as Mr. Underwood's. Still she had no doubts as to the contents. She broke that outer seal. Yes! there were letters inside—David's letters. She needed not sight to be sure of that. She touched one of the seals lightly with her trembling fore-finger, feeling for the impression of a certain device on a ring which she had given him on his birth-day, long years ago. It was a star, surrounded by the words, "Segui la tua Stella." With the delicate sense of touch peculiar to the blind, she recognised it instantly.

"Segui la tua Stella," she murmured. "Segui la tua Stella." Yes! he was bound to follow it: he could not do otherwise, though it led him from me. I was only a spring flower in his path; no star above his head to guide him onward. I faded from his touch when I should have moved onward with him."

She took up the letters, and examined each singly, passing them through her fingers many times, and laying them against her cheek.

"One, two, three—ah! this is foreign paper!—four, five—foreign paper again—six, seven—that is not his—he does not fold his letters so—besides, there is no seal." She was holding Mr. Underwood's note of the previous night in her hands.

At this moment came another knock at the chamber-door. Instinctively she collected all her letters, and covered them with her hands, ere she said, "Come in." It was Nurse Bernard again.

"Mr. Shepherd has come to see you. When I told him you were not well, you were lying down, he said I was to ask if he might not come up and see you. Do let him come, my dear. He's been frightening me about the fever. Deary me! Now I see you in the light, child, you do look feverish. Will you come and speak to him, or shall he come to you?"

"I don't feel well," said Miriam, passing one hand over her forehead. "I am rather giddy; ask Mr. Shepherd to come to me."

Dame Bernard went away immediately, and in a few minutes Mr. Shepherd stepped into the room alone, hastened to Miriam, and drew a chair beside her.

"You are ill—fevered. I see it. Why are you not lying down?"

"I am ill, but my sickness is more of the mind than of the body. I want your help, dear Mr. Shepherd. Tell me, did you know, last night, who it was—"

"I know now, my dear," and he took one of her hands affectionately. "It was David Underwood. What have you to say about him?"

"He is married."

"Yes! I knew that, long since. Surely you knew it! No? He came to you this morning, and you did not know it. Ah! that is painful," and the good man pressed her fevered hand in his, and looked with mournful eyes into her face for a few moments before he proceeded. "David wrote to me before his marriage, and told me that he had written to you on the subject. That you never mentioned it, or alluded to it, any more than to other passages of his life, did not surprise me, for I know that you are not like the generality of women—you do not love to talk of what you feel. I believed that you were acquainted with the circumstances of David's marriage, and I gave you credit for greater self-control and resignation to God's appointments than it has often been my lot to see in a young person, for I felt sure you had not forgotten him. It is strange how we take things for granted, and misunderstand what is going on in the hearts we think we know the best;" he continued, musing aloud. "And you did not know till now of David's marriage!—who told you of it?"

"I heard it from himself, some hours ago," she said, in a faint voice; "all that is over now. It has been a sad piece of work altogether. Why did his father keep back his letters from me? He is a hard man."

"You must forgive him, Miriam. What are those letters you hold so tightly?"

"I think they are David Underwood's letters that were kept back from me, and that his father, with a refinement of cruelty, sends me after I have had an interview with him. What have I done to Mr. Underwood to be so treated?"

"You labour under some mistake, my child. Mr. Underwood is hard and severe sometimes, but never to you. Be assured of that. Let me look at those letters; may I?"

"Yes; I cannot be mistaken about them," she sighed; "will you read them to me? I think I could not bear any other voice to utter his words."

He took them from her lap, and while she covered her face with her hands and wept silently, the kind old man examined the contents of the packet.

Who does not know what it is to turn over a packet of old letters? letters from one who will never, never write to us any more; one dead, or, perhaps, estranged,—it boots not how,—but estranged so that there can come no more such letters in all the years that are to be.

The letters from the dead are dear as his last words, to the loving heart. We shrink at first from the sight of the familiar handwriting, as we untie the ribbon that bound the precious papers, and they lie scattered before us. But if we have been true and loyal in our affection for the dead; if our friendship held firm through evil report and good report,—firmer through the evil than through the good,—firmest of all when the evil report had a foundation, and we knew that our friend had erred, nay, had sinned, and was even such a one as in our secret souls we know ourselves to be, or to be capable of being; if we have candour and impartiality enough for self-knowledge at all; if it were so with us and our friendship, there will be a sweetness in the sorrow with which we look on the letters of our dead friend. Softly and reverently will the faded, discoloured papers be handled, carefully, lovingly unfolded and re-read. There will be no bitterness in the recollections they produce; the old gaiety and pleasant jests scattered up and down will raise a smile still, and the figure of our friend, as he was when he wrote thus, will return to us, sit beside us, and smile with us over his old letters. And when we have finished them all, we perhaps look up with a sigh, and say, as we tie up our relics again, "Ah, it is a long time ago! but that true friendship is as dear to me as ever. I only wait to renew it in a higher life, where he has gone before me."

But it is not so with us when we see the old letters of one still living, who was once a friend, and who is so no more. No matter from which side the cause of estrangement sprang, the estrangement exists, a bitter thing to the loving soul. It takes no comfort from the thought, "It was not I that broke the bands of this friendship." It feels a terrible desecration of its affection in the fact that it can say, "I loved once," knowing the truth of the poet's words,—

"They never loved who can say I loved once."

It has been polluted with a false feeling, and it is ashamed. If its affection was a reality, it exists still, secretly, though repulsed and outraged. To such a soul the noble words of Coleridge should bring support and consolation:—

"Yet why at others' wanings shouldst thou fret?
Then only mightst thou feel a just regret
Hast thou withheld thy love, or hid thy light
In selfish forethought, of neglect, or slight.
Oh wiser! then, from feeble yearnings freed,
While and on whom thou mayst—shine on!—nor heed
Whether the object by reflected light
Return thy radiance, or absorb it quite.
And though thou notest from thy safe recess
Old friends burn dim like lamps in noisome air,
Love them for what they are, nor love them less Because to thee they are not what they were."

The letters of an estranged friend are never looked at without a mixture of painful feelings, and if ever they are read through, it is in bitterness of spirit, and with a sense of injury,—sometimes, alas! with contempt.

But the old letters which so stirred the heart of Miriam Grey as she heard their pages rustle in the hands of her friend, were not from one dead, nor from one estranged. She had no general remembrance of their contents, no precious associations connected with them. They were all unknown to her, all full of interest. They contained important news, and yet were written many years before. They spoke probably of love to her, and she was trying to reconcile her mind to the idea that he had vowed love to another. It was a strange mixture of contraries; but above all other feelings within her rose the desire to know what was in them, that she might in some measure honour him still.

Slowly the good clergyman broke each seal, and looked over each letter. They sat in silence; Miriam with tightly folded hands and still demeanour, bending her fevered face downward, and waiting with closed eyes for the first words, and yet shrinking as from the probing of a wound; Mr. Shepherd with grave earnest face scanning eagerly through his spectacles the letters meant for no eyes but those now sightless ones, to which he looks up occasionally with an ineffable pity. Sometimes he lays down a letter quickly, as if he had intruded too far into the writer's inner feeling, and could not bear to go on; again, he reads on with eagerness, and makes slight gestures of surprise, approval, disapproval, glancing ever and anon at his motionless companion. At length he breathes forth a sigh, and leans back in his chair to reflect a few moments; then laying one hand on the open letters, he touches Miriam with the other, saying,—

"My dear child. There are many things in these letters which will give you pain. Things which another in my place might deem it right to keep from you."

"But it would not be right. I ask to know all that I should know if I were not blind."

"You shall, my dear. I make no comment on David's conduct. You will judge for yourself. Are you prepared to hear them now?"

"Perfectly."

"Then let me tell you, first, that there is a note from Mr. Underwood, dated last night, touching on some business which has nothing to do with these letters, and which we can speak of another time. At the conclusion of this note he says, 'I send with this a few letters from my son David to me. Perhaps they may be valuable to you, as I remember, in your girlhood you seemed to favour him with some tender regard. You are now at liberty to dispose of them as you think best. Others which came to me before these I destroyed without opening them.'"

"Then these letters are not to me, after all."

"They are all addressed to his father, but contain enclosures to you."

"Ah! yes, I remember, in the last letter I received from him, he said that he should enclose all future letters to his father. What is the date of the first of these?"

"August, 18—. That is just seven years after he left Milford. It runs thus."

Miriam pressed her burning palms together, bowed her head once more, and listened with closed eyes to the following letter.

LETTER I.

"Again this season, this bright, warm, summer-time, carries me back to the far-off point in the past, when I left Milford and you, dear, sweet Miriam. In spite of your long-continued silence, I cannot resist the inclination to write to you once more, though probably in an hour of cool reason or pride I may tear what I now write. And of what do I wish to write? of the past, when I knew you? Nay—that is past, finished; it is a fair, complete structure in my heart, standing erect there, like a pyramid in an Egyptian plain; silent, strong, inviolable; sacred to an immortal memory; enshrining the earliest sovereigns of that now desert region—my mother, and my beautiful Miriam.—My gentle, blessed, dead mother! My gentle, blessed Miriam, now dead to me.

"But though the Miriam of seven years ago is dead to me, the Miriam of an earlier day still lives; it is to that Miriam, once his childish friend and confidant, that David Underwood now writes. It is she whom he thinks of when he hears (as he has heard once or twice lately) that Sir Ralph Grey of Torrington Hall is about to be married to 'a certain cousin of his, a Miss Grey, who has property in his neighbourhood.' It is she whom he now ventures to congratulate on this coming event, which will give so much pleasure throughout our two valleys.

"It is not your marriage, Miriam, that seems to me now to be a matter for congratulation; it is your marriage with another. How often in this life are we compelled to find our greatest consolation in the fact which we once imagined would cause us unmitigated pain! David Underwood has lived to thank God that Miriam Grey can never be his wife! It is good for her that it should be so; for him—no matter whether it be good or bad for him. It is inevitable; and he has learned to bear what is so.

"After all that shameful confession in my last, you will understand readily that I have long since ceased aspiring to your love. He who lies on the earth with his face downward, grasping clay, cannot see the stars. When he finds that it is only clay which he delighted in so madly, and that he has blinded his eyes by grovelling in the mire, he is worse than a fool if he cannot accept the consequences, and suffer in silence. He is also worse than a fool, if he continue passively to accept those consequences, without transmuting the silent suffering into strength, whereby to withstand future temptation.

"Temptation to sin! Do you know what it is, Miriam Grey? I think not. Ever since your infant voice could lisp the words, you have prayed—'Lead us not into temptation;' and I verily believe God has granted your prayer always. I know you, Miriam, what you are; an exceptional human being—one sent on earth to show us what we should be, also to show us what we can be, if it be our Maker's will. It is said by some philosophers and moralists, that there is no suffering in the heart where there is no sin. It is a false saying. There are some few men and women in a generation who seem too pure, too good for this earth, upon whom sorrows are poured forth in abundance; who bear the burden of other people's sins. Why they are sent on earth at all, seems a mystery; they want no probation, they are as silver seven times purified.

"It may be that such holy spirits—such saint-like natures—are set before us as guiding stars, as comforters, as examples. Such are you, Miriam Grey, in the eyes of all who know you. Such are you to me—the fallen one.

"I have risen from my degradation—a degradation for which few of those I live amongst would have despised me—only you, Miriam, and God, and my own better self. I have risen from my degradation, I say. My eyes have been cleansed from mire, in the waters of repentance. I am a sadder and a wiser man; but still a man—able to stand erect, and gaze upward on the heavens once more—able to follow your gentle injunction,—Segui la tua Stella.

"If there should ever come across your path one soiled with sin, who has wasted God's best gifts, who is bankrupt in reputation, in affection, in mind, in hope, say to him, Miriam, that you once knew one, ten times worse, plunged ten times deeper in remorse than he, and that that one remembered you in the depths of his despair, and through you, the God who made you. Then he belived and trusted in the Infinite Goodness and Mercy; he acquired strength to cast from him the insidious atheism of despair, and flung his soul, stained and weary with conflict, prostrate before the great God whose hand is over all his works, who 'hateth nothing that he has made,' 'who knoweth our frailty, who remembereth that we are but dust.'

"This is a simple unvarnished truth, Miriam. To you do I owe this renovated life; for without the remembrance of you, and what you once felt for me, I should have perished in despair of my own power to be anything more than an earth-worm, or a blot on creation. Because you once cared for me, and God always cares for me, I have learned to care for myself.

"And now, Miriam, I am beginning to do the work which is allotted to me to do in this world. Even now I see, dimly, that I could not do that work so well as I hope to do, if I had not sinned and suffered. We who strive to teach others, in our books, ought to know in our own lives what are the strongest trials and temptations, the most sickening sorrows of the life of man. A literary man who lives shut out from the dust and din, the strife and cruel warfare of the world, will not write soul-supporting books for those who have suffered there. By God's help, Miriam, my own experience shall be turned to some good account for the young and the old to whom the faculty I possess may make me known. Pray for me, Miriam, that this God-given faculty may henceforth help (in however small a degree) to make his will done on earth as it is in heaven. I shall not love his will the less because I have felt his anger when I transgressed it. Or, in the language of philosophy, (which I would rather use for ordinary talk than that more sacred heart-language of religion, which should not be profaned or vulgarized by keeping it too near the lips on all occasions,)—in the language of philosophy, shall not love the right less ardently because I have felt how the wrong brings with it its own punishment and degradation.

"And now a few words about——"

"Stay! stay! dear Mr. Shepherd. I can bear no more. This letter will turn my brain," cried Miriam, in an excited tone. "What does it all mean? I cannot understand it. I have waited patiently, expecting every minute that you would read something—some fact that would throw light on all this suffering and self-upbraiding. What can it mean? Degradation and David Underwood? Sin! Grovelling in the earth! grasping clay! David Underwood! our David! Bright spirited, lofty minded, full of all good thoughts and feelings! Degraded! It is folly! It is some fiction!" she continued, stretching out her fevered hands towards Mr. Shepherd. He grasped them within his own, crushing the letter as he did so; and said gently and with a sigh:—

"It is written, 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.'"

"Ah! You know something of the—the—cause—the—the—shameful confession" to which he refers. He speaks enigmas."

"Some things it is best to know only as enigmas," said Mr. Shepherd, pressing her hands affectionately. "Can you be content to know that David Underwood has had something shameful to confess?"

Miriam paused. "No!" she said softly; "I cannot be content. I would rather judge for myself how far his conduct would be shameful in my eyes. If you love me, tell me what you know—what he saw fit to tell me in one of those earlier lost letters. Mr. Shepherd looked at her eager wistful face, fever-flushed and full of acute pain. He could not resist, he did not think it well to resist her entreaty. In a sober but very low voice he said:

"I will tell you briefly, my child, what I know but imperfectly myself. I heard long ago of a certain Italian woman,—a syren with a sweet voice, and a fair face; a singer at the opera, one of those women of genius who use their glorious endowments for inglorious purposes. It becomes a snare and curse to them, and to these who have to do with them."

"And David had to do with this one? Ah! He loved music and the drama, and—and—all beautiful things."

"But he did not love this woman, as he once loved you,—nor even as he loved music and the drama. It was far other. He was very young then. She loved him after her passionate southern fashion, and let him know it. This appealed to his heart, her genius satisfied his artistic taste, her beauty captivated his senses, her fame gratified his pride, and all these things ministered to his vanity. 'The lips of a strange woman drop as an honeycomb, and her mouth is smoother than oil. But her end is bitter as worm-wood, sharp as a two-edged sword. Her feet go down to death, her steps take hold on hell.' My poor boy! My poor boy!"

"Nay! rather should we say, 'Poor woman!'" interrupted Miriam with grave sadness.

"This from you, Miriam? Have you sophisms and fair words for her? palliatives and excuses for the harlot?"

"Why not?" asked Miriam firmly; "the holy Son of God had."

Mr. Shepherd pressed her hand—this time with his lips. "God bless you, my child! I thank you for reminding me of my duty. The thought of David's sorrow and indignation at the sin, made me forget mercy to the sinner."

"To one sinner."

"You are right, too, there."

"To the one, too, that was probably the greatest sufferer."

"Not so, Miriam. There your benevolence leads you too far. You do not know, you cannot imagine, how a course of worldliness and sensuality hardens the heart,—even a woman's heart,—so that moral feeling becomes almost extinct, and natural affection half deadened. This woman had many rich lovers, though for a time she devoted herself to David Underwood, the poor young author. He was handsome and full of brilliant talent. It was only a caprice, and after a time she began to have other caprices; he remonstrated—she laughed. He talked of marriage. It seemed the only compensation in his power; for she was about to bear him a child. He knew that by such a marriage his life would be a wreck, but he thought it just and right towards her."

"Surely it was so, Mr. Shepherd."

"You shall hear. She told him that she was married already. David did not abandon her, though she tried to shake him off, and by her conduct turned his love into something like contempt. He loved his child with tender pitying love, and he was shocked at her neglect of it. At last, she decamped to the continent with a rich nobleman, and deserted David's child."

"Ha! what became of it?"

"David took it home to his own comfortable lodgings. It was a touching sight, I have heard, that sickly babe in the arms of her wretched, shame-stricken, self-despising father."

"This is indeed a sad, sad story! Poor unhappy babe! And this is what David confessed to me, and I never saw the confession; I could not write and say: 'Send me this helpless creature, doomed to suffer for its parents' faults, and I will tend and cherish it.' What has become of the child, since? He has formed other ties; he is married. Where has he hidden this innocent sufferer for his wrong-doing?"

"I do not know what has become of the child. I have not heard of her since his marriage. I think there is something about her in the concluding sentences of the letter I was reading. Yes—he says,

"A few words about my child, my darling Leonora. She is now three years old, and is very happy for the present, poor darling! She has met with some kind friends. Admiral Underwood's children are her playmates and protectors, and as I am domesticated with him just now, she is here also. The strong yearning towards the past with which I began this letter is fading away. I will conclude as I began, with wishes for your wedded happiness. Leonora has learned to pray for you already. The prayers of so pure a creature must bring good to you, Miriam.

"Farewell! Once more, relax your rigid silence, and say you forgive

"The erring

"DAVID UNDERWOOD."

(To be continued.)

THE GREAT AMERICAN ALOE.

WHETHER we contemplate the Great American Aloe as presenting one of the most striking physiognomic forms of vegetation to which tropical lands give birth, or as one of the most important uncultivated plants which minister to the varied wants of savage and civilized man,—or as one whose history is entwined with that of the human race, and whose geographical range, now encircling the globe, bears testimony to their migrations—in any point of view we cannot fail to regard it as one of the most remarkable of plants. It is not surprising that such a plant should have its mythical and fabular associations; even in our own country, where, in all curious collections of plants, it is reared in the artificial climate of the greenhouse, this patriarch of the flowers still obtains, in the popular mind, the remarkable peculiarity of blooming once in a hundred years; and in some parts of the country popular lecturers on botany still amuse their audiences on the fertile theme of the Aloe's rapid development of blossoms, which occasions an "explosion resembling the firing of cannon." These and other garden fables supply ample materials for the newspaper paragraphs which annually appear, recording instances of the flowering of the Aloe in different parts of the country; and it is with the view of correcting popular errors, and leading to correct views of the real nature of this plant, that we lay before our readers the following authentic epitome of its history and uses.

The Great American Aloe does not belong to the genus Aloe of botanists (which includes a large number of species, some of which supply the aloes of medicine), but to a family belonging to an entirely different natural order, viz. the Amarylhidaceæ. It is the Agave americana of Linnæus (A. Cantala, Ros.; Fourcroya Cantala, Haw.), but its synonymy is much confused in botanical works; and in popular accounts of its history, the English name has led to a greater confusion still, by mixing it up with the true aloes, the Yuccas (Adam's Needle), and, perhaps, other plants. It is, however, so extensively known, not only in Britain, but in all our colonies, by the name of Great American Aloe, that on this ground alone we do not venture a change. In the Indian Peninsula, the natives call it Wilaceto Ananas—i.e. English Pineapple; a name which seems clearly to indicate the original introduction of the plant to that country by the English, although it is only known wild in more southern lands than Britain. It is truly indigenous to the tropical parts of America alone, but has spread with the human race throughout all the warmer parts of the globe, where it has become naturalized, and flourishes luxuriantly under climatic conditions very different, in many cases, from those which it originally enjoyed. Its Sanscrit name is Kantula.

The ordinary aspect of the Agave, as seen in our greenhouses, must be familiar to most of our readers—a simple unbranched plant, with long leathery sheathing leaves of great substance, all rising from nearly one point, and generally of a deep green hue,—in the young state glaucous; but there is a variety with striped leaves, resembling in colour the riband-grass of our gardens. The plant assumes a very different appearance, however, when its blossoms are produced. It sends up a strong flower-stalk, a foot in diameter at the base, and sometimes more than thirty feet in height, bearing, in candelabra form, many thousands of blossoms, which give it a very imposing aspect. In hot countries the plant does not produce its blossoms for several years, varying, according to circumstances, from five to twelve; but in Britain, even where grown in the greenhouse, it requires a much longer period for evolution, and has been known to attain the age of eighty years, and more in some cases, although the flowers are generally produced long before that period. The flowering exhausts the plant, and it immediately dies, but the leathery leaves, in our climate, often retain their succulency and verdure for several years after the plant has ceased to grow, if protected from the atmospheric elements.

The Great American Aloe is, however, not altogether unknown as an ornamental open-air plant in Britain. To our own personal knowledge, it has resisted the frosts of winter on an artificial rock-work in the garden of G. H. Newall, Esq., Dundee; and although, under such circumstances, its growth is necessarily very slow, a considerable degree of heat being requisite for its proper development, yet one instance is on record of this extraordinary exotic flowering on the shores of Britain. The illustrious Humboldt records, that on the lovely coast of Devonshire, where Salcombe Bay has been called, on account of its mild climate, the Montpellier of the North, the Agave mexicana has been seen to blossom in the open air, and orange-trees trained against espaliers, and only slightly protected by mats, have borne fruit.¹ Indeed, the most remarkable history on record of the early flowering of the American Aloe is that to which Humboldt evidently alludes, which took place in the open ground, at Woodville, near Salcombe, Devonshire, the residence of the late James Cole, Esq., and which was fully detailed in the Transactions of the Horticultural Society, and has since been noticed in many other works. This aloe was planted in 1804, when six inches in height, and two or three years old, within a few yards of the sea-shore, where it never had any cover, shelter, manure, or cultivation. It gradually increased in size, until in 1820 it measured about eleven feet in height, and covered a space the diameter of which was sixteen feet, its leaves close to the stem being nearly nine inches thick. In the beginning of June of that year, a stem made its appearance, resembling a head of asparagus, but of gigantic dimensions, which during six weeks grew at the rate of three inches a day, and then gradually diminished in progress, but not till it had attained the elevation of twenty-seven feet from the ground, which was about the middle of September; the two lowest branches of the flower-stalk first showed flowers on the third of September, and others came out in succession from the beginning of October to the end of November, when they all began to lose colour and dry up. It is stated, also, that there were upwards of forty flowering branches, each with between three and four hundred flowers, making in all about sixteen thousand blossoms! As the stem grew, the leaves began to wither, and the plant died, its age being twenty-one years.²

The uses to which the Agave is applied by the natives of the regions it inhabits are numerous, and in the present paper we shall notice those of most importance. The Mexicans esteem it the most valuable production which nature has lavished upon them, and their notions of its value are based upon a drink which it supplies to them in abundance, which is greedily sought after by the mountain population of equinoctial America wherever the plant abounds. The following notice of this beverage, derived from Humboldt's Essai politique sur le Royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne, is from the pen of the late Robert Huish, F.L.S. "Scarcely," says the distinguished philosopher Humboldt, "does there exist a tribe of savages in the world, who are not acquainted with the art of preparing some kind of vegetable drink. The wretched hordes which wander in the forests of Guiana extract from the fruits of different palms a beverage which is as palatable as the European orgeat. The inhabitants of Easter Island, confined to a mass of barren, springless rocks, mingle the expressed juice of the sugar-cane with the briny water of the sea. More civilized nations derive their drink from the same plants as afford them food, and whose seeds and roots contain the saccharine principle mingled with the farinaceous. In southern and eastern Asia this is rice; in Africa and Australia, the roots of ferns, or of some species of Arum; whilst in the north of Europe the Cerealia afford both bread and fermented liquors. Few are the instances of certain plants being cultivated solely with a view to extract beverages from them. Vineyards only exist west of the Indus. In the old world, and in the golden age of Cicero, the culture of the grape was confined to the countries lying between the Oxus and the Euphrates; in Asia Minor and in Western Europe. In other parts of the world, nature certainly produces several species of wild vine, but nowhere has man attempted to collect them around him, and improve their quality by cultivation. The new continent presents the instance of

(1) "Comes;" Sabine's Translation. Third edition, vol. i. p. 320.

(2) "Transactions of the Horticultural Society of London," IV. p. 336.

a people who derived their beverages not only from the farinaceous and sugary substance of Maize, Manioc, and Bananas, or from the pulp of some species of Mimos, but who cultivated a plant for the express purpose of converting its juice into spirituous liquor. In the vast plains of the interior of Mexico, there are large tracts of country where the eye discovers nothing but fields planted with the Pitte, or Maguey (Agave americana). This plant, with its leathery and thorny leaves, and which, with the Cactus Opuntia, has become naturalized ever since the sixteenth century throughout Southern Europe, in the Canary Islands, and on the African coasts, imparts a most peculiar character to the Mexican landscape. "The plantations extend wherever the Azteque language is spoken: they cease to the north of Salamanca, and are seen in the greatest luxuriance in the valley of Toluca, and the plains of Cholula. The agave plant is set in rows, distant fifteen decimetres from one another. The juice or sap, commonly called the honey, from its abundant sweetness, is only afforded when the flowering stem is about to appear, so that it is of great importance to the cultivator to ascertain precisely this period. Its approach is indicated by the direction of the root leaves, which the Indian always watches and examines with great attention, and which, previously recurved, suddenly take an upward direction, and approximate, as if to enclose

(1) In alluding to the physiognomic character of the agave, Humboldt remarks: "What can be more strongly contrasted than a field of yellow wheat, a plantation of glaucous agave, and a grove of banana, whose lustrous leaves always preserve their own tender and delicate hue of green? Thus does man in all latitudes, by introducing and multiplying the various vegetable productions, modify at pleasure the aspect of the country around him."

In the "Aspects of Nature," the same illustrious author offers interesting observations on the physiognomy of the "aloe form" of vegetation, to which the agave belongs. He says: "In strong contrast with the extreme flexibility and fresh light-coloured verdure of the climbing plants, of which we have just been speaking, are the rigid self-supporting growth and bluish hue of the form of aloes, which, instead of plant stems and branches of enormous length, are either without stems altogether, or have branchless stems. The leaves, which are succulent, thick, and fleshy, and terminate in long points, radiate from a centre, and form a closely crowded tuft. The tall-stemmed aloes are not found in close clusters or thickets, like other social or gregarious plants or trees; they stand singly in arid plains, and impart thereby to the tropical regions in which they are found a peculiar, melancholy, and I would almost venture to call it, African character. Taking for our guides resemblance in physiognomy, and influence on the impression produced by the landscape, we place together, under the head of the aloe form (from among the Bromeliaceæ) the Pitcairnia, which in the chain of the Andes grow out of clefts in the rocks; the great Pourretia pyramidalis (the Atschupalla of the elevated plains of New Granada); the American Aloe (Agave), Bromelia Acanthos, and B. Bonplandii; from among the Euphorbiaceæ, the rare species which have thick short candelabra-like divided stems; from the family of Asphodelaceæ, the African Aloe, and the dragon-tree (Dracena Draco); and lastly, from among the Liliaceæ, the tall flowering Yucca."

And in a supplementary note, Humboldt observes:—

"In the candelabra shape of plants of the aloe form we must not confound the branches of an arborescent stem with flower stalks. It is the latter which in the American Aloe (Agave americana, Maguey de Cocuyusa, which is entirely wanting in Chili), as well as in the Yucca acutula (Maguey de Cocuy), presents in the rapid and gigantic development of the inflorescence a candelabrum-like arrangement of the flowers which, as is well known, is but too transient a phenomenon. In some arborescent Euphorbias, on the other hand, the physiognomic effect is given by the branches, and their division, or by ramification properly so called. Lichtenstein gives a vivid description of the impression made upon him by the appearance of a Euphorbia officinarum which he found in the 'Chamtoes River,' in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope; the form of the tree was so symmetrical, that the candelabrum-like arrangement was regularly repeated on a small scale in each of the subdivisions of the larger branches up to thirty-two English feet high. All the branches were armed with sharp spines."

the incipient flower-stalk. The bunch of central leaves next assumes a livelier green, and lengthens considerably; indications which the natives assured me never fail, and to which may be added several other less striking appearances in the general aspect of the plant. Daily does the cultivator examine his agave plantations, to watch which of these individuals promise to bloom, and if he himself entertains any doubt, he appeals to the village sages, the old Indians, whose long experience gives them an unerring precision both of touch and eye. At eight years old, or thereabouts, the Mexican agave generally shows signs of inflorescence, and then the collection of juice for making pulque begins. The bunch of central leaves, or 'corezon,' is cut through, the incision gradually enlarged and covered with the side leaves, which are raised up and tied together at their tips; in this cleft, the sap of those parts which were destined to form and nourish the gigantic flower-stem is deposited, and this vegetable spring flows for two or three months, and may be tapped three times a-day. The quantity of sap is enormous, and the more surprising, as the agave plantations are always made, by choice, in the most sterile soil, frequently on mere shelves of rock; scantily covered with vegetable earth; each plant is calculated to yield about 150 bottles, and at Pacuca the value of a maguey near flowering is from twenty to twenty-five francs, or five piastres. Still, the produce is apt to vary, and cannot be precisely calculated. Instances have, however, been known of a parent bequeathing a plantation of maguey worth from 70,000 to 80,000 piastres. The cultivation of the agave is attended with many real advantages above that of maize, wheat, or potatoes, as this sturdy, harsh, and fleshy-leaved plant is uninjured by the occasional drought, frost, and excessive cold which prevail in winter on the lofty Cordilleras of Mexico."

The agave juice is not collected in India, vinous beverages being formed from the date and cocoa-nut palms, which flourish in the same localities; these latter trees, with the agave, opuntia, and bamboo, give a character to the landscapes in Southern India. (Cleghorn.) The Tári, or fermented juice, and the Jagory, or insipidated juice, of the Palmyra palm, are in some parts of India more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengalese. The people of the Carnatic allege that the produce of the latter is very heating; they pretend to be very moderate in the use of the tári, but consume much of the jagory. Could it be converted into either a palatable spirituous liquor or sugar, the barren plains of the Carnatic might be rendered productive, and the whole of the grain distilled in Europe might be saved for food. (Buchanan.) The juices of various other plants are similarly used by the natives of tropical countries.

The leaves of the agave also supply a valuable fibre, which is obtained by maceration and beating on stones, and which is much used in India and other countries where the agave juice is unknown; specimens of the agave fibre were among the vegetable productions in the Indian department of the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park. "It is said that no thread is so much prized by physicians in Europe, as that which is extracted from agave leaves, (which are sometimes ten feet long, fifteen inches wide, and eight thick,) because it is not liable to twist, though the fibre of the New Zealand flax exceeds it in tenacity. Twine, thread, and rope are made of it; the latter is employed in the mires and on the western coast for rigging ships. The common juice of the plant, or that which it yields when not about to blossom, is highly caustic, and useful for cleansing wounds." It may well be said, therefore, that not only is the agave the Mexican vine, but it holds the place of the Asiatic hemp, and even the Egyptian paper-reed; for Humboldt observes:—"The ancient manuscripts of this country (i.e. Mexico) consisted of hieroglyphics, often inscribed on a paper made of numerous layers of the agave leaf, macerated in water, and glued together in the same manner as the pith of papyrus, and the bark of the paper mulberry of the Pacific Isles. I brought away many ancient specimens of this fabric, some as thick as pasteboard, others as thin as fine Indian paper, which are the more interesting, as all the Mexican records hitherto preserved at Rome, and in Spain, are inscribed on the skins of the Mexican deer." The strong spines with which the points of the fleshy leaves are armed serve the Indians for nails, pins, and needles, and by means of them the Mexican priests were accustomed to inflict wounds on their breasts and arms by way of expiation, as do the Buddhists in Hindostan. Dr. Cleghorn mentions that the lower decayed leaves of the agave are used as fuel in India in the absence of wood. The leaves and stem are likewise applied to other purposes; the centre of the flower-stalk, cut longitudinally, has been stated to be by no means a bad substitute for the European razor-strop, owing to the particles of silice which it contains, and which in a similar manner renders the stems of Equisetum ("Dutch rushes") useful for the polishing of wood, ivory, and brass. The juice from the leaves is sometimes dried, and when made into balls serves as a valuable substitute for soap.

We have not yet enumerated all the uses to which this valuable plant is applied. It is one of the most useful hedge-plants of tropical countries, and as such is noticed at length in an important paper on the Hedge Plants of India, read by Dr. H. F. C. Cleghorn, H. E. I. C. S., to the British Association at their Meeting at Edinburgh in 1850.² Dr. C. says:—

"In some parts of the Indian Peninsula the hedges are formed almost exclusively of this stately aloce-looking plant, which is both ornamental and useful. The flower-stalks rise to the height of fifteen to thirty feet, when ten or twelve years old, and are employed in roofing. It flowers in the rains. . . .

(1) It has only been recently pointed out, by M. Heiderich, that the plants so long cultivated in the Botanic Gardens of Europe under the name of Papyrus antiquorum, is not the true paper-reed of Egypt, but a distinct species. Vide "Hooker's Journal of Botany," vol. iii.

(2) The paper will be found in the Annals and Magazine of Natural History for October 1850.

This species is propagated by suckers, and young plants are in great request. There are hedges of this plant in Spain, Portugal, Sicily, Calabria, West Indies, South America, Mauritius, Capetown. Native gardens [in India] are often surrounded by mud walls, armed with agave leaves, the spines being made to project at both sides." Those only who really know the importance of fences in such a country as India, where the success of agricultural operations depends in a great measure upon them, can form a correct idea of the value of the agave in this respect. Buchanan mentions that the natives at Tayculum plant many aloes in their hedges, and use the leaves for making cordage. "It forms," says he, "a stroug fence against both man and beast, and thrives better in the arid soil of Mysore than in any other place that I have seen." The Marquis of Ormonde, in his "Autumn in Sicily," after detailing some facts respecting the agave, observes:—"A coarse thread, called zamborano, is made from the fibres of the leaves, but it is not much used except for halters, and purposes of that description. The aloes forms excellent fences, but not so impenetrable, nor so high, as the one of the Indian fig (Opuntia), for it seldom attains a greater height than five feet." In a paper published by Mr. Ball in the Botanical Gazette,⁴ he likewise alludes to the uses of the agave as a hedge-plant, mentioning that about Santarem, as at Lisbon and elsewhere along the valley of the Tagus, the hedges were principally formed by planting the Agave americana at about three feet apart; and as the older plants die off after flowering, young plants are placed in the intervals between them. Piptatherum multiflorum, unaccompanied by any other grass, grew abundantly in those hedges. We regard the agave highly as a hedge-plant; it is quite as formidable and indestructible as the opuntia, which the Grecian traveller, Clarke, suggested might serve in some latitudes as an outlook for fortifications; since, as he says, "artillery has no effect upon it; pioneers cannot approach it; fire will not act upon it; and neither infantry nor cavalry can traverse it!"⁵

LADIES' MEDICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

We desire earnestly and decidedly to impress upon the minds of our readers, that we are opposed to every movement which would tend, however remotely, to place woman in a false position in society; but we shall always advocate those measures which develop her utility, and increase her sphere of usefulness and occupation. The laws of God and nature have marked the boundaries wherein it is "meet, right, and her bounden duty" to exercise her influence, and certainly

(3) Buchanan's Journey, from Madras, through Mysore, Canara, and Malabar, vol. i. p. 36.

(4) Bot. Gazette, September 1851.

(5) Sir Hans Sloane mentions, in his History of Jamaica, that in the island of St. Christopher, when it was to be divided between English and French, it was ordered by the consent of the two nations that there should be planted three rows of the Opuntia Trees as a boundary, thinking these the strongest fortification to hinder the attempts of one another in cases of war.

they are by no means limited: on the contrary, they encircle vast space; and, to step beyond them, is neither for her own happiness nor for the good of others. In the United States they are, perhaps,—to write the simple phrase—"going too far;" but it is unquestionable that in that great country, and among a great people, reforms are in progress which, while they startle us by their magnitude, strike at the root of many social evils, and lay the foundations of improvements, of which the universe will reap the benefits hereafter.

Among other Institutions, one has been recently established at Philadelphia, to which the above title has been given. Mrs. Sarah Hale, an accomplished lady, whose writings are highly popular in her own country, and not unknown in this, has transmitted to us a document which we consider it right to print; although we shall at present do so with little or no comment:—

"A few ladies of Philadelphia have lately formed an association for the purpose of advancing educational and Christian improvement. The following preamble from their 'Rules,' &c. will best define their plans:—

"Believing that God, in committing the care of the young especially to woman, imposes on her the duty of preparing herself, in the best possible manner, for her important vocations, among which are the care of her own health, the physical well-being of her children, and tendance on the sick, suffering, and helpless; and finding, also, that the BIBLE recognises and approves only woman in the sacred office of midwife, therefore we, who give our names to this benevolent association, agree to unite in the following purposes:—

"1st. To cooperate with the efforts now being made in this city of Philadelphia, to qualify women to become physicians for their own sex and for children.

"2d. To give kindly encouragement to those females who are engaged in medical studies.

"3d. To give aid and sympathy to any among them who may desire to become missionaries, and go, in the spirit of love, to carry to the poor suffering women of heathendom, not only the blessings of the healing art, which Christian men can rarely, if ever, bear to females in those lands, but also the higher and holier knowledge of the true God, and of salvation through his Son Jesus Christ."

"The propriety of admitting young women to the study of medicine, and qualifying them to become physicians for their own sex and for children, is now not only generally acknowledged in our country, but has, to some extent, been provided for. Miss Blackwell, the pioneer in this praiseworthy undertaking, after graduating with the highest honours from an American medical college, went, as our readers are aware, to Paris and London to complete her studies. Having won from the faculty in those cities the acknowledgment of her full qualifications to practise the art of medicine and enjoy its degrees of honour, she has returned to this country and opened the office in the city of New York. Several other female graduates are now in full practice in that city and in Philadelphia.

"In Boston, 'The Female Medical Education Society,' was organized, and opened its School in November, 1848. In April, 1850, the Society was incorporated by the Massachusetts Legislature. After a protracted debate and severe scrutiny of the subject, only four votes were cast against it, which proves most conclusively the favourable opinion this respectable body of men entertained for female medical education. The School, thus incorporated, has received from sixty to seventy female students, many of whom have already gone into practice as nurses and midwives: but, as a full course of medical lectures was not given, none have graduated as physicians. The plan is now to be perfected, and we may expect it to prosper greatly. The 'Society' pledged to support this College numbers, we believe, nearly two thousand persons, among whom are found the names of distinguished statesmen, clergymen, physicians, merchants, and 'honourable women not a few.' New England has fully sanctioned the medical education of women. Indeed, the 'physicians of Boston' deserve much respect for their liberal views in regard to this effort to reinstate woman in the natural and Scriptural custom of tendance on her own sex, which must also include all necessary knowledge of the diseases of childhood.

"But Boston is not alone in this great, because good, work. 'The Female Medical College of Pennsylvania' was incorporated in 1849, and opened at Philadelphia in 1850. During these two years it has numbered about sixty students in all, though a number were only attendants on particular branches. Its plan of studies and lectures corresponds with those of the male medical colleges in this city; its students are very assiduous, and give promise of much usefulness; and several are expected to graduate at the close of the present season.

"The views and reasons which have led to the establishment of the two colleges thus briefly noticed, may be best understood by extracts from their own publications. The following is from the Introductory Lecture of one of the Faculty, who opened the 'Female College' at Philadelphia:—

"The education of Females as Practitioners of Medicine is not the only aim or intention of the Trustees and Faculty; they desire, by a complete course of lectures in medical science, to show her the delicate and beautiful machinery which her Creator has formed, that thus she may be enabled to aid the suffering, make the path of the departing less rugged, and teach her associates to repel in advance the insidious approaches of disease, to which she now, from ignorance of their effects, too freely exposes herself and her offspring."

"In April, 1851, the 'Female Medical Education Society of Boston' asked the Legislature for aid. The committee to whom the petition was referred made a favourable report, from which we will quote—

"FEMALE PRACTITIONERS IN MIDWIFERY.—Your committee have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that there ought to be a class of thoroughly educated females for this department of professional duty. So far from being a departure of woman from the duties appropriate to her sex, it appears peculiarly her province. And it seems an unfortunate oversight, that this branch of female education has thus far been neglected in our country. In the countries of the Old World, women have filled this office from the days of the 'Hebrew Midwives' to the present time. The governments of most of the European states provide institutions for the education and training of this class of persons, and allow none to practise but those who are properly qualified.

"FEMALE PHYSICIANS.—The education of females as physicians is specified as one of the objects of the Society that petitions for aid. It is not, however, expected that they are to supplant the present medical profession, but rather be auxiliary to it, thus rendering it more complete and useful. There is, at present, a want in this respect that has been felt and expressed by many physicians, and in reference to which the testimony of an eminent medical authority will here be presented.

"Professor Meigs, of the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, in his recent work on the Diseases of Females, thus speaks upon this point: "The relations between the sexes are of so delicate a character, that the duties of the medical practitioner are necessarily more difficult when he comes to take charge of any one of the great host of female complaints, than when he is called to treat any of the more general disorders. So great, indeed, is the embarrassment, that I am persuaded that ~~most~~ of the ill-success of treatment may justly be traced thereto.

"All these evils of medical practice spring not, in the main, from any want of competency in medicines or medical men; but from the delicacy of the relations existing, and, in a good degree, from a want of information among the population in general as to the import, and meaning, and tendency of disorders manifested by a certain train of symptoms.

"It is, perhaps, best, upon the whole, that this great degree of modesty should exist, even to the extent of putting a bar to researches. I confess I am proud to say that, in this country, generally, certainly in many parts of it, there are women who prefer to suffer the extremity of danger and pain, rather than waive those scruples of delicacy which prevent their maladies from being fully explored. I say, it is an evidence of the dominion of a fine morality in our society."

"In cases where these difficulties are nearly or quite insurmountable, Dr. Meigs recommends the call of a midwife, if one is to be found, to assist in the investigation; thus giving his testimony in favour of having a class of educated women of this description, if it be only to act as assistants to physicians.

"It is obvious, however, that the evils in question may readily be removed by the education of females as physicians for their own sex."

"To these reasons might be urged others equally important, and one of such serious magnitude as no Christian should overlook. It is proved by data which cannot be questioned, that the practice of midwifery by men is not only injurious, but destructive of human life. In Boston, for several past years, out of 4,000 annual births, the dead-born have averaged 800 yearly, or one in every fourteen. In the Hospital of Maternity, in Paris, entirely under a Female Superintendent, Madame Boivin, out of 21,802 births, only 783 were still-born, a fraction over one in twenty-eight; about half the ratio in Boston!!!

"Let these facts be considered, and we do not see how any conscientious man or woman can withhold approval of this plan of female medical education and practice. It is not new. The unnatural and degrading practice has never been prevalent on the continent of Europe; not even now in France, where there are, in the city of Paris alone, over six hundred licensed midwives, and several hundred are every year educated by Government for the provinces.

"It is in England, and the northern and middle portion of the United States that man-midwifery chiefly prevails. Yet it is but about eighty years since it was first ventured upon in America. It cannot long continue, now that public attention is called to the subject, and it is found that, in nine-tenths of the world, female physicians for their own sex are, and ever have been, employed successfully, and that there is actually less feebleness among women in those countries than in our own, where constitutional ill-health in the mothers is fast making us a nation of invalids. This is not directly the fault of the regular physicians, perhaps, but results, indirectly, from the increased ignorance of women respecting their own diseases and those of their children, since the practice has been monopolized by men. This ignorance leads people of both sexes often to employ quacks, and resort to poisonous nostrums.

"Ignorance and mystery always induce superstition, and the false is then worshipped for the true. Why else do we see, in this city of Philadelphia, the boasted seat of medical science, where six colleges for the regular training of doctors are located, that quackery lifts its head like a second tower of Babel, and steam-engines are driving onward the manufacture of pills and poisons, as though these were to support the nation? The inventors and preparers of these medicines win the confidence of the people from the regular physician, and gain wealth while he studies in vain, because he has kept his art in concealment, particularly from women, who is the real conservator of health, as of home. Let the good and learned physicians of Philadelphia open schools for training female medical students, and permit any lady who pays the matriculation fee to attend one course of lectures, and their halls would be crowded. The study of medicine belongs to woman's department of knowledge: its practice is in harmony with the duties of mother and nurse, which she must fulfil. It is not going out of her sphere to prescribe for the sick; she must do this by the fireside, the bedside, in the 'inner chamber,' where her true place is. It is man who is there out of his sphere. And now let the effort be to give all females that knowledge of the laws of health and of their own frames which will lead them to improve the modes of training children, and preserve them from the need of medical treatment.

"Then, when real diseases occurred, and danger was apprehended, the most worthy and eminent physicians would be employed, trusted, honoured. Quackery would be swept away as superstitious notions are when the people are enlightened, and the learned professor of medicine would no longer be eclipsed by every pretender who can prepare a pill and pay for a puff.

"But this appeal, which 'The Ladies' Medical Missionary Society' now makes to the Christian public, is mainly in aid of preparing the wives of missionaries to act as physicians for the women and children among whom their station, either domestic or foreign, may be found. And, more important still, we wish to aid in educating pious unmarried ladies who may be willing to go out as medical missionaries. What a blessing to a mission family to be accompanied by a competent female physician, who would be an adviser as well as comforter in the hour of sickness! She might act as teacher till called to her profession; and, though she would practise gratuitously among the poor in heathen lands, yet, when an entrance was gained to the more wealthy, she would doubtless receive rich presents, and be able to assist, materially, the cause of missions."

We trust our readers will give serious attention to this subject—reading this preliminary paper attentively, and with respect for the statements it contains. In England, less than any country of the world, have women been counselled upon cases in which women must have the surest and easiest facilities for acquiring knowledge: it is not only a hard, it is generally a thankless, task to encounter prejudice; and it is a true saying, that custom is second nature; but our age has been fertile of changes for good, and we may safely hope that a time is approaching, when the custom especially under notice will cease to be adhered to with a pertinacity which has been so often fatal. There can be no doubt that all classes of society would prefer to employ women in peculiar cases, if there were conclusive evidence of the fitness of women for a task upon which always so much depends; and who will be bold enough to affirm, that if women were duly, wisely, and by system, educated for the discharge of such duties, they would be incompetent to perform them?

The subject is one that requires great delicacy of treatment; and, in thus introducing it, we leave much to the mingled reason and imagination of the reader.

IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE AUTUMN OF 1851.¹

FROM THE LETTERS AND MEMORANDA OF FREDERICKA BREMER.

As I saw the impossibility of my being able, during this week, with any degree of completeness, to make myself acquainted with the Exhibition in its separate parts, I satisfied myself with endeavouring to comprehend its great characteristic features, and the peculiarities in the life and manufactures of the various nations. I wandered therefore hour by hour, from the lands of the west to those of the east, and from the north to the south, from the Polar regions to the Equator, from North America to China, from Sweden to Russia, from Turkey to France, from Germany to England, and so on, thus allowing the force of contrast and the things themselves to operate upon my mind as they would.

The first impression in this manner made upon me, and which further acquaintance only the more increased, was:

How good mother earth is, after all, to every one of her children! From north to south, from east to west, everywhere upon the habitable earth, has she, in metals, in green plants and trees, in noble fruits, in useful animals, in the whole wealth of nature's kingdoms, given to man a rich and, upon the whole, a wonderfully equal measure. Merely in the higher polar circle, in the realms of eternal frost, and beneath the equator, in those of eternal heat, seems her kindness, or more properly speaking, her capability, to have a limit: for to her children there, the step-children of nature, she still gives good things and gladness in sufficient abundance for them, who know nothing better.

The second thought which struck me was, the use which mankind now makes of the gifts of the earth;

"Replenish the earth and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth on the earth: and behold I have given thee every herb bearing seed, and every tree!"

Between this beginning in the beginning of time, and this present moment of time, many thousand years later, in this year which we call 1851, and its so-called World's Fair, there was a difference, and yet—a similarity.

For then in the beginning, in that first year of the world, No. 1, the capital was given to work with, the capital which was placed in the stewardship of man.

And now, in 1851 had a message gone forth through one of God's stewards, and an invitation to all people on the face of the earth, to come and show what they had done with the capital which they had received in the beginning. They should come—each with his portion, his pound—and show the use they had made of it.

They should come and assemble in an island in the world's sea, over which a young Queen reigned, and should be gathered in a great palace there, which had been built for them, transparent, open to all the rays of light: a palace of clear glass, erected in a garden. Here should the people from all the ends of the earth meet in a fraternal circle, become acquainted with each other's manners and manufactures, arts and ability. Here should their productions be viewed, their genius and art be compared and judged; there should human knowledge in this union comprehend itself, prove its work and say: "See! thus far have we advanced hitherto!" And after that a new career should begin, with new inspirations, and higher views. This should thus become a new beginning. Such was the design; and the call went forth from the noble Prince who felt himself called upon to stand at the head of this great undertaking.

And the people came from all the ends of the earth. It was a pleasure to see how joyfully and willingly they came, when they rightly understood the invitation. It was a pleasure and a gladness to see them assembled in the Crystal Palace, exhibiting what they had done with the riches of the earth—each in his place and according to his own way—to see their productions spread out here at the World's Fair!

That the civilized nations, they who dwelt nearest to the magical circle of the Island's Queen, should come with their goods and their treasures was to be expected; that was quite natural. They anticipated therefrom their own certain gain. But that also the people who lay most remote, who dwelt, so to say, in the corners of the earth, that they also should come, with the little they had to bring, that was astonishing and delightful! It showed that the human families in this great garden of the earth, spite of distance, spite of difference in temperament and in colour, had nevertheless begun to acknowledge each other as brethren, as children of the same heavenly Father, and the same earthly mother.

And if the Esquimaux indicated their presence in this great assembly of the nations, merely by some rough hewn timber, it was evident they were as yet too much of Esquimaux—or rather, not sufficiently so, in the higher sense; and showed in that which was rare to them, the wood and the artistic skill, something more valuable than what they might have exhibited from the great treasure-chamber which God gave them: that great sea with the fish, and the mighty whale that goes therein. With better comprehension had the Ashantees, from the Gold Coast of Africa, sent cloth which they had woven of grass and cotton. And the deadly enemy of the White man from the Cape had, symbolically enough, sent his bow and his arrows. Many a wild race from Asia and Africa sent their cloth, musical instruments, ornaments, weapons, all made from the vegetable kingdom. The North American Indian had sent his ornamental light canoe, made from a hollow tree-trunk; the naturalized Negroes from tropical America their utensils and their drums made from the Calabash, their ornamentally woven baskets; and most beautiful of all these simple creations, were those which had been sent from the islands of the South Sea, which Queen Pomare, the Queen of the Society Isles, had sent, mats of Pandanus, small crowns of Tacca, and garments woven from the fibre of the bread-fruit tree.

(1) Continued from p. 136.

In contemplating the productions of these dissimilar people, it was wonderful to see how the people of kindred races had applied the gifts of the earth to similar uses. The Christian people, of the so-called Circassian descent, had everywhere on the face of the earth, in Asia as well as in America, in Siberia and Hindostan, in Canada and Chili, in Egypt and at the Cape, in Iceland and Australia, in Sweden and in Italy, developed the same artistic skill, and for the same objects. When they came together here, the various peoples, but of the same race, from their different places, and exhibited the raw materials which nature had given them in metals, plants, etc., and the uses to which they had converted them, they were found to be wonderfully similar! The same in mechanical inventions and the fine arts. It was observed with some surprise that Cairo, Constantinople, London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Stockholm, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, New York, had none of them anything essentially new to teach each other, or to learn the one from the other, either in manufactures or art. The development of the race had, at these widely different points of the earth, progressed in the same proportion and simultaneously, although the differences in genius and character were unmistakable. But in no instance had any one people outgone others in anything new.

This involuntarily leads to the thought of a development in the human race based upon profounder laws, more profound natural powers than the empirical reality, than that which is produced by means of merely outward circumstances, however much these may contribute to it.

In the same way it was observable that the so-called wild races of the earth bore the same relative resemblance to each other. The Indian and the Negro, the Samoyed and the Caribee have probably the same turn of mind, the same object in life, the same method of constructing their dwellings, their weapons, their garments, of holding their feasts, and making their ornaments. In mechanism and art they give themselves as little trouble as possible; that which comes nearest to hand in the vegetable or animal kingdom, furnishes them with clothing, dwellings and ornament; they wish only to eat, sleep, and amuse themselves; they take life easily, that is plain. Their ideas of life are few, and not elevated. They appear always to have been the same, with the exception of occasional individuals who stand as the geniuses of the race, but who hitherto have not been able to inspire the race. They pass through these dark races as prophets indicative of a possibly approaching and higher transformation. These races appear here like stray children in the family of the earth.

The Chinese stand among the people of the earth, precisely as they stood several hundred years ago. They represent the ultra-conservative element in the assembly of the earth's people: the extremest east. Remarkable is it that the extremest west, North America now in California, comes face to face, and touching upon this extremest east, and that the Pacific Ocean seems calculated to unite them, as far at least as such opposites can unite! Their tea is still prepared in the same way; their porcelain is equally fine and has the same form, and the painting upon it is equally without perspective; their Chinese figures are alike uncouth at this very day as they were six hundred years ago. Nevertheless, one must confess that among those later ones may be seen some countenances with more physiognomy in them, more human soul than we have been accustomed to see in Chinese portraiture of the human form. This Celestial Empire, to judge by its artistic skill and its immovability, in contrast with the people of the Western continent, is as a castle of crystal to a living growing tree, as a chrysalis to a butterfly.

Another comparison which involuntarily presented itself to the spectator of the mechanical Exhibition, was, the relation betwixt the first raw materials given by nature, and their change in the hands of man, or rather through human art and knowledge. What a distance, for example, and what a development between the first formation of glass, as an accidental fusion of sand and ashes, which some thousands of years ago led some Phœnician merchants by the river Belus, to the discovery; what a distance between this bit of glass, melted together under the boiling pot in the sand of the desert, and the glass Palace in Hyde-Park and the Crystal Fountain in its midst, blending and refracting the streams of light and water in a thousand harmoniously glittering rays!

And again. See these lumps of green malachite as they are found in the Burra-Burra mine of Australia, or in Russian earth, and the brilliant doors, vases and tables, fitting ornaments of imperial halls.

And again:—There is the Swedish iron just as it is brought from the mines of Dannemora, the best iron in the world, say unanimously the critical judges of the Exhibition, and there, near its dull, shapeless masses, the Ericson iron-engine, which shall put the whole world into a more rapid motion than hitherto.

And still further:—Here is the flax, a little plant that in the North, at the feet of the fir-trees, nods in the wind, with its flowers of tender and delicate hue. Along the belt of great pine-woods which encircle the earth at the polar boundaries, stands in Sweden the flax in its finest condition, "for most lovely is the flax in the North." And between the flax and the pine-trees there is a relationship worthy of being illustrated in a legend of Hans Christian Andersen.

The tender flax is cherished under the protection of the pine-woods, and grows humbly at their feet. It is reaped by the hand of man, carried away from the pine-woods, is prepared, spun, and woven. The proud pines fall before the axe into the rushing mountain streams; and are floated by them out to the sea. Here they raise themselves again, but naked, without branch or leaf. On the sea they meet with the flax again; but changed. The flax has become canvass, and clothes the pine to its very top with a foliage of white sails playing in the wind. The little modest plant has become the ruler of the tree, and carries it away with it out into the wide world, to sail the ocean, to convey the productions of the earth from one nation to another, to live and die together far from their native soil. Thus they have come to the Crystal Palace with the earth's treasures from distant lands! and they appear together, the tree and the plant, even in the Exhibition in the Swedish spinning-wheel with the tow on the distaff.

Similar comparisons, and still more remarkable as it regards the change from the production of nature to the production of art, might be instituted in general, and demonstrated in everything in the Exhibition. Electricity could not indeed be displayed here in its first form to the human imagination, namely in the thunderbolt of Jupiter; but here was shown the use which the spirit of Prometheus in man has made of the dreaded fire in the clouds over his head, and the mysterious strength which he felt without knowing it under the name of Electricity. We saw this destroying fire taken out of the clouds and employed by man for the benefit of earth; we saw human hands play with Jupiter's thunderbolt. We saw in a variety of electrical operations, the result of deep inquiry and daring attempt, and in these the progressive development of science. We saw finally in the Electrical Telegraph, the earth, as it were, woven over with a nervous system, and bearing, like the veins in the human body, the message of thoughts and feelings, with the rapidity of lightning from one point to the other. We saw through these airy lines peoples and nations drawn together; saw the lightning become the messenger of man; speak with the human tongue (in electrotypes); and the earth become as it were, a man! The electrical machinery in the north-west gallery in the Exhibition, had a world-embracing importance.

The western part of the Crystal Palace, extending from the transept, belonged almost entirely to Great Britain, and its colonies; the eastern half was occupied by the foreign powers.

In the oriental rooms were seen costly furniture and ornamental articles, in every precious material; but a want of beauty and taste in form, excepting in some costume. Comfort, enjoyable still life appeared to be the leading principle of dwellings, furniture and dress. You saw much cloth of gold, rich, heavy drapery; everything soft, easy, adapted to the physical feeling and grateful to the eye; no glaring colours, no sharp forms. They exhibited fine shawls and cloths from Hindostan, distinguished for their subdued and blending colours. You here noticed the excellent systematic arrangement of the articles in the Turkish department, and the riches of the natural productions of all the countries over which the Sultan rules. The Turk, who at the present time shows himself to be a better Christian than many of Europe's Christian kings, displayed a great perfection in traditional art, but a want of higher knowledge.

Greece sent her honey from Hymettus, and beautiful blocks of marble; of that marble from which its celebrated statues of the gods were hewn. Marble blocks are still found in Greece; but the statues of the gods!

Egypt, Persia, Arabia, sent precious natural productions in stone and earths. Their manufactures are pretty much the same as those of Turkey. They are in the industrial arts and science far behind the western nations. But in certain things, it seems to me, the oriental stands as the eldest son, as the heir by entail in the world's house. He has palms, he has coffee, which we all must purchase from him, he has rich spices, he has tea, without which we cannot well live; he has fragrant oils, beautiful colours which must have had their origin in Paradise: he has the elephant and the ostrich; he has much in the living life, and much in the ancient mysterious arts; in architecture, in painting and in writing, which the more modern, which the European people have not, and cannot acquire, let them spin and weave, and try and invent and perfect as much as they please. And he knows it, and, therefore, he sits comfortably with his legs crossed upon his soft mat, and drinks his Mocha, and smokes his pipe, and looks with a calm smile upon the restless exertions of his younger brother, and—is far behind him in the career of emulation, at least in the mechanical Exhibition.

And now that younger brother,—but in order that we may see him in the form which presents the strongest contrast to that of the east, we will see him first in the extreme west, in the United States of North America. But—the United States cannot be said to have been fully represented at the congress of the nations in the Crystal Palace. Brother Jonathan had too much to look after at home to have time to come forth in his full pomp to brother John. He contented himself with freighting a ship of war with such trophies of peace as came readiest to hand. In many species of minerals he sent proofs of his great affluence in that kingdom of nature; in some enormous machines he gave proof of the activity of the spirit of invention on his side the Ocean; he sent his light carriages, his golden Indian corn, upon the whole more indicative of a great, increasingly growing people, with unlimited capabilities in the regions of nature and human intelligence, than any decided representation of a people who fully know and are in possession of themselves and their resources. It could not indeed be otherwise. Nevertheless, it is extraordinary that the new world has exhibited on this occasion the best plough, and the most beautiful female figure in marble, Hiram Power's Greek Slave. I see in this a prophetic symbol of a development of the highest material, and the highest ideal reality, which—this is not the place further to touch upon. But one thing I know: the sun is warm in the land of the Hesperides, and powerful enough to ripen all its fruit.

This so-called Greek Slave, this captive woman, with her fettered hands, I had seen many times on the other side of the Atlantic, in copies of the original, cold, weak copies of that original which I saw here for the first time. The copies had left a cold impression on my mind. The original seized upon me with an unusual power, as no other statue in marble had done. This noble woman with her bound-down hands, who so quietly turned her head with its unspeakably deep expression of sorrow and indignation—scorn is not a sufficiently noble word—against the power which bound her; that lip which is silent, but which seems to quiver with the tumult of wounded feeling, with the throbbing of her heart. I wonder whether Power himself comprehended the whole of its significance!

A service of gold from California was a very befitting representative from that Western Gold Coast, "Old California," which as yet has nothing more valuable to show. I here saw once more that beautiful moss "Tillandsia Nouvidis," from the Southern States, but quite unlike it as I had seen it hanging in long draped masses from the branches of the enormous live oaks, forming with these the most glorious natural gothic churches which any one can conceive.

An American eagle displayed aloft above an organ, also from the other side of the Atlantic, governed with its star-spangled banner the lower or eastern portion of the nave, and glanced towards the western or British side.

Let us now pass over to Europe.

France must be acknowledged as the queen of taste. In the departments which were devoted to its silver wares, its embroidery, carpets, flowers, costly woven goods, and works of various kinds, a delicate perfume was diffused around. It was as if there breathed around all those exquisite and tasteful creations a something of their own life, or of that which gave them existence. There was a peculiar, a nameless delight diffused through these departments, an indescribable grace in form, in colour, in delineation, a refined, ethereal art in the greatest as well as in the smallest thing. This was particularly striking when we came into this portion of the Exhibition from the English or the German departments.

Nothing struck me as so characteristic, as so peculiarly German, in the German department, as its statues. Those figures from the Niebelungen Lied, with their depth of will and earnestness; those immortal youths and maidens, in whose romantic beauty a half wild mystical power charms and commands, powerfully and pleasantly as the might of nature itself—they testify to the spirit of Germany, to powers of nature and of mind, such as no science is able to fathom, no exhibition fully to become the exponent of. That ancient, profound depth of life, from which the noblest spirits of Germany, its warriors, deep-thinkers and poets came forth, Hermann and Gottfried, Schiller and Goethe, Shelling and Hegel and Baader, spoke from these noble works of art by German artists, and bore witness that the creative power of Germany lives still fresh and young to inspire new spheres of life.

France had exhibited some plastic works of art with a horrible reality belonging to the satanic class. England had also much sculpture, noble, full of deep thought, natural and true—as for instance, statues of Hampden and Fairfax, expressive of powerful character, actuality, and a will firm as the rock, but they possessed not that German poesy, not that nameless bortom bergen, (beyond the mountain,) which extends the boundaries of the visible world, and opens the mind to the invisible, unknown worlds, at the same time to be and not to be as yet.

ZOLLVEREIN was the simple prosaic inscription over many noble German works of art from various German States. The poetic meaning of that prosaic word seemed to me to be, a union which would consider the various works from various states, as the offspring of one common mind, one common life, as a common mother-land, and not, as belonging to different states, princes and people. "ZOLLVEREIN" seemed to be a prelude to "UNITED GERMANY."

Spain and Portugal came forward in the Crystal Palace with rich treasures out of the vegetable and mineral kingdom. Botanists and mineralogists found here much to interest them. The Queen of Spain sent hither her jewels for the people to gaze upon—a collection which reminded me of the story-world of the Arabian Nights, that world of diamonds and jewels and pearls, which enchanted not only mine, but many another youthful imagination. Here too I saw, but without being enchanted, the largest diamond in the world, Koh-i-noor, as it is called, and which being here contemplated within its little glass palace, appeared to my profane eyes as a mere bit of glass without brilliancy. In other circumstances, placed upon a noble human breast, or on a beautiful, kingly brow, I might probably have seen it with other eyes.

Italy still appeared to me, among the people of the earth, as the old master in fine art. But some figures with veils of marble seem to testify of a veiled impotence.

Switzerland emulated France in industrial skill, art and finery. In great as well as in small, embroidery, woven goods—it was not possible to find anything more beautiful in work, or in taste and richness of design.

Belgium also testified by its productions to the existence of an industrious, affluent, and well developed people.

And what must I say about the crowds and masses of articles designed for the convenience or embellishment of life, for its benefit or its enjoyment, which England, Germany, France, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland produced, alike in clothes, domestic utensils, furniture, carriages, ornaments, porcelain, glass, &c. &c. &c.? I must say—nothing at all, because the subject is overpowering; and I wandered about the whole like a thankless one among this abundant affluence, both as regarded human wants and luxury.

When I wandered, therefore, among the English manufactured articles—through aisles upon aisles, halls after halls, rooms after rooms—as one might say, through a forest of wares, a little world for me, I confess I was more depressed than elevated, that I felt as it were an inclination to—run away to the woods.

And yet it was England, which in another respect made upon me and must have made upon every one, the deepest impression in this the World's Exhibition. England with its Colonies, occupied, as I have already remarked, the entire one-half of the Crystal Palace, from the western entrance to the transept. One wandered here from the east to the west, from the Polar circles to the tropics, and everywhere the eye fell upon traces of England's power. Everywhere, one saw people and lands which acknowledged England as their ruler. In Hindustan, one saw the Hindoo governed by the English sway. Hindustan which sent her rich treasures to England, and imaged representations of the life of her people, stands with her body and soul under the control of England. Australia sent tributes to England in her beautiful fruits ripened under a tropical sun, with its gold and its rich minerals; so also did New Zealand, in strange plants and animals. And pictures of the scenery of these islands show how beautiful is the heaven, how rich the earth in these distant realms, vast as continents, for which foggy England frames laws. Canada came from North America with the beautiful timber of her woods, her northern beasts from the forest and from the sea, and her Indian races which acknowledge the government of England. From the Islands of the South Sea did the emancipated slave-race send treasure to England their liberator and their Queen. Africa sent through the English Colonies on its coasts its homage to their Queen, to the Queen of the sea and of commerce. From all these so widely separated portions of the earth has England, by fair means and foul, compelled the people and the earth to her submission, and has impressed upon them the stamp of her laws and her civilization. And, to make use of an expression of Daniel Webster's in the Congress of the United States, "From the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, is beat the réveille of the British drum."

And it is England—that little island, which one can cross in a few hours by the railway from side to side, in all directions; it is this little nation, Britannia, which has done all this; which sits like a Queen Victoria upon the sea, extending her sceptre from the one pole to the other, from the east to the west; it is the people of this little island which have populated North America, and through its people have stamped their impression upon the states and population of the New World, even as far as Panama in the south, as far as the Pacific Ocean in the west, where again the west and the east meet across the ocean and excite one another—as the Vikings of old—to song or to combat, or to the solution of the profound riddle.

At the contemplation of this dominion, which increases with every year in extent and importance, the question arises in the mind as to the mission of England in the history of the world; one sees that England is designed to extend her civilization to a great portion of the earth, and the inquiry involuntarily arises, "What causes England to be a Victoria Regina among the nations of the earth? This queen is small and yet—so great!"

The power of arms it is not. We have seen what the power of arms is able to accomplish; we have seen that in France under Napoleon. It might conquer, but it could not maintain its hold. We Swedes fought bravely, also, at one time, conquered countries, dethroned and set up kings; but were unable to establish for ourselves a dominion—excepting in history. No, the might of arms it is not, not the might of weapons of war alone, nor principally so, which gives the power to England. England's power consists principally in its weapons of peace. It is not difficult to see this, especially when one remarks the advance of civilization in the wildernesses of Western America. It is under the standards of religion and of commerce that England has founded her dominion. It is the English spirit which everywhere settles down and holds home to be sacred—home, woman's world and influence, the church and the school are they which give to England a firm footing everywhere upon the face of the earth. It is that great human sentiment in the popular English heart which makes this mighty in humanity; it is the high civilization of England which makes England the civilizer of the world.

But the English people must not be, considered separate from the people who took part in its earliest life and history; and England is, more than any other nation, a nation of many nations, in the same way as its language is composed of many languages. It is easy to trace in the life, disposition, and language of the English people the influence of the Scandinavian race. The Vikings, the Sea-kings who invaded their coasts, gave them as an inheritance—their turn for discovery and adventure; that restless enterprising spirit which sent them forth in fragile vessels to visit all seas, and to open the way for the discovery of the new world. With our ancestors, also, was the home a sacred room. In proof of their profound sentiment for religion and for the union of heaven and earth, may be mentioned their glorious myths and most ancient songs; Ygdrasil and the soothsaying of Vala. And a yet deeper inquiry into the ancient knowledge, the oldest sagas and songs of England, would prove even to this very time still more clearly the deep impression of the spirit of the Northmen upon its people and country. It is becoming more and more firmly recognised in England that the world-conquering, world-civilizing English people are not the Anglo-Saxon but the Anglo-Norman race. It is the Ynglingar, (the Immortal Youths,) and their line in the Scandinavian North, that the sons and daughters of England and North America must reckon as their ancestors. They are descended from the Vikings. They are that, but they are, also, still more. It is the mission of the Anglo-Norman, already commenced in the history of the world, to develop in a yet much higher degree the Viking disposition, so that when earth is conquered, heaven may be won to earth, in a harmonious concord, a richer comprehension of life, a more beautiful earth, a better, fairer and more happy humanity.'

I will now return to the Exhibition, and—thus make an end of it. I yet visited it again three different times; twice upon the so-called higher-class days, when the admission was five shillings, and when merely from sixty to seventy thousand persons were in the building; but I was quite as much crushed then as upon the regular one shilling days; and again, for the last time, on the day when the Exhibition was terminated and the Crystal Palace closed to the public.

My impressions, however, still remained, for the most part, the same as on my first visit. I will therefore say nothing further respecting them. And such as would have a perfect knowledge of this Exhibition, its history, character and wealth, need not therefore come to me, but to The Illustrated Catalogue of the Exhibition, edited by Mr. S. C. Hall, the excellent editor of the Art Journal, and published by George Virtue, which work, with its many beautiful engravings, and its interesting enumeration of the scientific, artistic, botanic, and other world's wonders of the Exhibition, will fully satisfy, as well as serve for a guide and a reminder to those who were there, and to console and to compensate those who were not.

On the last public day of the Exhibition it was visited by one hundred and twenty thousand persons. Towards evening, I was told, many paid their half-crown merely to be once more, for one short hour in the Crystal Palace; to see, once more, the scenes and the objects which had given them so much delight, and to listen to the murmur of the fountains and of the vast multitude.

When the day was ended, and the time come when all must leave the Palace, the popular anthem of "God save the Queen!" was struck up. The men took off their hats, all became still, and this song of the people was sung by a hundred thousand voices. A right worthy English termination of the Great Exhibition.

The day following; the day on which it was to be closed by the Queen and Prince Albert, people were only admitted by special-tickets or by favour; I was admitted through both; for a ticket was sent me, and my excellent friends, Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, took me with them. The weather was horrible. The wind blew, and it poured with rain.

But, no matter; everything without and within the Crystal Palace went on as usual, and we entered without difficulty. A great number of articles had already been removed. The side aisles were almost empty; but the statues yet remained in the great centre nave, and the fountains still played in the western portion of the transept. In the middle of the transept had been raised an erection upon which stood a dozen chairs placed in a half-circle, and in the centre of these stood a royal fautuil—only one, so much the worse! The Queen would not come, only Prince Albert. People were glad to see Prince Albert; but they would have been much more glad to have seen the Queen. What a pity that she did not come! Everybody said so. Everybody had wished to see the Queen close the Exhibition, even as she had opened it, and to hear her speak. I most of all. I could not but desire to see that royal, little head which people said was so well formed; to see that bust, the shoulders of which were said to be so beautiful; to hear that voice the tones of which people imagined to be so harmonious; that delivery which was praised for its excellence, and the words of which were understood by all. I would so willingly have heard her say words like these with which she opened the Exhibition:—

"It is my heartfelt wish to promote among the nations the cultivation of all the arts which are the offspring of peace, and which are calculated to maintain the peace of the world."

I fancied that if I had here seen and heard her I should have been able, through some feature of her physiognomy, or from her demeanour, to have gained a clearer conception of her than I yet had done. That which I had hitherto heard of her had made me curious about her, but had not enabled me to come to a clear idea respecting her. I wanted to have seen this queen among her people; I wanted, from something in her own individual person, to have found the key to that sort of magic power which she has over the English people, and which made them enchanted with a little queen, who allows them to pay 119,000*l.* for her stables and dog-kennels! I should then have been able to discover whether this power was from above, the power of mind over minds, or from below, a fragment of that old pagan sense, which, infatuated by appearance, makes the cloud appear a goddess. I would have given something to have seen Queen Victoria here. But vain was the wish! I was not to see her at this time—but later.

The upper galleries were full of people. Down below, however, there was plenty of room. Prince Albert came, accompanied by the Archbishop of Canterbury, together with several gentlemen, all plainly dressed; it was a simple, unostentatious procession, and was received with loud huzzahs and the fluttering of banners from the upper galleries. Prince Albert bowed right and left, with an open, grave countenance, and took his seat in the arm-chair upon the elevation in the middle of the Crystal Palace. His attendants seated themselves around him, opposite to him the gentlemen who had taken the most active part in the Crystal Palace, its erection, the arrangement of the Exhibition, and so on. I could see the Prince extremely well from the place where I sat. But I was thankless; I would much rather have seen the Queen, and, therefore, I looked perhaps with less indulgent eyes upon Prince Albert. His countenance, with its pure regular features, with the high forehead, which appeared higher from the baldness of the temples, seemed to me deficient in animation and interest. Nevertheless, it was a fine, frank, honest countenance; a something there was in the brow and glance, in the glance of the clear blue eye, which reminded one of the blue, high-arched heaven; a something which one must put confidence in, and which made me involuntarily think,

"An honest man, the noblest work of God."

I seemed to see in the mouth an expression of manly decision, which I should have liked to see nearer on any occasion which should call it forth; for there lay within it a quiet power. But there was little here to bring it into action, where he had merely to read some documents, and to act as a man of business. And that the Prince did in as simple, impartial and unostentatious a manner as possible. One did not see here a prince; only a gentleman who concluded some business with other gentlemen, without any more action or words than was necessary. There may be something very great in this unassuming moderation on an occasion when it would have been so easy to have put on an air of magnificence and high breeding. And an unassuming earnestness, which keeps itself to the point in question, and which disregards show, seems a distinguishing trait in Prince Albert's conduct and character. I should have wished for more expression, I wished for—ah! I wished to have had the Queen here, and that, I believe, was the reason why I found any fault with Prince Albert's appearance and mode of reading, of which I did not hear a word.

Among the gentlemen who advanced forward to the Prince, and with whom he spoke in an especial manner, was Mr. Paxton, with that broad, remarkable forehead, within whose productive brain the idea of the Crystal Palace was first originated and carried out. We must say a word about this man and his work.

When the time was at hand for undertaking the building for the Great Exhibition, the Commissioners had merely the sum of 35,000*l.* in hand to apply to this purpose. Nevertheless, they boldly through the public papers encouraged the architects of all nations to send in plans for a building, the design and dimensions of which they specified. After fifteen long consultations over the various designs, the Building Committee came to the unanimous conclusion that not one of them was available for the purpose in question. This decision being made known to the Royal Commission, caused no little perplexity. The Building Committee itself now drew up a plan, which was so remarkable for its ugliness and great cost that the whole public was against it. The time drew nearer, and their embarrassment for want of a suitable building increased.

In the mean time, Mr. Paxton was busied in building a house for the reception of the water lily, the "Victoria Regia," as it was called, in the gardens of the Duke of Devonshire. Listening to the invitations of the Commissioners of the great Exhibition, and although himself no architect, he dashed off, one day, on a sheet of blotting paper, a design for the Crystal Palace:—an idea probably inspired by the building in which the royal flower is contained. Within a few days had this man with his great practical understanding and his talent for constructiveness made a design of the Palace in all its separate parts; and whatever perfecting might, during the carrying of it out, be given to the plan by Messrs. Fox and Henderson, the contractors for the building, yet has Mr. Paxton the honour of having been the originator of the design. As soon as this was shown to the Committee it was immediately adopted by general consent, and they at once began to carry it out with admirable unanimity and decision.

At the closing of the Great Exhibition, as soon as the Prince had finished reading and talking with the different gentlemen, and which he did as simply as if he had been with them in a room, and as if no great curious public had been present, with eyes turned upon him, the Archbishop of Canterbury, a handsome, venerable prelate, read prayers and a benediction, after which a quire of voices from the gallery on the left struck up the Hallelujah chorus—a beautiful idea in this place, the place of meeting of all nations, but which was deficient of effect in the Crystal Palace. For, whether it was the fault of the palace or of the chorus, certain it is that this magnificent anthem was on this occasion weak and ineffective.

When the singing was ended, Prince Albert rose, and he and his attendants departed amid the same tumult of applause as had greeted them on their entrance. Many crowded out after him, only delayed a moment by an excellent band of French horns and a couple of other wind instruments, which sounded from the gallery above the door of exit.

And now that Prince Albert is gone, I will relate how he won my heart.

In one of the more gloomy departments of the Crystal Palace you saw a section of a complete little house, a cottage, a pretty little dwelling which, in its entirety, might also be seen in the environs of the Crystal Palace, among many other things for which there was no room in the interior of the building. These dwellings were known by the name of "Prince Albert's Cottages." They were however models for houses for poor, respectable people of the working class, model-cottages which Prince Albert had had erected, and which were here exhibited together with plans and estimates, by which it might be seen that houses of this kind might be erected at small cost, and that they, even at the lowest rent, would pay full interest for the outlay, or would even support themselves.

I was conducted through these houses, which stand outside the palace. They are calculated for four families, and the arrangements are the same in all. Each dwelling consists of one large room, the family room, furnished with an excellent kitchen range, one bedroom for the parents of the family, and two lesser ones for the children, boys and girls, separately. The rooms were small but well proportioned, each somewhat arched in the ceiling and very cheerful. There was a sort of exuberance of light and windows, probably in exultation over the abolition of the irrational window tax which had for so long in England made darkness an inmate of the dwellings of the poor. Ceiling and walls were covered with a beautiful glaze. The arrangements made for change of season; for the preservation of perfect cleanliness, and for a constant supply of fresh water were excellent. Mr. Chadwick showed me how that these dwellings being built of hollow burnt bricks, were at the same time free from damp, warm, and less expensive; he laid before me his calculations of the means by which all the materials required for such erection being obtained at still lower prices, the dwellings would be less costly, and the rents lower in proportion; and in consequence, the poor would obtain much better and more complete dwellings at a much lower price. This practical, zealous and warm-hearted man, was no less delighted than I was at the prospect which promises a great reform in the condition of the working-class. For if these good dwellings were not let to any tenant who could not produce a certificate of good conduct, it is evident that these model cottages and others of the same kind would become distinguished means of the moral and physical health of this class of the community. Neither can this evident proof of a heartfelt regard in the highest class of society for those of the lowest class, for the dwellers in the abodes of poverty, be without its beneficial effect upon the minds of the latter. Do not all plants shoot forth towards the sun, as eagerly as the child stretches its arms towards the warm breast of its mother, and do they not put forth leaves and blossoms on the side which is turned to the light?

Blessings upon that zealous fellow-citizen who employs his powers in the practical carrying out of such undertakings! And blessings a thousand-fold upon that Prince who, with a princely head and heart, turns himself towards the mean and the despised of his realm, who seems to regard his power as given by Providence, primarily for the raising up of those who have not power to raise themselves, who extends a princely, brotherly hand to the lowest of his human brethren! In truth, that lively interest which Prince Albert takes in all questions where he can promote the good of the people, his ever-ready and active co-operation by word and deed, at the same time full of heart and full of wisdom; that beautiful example which he sets of a Christian prince—these give him a moral sovereignty in England which sways all classes, and which is much greater than any merely political power.

The opinion which is everywhere loudly acknowledged in England, that every man, king or peasant, holds in stewardship for God, a certain gift, power or ability, and that he must look at all his words and actions from this point of view—this opinion which is contemporary with Christianity, but which now, at this period, for the first time seems to be gaining ground as the supremely acknowledged principle of the age, has in Prince Albert one of its noblest representatives. He shows in everything he does, that this view is his own also. He had it inscribed upon the New Exchange—that place of business for the whole world—in these words:—

“THE EARTH IS THE LORD’S, AND THE FULLNESS THEREOF.”

He expressed it lately in the Great Exhibition, when he said, —

“Say not that the discoveries which we make are our own; the seeds of every art and science are implanted in us, and God, our teacher, brings forth from hidden fountains the power of invention.”

He gives proofs of it daily in the manner by which he employs his income, in the homes he has built for the homeless, and by the interest he takes in all plans for the public benefit.

And it is cheering to see how universally his character and his useful activity are acknowledged.

“He came just at the right time to prevent us from becoming republicans,” said a young radical to me, “we have never had a better nor a more useful prince.”

The Exhibition in the Crystal Palace has, at this time, truly placed the crown upon the beautiful popularity of Prince Albert and the Queen. It is said that the Queen remarked, “I have always been sensible of the esteem of my people, but never more than on the shilling-days at the Exhibition.”

The Queen frequently visited it on these days, and amused herself by going about with her children in the midst of the throng of people. And wherever the little Queen went, a way was immediately opened for her, a full space was left for her more readily than if the path had been hemmed in with Life-guards. Everybody was glad to see her, but they drew back respectfully that she too might be glad to see them; and thus be unmolested amid the grand spectacle which she and Prince Albert had prepared for their pleasure and profit. It was told me how she, before the Exhibition opened, might be seen there with her children every day and in all weather, passing many hours in talking with tradespeople of all kinds, listening to their wishes, promoting their interests; examining their wares, and selecting for herself and her court valuable articles from the works of all nations.

Fortune has seldom favoured any undertaking as it favoured this Exhibition. Among all the millions of human beings who visited it during those six months, among all the millions of carriages which thronged hither from all quarters, not a single accident occurred. Everything went on well, calmly and cheerfully. The excellent police power of England has, however, the merit of this, and I cannot avoid again reverting to it in this place. Whilst sitting in the carriage upon the great high-road which runs along Hyde Park, I observed how the police stood among the throng of carriages, one at about every ten or twelve paces, keeping back or advancing forward the drivers, protecting ladies and children, and leading them safely among the heads of the horses; for whenever these white-gloved hands so indicated the drivers pulled up or advanced forward. I drove hither at various times amid great throngs, but never did I see the power of the police withstood or defied. Never did I hear a quarrel or an angry word between the drivers and the police. Occasionally I have seen these last seize the horses by the reins and keep them back, but all was done calmly and without a word.

And now that I am about to leave the Exhibition, I must say a word or two about its history. Because, honour be to those to whom honour is due, and it cannot be denied that the idea of this, the World's Fair, belongs in the first place to—France. For several years has France, from time to time, set the example of great and increasingly comprehensive and systematically arranged exhibitions of national art and industry. At the eleventh exhibition of this kind, in the Champs Elysées, in the year 1849, no less than 4,494 manufacturers became competitors for the prize. The idea of a great exhibition of the manufactures and productions of the whole world, occurred the same year to the then Minister of Trade and agriculture in France, M. Buffet, and a circular to that effect was sent to all the various departments throughout the country, but was met with so much opposition, that M. Buffet relinquished the plan. When this was taken up in England by Prince Albert, it also met with some opposition. And it is universally acknowledged that the thanks are due to the courage, tact, and determination of the Prince, for the accomplishment of this great plan. As it has now been accomplished and that so happily, it is not too much to say, that this Exhibition is a means of universal and enduring good, and that the whole world, from China in the east, to California and Chili in the west, has vibrated to the pulse of the industrial heart of the world, throbbing within the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park.

If again there should be another World's Exhibition, I would wish and hope that it might be one in which the practical heart of the world might have room to beat, and to pour forth its life-streams for a new inspiration to all poets, philosophers, romance-writers, above all, for the joy and profit of the great world's poet, which sings in every human breast, we mean, humanity. Then would we see all nations present in beautiful faithful pictures of their own peculiar scenery; then might we see the noonday sun shining above the ancient woods of the tropics, and the midnight sun above the northern cliffs of Sweden; then might we see the peoples of the earth meet each other, and learn to know each other in the peculiar life of the people, in their forms and features, and not as now, merely by their productions. For, "is not life more than meat, and the body more than raiment?"

Such a congress of the nations would be a much more magnificent exhibition than that in Hyde Park.

And should such a one take place—may thou and I meet there!

(To be continued.)

MARGARET FULLER OSSOLI.¹

AN intelligent and amiable American writer, the Rev. Mr. Kip, says truly enough that the Americans have no past; and this truth explains to us the profound satisfaction they have in themselves, and everything belonging to or connected with them, and their exaggeration in describing it. They have, as yet, no means of comparison; of estimating their actual progress by what has been done before: they know only their present position; and every attainment they make being new to themselves, they naturally imagine that it is new to all the world besides; they know that it has not been surpassed among themselves, and by going a single step further, they arrive at the conclusion, that it has scarcely been equalled among others. We, again, on this side of the Atlantic, are not ready enough to make allowances for this enthusiasm; we ought to trace it to its cause, instead of turning from it, as we often do, as a compound of Yankee ignorance and conceit; we ought in clarity to see in it only an impassioned striving after excellence, and the generous appreciation of it, in whatever degree it may be reached. Doubtless, America has produced, and is daily producing, extraordinary and admirable persons, whose opinions and writings breathe all the undaunted freshness of a nation's youth; for an individual is the epitome of a nation; and a nation is but the enlarged scale of the characteristics of the individuals that compose it. Youth refers little to a past; full of its own bright imaginations and blossoming hopes, it is enraptured with the objects that rise before it, and invests them with a value according to its mode of viewing them, that its increasing wisdom will teach it to investigate more exactly.

We have been led into these reflections by the "Memoirs of Margaret Fuller," afterwards the Marchesa Ossoli, at this time given to the world by two of the most eminently gifted of her countrymen, Emerson and Channing; the warmth, not to say hyperbole of whose style, in speaking of her, however illustrative of the charge we have here made against American writers in general, may yet be fully pardoned in the sincerity of the admiration and esteem she inspired in their hearts, as well as in the hearts of many others, equally capable of appreciating genius and reverencing worth. To us, indeed, these memoirs are fraught with melancholy, even painful interest; for it was our lot to know the subject of them in a foreign land,—strangers there, like herself,—under circumstances of a public nature that would have stirred the coldest blood; and which in her, whilst they roused all her strong powers of thought and vigour of action, called forth, at the same moment, all her sweetest and most feminine attributes; all the tender sympathies and holy charities of life, by which her memory would have been embalmed in the hearts of all who knew her, even had it never been surrounded with that halo of admiration inspired in them by her vast conversational powers; equal to those of Coleridge, with more useful application of them; her deep and multifarious reading, and the energy with which she employed her acquirements and her abilities for all whom she could either benefit or serve.

(1) "Memoirs of Margaret Fuller Ossoli." By Emerson and Channing.

Margaret Fuller was the eldest child of Timothy Fuller and Margaret Crane, of Cambridge Port, Massachusetts, and was born on the 3d of May, 1810. Her father was a lawyer and a politician, a fair scholar, and well acquainted with general literature. To be an honoured citizen, and to have a home on earth, were, from her account of him, the great aims of his existence; and very praiseworthy aims they would appear, according to the estimate of most rational persons; but they were not lofty enough to satisfy the early intellectual ambition of his daughter, who had, even at the time she thus describes him, little respect for what she terms "the common-places of a mere bread-winning, bread-bestowing existence."

"To open the deeper fountains of the soul," says she, "to regard life here as the prophetic entrance to immortality, to develop his spirit to perfection,—motives like these had never been suggested to him, either by fellow-beings, or by outward circumstances. The result was a character, in its social aspect, of quite the common sort. A good son and brother, a kind neighbour, an active man of business,—in all these outward relations he was but one of a class which surrounding conditions have made the majority among us. In the more delicate and individual relations, he never approached but two mortals, my mother and myself."

This mother appears to have been a creature of angelic temperament, breathing love, and inspiring it in every living thing that came within her gentle influence. Mr. Fuller, proud of the capabilities of his daughter, developed even in her childhood, undertook himself to be her instructor; but by imposing tasks upon her beyond her strength, on subjects beyond her years, requiring her, moreover, to repeat them to him on his return from his office late in the evening, under all the terror of incurring his displeasure if she were not perfect in them, even whilst nature was calling for sleep, he did her the double injury of making her fancy herself "a youthful prodigy" by day, and rendering her at night the victim of spectral illusions, nightmare, and somnambulism; which, at a later period, changed their forms for head-aches, weakness, and every description of nervous affections. She began to read Latin at six years of age, and in translating it was expected to give the thoughts in as few words as possible, clearly arranged, and without breaks or hesitation. Of Greek she seems to have acquired but little; nevertheless, her youthful studies were divided between the mythologic fables of that poetic country and the sterner realities of Roman history; and day after day the enchanting visions of the one, and the heroic deeds of the other, were mused over by her, in a little garden behind the house, full of choice flowers, and commanding, through its gate, a view of the glories of the setting sun.

"Here," says she, "the best hours of my lonely childhood were spent;" and this childhood she describes with a minuteness of analysis that appears to us much more the effect of mature reflection than of childish recollections; particularly when she informs us that Shakspeare, Cervantes, and Moliere, were her favourite authors at eight years of age! Her absorbing love of books was at this time wholesomely interrupted for a season, by a passionate attachment she formed for an English lady, whom she first saw at church, and who afterwards became intimate with her mother, during the few months she remained in the neighbourhood. This lady was lovely in appearance, captivating in manners, elegant in her dress; and versed in the various accomplishments that often supply the place of talent, and give it additional value when found in combination with it. To the poor lonely overworked child, solitary amid all her precocious acquirements, she appeared like some glorious meteor; to her, the lady, pleased with her innocent admiration and profound devotedness, was all grace and sweetness, and the entire veneration she inspired, the new existence she awakened in Margaret, is described by her with a depth of sentiment which we have no doubt was sincerely felt, for we know well that an admiring worship of this kind continually fills the young imagination, at the age when all that is outwardly beautiful is believed to be interiorly excellent. Margaret Fuller's mistake was in imagining that the reveries of her own youth were peculiar to herself.

When, however, the object of her devotion left the New World, to return to her native home in the Old, Margaret's heart seemed to die within her, and she fell into such an alarming state of despondency and languor, that her father, beginning to fear that he had too highly worked upon her nervous system, by the incessant mental exertion he required from her, wisely resolved to correct his error, by sending her to school; where she would have the advantage of companionship and be tempted to relieve sedentary occupation by bodily exercise. She was accordingly placed, much against her inclination, with the Misses Prescott, in Groton, Massachusetts; and here her thirst after intellectual distinction, and the love of mental rule, which were the alternate sources to her, all the prime of her life, of the most lively pleasure and the keenest pain, began to develop themselves in the force that marked all her character. Passing at once from the monotony and, to her, loneliness of her own home, to a little world of youth and vivacity, she felt all her powers called forth, and resolved upon the subjugation of her schoolfellows, by gaining their admiration and their love; for whilst her head claimed the one, her heart equally craved the other. At first she succeeded in her endeavour; she delighted her young companions with the variety of her resources; "her love of wild dances, and sudden song; her freaks of passion and of wit: she was always new, always surprising, and, for a time, charming." Gradually, however, her peculiarities and caprice undid the spell her mental superiority had cast around; she as often teased as pleased; and at last, finding her empire totter, she began, in revenge for a joke played upon her, which she magnified into an insult, to act upon the maxim well known among despots, divide et impera, and descended to sow discord among her schoolfellows. She fanned the vanity of one, the jealousy of another—in short, availed herself of her quick perception into character, to bear upon the weak point of each, until distrust and dissatisfaction separated even those who had before been bosom friends. At length the source of all the evil was discovered, and the author of it solemnly arraigned before the whole school, and convicted of falsehood and mischief-making. The shame of this procedure, and the grief and horror she felt on being made sensible of the enormity of her fault, and the dreadful injury she might inflict upon society, if she continued in the practice of the same, so overpowered her that for many days she lay motionless, speechless, and only showed consciousness by waving her hand, in token of refusal, when food or medicine was offered to her lips.

Nobly and truthfully does Margaret Fuller tell this part of her story. Most impressive and encouraging is the lesson it holds out, that no single fault, however heinous, once seen, acknowledged, and sincerely and humbly repented of, can mar the whole course of after life. Slowly recovering from her shock, under the judicious treatment and tender sympathy of one of her teachers, whose friendship she ever afterwards retained, Margaret took the first step towards the restoration of her bosom's peace, by discharging it of the weight of remorse that loaded it, in a full confession of her fault, and a humble asking for forgiveness.

"When her strength was a little restored, she had all her companions summoned, and said to them,—'I deserved to die, but a generous trust has called me back to life. I will be worthy of it, nor ever betray the trust, or resent injury more. Can you forgive the past?'

"And they not only forgave, but, with love and earnest tears, clasped in their arms the returning sister. They vied with one another in offices of humble love, to the humbled one; and let it be recorded, as an instance of the pure honour of which young hearts are capable, that these facts, known to some forty persons, never, so far as I know, transpired beyond those walls."—Vol. i. p. 62.

Let it not be thought that an incident simple as this may seem is misplaced in a piece of grave biography. Nothing can be undeserving of notice that has an important influence upon character and life; and to that season of error and repentance, in her school-days, Margaret Fuller probably owed the integrity and candour by which she was ever after distinguished. She herself, speaking of this period, to the wise and kind friend who had supported her through it, says,—

"You need not fear to revive painful recollections. I often think of those sad experiences. True, they agitate me deeply. But it was best so. They have had a most powerful effect on my character. I tremble at whatever looks like dissimulation. The remembrance of that evening subdues every proud, passionate impulse. . . . Can I ever forget that to your treatment, in that crisis of youth, I owe the true life,—the love of Truth and Honour?"—Vol. i. p. 70.

Shortly after this, Margaret Fuller returned to her parental roof, and betook herself again to her studies; with what assiduity may be judged, by her account of them, in a letter to the beloved teacher to whose kindness in the hour of need she had owed so much.

"I rise a little before five, walk an hour, and then practice on the piano till seven, when we breakfast. Next I read French,—Sismondi's 'Literature of the South of Europe,' till eight; then two or three lectures in Brown's 'Philosophy.' About half-past nine, I go to Mr. Perkins's school, and study Greek till twelve; when, the school being dismissed, I recite, go home, and practice again till dinner, at two. Sometimes, if the conversation is very agreeable, I lounge for half an hour over the dessert, though rarely so lavish of time. Then, when I can, I read two hours in Italian, but I am often interrupted. At six, I walk or take a drive. Before going to bed, I play or sing for half an hour or so, to make all sleepy, and about eleven, retire to write a little while in my journal—exercises on what I have read, or a series of characteristics, which I am filling up."—Vol. i. p. 63.

She was then fifteen. Two years after, she says:—

"I am engrossed in reading the elder Italian poets, beginning with Berni, from whom I shall proceed to Pulci and Politian. I read very critically. Miss Francis and I think of reading Locke, as introductory to a course of English metaphysics, and then De Stael on Locke's system."—Vol. i. p. 67.

In Spanish literature she likewise made great progress, but her chief attainment was in German. Goethe became her idol, and her criticism on his writings, Emerson says, is, in his opinion, the best that has ever been written. Five more years were given to incessant reading, and to deep contemplation of the human character. At fifteen, she had said, "I am determined on distinction;—" at twenty she had attained it:—

"It was," says Mr. Clarke, one of the friends who knew her best, "by her singular gift of speech that she cast her spells and worked her wonders in this little circle. Full of thoughts and full of words; capable of poetic improvisation, had there not been a slight overweight of a tendency to the tangible and real; capable of clear, complete, philosophic statement, but for the strong tendency to life, which melted down evermore, in its lava-current, the solid blocks of thought; she was yet, by these excesses, better fitted for the arena of conversation. Here she found none adequate for the equal encounter; when she laid her lance in rest, every champion must go down before it."—Vol. i. p. 134.

Emerson also, himself so eloquent, bears testimony of her talent in this respect:—

"All these powers and accomplishments," says he, "found their best and only adequate channel in her conversation;—a conversation which those who have heard it, unanimously, as far as I know, pronounced to be, in elegance, in range, in flexibility and adroit transition, in depth, in cordiality, and in moral aim, altogether admirable; surprising and cheerful as a poem, and communicating its own civility and elevation like a charm to all hearers. . . . She poured a stream of amber over the endless store of private anecdotes, of bosom histories, which her wonderful persuasion drew forth, and transfigured them into fine fables. Whilst she embellished the moment, her conversation had the merit of being solid and true."—Vol. ii. p. 3.

In 1835 she was introduced to Miss Martineau, whilst she was on a visit to her friend Mrs. Farrar. She rapidly passed with that eccentric lady "the barrier that separates acquaintance from friendship," and whilst they were sitting together in church, put up a rapturous thanksgiving, beginning "Author of all good, Source of all beauty and holiness, thanks to Thee for the purifying elevating communion that I have enjoyed with this elevated and beloved being." Those who have only known Miss Martineau through the medium of her later writings, would be apt to doubt the purifying effects of communion with her. Margaret herself was somewhat disenchanted when her book on America came out; and wrote her a long letter of criticism upon its prejudices and intemperance of language. In this same year, Margaret was attacked by a severe fever. Her father came to her bed-side, in the course of it, and said to her, "My dear, I have been thinking of you in the night, and cannot remember that you have any faults. You have defects, of course, as all mortals have, but I do not know that you have a single fault." These words from one who, upon principle, had always abstained from praising her, or, indeed, any of his children in their presence, and the deep thankfulness he evinced on her recovery, were treasured up in her heart; and she had soon need of the consolation their recollection afforded, for very shortly after, the revered parent to whom she owed so much of her mental culture, was attacked with cholera, and expired on the second day of his suffering under it.

Her first thought, after the amazement of her grief was passed, was how far she could supply his place.

"I have prayed to God," says she, "that duty may now be the first object, and self set aside. May I have light and strength to do what is right, in the highest sense, for my mother, brothers, and sister."—Vol. i. p. 203.

And now it is that Margaret Fuller's real excellence of character appears. For the fulfilment of the duties she had solemnly taken upon herself, she relinquished the object which had formed the vision of her life; and that was to visit Europe, "its scholars, libraries, lectures, galleries of art, museums of science, antiquities, and historic scenes:" to the realization of which she had long looked, not only for the vast field of inquiry and thought it would lay open to her mind, but also as facilitating to her the means of turning her acquirements to account in the way of authorship.

The opportunity at last seemed to present itself under the fairest auspices; for it was to accompany two of her warmest and best friends, Mr. and Mrs. Farrar, with the pleasure, in addition, of Miss Martineau's society. Yet this long-anticipated delight she unrepiningly renounced; because she feared the sum she should require for it would be more than her family could spare as they were then situated; yet she had been promised it by her father, expressly for the purpose; and had, indeed, justly earned it, in devoting her time to the instruction of her brothers, by way of counterbalance, in order to spare the expense of other tuition for them. Ten years later she accomplished the object she had so passionately desired, and which, alas! terminated in her finding her grave beneath the billows that were to have borne her back, exultant, a happy wife and a mother, to her native shore.

The intervening period was passed by her in exemplary exertions for the honourable maintenance of her family and herself. She resided chiefly in Boston, where she gave lessons in Latin and French in Mr. Alcott's then flourishing school, and had classes of young ladies in French, German, and Italian. She also, during these years, published her "Summer on the Lakes," "Woman in the Nineteenth Century," besides several translations from the German, and contributing largely to the Dial and Tribune, two publications of considerable note in their day.

The Athenæum Library and Museum of Boston were a fund of intellectual wealth to her, and she deeply felt the exalting influence of the study of Greek art, and the Italian masters, though only through the imperfect medium of casts and engravings. She likewise there founded a "Ladies' Conversazione," which the force of her eloquence and influence managed to keep alive for six years, in weekly meetings, at which were constellated, from time to time, all the females most distinguished for talent, worth, and beauty, in the place. The subjects discussed, however, would not, we should imagine, long have held a similar assembly together in London.

"The first day's topic," we are informed, "was the genealogy of heaven and earth; the Will, (Jupiter); the Understanding, (Mercury); the second day's was the celestial inspiration of genius, perception and transmission of divine law (Apollo); the terrene inspiration, the impassioned abandonment of genius (Bacchus). Of the thunderbolt, the caduceus, the ray, and the grape, having disposed, as well as might be, we came to the wave, and the sea-shell it moulds to Beauty, and Love, her parent and her child."—Vol. ii. p. 139.

To these succeeded "Mythology," "The Fine Arts," "What is Life?" "Is the Ideal first or last?"

and other mysterious themes, discussed in the transcendental style then as fashionable in America as Euphuism was in our own country in the days of Elizabeth; and, if we may venture to say so, probably attended with as useful results. They served, however, to spread the name and fame of Margaret Fuller far and wide in her own country; the present offered no one to equal, the past no one to compare with her; nor was it believed that the future would produce any one superior to her. Indeed, she seems to have formed an estimate of herself on pretty much the same scale,—

"I now know all the people worth knowing in America," says she, in a letter to one of her friends, "and I find no intellect comparable to my own."

The same opinion is repeated by her in various ways, with an openness that almost disarms criticism. We will now, therefore, bear her away, in the zenith of her fame, to London, "the grave of so many celebrities," and thence to the classic land of which she had nursed such waking dreams of inspiration, and where she was destined to find all the warmest affections of her heart called forth and satisfied.

Margaret Fuller, during her short stay in England, saw many characters well known in the literary world, and describes them in her letters to her friends with her usual discernment and felicity of expression. Her portraiture of Carlyle, one of her almost idolized writers, before she "wearied" of him, is excellent. She complains, however, that his habit and power of haranguing was such, that the unfortunate listener whom he once got hold of, became a perfect prisoner.

"To interrupt him," she says, "is a physical impossibility. If you get a chance to remonstrate for a moment, he raises his voice, and bears you down."—Vol. iii. p. 99.

At Paris she sees Fourier, George Sand, La Mennais, and others; her accounts of whom we regret that our limits do not allow us to give. Her remarks from Rome are remarkably scanty and barren, considering the exciting period in which she arrived there,—the spring of 1847. She had at this time one hundred correspondents; for next to conversation, her intellect expanded most in letter-writing, and it is singular that the extracts from the epistles they must have called forth, amid so much room for reflection, should have been dealt out with such niggard hands. To us, however, the remembrance of our personal acquaintance with her, which began at this period, enables us to fill up the blanks in her written communications. She introduced herself to us with ease of manner, and total absence of pretension, by delivering to us a letter from a mutual friend. Her personal appearance was not in her favour; it is truly depicted by Emerson, who owns that at first it prejudiced him against her, but who was afterwards drawn towards her in the closest bonds of a friendship that knew no interruption.

"She was," says he, "rather under the middle height; her complexion was fair, with strong, fair hair. She was then, as always, carefully and becomingly dressed, and of lady-like self-possession. For the rest, her appearance had nothing prepossessing. Her extreme plainness, a trick of incessantly opening and shutting her eye-lids, the nasal tone of the voice,—all repelled; and I said to myself, we shall never get far. It is to be said, that Margaret made a disagreeable first impression on most persons, including those who became afterwards her best friends, to such an extreme that they did not wish to be in the same room with her. This was partly the effect of her manners, which expressed an overweening sense of power, and slight esteem of others, and partly the prejudice of her fame."—Vol. i. p. 268.

A curious mode she had of lifting up her upper lip when she spoke, and the American twang in which her opinions were delivered, were to us the most repellant of her peculiarities; but we soon lost sight of them all in the lovely qualities of heart which unfolded themselves to us, as we became more and more acquainted with her. We saw nothing of the self-exaltation, the thirst for distinction and excitement, the dictatorial tone that her letters and conversations display, in the early part of her memoirs. It is evident that her character underwent a great change in Italy. Arriving there at a most stirring and eventful period, the petty politics and ambition of minor scenes in America lost their interest with her: in the contemplation of the noble characters around her, she ceased so continually to analyse her own. She saw, and acknowledged it with her accustomed candour, many Italian ladies intellectually equal with herself, and far surpassing her in the acquired graces of society; every day, moreover, brought with it some event to interest her attention or excite her sympathies,—everything conspired to divert her from herself, but most of all the circumstance of her finding another self, much dearer to her than her own, in the gentle and amiable Marquis Ossoli, whom she first met by accident at St. Peter's, where he introduced himself to her by an act of courtesy, in assisting her to find her party, from which she had been accidentally separated. The acquaintance continued, and in a few months the young man, revering her talents, charmed with her gentleness, and sharing in all her views and hopes respecting Italy, offered her his hand. She refused it on account of the disparity of their ages, she being nearly ten years older than himself; but he was not discouraged,—he felt that she could no more relinquish him than he could relinquish her;—and he was right, for the love she had all her life desired, for which alone she had, like Madame de Staël, longed with passionate longing to be beautiful, this love, once found, was not to be parted with. He renewed his suit, and was accepted. The marriage, which took place in Dec. 1847, was kept secret, both from political and economical motives; and the son who was the fruit of it, was born at Rieti in the September following. Never were holy hope, sweet love, and patient heroism more beautifully set forth than in Margaret and her husband, under circumstances that must inevitably have chilled the selfish, and appalled the timid; never were feelings of wife and mother more touchingly described. Little did we think, when we were admiring the courage with which she spoke of the thick-coming dangers in which the base attack of the French upon Rome threatened to involve all who had advocated its noble struggle for freedom; when we were paying homage to the exquisite tenderness and unwearied attention she showed night and day, to the wounded and the sick in the Hospital Fate Bene Fratelli, to which she was appointed by the Princess Belgioioso; little did we think when we saw in her the same sweet smile, radiant with sympathy and goodness, that her poor heart was torn by the dread of finding, among those wounded, her own husband, who had taken his place with the defenders of Rome, at the gate of St. Pancrazio, and never left it till he saw the French enter it, triumphant in treachery and superiority of numbers,—that every fibre of that sensitive heart was wrung, moreover, with fears for her infant, forced as she was to leave him at the foot of the Umbrian Apennines at Rieti, amid a ferocious set of people, and with a treacherous and avaricious nurse, who threatened to abandon him, if she did not receive a certain sum at an appointed time.

All that Margaret says of herself, at this period, is so interesting, that we much regret our limits do not allow us to give it in full. It is beautiful to see the haranguer, the transcendentalist, the stickler for her sex's rights, that even maintained their right to be "sea captains," if they would—to see all this ferment of an unquiet though lofty soul, subsiding into holy gratitude for domestic peace, and affectionate appreciation of her husband's love, and of his unassuming merits. She thus describes him to her mother:—

"He is not in any respect such a person as people in general would expect to find with me. He had no instructor except an old priest, who entirely neglected his education; and of all that is contained in books he is absolutely ignorant, and he has no enthusiasm of character. On the other hand, he has excellent practical sense; has been a judicious observer of all that passed before his eyes; has a nice sense of duty, which, in its unfeeling, minute activity, may put most enthusiasts to shame; a very sweet temper, and great native refinement. His love for me has been unswerving and most tender. I have never suffered a pain that he could relieve. His devotion, when I am ill, is to be compared only with yours. His delicacy in trifles, his sweet domestic graces, remind me of E—. In him I have found a home, and one that interferes with no tie. Amid many ills and cares, we have had much joy together, in the sympathy with natural beauty,—with our child,—with all that is innocent and sweet." Vol. iii. p. 225.

To her friend the Marchioness Visconti Arconati, she writes thus of him:—"He has very little of what is called intellectual development, but unspoiled instincts, affections pure and constant, and a quiet sense of duty, which, to me, who have seen much of the great faults in characters of enthusiasm and genius, seems of highest value."

But it is in speaking of her child that all the passionate emotions of her heart burst forth. Years before, she had written in her journal:—"O Father, give me a bud on my tree of life, so scathed by the lightning, and bowed by the frost * * * always before I have wanted a superior or equal, but now it seems that only the feeling of a parent for a child could exhaust the richness of one's soul." This treasure now secured to her, she says to her mother:—"What shall I say of my child! all might seem hyperbole, even to my dearest mother. In him I find satisfaction, for the first time, to the deep wants of my heart." A peaceful winter of the purest domestic happiness in Florence, followed the months of anguish which she had endured in Rome, during its last noble struggles. But the time drew near for her to see again her American home, where she hoped to publish her work on Italy, the loss of which is deeply to be regretted, and to gain thereby the means of increasing the comforts of her husband and her son. But here the narrative is too painful to those who knew the lamented subject of it; and to those who did not it may still only recall afflicting scenes, such as have too recently occurred in the loss of the Amazon.

Margaret with her husband and child sailed from Leghorn for New York, on the 17th of May, 1850, in the barque Elizabeth, commanded by Captain Hasty. Many gloomy presentiments had haunted her mind for some weeks before: Ossoli had been told when a boy, by a fortune-teller, to "beware of the sea," and it happened that, till then, he had never set his foot upon a vessel. "I am absurdly fearful," says she, "and various omens have combined to give me a dark feeling. * * * In case of mishap, however, I shall perish with my husband and my child;" again, "It seems to me that my future upon earth will soon close. I have a vague expectation of some crisis, I know not what."

The first few days of the voyage all went on prosperously; soft breezes swept the vessel tranquilly over the azure bosom of the Mediterranean. Margaret and her husband paced, arm in arm, the deck of their small ocean-home; their baby fondled the white goat which was to be his foster-parent, or, carried about in the arms of the Captain, gazed on the spars and rigging and swelling sails: but alas! this kind Captain was taken ill of the confluent small-pox, and died off Gibraltar. The baby caught the disease, and exhibited it in all its frightful forms. His life was despaired of, but the incessant care of his parents preserved him to them, and once more joy and thankfulness filled their bosoms. "Slowly, yet peacefully, pass the long summer days, the mellow moonlit nights; slowly, and with even flight, the good Elizabeth, under gentle airs from the tropics, bears them safely onward. Four thousand miles of ocean lie behind; they are nearly home."—Vol. iii. p. 320.

On Thursday the 15th, at noon, the Elizabeth was off the Jersey coast, between Cape May and Barnegat, and so confident was the commanding officer of safety, that he promised his passengers to land them early in the morning at New York. That same promised morn the Elisabeth, driven by the combined force of currents and tempest towards the sand bars of Long Island, struck at four o'clock, on Fire Island beach. We will not dwell on the painful incidents that followed. Margaret refused to the last to be separated from her husband and child. Twelve hours were passed by them in communion, face to face, with death. The final moment came, and the prayer was granted, breathed by Margaret before they embarked, that in case of any fatal mischance, Ossoli, Angelo, and herself might go together, "and that the anguish might be brief."

Thus untimely perished a woman who by her strength of intellect and rectitude of principle, combined with her wonderful insight into character, and her warmth of sympathy, obtained a wider range of personal influence than perhaps ever fell to the share of any other female, devoid, like herself, of beauty, wealth or influential connexions. Her early trials were loneliness of heart, and obstacles to the development of her genius; her later ones, narrowness of pecuniary means, doubly trying to a disposition munificent as hers, and uncertainly as to the power of turning her abilities to the account her circumstances required: but He who bestowed upon her the gold, granted her also the strength to bear the purifying process which was to separate it from its dross; and there can be little doubt that, had her life been spared, she would have afforded a still brighter example of female virtues, than she had given, in her most brilliant days, of female talent.

THE RECLUSE.¹

A STORY OF THE COAST OF FRANCE.

III.

THE setting sun illumined the horizon of Piriac with its last rays. It was the eve of one of those great tides known in that part of the country by the name of reverdies, and the receding waves had left exposed to view many rocks generally concealed by the sea, whose surface now appeared in the distance. In one part, the waves, darkened by the shades of evening, resembled a newly-ploughed field; in another, they undulated like a meadow of long grass waving in the breeze; and again, reflecting the rays of the setting sun, they glistened among the rocks like burning lava. Now and then a solitary sea-gull appeared flying over the sea, and a few cows seated on the shore were lowing contentedly, apparently much enjoying the evening breeze.

Annette took the dry paths bordered with granite slopes, by which all the cultivated fields are enclosed. On reaching the most elevated promontory, she perceived one of those vines whose venerable roots resemble so many sleeping serpents, and in order to screen herself from observation, followed the direction of a wall formed to protect the viney from the sea-breeze. She thus arrived at the promontory of Castell, whose name testifies to its occupation by the Spaniards, and looked towards the three immense rocks which rise on the left like the shapeless remains of an unknown monument. Lewis was not there. It was useless for her to search beyond, in the creeks and clefts of the rocks; as far as the eye could distinguish, the coast appeared deserted. She was beginning to fear that Marzon was not on the sea-shore, when she perceived a boy's head rising from one of the fissures by which the fishermen descend to the beach. She recognised Lewis' younger brother and called him.

"Are you here, Julius?" said she, in a tone of surprise; "I thought you had been sent to Lérat."

"So I was," replied the boy, looking back towards the bay he had just quitted; "but I returned by the shore in hopes of finding my brother near the black rocks."

"And he is not there?"

"No," returned Julius, still looking back; "I have just left him in the large grotto, and I only came away because he desired me."

"He is in the grotto," repeated Annette. "And what is he doing?"

The boy raised his shoulders without replying, and followed the young girl for a few steps. His countenance, which was indicative of native intelligence, rendered yet more acute by misery, at the same time bore marks of anxiety which surprised and alarmed Annette. She renewed her questions eagerly.

"I cannot tell you what he is doing," replied Julius; "but one thing is certain, he is very unhappy."

The fisherman's daughter started. "And you say he is in the large grotto?" resumed she, hurriedly.

"Yes," returned the boy; "he begged me to leave him all alone, but it would be truly a mercy if any one could say something to comfort him."

Annette mechanically moved towards the fissure, then suddenly stopped short, and looked at Julius. The latter, understanding her intentions, hastened to take leave of her.

"Excuse me for having detained you, Annette," said he, touching his cap; "you are in a hurry to take la Rougeanda home; I saw her waiting for you in the little meadow, indeed she began lowing as I passed."

He took the winding path on the summit of the cliffs, and resumed his journey towards Piriac. As soon as he had disappeared, Annette looked round to ascertain that there was no one in sight, and then quickly descended the ravine which led to the sea. The beach which she thus gained was covered, in many parts, by pools of water, in the midst of which rose a natural causeway formed of granite, and covered with sea-weed. The noise of her footsteps was deadened by the sea-weed, and Annette thus reached the grotto without betraying her approach to the occupant of it.

(1) Continued from p. 160.

The summit of the rock in which the cavern had been formed by the waves, was joined to the cliff only by a few detached fragments, while its base was firmly united to the rest of the promontory. The grotto consisted of two compartments, connected by a lengthened arcade, and had entrances from two parts of the beach, separated by a mass of rocks. On its sombre-coloured walls appeared a few veins of iron ore, and of white quartz. In the first division, an opening in the roof admitted a feeble glimmer of light—the last ray of the setting sun. This ray fell on the forehead of Lewis Marzon, who was then seated on the damp sand of the grotto, and leaning his head against the rock. On hearing the exclamation Annette uttered, he rose suddenly.

"You here!" exclaimed he, bewildered; "is it possible? What are you come for?" Then perceiving the young girl's anxious countenance, he added:—

"For heaven's sake! has anything happened to bring you here at so late an hour?"

"Tell me first why you remain here yourself," said Annette, looking fixedly on him. "Generally when you come to Castelli, it is to place your lines, and not to sleep in the grottoes."

"I was not sleeping, Annie," replied the young man, sadly.

"What were you doing then?"

"I was thinking of what we had just been saying at your house. While I was with you, I was happy, but when alone and reflecting, I felt how little hope there was for me; then sorrow filled my heart, and my strength seemed to depart; when I laid down here, I felt as if I cared for nothing any longer."

"May God protect us! Is that performing the promise you made me, Lewis?" resumed the fisherman's daughter, deeply affected; "are you then no longer a man? Be reasonable, my poor Lewis, our trials are not yet ended."

"Alas! then you have come to tell me of some fresh misfortune," cried the young man.

"The more reason why you should exercise your courage," replied Annette.

"But, to come to the point; what is it?"

"It is, that my father suspects something between us, and that 'Long Mark' and he are as furious as madmen, and they are looking for you."

"Well, so be it," replied Marzon, with the indifference of despair; "they will easily find me, and since they are the strongest, they will be able to do as their wicked hearts dictate."

"For love of heaven! do not speak so, Lewis," interrupted Annette, clasping her hands; "how can you expect God to aid us, if we do not take care of ourselves? Do you not wish to live for the sake of those who love you?"

"But since this love is accounted a crime," said the youth; "if they wish to deprive me of it, at all hazards, even if it be with life, for so you just now said, Annie, how could I escape their cruelties?"

"There is one method," replied she.

"One method? and what is it?"

The young girl hesitated, as though she could with difficulty proceed; at length she resumed in a low tone, and without raising her eyes,—

"That which Marillas proposed to you."

"What! to go away!" exclaimed Marzon, "to leave you all alone, exposed to the cruelty of the Captain and Lubert? Is that what you propose, Annie? And what do you want me to do there? Do you think that I could work properly, and that I should not be always looking towards Piriac in hopes of receiving news of you? Go away! ah, you did not wish it before; you wanted me to remain here. Here, at least, we can see each other, even if it is at a distance; we hear of one another, we know that we are living in the same atmosphere. You felt that as I did, and now you have changed! Ah! Annie, this is a trial I did not expect."

The young man's voice trembled, his eyes were filled with tears. Annette, deeply moved, fell on her knees, took Marzon's hands in hers, and employed all kinds of tender words to prove to him the necessity of their separation; but this last blow had revived in Marzon's memory all his previous sorrows. Having nothing to say in reply to the sensible arguments of the fisherman's daughter, he plunged himself in the bitterness of his own recollections, and recalled with the energy of despair all the trials he had endured from his birth. Maternal desertion, pain from cold and hunger, the contempt of all save the dear creature of whom he was now to be deprived! Thus, it was not enough that he had ever been compelled to defer the accomplishment of his hopes, that he had been permitted only to enjoy a few short moments of happiness. The time was come when he must renounce even these! The ray of light which had hitherto cheered him was to be extinguished, and he must again journey in the dark. In proportion as he was justifying his despair to himself, his murmurs were converted into a passionate vehemence that quite overpowered Annette; she attempted in vain to resist. Whilst her lips were murmuring expressions of vague hope, her remaining confidence and courage insensibly abandoned her. The contest was prolonged, and to her disadvantage, for when once Marzon had opened the flood-gates, all the waves of sorrow he had hitherto restrained, escaped like an overflowing torrent. They still rushed on, ever more powerful and more irresistible, carrying with them his own illusions and those of poor Annette, until the latter, incapable of further resistance, uttered a cry, and buried her face in her hands. The young man suddenly stopped short on seeing his companion at his feet, her whole frame convulsed with sobs; his violence appeared suddenly calmed, and his tones of repining were exchanged for those of softened grief.

"Poor girl! I have made her weep," said he, "as if it were necessary for me to tell her all that! But why come and talk to me of seeing you no longer, Annie? It is as much as to say that I have no right to happiness, that I ought to live like the cattle merely for the sake of living, and without any enjoyment of the heart; and yet God has given happiness to all other men. There are some who are happy in counting the acres of their property, others in commanding vessels; others, again, in sleeping under the roof they have purchased; but I! . . . I have neither house, nor boat, nor land; I have nothing in the world except my little brother, who is a charge to me, and you, dearest Annie, who are my joy. When you smile on me,—when you call me by my name, in your own voice, which is so different from every other,—when I feel that you are approaching me,—I do not know how to explain it to you, Annie, but it feels as if a sunbeam were entering my heart; I am so joyful, I love everybody, and I thank God for placing me on the earth: but, when you are not with me, I am sad; I remember all my past suffering, and have neither rest nor resignation.”

“But what is to be done?” said Annette, who in the midst of her sorrow had been affected by the tender words of Lewis; “do you not see, that if you remain here, some misfortune will happen?”

“Do not fear that, dearest one!” returned Lewis, pressing her hands. “I know your father and ‘Long Mark,’ when they return to land, they will go and anchor, as they say, in the waters of the Sardine d’Argent, and provided I keep out of the way they will not take the trouble to look for me.”

“And if they should meet you by chance?”

“If they meet me, my cobriac, I shall do as they do when the wind threatens; I shall fly before the storm breaks out.”

“Do not speak thus lightly, Lewis,” said the young girl, reassured by Marzon’s almost cheerful tone, and nearly persuaded by him in spite of herself; “think of what I came to tell you. Perhaps you do not know the extent of the danger. When my father is blinded by anger he may do anything, and when once he has struck, ‘tall Mark’ will follow his example with double cruelty and force. Remember, my poor Lewis, they could easily overpower you.”

“Do not fear that, Annie. A man is not killed, like a crab, by a single blow.”

“And if you could defend yourself, you would be obliged to raise your hand against my father.”

“Never!” exclaimed the young man, eagerly. “Strike him who gave you life! No, no, Annie, you may trust me. His flesh is your flesh; and I would rather raise my hand against sacred things.”

“Thanks for this promise, dear Lewis,” said Annette, moved by the warmth which had accompanied his protestation; “this proves the goodness of your heart as well as your friendship; but not returning an evil will not prevent your suffering from it. What will become of you, my poor Lewis, if my father does as he has said?”

“What it pleases God, Annie,” returned the youth, with noble serenity. “We are all guided by his will as the sail by the wind. Who knows that he will not touch the hardened hearts? When the captain sees me bear everything calmly, perhaps my conduct will disarm him of his anger. If he strikes, I shall bow down my head without uttering a word, and unless he is indeed madly furious he will not renew his blows. Fear nothing; as long as you love me I shall have patience to suffer, and sense enough to keep out of danger’s way.”

While uttering these last words Marzon had half raised his gentle companion, whom he now tenderly folded to his heart. Annetto, at once bashful, trembling, and happy, offered but a feeble resistance. Her thoughts were now far from the danger which had led her in the first instance to seek Lewis Marzon. Impelled by feelings which solitude favoured, she had found her first alarm yielding to softer emotions, and, without heeding it, she had suffered herself to indulge in hopes which she had resolved to abandon. During this interview, which she had intended to be a farewell, she felt her attachment grow stronger; in attempting to loosen the bonds of union she had but fastened them more securely. She indeed attempted to murmur some feeble objections, but Marzon interrupted her by one of those ebullitions of tenderness which, without answering any argument, effectually dissipate all fears.

In the meanwhile, however, time was passing, night had arrived, and in the semi-obscurity of the grotto neither of them had observed its approach or arrival. Under pretence of discovering some prudent expedient, they were building a thousand castles in the air, for the construction of which each desire furnished a stone. At first it was a change in Goron, his consent to their union, and then all those pictures of domestic happiness which it is so delightful to paint beforehand. Insensibly both of them had converted their fancies into realities. The young man in particular, whose solitary life and ardent temperament had rendered him familiar with these delusions of the heart, yielded to them unresistingly, whilst his companion listened, half-bewildered and half-incredulous, as a child who is being lulled to sleep with fairy tales. When she looked through the arch forming the entrance to the grotto and saw the dark sky, in which a few stars had already appeared, she rose with an exclamation of surprise.

“Goodness! you have made me forget the time, Lewis,” exclaimed she; “the night is already closed in, and I ought to have gone away long since. What will they say in the village when they see me taking home ‘la Rougeaude’ at so late an hour?”

“They will not see you, Annie,” replied Marzon; “but for heaven’s sake do not go away until you have told me again that you will ever retain your affection for me.”

“Be quiet, naughty boy!” said the young girl, smiling; “you know very well that I have no longer any power over it.”

“Then all is done, my dearest one!” exclaimed Lewis, folding her in his arms, “nothing will now oppose us, for what one wishes above everything else never remains long impossible. As truly as I love you, neither your father, nor ‘Long Mark,’ nor any other human being, will be able to prevent our happiness."

At this moment a sound as of water dashing against the rock startled the young girl.

"Do you hear?" said she. "It is late, the tide is rising; if you detain me I shall not be able to reach the path on the beach."

"Do not fear," replied the now happy Marzon, "the sea is still far from us."

"Look down there; in the darkness there is something white."

"It is the sand on the beach."

"I feel the spray from the waves."

"It is only the evening dew."

Thus saying they advanced together towards the entrance of the cave; but, on gaining it, Annette uttered a sudden cry.

"What is the matter?" inquired Lewis, unable to take his eyes from her.

She spoke not, but pointed in front of them. Marzon looked in the direction indicated, and started back alarmed. As far as he could distinguish in the darkness he could see nothing but the water. The narrow beach which it was necessary to cross in order to gain the ravine was so completely covered that the rocky causeway was distinguishable only by the foam which indicated its direction. Marzon ran to the second entrance, but the shore, which was still lower in that part, was entirely concealed, and he saw nothing but a deep and frightful bay.

After the first cry of terror Annette had remained motionless and silent, her hands clasped and her eyes fixed on Lewis, expecting him to propose some means of escape; but when she saw him standing still at the second opening of the grotto and watching the waves which already bathed his feet, she seized his hand and addressed him by his name. Marzon turned round.

"Well?" inquired she.

"Well! you see," stammered the youth, "on this side one cannot reach the ravine, which it would be at the peril of one's life to mount now; and, on the other side, the beach is covered; no one could pass it without being carried away by the tide."

"But you, who know the rocks of Castelli as well as I know my father's house," resumed the poor girl, in the deepest anguish, "do you know of no other way? Is there no means of getting out of the grotto?"

Marzon shook his head and, without answering, pointed to the sea which surrounded them.

"Merciful heaven!" exclaimed Annette, in an agony of despair. "But, Lewis, we cannot die here. Look, the land is quite close to us."

"Yes," replied he, sorrowfully; "but, in order to reach it, we must swim across the beach."

The fisherman's daughter started.

"Well! you can swim," exclaimed she, eagerly. "You will be able to cross the little beach on the sea as easily as I did just now on the sand. Be quick, Lewis, be quick; if you stop any longer you will be too late. Go away at once, I entreat you."

"And leave you to perish alone, my own dear innocent one?" said the young man, smiling sadly.

"No," returned Annette; "I know that you will not leave me; but here you can do nothing, whilst, if you reach the shore, you can run to the harbour; there some one will be sure to lend you a boat, and you will come and save me."

The youth shook his head.

"Look how the sea is rising," said he, pointing to the waves, which had already invaded the grotto; "even if I had the wings of a sea-gull, all would be over with you before my return."

"Is it so?" whispered Annette, weeping with terror, "then I am lost, you say—lost in reality! Oh! it is impossible. O my God! thou wilt not be unmerciful. Save me, blessed Virgin! Guardian angels, save me!"

She raised to heaven her clasped hands and agonized countenance. Love suddenly overcoming the egotism of fear and inspiring her with new courage, she exclaimed:—

"No! I am mad; hearken not to me, O God! It is Lewis who must escape—take me if thou wilt. Save yourself, Lewis, I entreat, I implore you! Oh! for pity's sake, spare me the grief of witnessing your death. If you are here I feel my courage will fail; I shall never forgive myself. Lewis, leave me to die alone, for the sake of my eternal salvation!"

At this moment a wave swept over the rock which was situated at the entrance of the grotto, dashed against the young girl and overpowered her. Marzon had barely sufficient time to snatch her from the wave, which in another minute would have borne her away, and carried her to the second compartment; there, the ground, being a little more elevated, was still untouched by the sea, and towards the end projected a portion of the rock united to the ceiling by an inclined plane. The young man climbed this with difficulty, and placed Annette on the highest part of it. There, at a few feet from the opening by which the grotto was illumined, she was soon revived by the sea-breeze and the starry light which penetrated the narrow aperture.

In the meanwhile, however, the violence of the waves became every moment more alarming; they appeared amidst the darkness of the cavern rushing in from both right and left, rising to the roof, and then bursting with a terrific noise. The narrow circle yet untouched by the water round Marzon and Goron's daughter became every instant more limited. Already deafened and bewildered by the terrific echoes which the flood awakened in those sonorous caves, and breathing with difficulty in the midst of the damp vapour, everything appeared to them to tremble. Feeling but too truly that escape was now utterly impracticable, they clasped each other in silence, as if both had lost the power and even the desire of thinking. Suddenly a sound, rendered faint by the distance, was borne to the grotto: it was the bell of Pirias summoning the faithful to evening prayers. This well-known and unexpected sound touched a chord in their hearts, and, as if by instinct, Marzon took off his hat whilst Annette clasped her hands.

"It is God who calls and comforts us," said Lewis, with that ardent faith which accompanies the hour of death; "let us say our last prayer with those we may never see again."

And, kneeling on the damp sand, the youth commenced aloud the sublime confession of the Christian faith. In the midst of the fury of the ocean, the simple words of the "Belief" were heard as if the creature were opposing with his faith the violence of creation. Marzon was professing his belief in Him who is to come and "judge both the quick and the dead," when he was interrupted by hearing the sound of his own name in the midst of the roar of the waves.

"What voice is that?" murmured Annette, who almost fancied she had heard a supernatural call.

A shadow intercepted the light which reached them through the opening above their heads.

"Merciful heavens! they are both there!" exclaimed the voice.

"Julius!" cried they both at the same moment.

"Help! help!" resumed Annette, again inspired with hope.

"It is impossible," murmured Lewis; "we are all lost!"

"That is to be proved," said Julius, quickly; "just now Peter was at Penhareng with his boat."

"At Penhareng?"

"For love of heaven, hold fast! I will go and fetch him."

The child disappeared like lightning; the poor girl was again plunged in grief.

"If the boat . . . should not arrive till too late," murmured she. And, feeling the water touch her feet, she continued, "Look, look, Lewis, how the tide is rising! Oh! you were right—all will be in vain! We must die here!"

"It does not take long to come from Penhareng," observed the youth, hesitatingly.

"Then you think they will be able to save us?" resumed Annette, grasping at this faint hope with the credulity of fear. "Oh! if you say so, it must be true, Lewis, for you know the coast better than any one in the place. Look, look, is not that the sail of Peter's boat coming into sight?"

She pointed to a white speck which was advancing towards the entrance of the grotto by the sea. Marzon shook his head, and, placing himself still more firmly on the rock, he clasped the young girl closely to him. The white speck approached rapidly; it was darting onwards like a race-horse, when Annette perceived a terrific wave, larger than any that had preceded it, rushing towards them, and uttered a piercing cry. The breaker reached the entrance and dashed into the grotto, which it entirely filled. Marzon felt that he was being carried away; but finding some projecting angles of the rock he seized them convulsively; the wave retired, and Lewis still retained his perilous situation with his young companion. The latter, overpowered by the shock, had loosened her hold of the youth's shoulder; he attempted to place her in a still higher position, at the same time endeavouring to revive her courage. The approach of death appeared to have endowed him with supernatural strength. Annette, encouraged by his words, clung firmly to the sides of the rock in order to resist the approaching wave. For some moments it was a fearful and desperate struggle for both of them. Stunned by the awful roar of the waters, enfeebled and half suffocated, they recovered breath only to resist a fresh attack. Their strength was on the point of failing them when the voice of Julius was once more heard through the aperture of the rock.

"Cheer up, Lewis! cheer up, Annette!" exclaimed the child, "here is Peter."

The indistinct form of a vessel struggling with the waves was visible amidst the darkness of the night; but it stopped at some distance from the entrance, and Peter called out something which was lost in the noise of the waters.

"What does he say?" inquired the young girl.

"He says," replied the boy, "that the boat cannot approach the grotto without being broken to pieces."

"For heaven's sake, make one effort to save us!" cried Lewis.

"It is impossible," returned Julius, "the sea is too strong; they are now getting the boat terribly dashed about; they say they cannot stop."

"Then there is but one chance," exclaimed Marzon, recovering himself with a vigorous effort. "Clasp your arm tightly round me, Annie, and commend your soul to God!"

As he spoke an immense wave reached them; he abandoned the post he had hitherto so firmly maintained: Annette uttered a piercing shriek, and both were engulfed in the flood; but, as the young man had foreseen, the reflux of the tide carried them out of the grotto. Peter fancied he distinguished something passing in the waves; he stretched out his oar, and, drawing it again towards him, received Marzon and his now lifeless companion into the boat.

(To be continued.)

THE SEA.

THE LARGEST OF ALL CEMETERIES is the sea, and its slumberers sleep without monuments. All other graveyards, in all other lands, show some symbol of distinction between the great and small, the rich and poor; but in that ocean cemetery the king and the clown, the prince and the peasant, are alike undistinguished. The same waves roll over all—the same requiem by the minstrelsy of the ocean is sung to their honour. Over their remains the same storm beats, and the same sun shines, and there, unmarked, the weak and the powerful, the plumed and the unhonoured, will sleep on until awakened by the same trump when the sea shall give up its dead.

Chronicle of Ethelfled.¹

BOOK FOURTH.

It came to pass after Yule, that there set in a grievous frost. Before the frost, there was a heavy fall of snow, under which many men, women, and huts, lay yburied. Is it not written in the annals of Alfred the king?² Thereupon came forth the wolves, stepping so warily in each other's footmarks, that on the snow could be seen but the track of one. They trotted along the skirts of the forests, bounded across the narrow roads, without leaving a single foot-print, and made for lone houses and scattered thorps. Then they stopped, listened, and snuffed the air. The shepherds, watching their flocks by night, could only keep them off by great fires. If they were heavy to sleep and suffered their fires to decay, the wolves fell on them, and destroyed them with their flocks. What, to them, were pens? they would leap over walls eight feet high. If they found horses within their sheds, they would attack them on the haunches; if oxen in their straw-yards, they flew at their throats. They ravened on many men, women, and children. They dug up the dead in many churchyards. They made no noise. If one of their young ones emitted a cry, they bit him; they dragged him by the tail, till he learned to hold his peace. When they had gorged themselves and were filled, they retreated as they came, with one ear thrown backward, one in advance, their muzzles low, their eyes burning like fire, their bushy tails obliterating their traces as they swept the ground. When they got to the wood side, they would face about and howl like Danes. "Sayth the cub, I am now under cover."

Sometimes one wolf would come in advance, and give a whining cry outside the stakes to tempt one of the hundas³ to come forth. Oft they suspected the artifice; at other times a dog would be unable to restrain himself from springing over the pales. Then there would ensue a dreadful yell, and he would be rent in pieces of all the pack.

Alfred the king hunted much, both in autumn and winter. He paid a penny for every wolf's brush. He was glad to put money in poor men's pouches, the times were so bad. He hunted harts, boars, rein-deer, and now and then a bear. Those who were craftlike in snaring deer in nets, he sometimes rewarded with a horse or a bracelet. Every man, save on Sundays, might hunt in the woods, if so be it he interfered not with the king's hunting. Thus many of the poor were fed. When the ground became hard and the scent did not lie, much small game was taken by the hand, stupid with the cold. Also the king distributed many bushels of grain, many ambra of malt, many wagon-loads of billets and twigs, that the people might be both warmed and fed. Nevertheless, as will always be the case, some were dissatisfied. And of these, certain complained unto Neot that they were neglected in the daily ministrations. Then Neot came and stood before the king; and his righteous face was red, and, saith Neot, "Why do you wrap yourself in your misconduct? Why are you powerful but in injustice? You have been exalted, but you shall not continue: you shall be bruised like the ears of wheat. Where will then be your pride? If that is not then brought low enough, it soon shall be. You shall be deprived of that very dignity, whose powers you so much abuse."

Saith the king, "My father, what words are these which proceed out of your mouth? Whose ox have I taken, what widow have I oppressed, or what poor man have I ground to powder? My purse is not bottomless, I wish it were fuller; howbeit, in this matter you seem misinformed."

Quoth Neot, "I have not been misinformed. There are certain, oh king, that have been neglected in the daily ministrations. You lie soft, and you eat as much as it liketh you, and you delight yourself in being a king, and hear not the cry of them that have no helper. Therefore look to it, or believe in my word, that you shall be deprived of that kingdom in which you are swelling, hunted from one covert to another like a fox or a hare. Howbeit, if you repent in time, you shall find mercy." Thereunto the king made no answer, and Neot withdrew himself from him, warm in his wrath.

As the cold increased, trees were split by it; bread must be thawed and chopped, ere it could be eaten; water yfroze in the outpouring, and stood on end like an icicle; fish froze in the rivers; the warm blood froze in our veins.

We of the spinning-side kept house. At night, there was much feasting. The harp went round, and every man sang his lay or told his tale. Some told of bear hunts and boar hunts; some of wolves, and foxes that talked; and of serpents that could feign to be human, and slip in and out of their skins. Also of gold-hunters, in some strange land, that journey on camels to a place where gold is dug by ants as big as dogs, with feet like unto the feet of grasshoppers. The men leave the camels for the ants to devour, and, while they are at their feast, the men take the gold. Also of the pepper-gatherers, who find the pepper guarded by serpents, that must be scared from it by fire; and thus the pepper becomes black. Is it not written in a book? Therefore it must needs be true.

Elfric the thegn sang a song, which became very popular at court, and even in the streets. He had it of Tinne the Cornishman, son of Tredulf of Tintagel; of whom we speak in the proverb, "As sweet as one of the songs of Tinne." The substance of it was this:—

"In the days of old judge Eli, came king Brute unto our shores. He was grandson of Ascanius, Eneas' only son. Then our land was full of bears, of beavers, and of boars. Then men multiplied among us till the island was o'errun. They had need of many things, I wis, we cannot bear to lack. But these poor swains ne'er missed them, so hardly were

(1) Continued from p. 151.

(2) Some unusually hard winters, about this time, are recorded.

(3) Hounds.

they bred. They had cattle, but no money. They were used their corn to stack i' the ear, and only threshed out just sufficient for their stead. In course of time, came Cæsar, to rob them of their land. What! had he not already subdued lands enow? He must come and plant his standard upon our yellow strand. But the poor, untutored Britons rushed boldly on the foe. Yea, right into the water they rushed with one accord, and gave their naked bodies to the arrow and the sword. One mind there was among them; they drove him to the main. And what those Britons then did, may we not do again? Up, enihts!¹ and with one heart! Destruction to the Dane!"²

No man told his tale and sung his lay better than Alfred the king. Also his proverbs and pithy sayings, are they not in everybody's mouth? There is no need, I wis, to write them in a book. Peradventure, many of them will be in use, when it shall be forgotten who made them.

The prince of Wessex came to court. He, too, sued for my hand; but he was coorl-like,³ and had no stæfen craft. I heard him tell the king that I started off at the first word, like a young deer from a gad-fly.

When it came to be currently reported that I was minded to profess, the priests came about me like bees; while my lovers and suitors fell off from me, as though I were too holy to come nigh. The two chaplains ascribed my call to themselves, and nailed me down to it, or ever I well wist whether I had one or not. For this cause and for none other, I have never, even unto this day, felt unto them quite freond-like. Whereas I had overmuch made a show of setting light by the world, perhaps to give a little pain (which he never felt), unto one who lived in it, I was now sore bested to find me taken at my word, and thereon, I shed many salt tears. The priests said, my ghostly enemy, witting his time was short, was having a last struggle with me, and that God loved a reluctant sacrifice. If so, I wis he loved mine. They made me think it true; and, albeit Ethelswitha put it to me, even weeping, whether I were prepared for all that lay before me, and told me sundry tales of nuns' lives I did not then believe, I still held on, but I was sore betost. Then began I to question in mine heart, why one woman should be born to be taken, and the other left? why one should be a queen, and another a nun? Howbeit, whenas these moodful thoughts had reached their highest, and I was nigh minded to forego the cloister, Eadwulf arrived with horses and with spearmen to carry me home, because that my mother lay sick, and, as it seemed, a dying.

There is no need for me Ethelfled to rehearse in detail the several graces of this my blessed mother; she being renowned throughout the length of Mercia and the breadth of it for her prayerfulness and largeness of heart. When the eye saw her, the heart blessed her: on the tongues of the poor was her praise. When I heard how she lay sick, I was pricked at the heart, to think how I had of late been trifling with heaven; and I stole into the chapel a little before the first Angelus, and vowed a vow, that if it would please the Lord to heal my blessed mother, I would wholly dedicate myself a willing servant to the Lord.

Now, because my mother's need was urgent, I tarried little in setting forth. Eadwulf rode beside my bride, full silent, till we had cleared the first long forest; for a bear had been tracked, albe we thought it must be a tamed one escaped from a bear-warden, they were so seldom known in those parts. When we reached the first down, he spake ere I spake unto him, which was unmannerlike, but well meant; and, saith Eadwulf, "Of a verity, mistress, my meowla⁴ will be fain to weep at what is held for sooth in the great city. . . I heard it, for as short a time as I tarried. Oh, lady, lady, every stroke the muffled bell shall toll for thee, will knell in our hearts! How little thou wittest of what lies on the hither and thither side of that wall of separation! 'Ye see me but half,' quo' the gate-post."

But I bade him hold his peace, so he fell back, like a chidden hound. Then I relented, and sought news of my mother, and held speech with him of long time. Then we rode till nightfall, mostly in silence, and tarried at a thane's house; and we journeyed all the next two days.

Now, when I saw my mother's deathful face, I repented not my vow, but renewed it full fervently; and thereafter she began to amend. But before I could see of this travail of my soul, I had a more immediate savour and relish of peace than I had known of long time. My mother, deeming herself at point to die, made her will; I supporting her in mine arms all the time; and, albe her provisions were needless that season, I marvelled at and loved her for her great heart therein made manifest. For, not alone devised she her morgen-gift unto my father, and this and that basin and chalice to this and that church, and such and such heall währifts and seil hrugel⁵ to Ethelswitha, and so many scencing cuppan⁶ and silver dishes to the king, besides tokens of remembrance to this and that friend, as buffalo horns, cups of bone, and brazen dishes; but she took heed to the eldest of her slaves; as on this wise—"Let Ebba be freed, on condition she abide with my daughter Ethelfleda; and let Urried be freed and go whithersoever she listeth; Wynric and his wife, and Spror; and let the sister of Tidulf be freed." Wite-theows⁷ she had none to release; my blessed mother! After this, she washed, and caused herself to be clad in long white funeral garments; then she confessed, and received the holy communion;

(1) Lads.

(2) We apologise for somewhat modernising the song of Tinne. It is just possible we may find a fitter place for giving some better specimens of this old Briton's ballads, without vouching for their pedigree.

(3) Vulgar.

(4) Familiar word for wife.

(5) Hall hangings and seat-covers.

(6) Drinking cups.

(7) Penal slaves.

so that nothing remained but for us to place her, after her decease, just as she was, in her coffin. Then she, with fatigue overwhelmed, fell back upon her bolster; and we with hopsyeytan¹ and a goat-skin covering warmly covered her o'er; and her breaths grew deep and far between, as the sighs of expiring people commonly do; but, in place of their growing yet fewer and more faint, she began anon to breathe more peaceful like, and presently fell into a deep sleep. Now I Ethelfled dismissed all her women save one. A great wax candle in a heavy candlestick burned at the foot of the bed. I lay down beside my mother, whileas Ebba fed the decaying fire with turf: and I kept staring at the candle, and thinking my mother's inward light was brighter, and I mused of the dying nun at Barking that bade them extinguish the taper; and or ever I wist, I fell on slumber, with the tears, I believe, yet on my cheek. Now, in this my sleep or trance, a dream was vouchsafed me,² not like that which caused Eliphaz the Temanite to fall a trembling, but that came unto my weary soul, with I know not what to say of peaceful and refreshing, like unto the cool night air after a hot day, or the soothing of music that yet hath no distinct sound. Mesecened to take up mine old dream in my sister's closet; in the loneliness and darkness of that locked-up garden, with its tangled weeds and sweet-smelling herbs growing unseen, all about me; and mesecemed to be standing on the brink of that deep little pool. And I heard the key turn in the gate, and some one come in and lock it again and descend and stand by the pool; but mine eyes saw him not. Then a sense of awe overcame me, and a pleasing dread overshadowed me; yet I drew nigher unto him in place of falling back; for I felt I was helpless, and here was some one that could help: sorry ful, and here was one pitied sorrow: weary, and here was one could give me rest: and, leaning over the pool, I saw therein what I could not see in its own substance . . . the face of Jesus!

Thereupon my mother woke me with a kiss, and sayeth, "Ethelfleda, you are weeping in your sleep—are you in trouble, love?" But I said, "Oh no;" and she lay quiet, and, methought, slept again, but she did not. Anon she saith in a hushed, calmful voice, "I have slept and am refreshed . . . I think my life is given unto your prayers . . . for I wis thou hast prayed for me, my daughter." I said, "Oh yes, my mother." Then she began, ever and anon, to question me of Ethelswitha, and likewise of myself. Her questions were very loving, but searching; and or ere I was aware, I felt mine heart drawn out unto her, and possessed her of every sorrow that lay in it. Her dear arm lay across me: I seem to feel it now. After long silence, "Child," quoth she, "you have been hardly entreated; and the more so that there is nothing whereon for us to take the fæth.³ Were I thy father or thy brother, I might make a quarrel of it; but perhaps it is better as it is; for to what good could we stir in the matter? Words and looks are oft but the fruit of a false heart: we may value a man's life at his were,⁴ but there is neither were nor wite for mind's peace. The owner of a mischievous dog may be fined; but they that bite and devour their own kind go sac-less." Then said I, "Oh my mother, let us keep the grief hidden between you and me. In my bitterness, I vowed a vow unto the Lord, and now keep it I must." Then saith she, "Oh child, what hast thou done? to speak unadvisedly with thy lips? The vow of a young maid in her father's house, vowed in mere sorrow of heart, need not stand." Then said I, "Oh my mother, I renewed it, or ever I left the royal city. I went into the chapel, just before the first Angelus, and kneeled upon my knees, and vowed that if your life should be lent unto us yet a season longer, I would wholly give myself unto the Lord." Then she sayeth, "I suppose such a vow as that must stand." And we both wept sore.

All this time, Ebba slumbered and slept; but now she awoke and renewed the bright beaming flame; and we two held our peace. Thereafter, my blessed mother, who was very weak, slept again; and I lay long awake, but slept at last; and when I slept, it was heavily and with no dream.

Whonas I awoke, I felt weary; and the cold, grey morning light was stealing in, and the air of the chamber was at once close and chill. But my blessed mother was still asleep peaceful-like, and the two furrows had yfed that were on her brow; and the words came into my mind, 'She shall see of the travail of her soul, and be satisfied.' Ebba was seeking, full stealthful, to revive the embers; and I lay quite awake, but still; feeling as though some great wrench had torn the quick flesh, bleeding, from the bone; and as if a strong hand had turned my soul round about, from all the things wherein it had greatly delighted, towards a new prospect, with a strait path, closely hedged, running on to a thick cloud beyond. There was somewhat untruthlike⁵ in it all; but my mother's bettering was soothfast enough.

About high noon, one of her women came in, and said the holy Neot had arrived with a token for her from the queen: having ridden all the way, to make the more speed. He was admitted strait; for my mother delighted greatly in his minis'rations; and, at this present, her soul was as subdued as a weaned child. He tarried with her long time; prayed for her; said how short and vain was life, how blessed was heaven, what exceeding love our Saviour had shown in dying for us: and every word he spake, my mother's soul and mine drank up as dry and thirsty land drinketh up water, that soon indeed disappears from the surface, but only to sink down into it and make it fruitful.

My mother being at length heavy to sleep, the good Neot withdrew into another chamber; beckoning with the hand, that I should follow him. Then sought he more particular news of my mother, to bear unto Ethelswitha, and inquired of me when she began to

(1) Sheets.

(2) "Dreams (likewise, among the Anglo-Saxons,) had their regular interpretations and applications." SHARON TURNER.

(3) Deadly feud.

(4) The pecuniary fine for homicide.

(5) Unsoothfast.

amend. Also he spake words of peace unto myself, saying how great a blessing it was for my mother to have so good a daughter by her, to abide at home and be her stay; and that my mission of usefulness, if less glorious in the sight of the world than that of my sister, was not so in the sight of God, who seeth not as man seeth. Thereupon my tears began to flow; and I did the holy man to wit how much too well he thought of me, and how I had been sore let in running the race that was set before me; but that now I began to see my way plainer; only I distrusted my strength to hold on to the end, and should be thankful to him for his prayers. These he promised me; and he went on to speak of things heavenly with such sweetness, that I was drawn on to tell him of all my little difficulties—my great difficulties would be the truer word . . . and of my dream overnight; and I asked him if he thought there were anything in it. Thereon he smiled a little; which I then thought, and think now, so good a man should not have done; for was it not unto me a serious matter? Young persons may ask unwisely questions; but, so be they are docile and anxious to be set right, they should be treated with gravity and judgment. Howbeit, the good Neot sate silent for a season, wrapped within himself, and then said, "There are sundry ways in the which divine instruction and comfort may be and have been imparted: and we know that visions have aforetime been vouchsafed unto believers, to direct and strengthen them in their need. Doubt not, therefore, my daughter, but freely believe, that this dream of thine, even if the offspring of thy foregone turn of thought, hath something of profitable and spiritual in it. Why shouldst thou have felt that great delight in the unseen presence of Jesus, if thou wert not one of his little flock? His sheep know his voice, but it only scares the goats. Why should you have heard his voice in the garden without being afraid, if you had been eating forbidden fruit, and would not have him know it? Your soul is, in sooth, his garden; full of weeds, no question, and of unpruned flowers and unripened fruits; but we know what those fruits are: love, joy, peace; long-suffering, gentleness, goodness; faith, meekness, temperance. If we are ware that these fruits have taken root in us, and are growing however imperfectly, we can, with humble assurance, invite the master of the garden to come and behold his pleasant fruits; and we must not take it amiss if he pruneth pretty freely those branches which are running to waste, since he only so doth that they may bring forth more abundantly. As concerning your deep still well . . . the heart is, we know, a well of sweet water or bitter: as bitter as Marah till the Lord casts in the righteous branch. Then it obtains his own sweetness; and oh! well for us, my daughter, when he comes down by the secret path that no man knoweth, and, taking us at unawares, finds his own image reflected in the shady pool! May he so find it with each of us, so often, that his frequent steps shall wear a little track, known only to him and to us!"

Furthermore he said, "What manner of journey

hadst thou, my daughter?" I said, the way was long, and cold, and rough, and in many parts dangerous. We tracked a bear, and feared the wolves, and had much ado to cross the rivers, which were half thawed, half frozen; howbeit, I scarce noted all the terrors of the way, I so longed to see my mother's face. As soon as I reached my father's house, all my perils, all my panics I forgot. "Thus will it be," quoth he, "in the heavenly country, when you reach your Father's house. You will scarce note the present perils of the way, if you long to look Jesus in the face."

Then he told me the following parable. "A little girl was once sent to market with a basket of eggs. On her return she found the floods had risen and the bridge was carried away. While she stood weeping beside the torrent, a tall pine snapped in twain and fell across from one bank to the other. Thereupon suddenly appeared unto her a man of most beautiful countenance, who said, 'Child, why weepest thou? what seekest thou?' She said, 'Oh, my lord, the bridge is broken, and I cannot reach my father's house.' The stranger saith, 'A pine has fallen from side to side, thou mayst cross on that.' The child saith, 'Sir, the stream is deep, and flowing very fast: my head will spin and I shall fall in.' The stranger saith, 'Give me thine hand; as long as thou holdest unto me, I will uphold thee. Look stedfastly on my face, look neither to the right nor to the left, and I will lead thee across.' The child stretched forth her hand, and looked stedfastly in his face, which waxed more and more beautiful every moment; and though she was strongly tempted, when she heard the waters raging vehemently, to look now to the right side, now to the left, she never did; and they won safe across."

Furthermore he said, That one reason which inclined him to think that my dream in my sister's closet had come, not from within but from without, directed by some superior intelligence, was that some of the ideas in it were unchildlike, and would not have originated with myself. What should I have known of the heart's bitterness? or of the spiritual conflicts of the poor maid? Thereat, I interrupted him, and said I had remembered, afterwards, having heard Ebba scoffing at the terrors of Æthelice, in the hearing of my mother, and calling them vain shadows; whereon my mother had checked her by saying that whilcas they lasted, they were no vain shadows to her. Good Neot fell a musing of this; and presently said, that if all were as ingenious as myself, and regarded not the dispelling of things seemingly marvellous by telling the exact truth, he wist that several things would be to be accounted for that now passed for miracles, and by their puerility and inconsequence brought discredit on those that were truly such.

He added, he had once had a dream that had much strengthened and comforted him, albe it was not so pretty as mine: peradventure because he was neither young nor pretty himself. He was tending of a sick friend, of whose state of grace he was by no means certain; and during his night-watch, when he ought to have been alert, he, like the poor, distressed disciples who so loved their master, fell a sleeping for sorrow. Thereon, he fancied he saw his friend trying to scale a ladder resting against something out of sight, yburied in clouds; and seeing his friend like to fall, as though blind and dizzy, he cried out with all his might to him to hold on; and would have stretched forth his own hand to save him, but had no power. Just as he thought his friend was going to fall into perdition, and could hardly endure to watch him, a hand from the cloud above was put forth and drew him safely up. "And albe," quoth Neot, "you might say that this vision was no other than the fruit of mine own previous and anxious thought, I affirm to thee, daughter, that it comforted me long afterwards."

In discourse like this, the good Neot quite took away, for that season, all lingering bitterness and reluctance from mine heart; and, continuing his communion with me from time to time, he led me onwards, step by step, and helped me here and there over rugged places, so that I never stumbled nor drev back. His great engine was the love of Jesus; not mine for him, but his for me, which indeed did as it were constrain mine own. And when other matters called my good teacher away, I found that albeit I had lost a stay I much missed, I could now with timid steps walk alone. One good I was to him indebted, was the method of life I now had formed, which so filled all my time that I had no leisure for mod-seoncnese.¹ Alfred the king, who by reason of the pagans having conveyed themselves into the north so soon as the frost brake up, had yet a lengthened season for bringing to pass such things as liked him,² and setting aside such things as liked him not, was zealously minded to promote the stafen-craft as well of clerics as lah-men. For whereas of late there had been few ecclesiastics below the rank of biseopa, on this side the Humber, who understood the service of the church, or could turn Latin into English, he was purposed that, if not all the ceoal-like at least all the ranelike throughout the realm should have some knowledge of letters; many men who should know better, being obliged, as at this time, to sign their wills with the sign of the cross, pro ignorantia literarum. Well hath he, the good king, written of later time, concerning the sadness of a soul benighted:

Oh! in how grim
In how bottomless a pit,
Laboureth the bedarken'd mind,
When it the stormy
Tempests beat
Of the world's business!

Forasmuch as then it is we find ourselves at fault, and too late lament our ignorance. And again;

Oh! thou Creator
Of the pure stars
And of the earth and heaven,
Thou that on heah-setle

Ever sittest,
And the swift heavens turnest!
Oh! who on earth
Obey thy commandments
As some do in heaven?
Man, man alone
Against thy will Evermore worketh!

So rihtwise a king, distrustful of himself, and continually seeking the good of others, was likely to have the blessing of heaven on his deed. Much he laboured, not alone by schools and colleges to promote stafen-craft, but likewise to spread the knowledge of the holy Scriptures by multiplying copies. And, because that the labour of transcription was great, and the labourers few, he was purposed that even religious women should assist in the work; and had already opened his mind to me on the expedience of insisting much on the poyntel-craft³ of the holy virgins that might hereafter to my care be committed. To please him and edify myself, I now spent much time, both in transcription of Latin and Saxon, and in copying of illuminated initials and borders, with colours of red, blue, and yellow; but my materials were exceeding bad, nor had I as yet seen any good models, therefore my labour was not purpose-like or effective; albeit, it seemeth me as much pleasure accrues to the performer of an indifferent as of a superior work, if so be he is satisfied with himself. This labour I could pursue in my mother's chamber; and she, being too feeble for much speech, and having great respect for those that were clericic, did peaceably lie, with pillows under-sette,⁴ her eyes fixed on me and her hands folded, as if in the article of saying Nunc dimittis. Thus I transcribed much of the psalter, and figured it as I went along with representations of trees, rivers, men, birds and beasts, outlined with red ink, and filled up with the best colours I could find or make. Each night I read to my blessed mother and her women, the portion I had transcribed during the day, and commented thereon to the best of my poor power; whereby I could discern that I was, without yseeking it, silently gaining of them the reputation of a young saint. This was very peaceifying unto me, and went some way towards counterpoising the chief grievance I now had in my mind, which proceeded from the cause following.

When my mother first fell sick, there cometh twice or thrice from the king's royal court, sumpter horses, well guarded with spears, and laden, by the bounty of Ethelswitha, with grain, wine, cakes, cracknels, spices, comfits, pepper, and, in fine, every dainty my mother could need, and every remedy, methinks, that could be in the book of Bald the Laeco.⁵ Inasmuch, that my mother bade her stay her hand, for she was by her goodness overstocked, as well with things that would as would not decay, and provoke the greediness of mice, rats, and weevils. Therefore the sumpter

(1) Mood-sickness: sickness of mind.

(2) "I, Alfred, cnying, have gathered together many of those things our fathers held, which liked me; and have thrown aside many of those which liked me not."—Exordium to Alfred's Laws.

(3) Penmanship. See Wickliffe's Bible, "And he axed for a poyntel."

(4) Propped up.

(5) Bald the Leech wrote a medical treatise about the time of Alfred, containing two or three hundred prescriptions.

horses came no more; and the latest envoy having the news that my mother was well to speed with him ycarried, Ethelswitha of a certainty made up her mind that she was quite healthful, which was far off from the truth. From that season, we had no note nor signal of her remembrance of us, which troubled us full sore. Of a truth, we were set at a great distance from the royal city; but kings and queens have so many men and horses at their beck, that a handful of them might, certes, have been well bestowed in doing us to wit that they sometimes bare in mind we were in the land of the living. Howbeit, we were overlooked of long time; and when, at length, some token reached my mother, there was no question for myself, no more than if I had for years in a cloister been yburied. This snote me at the heart; and when, of later time, I spake of it to Ethelswitha, she put it off lightly with, "Oh, we married women." . . which made the matter not better but rather worse, I'm bethinking! For, if married women have more businesses and pleasures than those that, unwed, nigh the hearth twirl sadly the long flax, they ought of their lonely sisters to be the more mindful. Soon I found, that whenas my thoughts went in this direction, my heavenly comforts faded: for that cause, after one or two sore conflicts whereof none others wist, I gat much unto prayer, and unto reading and transcription, grinding colours, steeping and scraping of parchments; and, though much of my labour was in one sense wasted, yet the demon was cast out. Also, about this time, my father returned from his attendance on king Buhred, who was purposed to go beyond seas, leaving behind him Ethelswitha, his queen, king Alfred's sister. My father was, by advancing money unto him and to king Alfred, much impoverished; and when my mother told him I was minded to profess, he cried, "What! my apple-blossom? I was purposed to give her unto the prince of Wessex; howbeit, he with another wyf himself hath provided, so that, it may be, all is best as it is; for that, or ere my youngest should wed much beneath my eldest, I would sooner see her a blot." Also he was pleased to say that he had found it so expensive a pleasure to be kinsman to two kings, that he thought a third would have ruined him. I marvelled my father should take it thus easily, and was thankful he wist not I had repulsed the prince of Wessex; howbeit, his indifference and the neglect of Ethelswitha made me droop, which, my good mother noting, she would have it that 'twas from overcare of her; so to set her at ease, I told her my heart's grief, and she comforted me and told me she had been grieved too. Also, she told me how many excuses she had been able to make in her own mind for Ethelswitha; wherefore, after a few tears, I was able to go on my way peaceful-like, with still increasing love for my blessed mother.

Howbeit, the bearer of the tardy love-token having returned to the royal city, there arriveth, some three weeks afterwards, (it being then the summer of the year of our Lord 873) a company of spearmen guarding a sumpter load of good things for my mother, and bearing an epistle ywritten in Ethelswitha's name by Werefrith the chaplain. And the epistle signified that if my mother were now able to spare me, the queen was desirous of my immediate company. And whereas I, being still chafed, was minded to punish mine own self by refusing to go, my loved mother urged my ready compliance, and with my conflicting mind so ywrought, as that I started the next morning, royally attended. Now whereas my winter journey had been rough and dangerous, and performed with a troubled heart, the weather was now warm, and the air fresh, and the rivers fordable, and the husbandmen at work in the fields, and the wild beasts in their dens until nightfall. Therefore my spirit was glad and my heart rejoiced; the more by token that I thought my prayer and my vow had gone some way to win me the grace of the life of my blessed mother; and I had the fancy of somewhat good in store for me, I wist not justly what. Therefore the road seemed short and the journey delectable, albe it lasted three days. When we reached the royal city, it wanted about two hours of high noon; and Alfred the king, just returned from trying some new German hawks, was standing at his gate, in his green hunting frock, surrounded by his ealdormen, gerefas, and thanes: his hair had partly escaped from its fillet; and as he stood talking and laughing with his train, he looked like what he was, a king and the son of a king. He lifted me from off my horse, saying "Ethelfled, you look as fresh as a rose!" and led me in, all smiling, to the queen. With her was Bald the physician, who in stead of retiring as he might better have done, from the first greeting of us two dear sisters, only stood aside, unmannerlike, and anon asked me how fared the earl my father. I said he had recovered from his foot-ail so wholly, as to have been on his duty to king Buhred. Thereupon he would know what had healed my father so speedily. To him I replied that Gunfried had dieted him low, kept him cool, and given him mineral water from a spring of rare virtue. He repeated after me, "Low diet? kept him cool? mineral drinks? I am driven beside myself, oh lady, to hear of such senseless proceedings. Do not we Saxons hate cold water? Is it suitable to our constitutions? This old woman might have been the death of your noble father by driving the ail from his extremities. Ye should have loaded him with bedd-rafes, have fed him high, and have given him my tried prescription: to wit, a penny-weight and a half of the dried heads of tuberose-isis, which in the vulgar tongue we call greata-crauleac; half a penny-weight of pear-tree bark, Roman bark, and cummin; a fourth part of laurel berries, and six pepper-corns. All these you should have ground to a powder, and added thereto two egg-shells full of good wine; and given him to drink thereof, until he got well."

Howbeit, my father had tried this remedy without success, though I declared it not unto Bald; and, albe it Gunfried might, the laece averred, have been

(1) Ymbethencan: to bethink one's self.

(2) A sacrifice.

his death, yet certain it is that under her care he became well. As say the common people "No physics more rare, than simples with prayer," so it had proved in this instance. A gilded pill is sometimes moriferous. Flour of wheat, boiled in milk, hath healed the swelled knee of a saint.

About an hour before sunset of the same day, my women having uncorred my chest, I took therefrom the Psalter I had illuminated at my loved mother's bedside; and placed it, not without a little secret elation, in the hands of the king. Thereon he smiling and greatly content, called unto him Æthelswitha, that they its contents simultaneously might behold. Now I with modesty looked another way; but anon, venturing to cast mine eyes to the king, I saw his eyebrows, which were very moveable, quickly uprise and decline again, and his mouth betray that he was making merry at my expense. Then my face became suffused, as if with the red colour of stibium;¹ and I said, "You have shamed me, my king." He said, "Thy shame be upon me, my sister! of a truth, to laugh at thee was unmannerlike, more especially for thy failing well to depict things thou hast never seen; but indeed, Æthelfled, these waves of the Red Sea look like fratwungs,² and these clouds like dumplings. Neither wot I how these warriors should escape being fined, for carrying their spears so dangerously, nor why this giant's head should exceed in size his body, unless to be the better mark. But be not discouraged, my sister; you need nothing but better teaching. Oh that I, in my boyhood, had in many things been better taught!" And, after a good deal more parley, that was delightful and praiseful, albeit that sudden smile once and again lit up his face, he saith, "Have you ever heard of the famous gospel of St. Cuthbert, commonly known as the Durham Book?"

I said I knew it had been transcribed and illuminated by the Bishop of Lindisfarne, a hundred years ago, and that he had been twenty-and-two years about it.

The king sayth, "Sister, believe me, no great work was ever perfected in a hurry. It was by labour and patience that the bishop made his book worth a royal ransom. I have desired that mine eyes should see it, long time, but would not send spears and horses so far in troubled times, only myself to please; nevertheless, now that it may profit you to see the book, I will send. It may be that the monks will lend it to me on pledge; or on the word of a king." Thereafter he praised my delineations of herbs and flowers, my colours of red and of blue, and the smoothness of my parchments: howbeit, when I to my chamber retired that night, I was disturbed because that my limnings had made merry the king; and was ready to wish that I had not showed them unto him. Then saw I how far the pleasure of executing a work of art exceedeth the pleasure of having it appraised by others when y wrought. For sympathy is pleasant, and praise is pleasant; but the excellency of art is that it is all-sufficient in itself. To conclude, I, Æthelfled, thus mused in my mind; "Thou, oh king, hast many painful, many weariful hours; and is it not a good thing that, even at mine own expense, I for a little should have made thee merry, my brother?"

Now, behold, over and above the stuff contained in my brazen-bound chest, as gems and goodly raiment, I had brought along with me two goat-skin bags or pokes, well lined, and secured at the mouth, containing sundry matters; and herein, I blush to relate, I had, witless, placed an embroidered purse, containing fifty-and-three mancusa of gold, a love-token from my mother unto Æthelswitha. And when the bags came to be emptied, behold, the purse of gold was not therein; and the suspicion of theft fell on Umfreig,³ who had had the baggage in charge. Now, Umfreig was my father's cup-bearer. Full sorry was I, therefore, that he of such villainy should be accused; but what could I do? The loss was Æthelswitha's, not mine, wherefore, I was constrained to publish the matter. And because that it could not be brought home to him, and he would not confess, it was decreed that he should be tried by ordeal.

Now, on having his choice, whether of red-hot iron or of water boiling furiously, he decided on the latter, which some thought savoured of innocence, and others of audacious presumption. For me, I was ready to weep for him, being assured of his guilt; albeit Wulfgyth, my woman, said somewhat scornfully, "Be at peace, lady, there are ways of seething without being hurt." Simon the priest took the direction of the whole. For three days he kept the man in retreat, feeding him on bread and salt, bitter herbs and water; and thus brought his spirit low. On the third day, a fire was kindled within the church, and water set thereon in a copper vessel and made to boil, in the presence only of the priest and the accused. Then entered two men of either side, and agreed that the water boiled furiously; then an equal number of additional men of either side entered the church, all fasting, and ranged themselves on either side the ordeal. Then the priest sprinkled them with holy water and made each of them taste thereof; then they kissed the Gospels, and were signed with the sign of the cross. All this while the fire was not mended, and peradventure the water ceased boiling; else how should ensue what happened? A stone being cast into the pot, Umfreig plunged his hand in after it and drew it out, while Simon the priest uttered an ejaculatory prayer, that the truth might be made manifest unto all men. The hand was wound up in a linen cloth and sealed; in that fashion it was kept for three days. At the end of that time, the seals were broken, the cloth was unwound; and the hand was found . . . whole! like as its fellow.

Now, here ensues the marvel. Umfreig was afterwards detected endeavouring to pass one of the mancusa, which, unbeknown to him, was marked; and being taken in the manner, he confessed, and should have suffered death! howbeit, his kinsmen redeemed him by paying his were, and the amount of the stolen treasure, besides giving borh for his future fidelity. Now, albeit he confessed his own guilt, he could not be brought to confess any collusion or deceit in the administration of the ordeal; albe Bald the physician, who was certified in his own mind that some outward application had hardened his hand, offered him monies and his mediation with my father, if he the same would reveal: alleging that the individual wrong would be greatly atoned for by the general benefit that would accrue therefrom. Not one word would he confess, that hardened Umfrieg: he was always a close, unpleasant fellow. So Bald interceded not with my father: the office of cup-bearer was given unto Snel; and Umfrieg, after lying long in bonds, was cast forth, a feo-lun, that is to say, one who hath not a penny. In the old days, had he escaped with his life, he would have lost hand and foot. I think he afterwards joined a hioth.¹ All this crime and sorrow might I Ethelfleda have prevented, had I locked the money in the oaken chest.

(1) A rouge, not unknown to the Anglo-Saxon ladies.

(2) The zigzag ornament so often seen in Saxon architecture.

1 [(8) Humphrey]

Now, save for this untoward event, my visit to the court as at this time, was full pleasant; but, insofar as others were concerned in it, completely secular. There was much to tell, much to hear: when I spake of taking the veil, no one seemed to hear me. Many people came and went; among the rest was the king of Northumbria's son, who came and did not go. He was winsome, clerclike, and could play well on the harp and rote. To my great surprise, Ethelswitha asked me if I would have him to my husband. I said no; I was the bride of heaven, and dared not to think of an earthly spouse; it would be sin. She said that was nothing; I had taken no vows, and was, as yet, unfettered; but I knew I had taken a vow in mine heart, as sacredly as if the bisceopa had held the Host before me at the altar. Howbeit, her I told not, save in general, that I could not, nor would not; wherefore Ethelswitha was on no wise to be blamed for that she bade the king to talk to me. But it fell, that ere he returned from the chase, I had the grace of a few hours to myself; and the end of my reflections was, that my Saviour must be all or nothing to me; that my word would not be worth an egg if I kept it not to him, albeit none else had wist it to be pledged; that there was much peace and much profit to be hoped for, if my life were hidden with Christ in God; that he could help me, and that he would help me through all trials, if so be I gave myself wholly unto him; and that I could, and that I would. Therefore the king, when he had speech of me, found me firm as a rock, and after saying all that could be said on the matter as well as any one could say it, he came to a pause. Then, quoth the king, "I never knew so stedfast a mind! go on thy way rejoicing, Ethelfleda! heavenly angels be thy speed! Noted shalt thou be among our holy women; and for all thou sayest, in thy too great modesty, of the uselessness of an unmarried woman's life, be secure it needs not in thy case to be so, but may be quite otherwise; for you may help me in my schemes greatly. I have store of high and holy work that none but one so gentle, so pure, so wiselike as thyself can do; and I wit thou wilt do it well for me, my sister!"

Thereon, what could I do, but kiss his hand, and then steal away to the chapel, and kneel down before the altar? happy, happy! to wist that in giving myself wholly unto God, I had gained the power of being useful and finding favour in the eyes of the king.

(To be continued.)

LIFE IN PRAIRIE LAND.²

CHAPTER XII.

On the northern side of a prairie, eighteen miles in extent, two groves approach within a short distance of each other from the east and west. They lie on a lofty swell of land, and are visible many miles away. The plain between these dark green promontories is smooth as the unruffled sea, and you fancy as you look upon its quiet outline, while the tree-tops toss and swell against the clear blue sky, that the smallest object would be discernible. Presently a short dark line rises against the light, and as the coach toils over swell after swell, and brings you nearer the object, it grows distinct, permanent, and bold, and fastens itself with a strange pertinacity on the eye and mind. It concentrates your wandering thoughts, and you wonder what could have led to the construction of such an object on that spot. No dwelling or other tenement is visible, and the green wall of the western grove rises apparently a full mile from it. There it stands without proportion or symmetry, its harsh angles unrelieved by a single shrub, its silent walls brown with the storms of years. It is a tomb! Further back in the grove stands a house near which its silent tenant lived and died.

Long before these lands were vacated by the Indians, a settler came hither from the eastward, with his family. He was roving through these beautiful gardens in search of a spot whereon to make his home. One morning his white-topped wagon entered the southern border of this large prairie, and, all day, was seen by the wondering Indians at the grove, to rise and fall slowly among the green swells, coming nearer and nearer, till at nightfall it halted on the line where this solitary tomb now stands. Here the travellers encamped, and one who has visited the spot, will not wonder that when the patriarch had seen the next sun rise on the scene before him, he declared their journeyings ended! A site was selected in the grove for their cabin, the logs were felled, and laid up by the father and his sons, and a frontier home soon sent its smoke curling through the overhanging boughs. Their only neighbours were the rambling Indians who, in their excursions from the north and south, always halted at this grove. They had no domestic animals save the faithful cattle that had drawn them, and a dog.

(1) A band of thieves.

(2) Continued from page 144.

For many months after the cabin was built they depended on wild game and fruits for subsistence. The rifle of the father brought down abundant supplies of deer and grouse, and the smaller members of the family could trap the quail, gather berries and plums, and beat the hazel and nut-trees.

The wife and mother wrought patiently for those she loved. Her busy hands kept a well-ordered home during the day, and at night they plied the needle to the wardrobe of her little household band. It was already scanty, and materials to replace the worn-out garments were far away, and would cost what she had not to give. When one was worn beyond the resuscitating powers of her needle, its place was supplied, as well as might be, by the skins which they had taken from their game.

Sunrise and evening twilight found the father at his labours. He had no harvest that year, but if he would reap the next, much preparation must be made before the winter came. First, the turf was broken where he proposed to plant his corn, rails were next made and laid around it, some of the native hay was gathered and piled up at the corner of his cabin, and a little garden fenced and ploughed. When all these things were done, there yet remained the journey to the nearest settlement for winter goods and grains, and for the cow, which could not longer be dispensed with. When all was ready, the father and his eldest son started in the emigrant wagon, and were absent many days, during each of which the mother and her little children—protected, if danger came, only by the dog—looked anxiously out upon the great prairie, now embrowned by the frosts of autumn, and wondered when they would return. There were few travellers then in those uninhabited plains. Day after day passed, and no sign of life was visible on the plain, save the deer bounding among its crisp herbage, or the famished wolf, rushing madly against the winds which bore the scent of prey. The intense sunshine which flooded this swaying sea, was now softened by the hazy atmosphere peculiar to those plains in the autumn months; the flowers were all dead, the trees disrobed, and a wild, vast desolation, which penetrated the soul of the lone woman, seemed hovering over the face of her new home.

On the fifth day, a party of Sauk warriors, plumed and painted, entered her dwelling. Her heart beat quick, and her eye glanced wildly toward her little ones, as their swarthy figures darkened the door; but a moment restored her self-possession. She knew they were not enemies, and felt secure in her very helplessness. They had not lived much among the whites, and it requires some teaching to induce the savage to fall on a helpless person who is not his foe. With the few words and signs which she had acquired, she entered into conversation with them, and learned that they were on their way to give battle to the Kaskaskias and Peorias. Here was a new cause of solicitude; her husband's road lay through the battle-ground, and who could tell what savages, seeking blood, might do? or what would be his fate should he fall between the hostile parties! Offering them such hospitality as her poor home afforded, and praying that it might purchase the safety of the absent, she signified her hopes and fears, and watched their retreating footsteps with a boding heart.

All day she bent her eyes to scan the plain, but nothing met her search save the forms of the retreating warriors, which grew dimmer with distance and the fading night, till at length they were wholly lost. With aching head and anxious heart she put her little ones to bed; and when they slept, she rose and looked anxiously out upon the night. Black broken clouds were driving across the heavens at a fearful rate, and the wind rushed through the naked trees, and howled around her chimney, like some evil spirit demanding sacrifice.

The only window of her cabin looks over the plain; and there she stands gazing as if the daylight rested on it, and she hoped each moment to see the long-wished-for object leave in sight. Presently a strange light gleams on the blackened sky! What should it be? not lightning, for it rose instead of falling, and hung longer on the sight than the electric flash. But it is gone!—now again it comes, stronger, and looks as if the bright, fiery sun had lost his place, and without any precursor were rushing up the southern sky. Again it almost disappears; but the faint tinge is soon increased, and a broad glare bursts up which overwhelms that widowed heart. The dreadful truth pierces her very heart, and makes her whole frame tremble. The prairie is on fire! Oh God! what a conviction! She remembers now that they have talked of prairie fires, and promised themselves much pleasure in beholding them. But she never dreamed of the red demon as an enemy, and one to be encountered in this dreadful solitude.

Her heart sinks within her. There are no means to avert or escape it. The only living things about her are the children and the faithful dog. The former are sleeping quietly, and the latter sits at her feet gazing in her face with a mute sympathy that brings tears to her eyes. She does not need to look for the light now, for it has gained so that she cannot escape its glare. The wind is bearing the fire almost with its own speed across the immense savannah. She cannot calculate the distance at which she first saw it, but if it were at the extreme southern border, it must, with such a wind, reach her in a few hours, nay, even less!

But what to do, where to go! She rushes to the door. Merciful Heaven! It is all one sea of dry combustibles around her. Grass, dry grass everywhere! she can find no refuge. The very tree tops, if she could gain them, with those she is bound to save or perish with, would afford her no protection from such a sea of flame as is roaring yonder! The wind increases, the elements seem to grow madder as the flame approaches, and aggravate its fury. With every blast, it towers and curls, and then, as if enraged at its own impotence, sinks a moment sullenly, to gather strength for a fresh effort.

There is a large creek about four miles away, and on this the lone woman hangs her last faint hope. The wind will not befriend her, and she can only hope that the waters may arrest the flame. Hapless woman! she little knew the strength of the devastating demon that was let loose that night! A slender thread of water to separate her from such a surging sea of flame! But if it did not protect her! What then! If the last extremity came! what should she do? She could have but few moments to deliberate, after the dreadful foe crossed this line. Bewildered, almost stupefied, by the terrors of her condition, she had not waked her children. She had contemplated their dreadful fate alone, almost in silence, and with little action, after she opened the door and was overpowered by the conviction that to leave the house was even more certain death than to remain.

Now, when the time grew short, and the hot breath of her relentless foe rushed fiercely around her, she addressed herself rapidly to the care of her little ones; she woke them with much difficulty, and with much more brought them to comprehend the danger that awaited them. One lively boy enjoyed the spectacle, and clapped his hands, and almost maddened his mother, by rushing out to get a fairer view of the wonderful scene. But where was the dog? the noble dog who was her only intelligent friend in this fearful time? Her quick mind had counted on his protection, in case she should escape and were shelterless. But where was he? She stepped to the door; the light was now strong and revealed distinctly every object. He was nowhere to be seen! She made the wood ring with his name, and presently a low supplicating bark was borne to her ears on the hot wind.

The fire had crossed the creek, and was tearing its way, like an infuriated demon, up the plain. A few minutes must decide her fate—she fell on her knees, and commended herself and her helpless babes to the mercy of her God; and then rose, calm and collected for the event. She had not, hitherto, contemplated the wonderful scene apart from the dangers with which it was fraught; but now, for the first time, she was struck with its grandeur and sublimity. It was an unbroken line of flame, wide as the eye could reach, mounting, roaring, crackling, and sending up columns of black smoke which, as they rose, became rarer, and, rising still higher, were reilluminated so as to appear another devouring demon sweeping the heavens. Mercy and hope seemed alike cut off by its angry glare. The fiery wall shut out the world behind, except occasionally, when a blast cleft it, it opened upon a black chasm that looked like the funeral vault of nature.

Scarcely had she taken this brief survey, and noted the nearer approach of the flame, when the dog came bounding to her side, and with the most earnest petitions, sought her attention without the door. She followed him a few steps, scarcely thinking what she did, but, finding nothing, and seeing him making rapidly for some distant point, she turned back, closed the door, and sat down before the window to watch the progress of the fire. In an instant he was there, pawing, whining, howling, and, by every means in his power, soliciting her attention. Before she could open the door to admit him he bounded through the window.

"Merciful God! what have you done! we shall all be consumed—there is no hope now!" He stood at her feet; the strong intelligence of his face fascinated her eye in spite of the danger. What could he mean? In an instant the sagacity of his instinct flashed upon her. To the ploughed field! Yes, there was hope, and there alone. She seized the two younger children in one arm, and almost lifting the other by her hand, she fled along the trodden path, the delighted dog going before, and manifesting his joy by every sign in his power. They gain the fence—the fire is at their heels, it almost blisters their unprotected faces! One or two more leaps, and the herbless ground is gained. The fire has nothing now to feed on, and almost faint with the sudden and certain safety, the exhausted mother drops on the ground among her helpless infants.

"Merciful Saviour, what an escape!" In a few minutes the flames are besieging the house, the logs covered with dry bark are but a morsel in their fierce jaws, the haystack takes fire and communicates to the rest of the cabin, and while the great volume of the fire sweeps among the trees and over the plain, it leaves the heavier materials to be consumed more slowly. Long did the light of the burning home, therefore, blight the eye of the lone woman after the "prairie fire" had done its worst around her, and gone, bearing ruin and devastation to the northern plains and groves. Worn out by the terrors of the night, she sank into the semblance of sleep, on the naked earth, among her babes, with her faithful protector crouched at her feet.

CHAPTER XIII.

SHE woke in the morning to the dread reality which had been briefly forgotten; but which now broke with stunning force upon her senses. Her children were chilled and hungry. The spot where late their pleasant hearthside shone was a heap of mouldering brands and blackened ashes, with which the morning winds were toying in merry pastime. There was neither food nor shelter! and when she rose to her feet and looked out upon the plain, its strange appearance startled her. It seemed more boundless than ever, and the blackness of desolation brooded over every foot of it. It was clean shorn of every blade of vegetation, and appeared, within the last few hours, to have been blighted with a curse from which the smiles of heaven could scarcely redeem it.

With faltering steps the unhappy woman gathered her little ones, and prepared to leave their cheerless bed. But whither should they go! there was no house within many miles. Beside her own little roof she had not seen another since they left the last settlement. To seek shelter or bread, therefore, from others was impossible. Her only resource was to search the wasted wood and plain for roots or nuts, or whatever might be left to support life, till her husband's return. The fire of her cabin would warm the shivering babes for one or two days at least, and if help came not then, she must trust herself to the mercies of a journey over the bleak desert.

Bending her steps, therefore, towards the smouldering ruins, she soothed and warmed her children, and set out with the generous dog to search the grove for food. It was a desperate pilgrimage: most of the nuts and fruits in the vicinity of the house, had been gathered and deposited in the loft for winter use; and of those that were left upon the ground, few had escaped the consuming flames of the previous night. Occasionally she found one sheltered by a decayed log or a heavy clump of grass, which the fire in its haste had not stopped to devour. But they were rare, and she had three mouths to feed beside her own! A scanty meal was, however, obtained, and she returned to the fire. The warmth relieved their sufferings more effectually than the coarse morsel they had eaten. The little ones wondered where the house was, but rejoiced in the great pile of burning logs, and after a little time, the mother had the happiness of seeing them forget their hunger in some merry games.

Long and intensely this day did her eyes dwell on the wide, black plain! She had no need to look so earnestly, for the most careless glance would have revealed the white cover of the wagon if it had been moving over the dark surface. Noon passed, and brought no signal of mercy. She could see the brown deer leaping timidly over the scorched waste, and the grouse wheeling his short, swift flight from place to place; but this was all. Another night of dreadful solitude! exposed to cold and hunger, and to the starved wolf! shelterless, weaponless—the dog their only defence.

During the day she had found a few of the ground-nuts, which grow quite abundantly in the edge of the grove; with these she fed her little ones; and parting with nearly all her clothing, wrapped them in the scant covering; and with pleasant words, while her heart was bursting, soothed them to sleep, and laid them on the charred turf to the windward of the smoking pile, while, with her noble dog, she sat down to watch their slumbers. At intervals, for several hours, the winds bore to her aching ears the short, querulous barking of the small prairie wolf, and once or twice her very blood curdled when the shrill, dismal howl, by which the large, grey wolf summons his neighbours for an attack, resounded over the bleak waste! The night was utterly black. Beyond the little circle, faintly lighted by the wasting embers, nothing could be discerned. Her eyes would not warn her of an enemy within three yards; and as often as she peered into the darkness at every new sound, the faithful dog would nestle to her side and lick her hand, and turn his intelligent eyes toward hers with an expression of sympathy and confidence that cheered her solitary vigil more than she could tell.

The cold winds howled around her thinly-clad frame, and chilled it to the core. The noises one by one died away, and, spite of the horrors of her condition, a drowsiness stole over her which she could scarcely resist. Her eyelids drooped, and her shivering body swayed slightly to and fro, when the smouldering ends of the logs tumbled into a new position, and sent upward a volume of shining, crackling sparks, which roused her sinking energies and braced her for another hour's watching. At last the darkness became profoundly silent! Save the steady pressure of the wind, not a sound was heard. The nocturnal wanderers seemed to have withdrawn to their haunts, and left nature to the undisputed reign of night. Chilled, and faint with fatigue and fasting, the lonely watcher could no longer preserve her wakefulness; she curled her shivering form close to the sleeping babes, and left the vigil to the faithful dog.

It was stupor rather than sleep that locked her faculties till the cry for food recalled them. The fire was diminishing, the sun was up, but he looked coldly through a mass of leaden vapour that was crowding up the south-eastern sky. The whole heavens were curtained with the still sullen mass which threatened every moment to descend in rain. A few hours before, she had thought her condition could scarcely be aggravated. But the impending storm was little less to be dreaded, in their feeble state, than the terrible foe which had exposed them to it. Her limbs were stiff and full of pain; her brain reeled, and her sight became dim, as she rose to her feet and prepared to search the grove once more for something to sustain life in her hungry children.

Her own desire for food was gone; she would have loathed the most tempting viands. But when the little ones hung upon her garments and begged for bread, she summoned her fainting limbs to one more effort; and taking a direction which had not been tried before, she found, after a long and painful search, a few stalks of the ground-nut, which her feeble hands with difficulty removed from their firm hold upon the soil. The roots of these afforded a morsel wherewith to still the cries that pierced her heart. And when there was no further hope, and her limbs tottered beneath her, and strange racking pains wrung her worn body, she hastened back to the spot which still seemed home, though nought of home was there, and felt, if her hour were come, it were better to lie down and perish by those consecrated ashes, than in the cheerless wood. A drizzling rain was falling when she reached the spot, and threatened to increase. It would be impossible to preserve the fire long; but pushing the brands together, she gathered her trembling little ones about her knees, and, between her periods of agony, sought to impress their memories with the terrible events that had befallen them. She endeavoured to make the eldest boy comprehend that he might be the only narrator whom his father would find, should he ever return; and left many tender messages for him and for her first-born. With pallid, tearful face he promised to do as she desired; but urged her to tell him where she would be when his father came, and whether his little brothers were going with her, to leave him all alone.

The rain increased, and their drenched garments gave the chilling blast redoubled power. The embers hissed and blackened, and soon refused to warm the shaking group. Like the pangs of death grew the mother's agony!—as certain and relentless! And there, beside the reeking ruins of her home, the black earth beneath, and the pitiless storm above, there alone, her only attendants the helpless children and the dog, who sat at her head, and seemed almost to weep over her writhing form, the hapless woman gave birth to a little being, whose eyes never opened to the desolation of its natal hour.

Long did the mother lie unconscious alike of the terror-stricken cries of the children, and the moaning carresses of her dumb friend. The day was far advanced when her eyes opened on the dreadful scene. The cold rain was pouring steadily down, and twilight seemed to her faint eyes to be creeping over the earth. A pleasant sound was ringing in her ears, but it was either a dream, or its import had faded from her mind before it was fully grasped. She made an effort to rise, but fell senseless. Once again, her eyes opened, and this time it was no illusion. The eldest of her little watchers was shouting in her ear, "Mother, I see father's wagon;" and there indeed it was, close at hand before his untrained eye had discovered it. All day it had been toiling across the black prairie! The rain had softened the turf, and the wheels sank without cutting it, so that the last few miles had been inconceivably tedious. The mourning garb of the plain had struck the hearts of both father and son with indescribable terror. The former would have left his slow team and flown across it, but his son had charge of the cow, and this was impossible. More alarmed and excited as he advanced, he was still obliged to restrain his intense feelings, and accommodate his progress to the slow motion of the tired cattle. Night drew on before the desolation of his home was revealed to him. When within about a mile, he should have discovered the house, but all was a level waste! Unable longer to endure the torture, he sprang forward, leaving the animals to follow as they chose. He flew, he shouted, and the dog bounded to meet the well-known voice. When the boy saw the wagon, the father had just left it, so that even as he repeated the joyful tidings, the stricken man stood over them, half-stupified by the effort to comprehend the nature and extent of his calamities.

A group of perishing children, an infant corpse, a dying wife! and all, all gone, wherewith to minister even the decent ceremonies of such a period. Oh, how bitterly his heart cursed the day when he trusted the treacherous beauty that invited him there. He raised the dying woman in his arms; the seal was on her glazing eye, and the faint fluttering at her wrist foretold the last and worst that could befall him! Slowly, word by word, she told her agonizing tale. He threw his garments over her, and wiped the rain-drops from her face, and drew her to his heart. But the cold dew returned, and told that storm or shelter would be soon the same to her! He prayed her forgiveness, and with wild, incoherent words, accused himself of her cruel murder. She vindicated him from these accusations with all her little strength, and with many messages for her absent son, and many prayers for her dear children and their father, she resigned her breath, just as the last light was fading from the western sky.

She had begged that her tomb might be made on the site of the burned cabin. And there, when he had watched two days and nights by her unsheltered corpse, and hewn a rough coffin to receive her and her untimely babe, she was deposited. The grave was a rude hollow, scooped with sticks and the hands of the widowed husband and his sons. The preparations were completed and the dead lowered on the afternoon of the second day. At midnight a troop of famished wolves attacked the holy spot, and but for the rifle of the husband, would have torn its sacred contents from their rude repose. The next day he felled the nearest trees, and laid them in the form of a vault on the spot. And this it is which greets the traveller's eye so many miles away on the untenanted prairie.

(To be continued.)

THE FLOWERS OF SPRING.

"WHAT is this place, my mother,
This quiet piece of ground!
And why does the long grass wave uncut,
When the hay lies all around?"

"My child, it is the old kirkyard,
And here they lay the dead;
And they sleep in silence underground,
While the grass waves overhead.

And the yew-trees bend above them,
While sunbeams come and go,
And glide between the dewy leaves,
And shake on the turf below.

And here the long grass never Before the mower falls,
For we seem to know and love each blade
That grows within these walls."

"When I lie here, my mother,
Will you come and plant above,
The primrose and the violet,
And all the flowers I love?"

"My child, my child, may Heaven
Preserve you many a year,
To live with me in memory
When I am sleeping here!

If we are to be parted,
Not you must go, but I;
And as I've taught you how to live,
I'll teach you how to die."

The winter's come: the flowers are dead;
The bare tree tops swing rattling in the gale;
With mist the sky is overspread;
The earth looks sadly forth from out her snowy veil.

With sudden clang, a sullen sound
Comes slowly swinging through the gloom :
The passing bell proclaims around,
One more inhabitant of earth is journeying toward the tomb.

The sound has ceased ; the passing knell is toll'd—
All silent stands the belfry grey ;
But still in fancy peals its deep tone o'er the wold, Rings loud its summons to the mind, then slowly dies away.

The soft winds blow ; the streamlets flow
From every laughing hill ;
The flowers awake, and from their sleep
Glow forth bright primroses, while still
With scarce half open'd eyes the timid violets peep.
To fairy cars the hyacinths are ringing,
In every shady wood ;
The harebell on its slender stalk is swinging,
In lonely solitude.

The daisies stud the verdant lea,
In mossy dingles waves the cowslip's sheen ;
Round opening rosebuds hums the hovering bee,
And golden buttercups gleam o'er the enamell'd green.
But where the tall old church-yard trees extend their quivering shade,
And to the softly breathing winds the rustling
grasses wave,
There all the flowers that deck the spring in twilight's hour are laid :
For there a mother's love adorns a little new-made grave. D. T.

THE WEATHER-WISE.

A TALE ILLUSTRATIVE OF FARMING A CENTURY AGO.

JOHN BUZZHEAD cultivated a small farm of not quite fifty acres, and, being an utterly uneducated man, (for in his youth, so far from there being any theories of national education, even Sunday-schools were not invented,) with nothing to divert him from his agricultural labours, he was one of the most successful cultivators of the soil thereabout or anywhere else. In fact, John was comfortable, seemed always to do the thing in the right season, and had better crops than the great farmer Leibigging, though he understood to a spoonful of salt, to a pennyweight of potash, not to mention a wheelbarrow of guano, what was exactly best for a twenty-acre field. All the neighbours round about held that John was very lucky ; yet it was not chance, but observation and experience that helped him so continuously. The son of a peasant who had never stirred ten miles from the place of his nativity, nurtured amid the same scenes of rural labour and quietude, and acquainted with the soil as if he were an earthworm, Buzzhead simply followed the old example, and flourished like a green bay-tree, as his father and grandfather had done, in his memory, but rather improving on their condition, as,

"Lo, two puddings smoked upon the board !"

His grand secret and forte, however, lay in Weather Wisdom, for, as it is truly said—"Some are wise, and some otherwise." On the gable end of his barn stood a venerable weathercock, the indications of which he studied from daybreak till dark, and read off as diligently as the Astronomer Royal, Airy, reads off his lessons on nebulae, double stars, and new planets, in Greenwich-park. As the cock veered John reasoned. If from north towards south, or east towards west, or vice versa, more or less in a given time, John was clear, as if he were possessed with the highlander's second sight, of coming rain, or drought, or heat, or cold, or calm, or tempest, or indeed of whatever the weather might be which was about to issue from the skiey elements of Heaven's alchemy.

Thus had the world wagged with John Buzzhead to the age of fifty-five, and, indeed, to the precise date of one stormy night, which befel on the 9th of November : a night more celebrated for change in the city of London than in the country, with the exception at which our tale has now arrived. In the one case a lord mayor had sunk and another risen, or at least been lifted from the table at which he had too freely toasted, in loving cups, the joyous and uproarious citizens who filled the Guildhall, and upon whom the ancient barbarians, Gog and Magog, looked down fasting and contemptuously,¹ bequeathing to the majority the heart-burnings and head-aches of the morning.

On that morning, the 10th, John had neither headache nor ailment. His night's rest undisturbed by the tempest, he was out, as usual, soon after the break of day, and as usual consulted his oracle for a meteorological premonition. "A little to the southward of west," said he, "and excessively cold and chilly for the wind in that quarter. It is veering round to the south : there can be no doubt of a renewal of the storm ; it is of no use going a-field to-day, or till it blows over. The turnips won't hurt ; but as for sowing winter wheat, that would be madness." And so he walked in to breakfast, as if he preferred a rasher to being rash on the farm. Day after day passed, and though the wind did not vary a point, no bad weather ensued. The turnips were not refreshed by rain, nor was the fallow, prepared for the wheat seed, inundated with wet. John was still puzzled, and still expecting, till the month of November, the gloomy, abused, and suicidal month, had, in this instance, worn itself out in extraordinary clearness and sunshine. The time was lost, and John resolved to sow, though rather late, and in spite of the false weathercock.

Friday and Saturday, December 1st and 2d, there were preparations for Goosegreen Fair to be made. Sunday was the 3d, the fair was on Monday, the 4th, and the worst that had been for seven years. Tuesday, the 5th, was occupied with arranging what had been brought back unsold, and what had been purchased ;

(1) Agreeably to a song, which for its facetiousness deserves to be popular in the city, though the singer, viz. Gog, it must be confessed, is rather timber-tused :—

"I really think these city lords

Must be a shabby set ;

We have stood here since King Charles's days,
And had no dinner yet !

"Chorus.—Are we to dine to-day ?" &c.

and therefore the sowing was happily fixed for Wednesday the 6th, the Cock having auspiciously gone round and pointed to the promising north-west, which had never failed to bring weather the most favourable for agricultural operations. "All is right at last," said John, and retired to bed, wrapped first in measureless content, and next in a sound sonorous sleep, out of which he did not wake till past six o'clock! Could he believe his eyes? Were they open, or did he dream? Dream he did not. The ground, far and wide, had during the night been covered, half a foot in depth, with a fall of snow, even thus early in the season. John was astounded. John was perplexed. John did not know what to make of it; but he knew that he could not do a bit of any kind of work till the white mantle was removed from the earth. It was unlucky and vexatious:—even in-doors there was little or nothing to be done; and idleness is the farmer's abhorrence. The snow lasted a good while, and, melting, laid the country-side under a deep solution of slush. The fields were morasses, the roads ditches. The Cock veered at last to the south, and Buzzhead's hopes turned to the same gentle aspect for pleasant airs to expel the moisture, and permit him, like Noah from the ark, to set his foot on dry land. Vain hopes; fallacious index. January set in with a hard frost; and, except the boys sliding, and the women-folks slipping, there was not a semblance of busy life on or about the premises. The turnips were with difficulty extracted from the hard-bound ground to feed a score and a half of sheep; one of which John thought proper to kill for family provision before it lost flesh in consequence of insufficient nutriment. This was, at least, something to do; and the work was increased by saving the blood, and applying it, by means of pickaxe and spade, to the roots of the fruit-trees in the orchard, which had seemed last autumn most in need of recruiting. The Buzzheads for a hundred years had employed this as a sovereign remedy; and, sooth to say, their pippins were as abundant as any, and inferior to none. Other venerated recipes and customs were not quite so certain, but upon the average they served to perform their offices about as well as the more improved systems, partially or entirely adopted by the neighbours, as they happened to be of the slow, lethargic, or vehement go-a-head agricultural breeds. Thus, for example, in his last brewage of October beer, John had found that the buck-bean of his ancestry was not in fact so good as the hop of more universal use in modern times; and although he had since infused the roots of avens from the hedge-rows to prevent the malt from growing sour, they had given it so spicy a flavour that it needed an acquired taste to relish it even among the hinds.

February, with the compass direct to the dry north, turned out uncommonly wet. Things seemed determined to go wrong. The severity and changeableness of the weather had told upon the poultry yard, and turkey cock, dunghill cock, and bantam cock, together with their several seragios and rising families of various ages, appeared like the weathercock, inconsistent with themselves, and quite contrary to the management which had hitherto been found sufficient to ensure health and eggs, at the commencement of spring. Mrs. Buzzhead tried the old infallible remedy of one-third damaged rice, and two-thirds of buckwheat, and fed them as well as they would feed; but many of them pined and died.

John, meanwhile, thought it, at any rate, wet enough to do his utmost for his wheat when postponed so late in March, and only to be trusted under favourable aspects for the likelihood of producing a tolerable crop, and so he made his compost of pond mud, pigeon's dung, and coal soot, and sowed it, a priori, in the field destined for the last experiment with the seed now kept back from November—above three months. The rain fell propitiously, and soaked the manure into the ground, (for if dry it was deemed of no utility,) and the unfortunate wheat was soon after committed to its additional stimulus in the maternal earth.

It will have been gathered from these primitive notions and practices, such as they existed in the middle of last century, that Buzzhead, with all his success, was very ignorant of agricultural chemistry. As his great grandsire had done, he did, and he would tell you that in the time of his progenitor and model, England was more prolific than now; that vineyards were cultivated and Burgundy made, and that the people wanted no Humphry Davys or Professor Johnstons to teach them how to manure, how to plough, how to harrow, how to reap, and how to save. He despised theories. He knew that brimstone was injurious, and Epsom salts beneficial in the soil. He knew that chopped woollen rags and rabbit clippings were almost beyond anything else for promoting enormous returns of grain. But they were only requisite where the pure earth could not be had; and this pure earth was the ideal of his worship. He could tell it by its smell, and was well convinced it was so salutary, that physicians prescribed to their patients to walk behind the plough, and by this means effected cures far more wonderful than ever were achieved by dry bread, or cold water, or homœopathic doses, or mesmeric passes. The breathing from the chest of the common mother, as the famous improved wheel plough beautifully traced furrows upon her breast, was the alpha and omega of agriculture and medicine, and the fruits and herbs that sprung from this source and culture were tenfold sweeter than where the soil was polluted with filthy dung. Yet was there, as already acknowledged, much virtue in old rags; only care must be taken that they were not dry and tindery. These were good old farming practical rules, and if the weathercock had done its duty rightly, the Buzzheads would have reaped the full benefit of them, especially as they did a good deal by spade husbandry in the arable portions of the land.

Pity it was that so much intelligence, skill, and industry should have been thrown away during the period of which we have been writing, and all owing to Mr. Buzzhead's miscalculations about the weathercock, and its indications of approaching atmospheric phenomena. Wonderful to relate, a west wind set in to begin a dry April, and all the turnips that were left were devoured by the fly, John having neglected to soak the seed in water impregnated with flour of brimstone, which would have prevented that misfortune. The same plague attacked his wheat a little later, and did infinite harm, in spite of labourers being despatched along the furrows with cords reaching from furrow to furrow, and while wet with dew brushing them off whilst they crawled upon the shooting ears, and had not had time to lay their eggs, and hatch their maggots, in the body of the corn.

In May the hay-cutting was equally unfortunate. In defiance of the lying and deceitful weathercock, when it declared for fair it was sure to rain, and equally certain to be fair when it persisted in sticking to an invariably rainy quarter. The mowing, accomplishing by taking a bright day, was followed by a perfect deluge, and the hay rotted where it lay, without even being cocked in its own natural method. Bur reed was obliged to be gathered for pasture, and the herbage of ladies' mantles had to be sought to feed the cattle. To obtain these substitutes was very expensive; and in consequence of similar mistakes and losses in everything else, the hogs were reduced to the wild club-headed rush, and viper's hugloss had to be scattered about to feed the bees, and induce the making of honey.

Thus was July spent in a fever of crosses and disappointments, and the cost of expedients, however highly warranted in the school of 1752, had eaten mortally into the economic savings of poor John Buzzhead. His personal mortifications were also great, and it was almost disgusting to see his neighbours, over whom he had, perhaps, crowed a little when boasting of his own management in the good old style, and its superiority over their modern fashions,—it was almost disgusting, we repeat, to see how they chuckled at his failures.

In August he cut his corn a little before it was ripe, as was the rule of his house, and the weather came on so contrary to the weathercock promise, that it shrank and shrivelled up instead of filling and ripening. This was the climax of a thoroughly bad year. The whole farm had gotten into a state of desolation and ruin. There was no success in any one produce to counterbalance the grievous destruction of the rest. Only the orchard did something in a small way, and its fruits were gathered in the early morning, agreeably to the ancient adage, that apples, pears, and plums were, like human beings, all the better for the night's rest and recruiting, and ought to be plucked by sunrise to make the best account of them.

And John, let us record it to his praise, was of a contented and Christian disposition. Even for this small mercy he gratefully thanked Providence, and another blessing attended him. His potatoes did not take the disease which committed ravages around; and if he could but regain confidence in himself, he felt as if all might yet be well. But this was the puzzle. He gazed disconsolately at the no longer safe-guiding weathercock. It persevered in its caprices and errors, and at last one day in a rage the master called Robin Softone, the half-witted Jack-of-all-work, to climb upon the thatch and pull it down.

"Whoa, ees, sir!" answered Robin, "I sall doo that, for I ha'n't seen no use on't since the storm blew it round about and fixed it all the wrong way last winter!"

"Oh, Lord!" exclaimed John Buzzhead, "here is the secret from a fool after all: all right. Down with newfangled doctrines, and success to the farming of the good old times; the Buzzheads will thrive again, in spite of the misleading of weathercocks!"

W. J.

THE GREEK MOTHER.

To the classic scholar and the student of ancient history, Greece is ever associated with everything that is great in arms and noble in the arts. It is pleasant to sit down and indulge in a sort of reverie concerning all one has read of those mighty names that shed glory on their own country, and bequeathed to other lands the brightness of their rising. At one time we are hemmed in, (though, fortunately, in imagination only,) with Leonidas, at Thermopylæ, or encamped on the plains of Attica with Miltiades at Marathon, or waiting with Themistocles in the Bay of Salamis for the fleets of Xerxes, or retreating with Xenophon and his "ten thousand" from the plains of Cunaxa. The din of the battle-field has passed away, and instead of the noise of contending armies, we hear the voice of Demosthenes haranguing the Athenian citizens, and of Socrates inculcating lessons of wisdom, and of Plato in the groves of Academus conversing with his disciples on the most sublime speculations, human and divine. But thought, which so frequently carries the mind from one extreme to another, has now borne us from the schools of philosophy to those of wit and pleasure, and we are enjoying the cool of the evening in the fragrant gardens, where the later followers of Epicurus, freed from the constraint of the austere creeds taught by others, are indulging in the luxuries of what they conceive to be the only real good; for here alone was to be gathered the true Attic honey that left no bitterness behind it. Another "change has come o'er the spirit of our dream," and we are standing by the statue of Jupiter Olympius, in the studio of Phidias, from which we turn to enter that of Apollodorus, who has just finished his picture of "Ajax struck by lightning," while Zeuxis invites us to a "private view" of his beautiful "Helen."

There is a marvellous pleasantness in such fancied communion with the mighty dead,

"Who through the mists of ages rear their heads
In brave defiance of the storms of time;
For haply, from those distant regions came
A power that shed a light on man; and as
The sun draws from the earth rich fruits, drew forth Bright thoughts and patriot feeling, and did give To Greece its fame unparallel'd."

BARRY CORNWALL.

It seems almost impossible to disconnect the country, in imagination, even in its present comparatively humiliating position, from its former power and magnificence; its name acted as a talisman on Byron, who sacrificed his life in the attempt to revive some small portion of its original glory; and the sight of the little engraving of Mr. Corbould's "Greek Mother" involuntarily recalled to our recollection the Spartan matron, who, when her son was going out to battle, dismisses him with the injunction,—"Return with thy shield, or on it." Possibly this incident would not have recurred to us, had we not fancied there was at work in the mind of our "Greek Mother" feelings somewhat akin to those of her warlike ancestor. There is undoubtedly a wide line of demarcation to be drawn between the Greek of modern times, whatever the sex, and him who assisted to dash down to earth the plume of the Persian:—

"Lost land! where Genius made his reign,
And rear'd his golden arch on high;
Where Science raised her sacred fane,
Its summit peering to the sky;
Upon thy clime the midnight deep
Of ignorance hath brooded long,
And in the tomb, forgotten, sleep
The sons of science and of song."

Still the present century has shown that the spirit of the old Hellenic race has not quite deserted their descendants; the attempts made during a space of ten years, from about 1820 to 1830, to shake off the hated yoke of the Turks, were almost worthy of their great ancestors, and it was not till the Ottoman power, unable single-handed to subdue the revolt, called to their aid the well-disciplined forces of the Pacha of Egypt, that any progress towards subjugation was made. The islands of the Ægean witnessed many a heroic encounter; Scio was laid in ruins, like a second Moscow, by the hands of its own inhabitants, rather than they would allow it to be a stronghold for their enemies; and the young Botzaris, a chieftain worthy of his race, perished like another Leonidas, with a handful of brave followers, in the gorgo of Thermopylæ. The result of such and similar acts of heroism, aided by the intervention of the great European powers, was the independence of the country under the monarchical government of Otho, of the house of Bavaria.

In the absence of any authorized clue to the interpretation of Mr. Corbould's picture, it may fairly be presumed to have some reference to the events just alluded to. The mother and her two young children are assembled in an apartment overlooking the sea, upon whose waters they perceive something that excites their deepest apprehension, for terror and dismay are strongly depicted on their countenances; the lute is thrown aside, as, possibly, music of a more fearful nature is ringing in their ears, though neither sight nor sound of woe comes up to us through that open casement from the deep blue sea, out of which the moon is gloriously rising. And again, the sword and shield hang not where they should be found when danger threatens the domestic altar. But a truce to conjecture, we must leave the reader to give the subject his own explanation, provided ours be not sufficiently conclusive.

'NELLY NOWLAN'S EXPERIENCE.'

COMMUNICATED BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"I BROKE off in my last without an ending, which I could not help; I am not a bit more mistress of my own time than if I was a born lady, and oh, Aunt dear, but I do pity them ladies—you'd never believe how hard they work—not with their heads or their hands, but in a way twice as bad. You think it hard enough to put on your things of a Sunday. Oh! if you knew the dressing and undressing, the shopping, the driving round and round and round in a place they call a park—where there's no sign of a mountain or anything to raise the spirits—the visiting! not having a bit of friendly talk with those they like, but wearing the life and liveries off their servants, posting from house to house, and just leaving little squares of pasteboard at the doors.

"Has Lady Jane Vivian never inquired how I am?" asked my poor mistress.

"Never, Ma'am," I said.

"Well, she had a puzzled look on her face, and there it ended for a while."

"Ellen," she said again, a few days after, "Mrs. Brett tells me, Lady Jane Vivian called every day, and left cards."

"Well, I was fairly bothered about the cards."

"Sure Ma'am," I said, "what would make her leave the cards here, we're no gamblers;" this was when first I was own maid to my mistress—so she smiled again, and said how it was I did not understand that ladies left their names printed on pasteboard squares; and that was the same thing as a visit. Well! I had my own thought of what a cold unnatural thing it was to send a square of pasteboard up to a poor sick lady, instead of comforting her, with a bright smile and kind words, and all sorts of cheerful discourse. But I supposed it was manners, and every people have their own; and then she asked for the cards. Now, the mistress of the house we lodged in, scrambled up every bit of them pasteboards with a tittle, and stuck them round the looking glass, in her little dingy back parlour, for a nobility show. So I had to go, and ask her to pick out all the Lady Jane Vivians, which she did, and gave them with a toss of her head, saying, "She did not want such a scrap of an ould maid's title for the matter of that, she had Lords and Dukes! calling on her, before now; it was on the tip of my tongue to say, 'Calling on your lodgers, you mean, Ma'am,' but I held my peace. Well! would you believe it? My own mistress was as proud of them five bits of pasteboard, as I'd be of five shillings! And she bade me bring her fine chaney dish with a small tea-party painted on it, up in the air and down on the earth, beside a little railway, and little tufty houses one atop of the other, and bells at the corners—a fine ancient dish it is, like nothing on the earth or in the sea, which she says shows its imagination; well, she takes every one of the cards up in her poor thin trembling fingers, and then she rubs them clean and puts them right; the Misters and Mistresses, and the young Misses all down below, and the Sirs and Lords and Ladies on the top; mighty neat entirely to look at; and all the time, the darling! she was railing at the vanity of the lodging-house woman who wanted to show off the fine names, and never seemed to think that she was doing the same thing; to be sure, she had a right to them, and right is right; but the vanity, to my thinking, was all one. I had a deal more to tell you about that church—but one who knows said, it was fitter for me to hold my tongue; the reason is this, that it's better for us, you understand, to keep on never heeding them, and not to put them in mind of what they are doing, and they will all walk, as easy as anything, back to the fine, true, old, ancient church of Rome: they call it High Church now, but if they're let alone, one who knows says, they'll soon be higher, on the highest pinnacle of St. Peter's! so all we have to say, Aunt dear, is just good luck to every poor traveller on the right road!

"Do you mind Mary Considine, who you used to call the blue bell of the Shaunon? She was the beauty of the place, I have heard, when she married her own first cousin, Ned Considine? don't you also mind telling me how cruel hard she was to be pleased; and how, after she had married him, she said she intended taking a house, but changed her mind and took Ned, and was greatly disappointed in taking him, for he was very deaf?

"Well, who should I chance to find out but this very Mr. and Mrs. Considine; and indeed it's little remains of beauty she has now; the country, or rather the town life, does not agree any how with beauty, living, as they do, at the back of 'God speed,' in a small court; though, as you will see by'n bye, they have lashings¹ of money: they've one son and a daughter. I met the young girl,—(she was born to them, I may say, in their old age, a last rose of their summer),—at mass, and I think we knew each other by nature: my mistress gave me leave to run over and see her, and when she came to me took great delight in her smiling innocent face, and the sweet voice I told her she had; and she sung some of the Irish melodies like an angel, if you can think of an angel singing anything but holy psalms. And this young Mary is well brought up, quite above the common; reading and writing is nothing to her; and as to other accomplishments she's wonderful; and can tell every fortune out of a book, except her own! Now, among the many prides her mother has gathered, the one that bothers Mary the most, is that she does not like anybody to think she is Irish; she thinks she turns her tongue so purty on the English, and as my poor mistress says (for she heard her at it), with a brogue, a rare Cork brogue; not the same as our pretty delicate Leinster accent; but (as the mistress says) 'a brogue strong enough to carry St. Paul's to St. Peter's,' and so I thought, particularly now, when it's on the road. My mistress says it's quite absurd to look at her curtsy; and when you talk to her of her country, to hear her cry out—'Why then, how did you know I was Irish?' The Irish divert my poor mistress a great deal. She encourages me to tell all about my country, and she has been more like a mother than a lady to Mary Considine.

"But about poor Mary. She was overjoyed that her father and mother took so to me, and, indeed, so was I, for the music of home is in Mary's sweet voice; and it is the next best thing to being in my own land, to hear her sing 'The Exile of Erin'; and then, while the tears are wet on my cheek, she tunes up 'Shiclan-a-guira,' with a heart and a-half; her eyes are so beaming with light, that you wonder where the dark place is in them, and yet it's all the time a light in darkness. I can't discourse you now her features one by one, but altogether: the poor Irish never pass her in the street without a blessing, or the English without a stare—still I saw that Mary was far from happy. I have not much time to watch or inquire, but I could not sleep for thinking of her—Mrs. Considine's mouth was full of the titles of the great quality she'd see in the Park; and she travelled about with a book she called a Pecrage, in her pocket, while poor Mary would show me the bits of flowers she'd pick out of the grass, or bring my mistress a bunch of violets from Covent Garden Market. As to her father, he hardly ever stirs out, except to watch that his son, who has a situation at Blackwall, does not spend his pence on an omnibus,—he makes a fair God of his money; how the priest gets over it I don't know, for he's the greatest miser I ever heard of—a fair neager²—not like his countrymen.

"Well, Aunt; at last poor little Mary let me into the very heart of her trouble. She was in love—; in love with maybe you think some delicate dandy chap of an Englishman; for Mary is very little—a fairy of a thing, (God bless us) that might pass for a real 'fairy' in her own country,—as thin as a willow-wand, as straight as a bullrush, but small, you understand. I wanted her to tell me who it was, and she used to hide her face and cry, and then look up, blushing like a rose among the dew-drops. At last, she said she'd show him to me next evening; she was going to confession, and he would do the same, and meet her at the door. So away they went. There were three or four young men at the door, one with a sky-blue tie and a fine waistcoat. I was so sure that was him, that I never looked at any one else; but she passed on, tossing her head disdainfully at the blue tie. 'He's not here,' she whispered; and the little creature trembled on my arm. She soon made a clean breast; and I waited, as I had leave to do: the sky-blue tie waited also, but Mary was too quick for him; she darted round the corner while he was admiring his own shadow, thrown by the full moon on the wall, and I after her. 'Come on,' she said, almost breathlessly; 'come on; that's the man my father wants me to marry, but I'll die first!'—We walked fast, but she took, as I thought, the wrong turning—I told her so, but she looked up in my face, and smiled,—it was a narrow court, and at the far end, a smith's forge. I heard the bang of the hammer, and saw the light, all in a glow, and a thousand sparkles like falling stars! Mary got under the shadow of the houses,—she crept on, the hammer going, the fire glowing, the sparkles falling all the time, and the shadow as of a giant, forging the red bar, as if the hammer was a waud,—Well, she avoided the door, but drew me on to a slit in the window, still keeping in the shadow,—'that's him,' she whispered. Aunt, dear! the sweetheart that mite of a little beauty had set her love on, was just, there and then, a rale giant! he looked strong enough to sling a thunderbolt, and active enough to make a playfellow of the lightning. When he stopped and threw back his hair I thought I had never seen so noble a head, but his face looked pale in the flashing light. Mary never spoke but the one word, she never sighed, nor signed to him in any way, yet he wiped his brow, pulled down his sleeves, and came to the window.

(1) Plenty.

(2) Neager, i. e. miser.

"Mary, Mary," he whispered, and his voice was as soft as the coo of a wood-pigeon. 'Speak Mary, I know you are there, it's no use hiding from me, I know it as well as if my eyes were looking into yours, and as if you had told me so.'

"I am here, Philip," she said. 'My friend was with me, and as you were not at the Priest's, I thought you had something to do particular.'

"Yes, Mary," he answered; 'but that did not keep me. Your father came here to-night; he gave me clearly to understand, and without civility, he did not wish me to continue to keep your company; he said, your mind, as well as his own, turned another way.'

"And you believed him?"

"Her voice was like the murmur of a young bird in its nest.

"I believed my own eyes," he answered, folding his great arms over his chest, his eyes glaring in his dusky face like coals of fire. 'I went to the Priest's door, and saw that clean done-up youth, with his blue tie round his throat, and his boyish hands, only fit to finger a yard measure, scenting the place with his white pocket-handkerchief. Oh, Mary, fancy my hands dangling a scented handkerchief!' and he dashed them passionately forward. 'When you did change,' he added, 'you might have chosen a man—not a monkey.'

"And you misdoubted me," she said; standing firm and straight in her pride. 'Well then, Philip, I'll just say good bye at once;' and then she struggled and struggled to untwist something from her neck, and flung it right in through the window. The fire which had been flickering and flickering flamed up, and there, lying on the black floor, shone a little golden locket, and a broken velvet.

"To my dying day, I shall never forget the look that strong man cast from the locket to Mary, but I knew he could not see her face, it was in the darkness to him, though I saw, plain enough, her quivering lips and glowing cheeks,—he stamp on the locket, and I heard it scrunch beneath his foot. She flew like a rapid over a rock of the Shannon, and was away in a minute—I turned to follow her, but the strong grasp of the smith was on my shoulder.

"Why did she come here at all?" he said, and his voice was deep and husky. 'What brought her? why should she come to torture me? its all along of the old man's love of money, and her mother's mad love of fine names;—she told me my name, Philip Roche, was vulgar! Oh! to think of the love I bore her, slaving by day and night to make her a home, keeping to my pledge, and working (and well able to do it) on water.

"Mary, I told him, knew nothing of it, she had no hand in it: I wanted to tell him how she took me to the door to see him, and not finding him there, drew me to the forge—her innocent heart full of love for him and for him alone: the thoughts came fast enough into my head, but I could not speak them—I was bewildered, the despair written in his face haunted me,—the look he gave, and the iron hand on my shoulder stupefied me altogether, and though we walked on fast—fast after her—I trembled in every limb, and lost all power of speech.

"Words he certainly spoke betimes, and they hissed off his lips, as water hisses off a smoothing iron. We tramped faster and faster, past the houses, and under the light of the lamps, and through the people, until we came to the court where they lived—there he stopped in sight of the door, and such a sight it was to him!—for there, on the very step, waiting to have it opened, stood Mary Considine, and the blue neck tie! I cannot tell you, Aunt dear, how it was that I felt so interested for that strange strong smith Philip Roche, whom I had never, to say rightly seen. No wonder the people stopped and stared after him for he was without a hat, and his long hair tossicated about his head: I looked up to him, and maybe it was best that I could not see his features, I only heard him mutter—"Do you see, do you see!"—has she no hand in it now?"—he staggered forward, but I caught him.

"Have patience," I said; 'have patience, it will all come right, she has no hand in it.' He threw me off as if I had been a child, and the last I saw of him, was his head above the people that had gathered round the court. I walked quietly on, and when I entered the house, there stood Mary, white as a sheet, while Mr. and Mrs. Considine were doing all manner of civilities to the young man, who was acting the gentleman, smiling and bowing and twisting a seal, (set the likes of him up with a seal!) at the end of his watch chain, a seal which was big enough for the rapper of a hall-door! and dangling a ring he had on his starved crooked little finger, right in the foolish old man's eyes. And won't you sit down, Mr. Henry Highley,' said one, 'and won't you stop for tay,' says the other. And seeing me staring at him, Mrs. Considine adds:—

" 'A young lady-friend of my daughter's, who stops mostly with a friend of her own at the West-end.'

" Now Aunt, I didn't care about her culling me a lady, but I couldn't bear being put on a level with my mistress, a rale lady born!

" And I said, 'My mistress lives at the West end, sure enough.' Mrs. Considine frowned at me, and Mary left the little room.

" 'Come back, Mary,' called her father, 'bring her back,' whispered her mother. It was well I followed her—she had fainted; I laid her on the bed, and did all I could for her; when she was coming to herself, she put up her hand—I thought, maybe, to feel for the locket, but that might be my fancy. It was long before I could make her deaf father understand that she was too ill to return, but her mother saw it at once, and after we put her to bed, and she drank a cup of tea, and said she thought to go to sleep, we left her,—I staid a few minutes below, though I saw the old man wished me gone. And now, Aunt, don't be angry, but I think I could have found it in my heart to give that Cub-teen of a fellow, a glass of poison: his face was not only vicious, sharp, and thin, and active, like a rat's—but he had his eyes everywhere—I saw him weigh the teaspoon on his forefinger in a balancing sort of fashion, and then look at the mark to be sure it was silver; he drew the old people on in such a way, getting more out of Mr. Considine than ever was got out of him before, as to his property and means—getting him to talk of interest and bankers, and the like; and the old man cursed the savings banks, and said money was never so safe as in one's own house, and that the best of all banks for him was his leather bag;—the more I looked at Mr. Henry Highley, the more I hated him, and sorry enough I was to know that young Considine had gone a journey for his employer, and was not to the fore, when most wanted.

" 'I stole up for another look at Mary. She was, or partended to be, asleep; but it was put into my heart to kneel down and pray for her. The words were not many, but the Lord knew their meaning. I dipped my finger in the holy-water cup, that hung at the head of her bed, and signed the blessed sign over her forehead, without touching her. She looked so helpless and so lonely there—her young innocent face, still wet with tears, turned up to the heavens;—

the moonlight was hindered from shining on her by the fog that hangs about the London streets by day and night; and maybe so best, for moonlight lays heavy on a throbbing brow, and is not over lucky, particularly (as you know) when it's full moon. So I did not go into the little room again, but hurried home, for I had overstaid my time by more than an hour. I was near my own street, when who came up to my side but Mr. Henry Highley? and he said it was dull walking my lone,' and he'd see me home; and I told him I had the sight of my eyes, and could see myself and him too. And he said I was very witty, and I said, I was sorry I could not return the compliment. Then he thought to fish out about my mistress:—she must be a rich lady to keep the likes of me. And I answered riches had nothing to do with that; I did not want to sell myself, or buy any one, and that I should be happier to serve for love than for money; but he stuck to the question—Had she plate and jewels? So, turning sharp on him, I said that any one would think he was a housebreaker, and I laughed; this was at the door; and there was a policeman passing, who stopped. Well, Aunt, Mr. Henry Highley, without another word—with your leave or by your leave—whisked off.

" 'What do you know of that young man?' inquired the blue-coat.

" 'Nothing pleasant,' I said.

" 'Where did you meet him?'

" 'You are neither judge or jury, to be questioning me,' I answered; for it isn't in the nature of an Irish girl to put up with a policeman.

" 'I mark you,' he said, very stiff, (but they are all that), 'and when the time comes, young woman, I'll find a way to make you tell—' and he walked off.

" Now Aunt, dear, sure I had enough of walking on and off that night! My mistress was angry; but I did as you told me often enough—instead of making excuses, and inventions, which come mighty pleasant and natural, I just told the plain truth—quiet and easy—all except the last, for I did not wish to make her uneasy as I was myself, having a cruel bad opinion of Mr. Henry Highley.

" 'It's mighty quare how, in this wonderful city of business and bother, how your little peaceful sayings, darling Aunt! and the songs you sung to the wheel of a winter's evening, with none but the pusheen-cat and myself and a cricket or two to the fore, come into my head, or one of Watts's hymns, in the very bustle of the town; I often dust the room to 'Aileen Mavournceen,' and brush my lady's hair to 'Eveleen's bower,' played on the chords of my heart. Sometimes, when I draw back the curtain, and shade the light of the pale night-lamp, with my hand, for fear it might wake her, (the mistress I mean,) for I never lay down until she is asleep;—often, when I watch her features worn with pain, yet so still, and gentle-looking, and see her pale pink lips, half open, and such a sweet smile on them, I think, the sleeping face differs so from the waking one, that angels must be whispering the joys that will come. When the last dull sleep is ended, Aunt, I am sure I should go mad if I thought that dear innocent woman, so tortured in this world, yet so meek in herself, so thoughtful and generous to the poor, so kind in her judgments, so fond to take the sorrows of all who have sorrow into her bosom, and turn them to blessings—I should indeed break my heart, if I believed that, for reading the one book another way, we should never meet in the world that's to come! I can't believe it, so there's enough about it. As I looked at her, the song of "The Angels' Whisper" came for a second time into my head that night, and then I crooned over that "Savourneen delish" you are so fond of; and that brought poor Tom and his motherless children before me! Aunt, dear!—Maybe I didn't use Tom well! I couldn't help it; though you often told me I should not cast out dirty water until I could get clean, (not a grate compliment to Tom either!) yet to be obliged, after a few words, to be a mother all out to three sharp children; and if he was cold and weary, and didn't smile and talk every day the same, to have the creeping chill steal over me like the shake,* that he was thinking of his first wife, and may be comparing us in his own mind—that would drive me as wild as the other thing I told you of a while ago; and yet, I own to you, I have thought more of poor Tom since I left home than ever I did while I was there.

(1) "My lone," alone.

"The next day, and the next day, and the next passed, and no word from Mary, and my mistress was ill. Once I ran as far as the turn to the lane, and looked down at the forge. The fire was burning low, and there was no sound of the hammer on the anvil. At last Mrs. Considine herself called; she was very full of prate; she had the dirty red book, as usual, half sticking out of her black bag; she said, that indeed Mary had demeaned herself by taking up with nothing but a smith, a great friend of her brother's, and one she would not deny who had done him more than one good turn, and would be right well to do in the world if he had a little capital to push him on, which neither her nor her husband would give to a man of the name of Roche. Roche, indeed! Roches were as plentiful as blackberries and as common, where she came from! set her Mary before the priest with a Roche! no, no; Mr. Henry Highley was the man for their money, so nice a gentleman; for every sovereign her husband laid down as Mary's fortune, he would lay down another, or could two! and such jewellery as he had! rings for every finger, and fine watches, one set with precious stones, (which had belonged to his grandmother,) a Talbot itself! There was all about the family printed in the peerage, and sure it wouldn't be there if it wasn't true—but indeed she couldn't tell what was come over Mary; she had no pride, no spirit in her; her husband would weigh the watches in his hand, and look at the rings all day, and ask what they were worth over and over again, and take them to bed with him, if he was let, he had such delight in them. But they might be so much pinchback, for anything Mary cared; they would have the wedding at once, and when it was over, she'd know better. Mr. Highley was so fond of her, he wouldn't hear of delay, not even until her brother came home! She let on that Mary, when married, would be too grand company for the likes of me, but that she would not be proud. I might look in sometimes, she'd be glad to see my mistress when they got into a new lodging, which Mr. Highley said they must after the wedding—for his sake, dear, sweet, well-born, well-bred young gentleman!

"Like her impudence it was; My mistress itself! MY MISTRESS! visit with her; oh hone! What would the cards on the fine china dish say to it, if they could but speak? But, Aunt dear, what do you think I did, when she, and her bag, and her book were cleared out of the house? I told my mistress every word she had said. Now it was a mercy that she was quite herself that morning, and sure enough she has a head almost as clear for business as our dear QUEEN'S! God bless it for ever, for a right royal noble head! (the Queen's, I mean.) She did not ponder long, but laying her spectacles in her Bible for a mark, she set it beside the china dish.

"Ellen," she said; "have you ever seen the policeman who spoke to you since that night?" And I said I had: that very morning he was on our beat.

"Bring him to me, Ellen."

"My heart was leping,—leping up into my mouth. 'Bring him into the house,' I repeated!

"Yes," she said; "into the house."

"Have I done anything wrong, Ma'am?"

"So she smiled. 'Nothing, but very right; do as I tell you.'

"That 'Do as I tell you,' is the same thing as 'Hold your tongue.' So, Aunt dear, if you please, you must just fancy me looking for a real living policeman, and for a wonder, I found him when he was wanted! he soon stood like a statute before my mistress.

"She told him word for word what I have told you; he noted it all down in a bit of a book, and was mighty particular over the number of rings and the Talbot watch; he then looked at me, and my mistress nodded for me to leave the room. Now, wasn't that too bad?

"I never felt more hard set to put up with anything in my born days, but I went!—and, only my mistress has nerves, wouldn't I have banged the door! When the bell rang he was gone; she told me I was to go over in the evening and see Mary. When I got there Mrs. Considine was watching for the postman, who was coming down the court. She took a letter from him, which I saw was directed to Mary; she read it hastily, and tossed it into the fire. 'My relations,' she said, with a toss of a different kind, 'hearing of the fine match Mary is going to make, write constantly to get them situations.' A double story—I was so ashamed for her.—Aunt dear, God bless you for teaching me that there is no such thing as an ‘innocent lie.’ The old miser of a man was in a little inner room they have, divided by a passage from the one we were in, where they sleep themselves; the windows open into a lane, dark as dungeon by day or night. He was fumbling at his leather-bag, and came out talking to himself, muttering such things as these, ‘At first he said it should be guinea for guinea, but now its two guineas for one—two guineas for one! Ah, Nelly Nowlan, a fine match! the smith had nothing but his four bones, and would have wanted my hard-earned little savings, and no guinea for guinea, or one to two;’ and his eyes, so dim and glassy, rolled within their scamed lids, and he rubbed his skinny, bloodless hands together, as if joy and gold were all one. ‘Money makes the man,’ he continued, ‘all England owns that; they are a wise people, the English, they never ask what you are, but what you have. When my pretty daughter sits on her own ear, won’t every one bow to her and I? Oh, if I was back in my own place, instead of poor ould Ned Considine, wouldn’t I be Mr. Edward, Sir! with a squire to it. Ah, ah, I know the world, but the world does not know me.’

1) "Shake," ague.

“‘Has there been no letter?’ I heard the low trembling voice of Mary inquire, as she entered the house.

“‘The girl’s foolish to be asking after letters. One from Ireland from our people, wanting places,’ was her mother’s reply.

“When Mary saw me she burst into tears, and hung about my neck like a child. She whispered that she was not long for this world, that Philip had forgotten her, that she should never be happy more—She would obey her parents and die—my mistress had warned me to hear all and say nothing. I comforted poor Mary as well as I could, and was asked to the wedding the next day—I told my mistress, and again she saw the policeman. Oh Aunt, wasn’t it cruel of the mistress not to trust me? I didn’t care what she had to say, but I did want to be trusted. She said she did not fear my zeal, only my discretion. Wasn’t it hard?

“I went to the wedding—there was the Priest, a fine ould ancient Clargy, of the right sort; there was the bridegroom, looking pale and wicked, with as much finery on him as would set up a jeweller’s shop. There was the father and mother, all excited; there were a couple of bridesmaids, newfangled acquaintances, and two or three strangers, friends of the bridegroom’s, that Mr. and Mrs. Considine made a great fuss over, and called by the finest of names; there was a dinner, half-laid out in an upper room, that no one on the banks of the Shannon ever saw the like of; little puff things, all ornamented out by a real confectioner, in a white apron, such a sight of folly and nonsense. I was quite set on one side, and looked on anything but kindly by the whole of them, except the old man, who kept on talking about his money. They seemed all unnatural to me, as if they only wanted the bride as a part of the ceremony, while all over the world, if a woman is ever as a queen, its from the morning till the evening of her wedding day, what she is after that depends upon another. The bridesmaids kept going in and out, and at last, one had the manners to tell me, the bride wanted me. I knew that long ago.

“She was standing like a spirit, all in white, in the middle of her little room. She seemed turned into stone, stiff and stark as a corpse in its shroud; her mother was wringing her hands by her side, her face like scarlet, and if ever she spoke with a brogue she did then.

“‘Och Mary a lanna Machree!—Sure it isn’t disgracing us you’d be, going back of your word, Mary, my own darlin’ child. Sure, darlin’, I hated the very ground ye’r father walked on, even after I had married him a good while. I was disappointed in him, dear; but when I got over thinking of love, and all that sort of nonsense, when my heart dried up, and I was all head, I knew what a fine savin’ man I had got, who understood the value, even of a brass farthing; he was ould enough to be my father—let alone yours; but what does that signify, he helped me to grow ould before my time; and look at the money he’s able to give you, and win you, Mary macourneen—what’s come to you, child? sure you consented all out; and what ails you now?’

“I pressed her cold hands within mine: they felt turned into bone, cold and hard and dry.

“‘You’re murderin’ your own child, Mrs. Considine,’ I said; ‘you are killing her as surely as if you put a pistol to her head, or poison to her lips.’

“The wicked old man called to Mary from the bottom of the stairs to go down,—and added a curse on her delay; the bridesmaids, one in particular, who who was as hard as the rest at first, had kept on saying (God forgive her,) that love on one side was like a fire, and would soon catch the other,—now looked terrified, and pity-struck.

“Again the call and the curse were repeated; Mary started as if from a dream; she drank off a glass of water from her mother’s hand, who kept repeating, ‘That’s a jewel,’ ‘there’s a darlin’,’ ‘corra machree was she,’ and such like nonsense; to which the poor girl made no reply, but pressed her hands on her temples, and whispered to me, ‘Pray to God for me.’ She walked straight into the room; the bridegroom met her with ‘Sweet Love,’ and a flourish of his pocket-handkerchief, a smile on his lips,—but such oak sticks between his eyes. She put him on one side with her little hand, and advancing to the priest, knelt down reverently before him; there was a hush in the room, nothing heard but the clink of the gold in the leather bag the old man was shaking out of pride.

“Oh it would have melted a heart of stone to look at that young creature; tears overflowing her face, so that she could not speak, and her hands wrung together.

"The bridegroom whispered something to her mother about her being nervous, but it would soon go off; I could have killed him! he then handed round the ring for us to look at; aye, while she was weeping and trembling at the priest's feet. When he held it to me, I struck it down—Aunt, I could not help it! What a look he gave! it rolled along the floor; but his attention was drawn to Mary's words.

"'Father,' she sobbed, to the priest, 'save me,—save me from my own people; save me, a young helpless girl; save me from marrying him I hate. Oh, do not let them put the sin of a false oath upon my young head,—I cannot love him. Father, you know I owned to you in holy confession but ten days past that I loved another,—that I love him still. I will never, never speak to him, or write to him, or ask to set eyes on him again; I will quit the world, and go into a holy house if you think me fit for it,—but oh, save me, save me from perjuring my soul—save me,' she repeatedly wildly, 'or I shall go mad!' To see the holy priest raise her up; to see him place her in his own chair; to see him put his hands upon her head, and hear his words of comfort! 'Trust in me, my dear child; I will never join a willing to an unwilling hand; be calm, my child; and you,' he said, turning to the bridegroom, 'and you, have you the feelings of a man, to stand by and see this, and wish to keep her to her promise?'

"'I never promised him—I never promised him,' sobbed Mary,—'the most I ever said, and that was in anger and agony—was—that I would do my parents' bidding. Father! Mother!—you cannot be so cruel at the last.'

Mr. Considine edged up to his reverence,—'Talk to her, holy father,' he muttered, 'talk to her: he's so rich—rings, and watches and golden guineas two to one, holy father, think of that? two to one! her mother married me for my good, and we've been happy;—two to one, holy father!'

"'Begone!' said the priest sternly, in such grand English, 'and do not dare to stain this holy sacrament by the money loving spirit, that crushes your soul to destruction. If this dear child persists in her refusal, I myself forbid the marriage.'

"Oh, Aunt dear, the lep I gave, and found myself at his holy feet as if he was the Pope of Rome! and surely no Pope could have looked more like a guardian angel than he did at that minute.

"'I must speak with you in private,' said the bridegroom to his intended father-in-law as meek as a lamb, 'just one word;' and he laid his hand so gently on the old man's arm: 'this can be arranged.' They went out of the room together, Mrs. Considine exclaiming, while clapping her hands so vulgarly! 'Och-e-yah! the poor dear young man! Ah, then! Och Mary, my gra girl, how could you have the heart to refuse such a match? and he, after promising you a car—a cab, I mean, of your own. Och Mary, darlin', be friends with him, Mary Machree! Och yah! poor broken-hearted crayther that I am!'

"She kept on that way for some time, until a fall, which shook the house, and the dull hoarse scream of murder startled us into silence. The priest and myself rushed to the door; but the two groomsmen came between us, exclaiming, 'It was in the court.' I saw the whole thing then, like a flash of lightning, bright and clear. Again the cry. We cleared the way somehow; the window of their bed-room was open, and the poor old man, blinded by the blood which gushed from a wound in his head, was grovelling on the floor.

"We lifted him up: his fingers kept on grasping the air, while his cries of 'Murder!' and 'Help!' were broken by such words as, 'My money! my bag! my hard-earned money! catch him! two to one indeed! Oh let me after him!'

"It was an awful sight—the roars of the old man for his money, the shrieks of Mrs. Considine, the still more terrible calmness of Mary, who, while hindling up her father's head, said 'This is my doing.'

"There was a scuffling at the outward door. 'Keep a brave heart, Mary Considine,' said the priest, 'he's not hurt to signify.'

"'A hundred and fifty in the bag, not a farthing less, the murdering young villain; oh, I can't live—I won't live.'

"'Shame upon you,' said the silver voice of the fine old priest. 'Give God thanks for your deliverance, first from the man, next from your money.'

"'They are both here,' said my policeman, who came upon us unawares; 'it would be strange if we were not up to Bill Soames. We caught him on the bound, but I managed badly this time; I ought to have saved you that tap on the head, old gentleman; though I must say it serves you right, to want to give that poor girl to a fellow once tried for bigamy, and a house-breaker to boot!'

"Aunt, I tore a silk handkerchief to ribbands, trying to keep my hands off the blue tie, who stood as if nothing had happened, between two other policemen.

"'It's but a step to the court, and the magistrate is sitting,' continued the superintendent; 'half an hour will send my old acquaintance to his quarters.' Of course there was plenty of people outside; and in the midst of it all the two groomsmen had cleared the table of every spoon, and Mr. Considine's own watch, during the time we were with the old man. Oh, what a deliverance for poor Mary!

"My heart flew into my mouth—I was as light as a lark leaving the cornfield for the sky in the early morning, and from the same cause, both thankful for the new light!

"Oh I was so happy!—'He's of a high family, Ma'am,' said the policeman, with a knowing look at Mrs. Considine; 'all that I heard of, travelled at the expense of government, while some,—you understand me?—'

"He made a sign round his throat, not pleasant to look at, while Mrs. Considine's grief took a new turn, and she bemoaned the disgrace to her family, and the loss of the family plate! It was delightful how brisk the old man grew when he knew that his money was found:—he called the cut a scratch, and said 'his head would be all the better for a taste of the old times,' and away they went, the whole party—barring¹ his reverence, and Mary, Mrs. Considine, (who declared nothing should force her to enter a police-court,) and myself—were cleared out of the house, and I had the satisfaction of seeing Mr. Henry Highley in the grasp of two policemen; Mary came wonderful to herself, considerin', and went to her room. I peeped through a crack, and saw her on her knees before the image of the blessed Virgin. Mrs. Considine continued sobbing, and exclaiming all the time she wandered about the house—I was just going to see how they were getting on in the court, when the Priest called me back.

"'Nelly,' he says; I made my curtsy;—'Nelly,' he says again,—'it is a beautiful dinner.'

"'Indeed, your reverence,' I answered, 'it would be that certainly when the solid things come on the table; there was to be a roast turkey, and a ham, and such a lovely piece of boiled beef—poor Mrs. Considine was bemoaning it all to me not a minutes ago.'

"'A ham, a roast turkey, and a fine piece of boiled beef,' repeated his reverence slowly, 'besides all the kickshaws,—and wine?'

"'The finest of port, thick, (round the bottles with age), and champagne, that the villain of a bridegroom brought,' I answered.

"'Say nothing about who brought it, Nelly, if it's there, and he's not,' said his Reverence,—he paused awhile, but I knew by the twinkle of his eyes, he was thinking of something past the common,—

"'It's a mighty fine dinner, Nelly!'

"'It is, your reverence.'

"'Nelly, it's a sin and a shame to have such a dinner as that in the house, and no wedding.'

"'True, for your reverence.'

"'Nelly, we must have a wedding!' and he looked me through and through.

"'Your reverence,' I said,—hardly knowing how to answer, 'knows best; but I don't see how at this present time; it's my ignorance, your reverence.' He shook his head and smiled.

"'I know the secrets of more hearts than one; and, instead of going down to the court, just step away to Philip Roche, and tell him what happened and how Mary kept true to her old love, and let him dress himself at once—we're not tied to canonical hours like our neighbours,—and tell him from me, to come here, and before the evening's out, Nelly, we'll have a wedding, and a dinner, and a dance!'

"Oh, how I flew! There was Philip in the thick of cold iron, reading a paper about emigration. I never saw a man so altered: he was but the ghost of himself, bent and bowed and broken-hearted he seemed, and his voice as changed as himself; he knew me at once, and knew that it was her wedding day.

(1) Except, putting aside.

"'It's all over by this time, I know,' he said, with a ghastly smile; 'and I suppose you have brought me the bride-cake tied with green riband.'

"'Here was the place,' he continued, going across a little yard, 'where I thought she might live quiet and content; a pretty bright room for London, and two others inside it—she could sit in that window at her sewing, and sing; and, if she raised her head, see me at work at the forge—she never even answered my letters—for I was too hasty that evening; but it's over now. She never can be anything more to me; yet this day's post brought me a letter, telling of an uncle's death in New York, who has left a good thousand English pounds, to be divided between my brother and myself; so I'll just sell off, and go after it.—Old Considine might have kept his money; it was not that I wanted; but it's all over!' Such a wail as there was in the voice of the strong broken down man, like the sough of the winter's wind, I could keep silent no longer. I believe he thought me wild—mad; I could hardly begin my tale for joy,—joy throbbing in my heart,—joy beating in my throat, and keeping back my words. I got it out at last, all that passed in one little hour, on which depended so much happiness or misery; oh, Aunt, he is such a great darling! Not a bit of exultation over Mr. and Mrs. Considine; only bitter reproaches to himself for not having understood Mary better; wondering if she could ever forgive him!—and so glad her father was not badly hurt. Oh, how my heart warmed to him! And when, at last, I bid him trust all to his reverence, to see how quickly he dressed! and maybe he didn't look like an O'Brian, or an O'Sullivan, or some of the great grand O's—so plenty about Killarney in the ancient times. I didn't know my own shadow on the wall, sidebeside his; and yet he was so overcome, that at times he stopped from downright weakness.

"'The priest opened the door with his own blessed hands: they had returned from the police-court, and his reverence had both the old people crying. I don't think Mr. Considine heard all he said; but, indeed, his heart was softened; he was ashamed of having been imposed on by a well-known London thief; and who can say that he was not grateful for his deliverance? for, next to his money, he loved his child.

"'Come in, Philip Roche,' said the priest; 'there has been a bit of a misunderstanding here, which we are sorry for; but it's well to forget and forgive. Mrs. Considine says, she never believed Mary thought so much about you, or she would not have put between you: if you can make friends with the little girl up-stairs, we'll have the wedding! and—the dinner!—and now, Nelly Nowlan, I trust to you to bring Mary Considine down, without telling her why. Leave that to me.'

"Oh, then, isn't that priest a rale minister? The delight he took in his little innocent plot, and all to make those young people happy! He hid away Philip in the back room, and Mary came with me, easy enough, when I told her her father and mother were crying.

"Now, Mary, my child," says the priest, "you'll obey me, won't you?—that's right. I must give you a penance, Mary: I saved you from one husband, my darling—I have found you another!"

"The life that had come slowly back to the poor girl seemed leaving her altogether, but Philip could not bear it,—he rushed forward, and caught her in his arms.

"I can't tell you what he said Aunt, or what any one said; but in less than five minutes the priest had opened his book.

"What will be done for a ring?" sobbed Mrs. Considine.

"I had picked up the one I struck from the hand of that wicked man, and said so.

"Use his ring!" exclaimed Philip; and he flung it into the fire.

"Oh, the sinful waste!" screamed old Considine; "it was pure gold."

"He would have raked the fire out to find it, but the priest commanded him to be still. Oh, but he's a fine man; only terrible in anger. Aunt, I'll tell you the truth; if I had a very heavy sin, it's not to him I'd go.

"The key of the door will do as well," he said; "it's the sign of the Eternal Union we want, nothing more." No one gainsaid him, and in another five minutes they were bound together in the sight of God and man.

"And now for her fortune, Mr. Considine," said the good Priest, so considerate.

"The young smith stood straighter than ever on the floor; straight and firm. With one arm he drew his little bride to his heart, the other he held out.

"It would all feel to me like a dream," he said; "but for this." He pressed her more closely to him, bent down and kissed her.

"Keep your money, Mr. Considine; cross or coin of yours, sir, I'll never touch. Mary was all I ever cared for, and only this blessed morning did I learn that it has pleased God to give me what you think so much of. Mary, your husband has five hundred good pounds of his own: keep your money, Mr. Considine, I never cared for it; but I must say,—"

"No more," interrupted the priest. "Let us have in some of our good friends and neighbours; and, Nelly Nowlan, sure it's a comfort that the beautiful dinner won't be wasted."

"And so, Aunt darling, there's an end of Mary Considine; for in all the books I read my mistress, there seems an end of a woman when she marries,—a wife and a mother go for nothing! And maybe, I hav'n't something to tell you about that, for sure enough, the women (some of them) want to change places; now who do you think with, Aunt? I am sure your simple head would never find out. Shall I tell you next time?"

ADVANCE!

In the volume¹ from which we extract this poem, there are many others which equal it in worth: compositions of exceeding vigour, and of gentle and touching beauty. The writer is one of those young Irishmen, who, to the proverbially rich fancy inherent in his countrymen, adds the scholastic learning which circumstances have placed so abundantly within the reach of his countrymen. His book is full of "fine things;" marred, it may be, occasionally, by that misdirected judgment which imagines or creates a wrong, in order that poetry may protest against it. This is neither the place nor the occasion either to maintain or to question Irish grievances: be they real or not, now-a-days, that they have been many and terrible in old times, is beyond question; and the bard may be excused for perpetuating themes too apt for sorrow. Mr. McCarthy may be ranked foremost among the great poets of whom his country has been so productive in all ages of her history.

God bade the Sun with golden step sublime
Advance!

He whisper'd in the listening ear of Time,
Advance!

He bade the guiding Spirit of the Stars,
With lightning speed, in silver shining cars,
Along the bright floor of his azure hall
Advance!

Sun, Stars, and Time obey the voice, and all
Advance.

The river at its bubbling fountain cries,
Advance!

The clouds proclaim, like heralds, through the skies,
Advance!

Throughout the world, the mighty Master's laws
Allow not one brief moment's idle pause.
The earth is full of life, the swelling seeds
Advance!

And summer hours, like flowery harness'd steeds,
Advance!

To man's most wondrous hand, the same voice cried,
Advance!

Go clear the woods, and o'er the bounding tide
Advance!

Go draw the marble from its secret bed,
And make the cedar bend its giant head;
Let domes and columns through the wandering air
Advance!

The world, O man! is thine But wouldst thou share,
Advance!

Unto the soul of man the same voice spoke,
Advance!

From out the chaos, thunder-like, it broke,
Advance!

Go track the comet in its wheeling race,
And drag the lightning from its hiding-place;
From out the night of ignorance and fears,
Advance!

For Love and Hope, borne by the coming years,
Advance!"

All heard, and some obey'd the great command,
Advance!

It pass'd along from listening land to land,
Advance!

The strong grew stronger, and the weak grew strong,
As pass'd the war-cry of the world along—

(1) "Ballads, Poems, and Lyrics, Original and Translated." By Denis Florence McCarthy. James McGlashan, Dublin.

Awake, ye nations, know your powers and rights.

Advance!

Through Hope and Work, to Freedom's new delights,

Advance!

Knowledge came down, and waved her steady torch,

Advance!

Sages proclaim'd 'neath many a marble porch,

Advance!

As rapid lightning leaps from peak to peak,
The Gaul, the Goth, the Roman, and the Greek,
The painted Briton, caught the winged word,

Advance!

And earth grew young, and caroll'd as a bird,

Advance!

Oh! Ireland—oh! my country, wilt thou not

Advance?

Wilt thou not share the world's progressive lot?

Advance!

Must seasons change, and countless years roll on,

And thou remain a darksome Ajalon?

And never see the crescent moon of Hope

Advance?

'Tis time, thine heart and eye had wider scope—

Advance!

Dear brothers, wake! look up! be firm! be strong!

Advance!

From out the starless night of fraud and wrong

Advance!

The chains have fall'n from off thy wasted hands,
And every man, a seeming freedman stands;

But ah! 'tis in the soul that freedom dwells,—

Advance!

Proclaim that then thou wear'st no manacles,

Advance!

Advance! thou must advance or perish now,—

Advance!

Advance! Why live with wasted heart and brow!

Advance!

Advance! Or sink at once into the grave;

Be bravely free or artfully a slave!

Why fret thy master, if thou must have one?

Advance!

"Advance three steps, the glorious work is done,"

Advance!

The first is COURAGE—'tis a giant stride!

Advance!

With bounding step up Freedom's rugged side

Advance!

KNOWLEDGE will lead ye to the dazzling heights,

TOLERANCE will teach and guard your brother's rights.

Faint not! for thee a pitying Future waits—

Advance!

Be wise, be just, with will as fix'd as Fate's,

Advance!

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.¹

BY JANE M. WINNARD.

CHAPTER XVI.

DAVID'S FIRST BOOK.

MIRIAM GREY made no comment on the concluding passage of the letter reported in the last chapter. She sat silently, with her face turned towards the distant ocean-line. Great tears collected slowly in those melancholy eyes, and she made no effort to conceal them. She even forgot Mr. Shepherd's presence, as her mind worked painfully on the realization of all the strange and (to her) wonderful intelligence she had just received. The kind clergyman thought that she was praying or composing her spirit to endurance, when she was only endeavouring to understand all that she had heard. She had lived so shut out from the world that this first rude contact with it was bewildering.

"Shall I put the rest of these letters away, Miriam, and come and read them in the evening?" asked Mr. Shepherd, gently.

"I would much rather hear them now, if you can spare the time;" she said.

"I can spare the time, my dear. I will do what is most likely to set your mind at ease. Perhaps you had better know all without further delay."

"Yes, yes;" she replied. "Read all the letters which are addressed to me. Do not think I cannot bear them; I can bear anything, now. Then, divining Mr. Shepherd's anxiety on her account, she added, gravely,—"Do not fear that I shall not forgive David, as he asks. Dear Mr. Shepherd, I am not so foolish as to think of him now as of an old lover: I left that off long ago. In the boy-and-girl world of tinsel romance, forgiveness may be asked and granted; in the present world of far stronger and truer life, as it begins to shape itself before me, we must not use the word—Forgive! To forgive, there must be condemnation. What have I to do with condemning David,—I, who cannot understand or measure his temptation? If I presume to judge him in this matter, surely it is I who would stand in need of forgiveness from him, as he may stand in need of forgiveness from God. Never, until now, did I comprehend the full force of the words—'Who art thou that judgest another? To his own master he standeth or falleth.'"

"Miriam, my child, I never felt so clearly as I do now, the full meaning of the words,—'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.'"

He then adjusted his spectacles once more, and after turning over the open letters, selected the following, and read it aloud, pausing occasionally to observe its effect upon his auditor."

"Dear Miriam—"

"What is the date?" interrupted Miriam.

"It is dated from Florence, August 19,—a year after the one I have already read."

"DEAR MIRIAM,—I begin now to give up all hope of receiving a letter from you. I suppose my father's anger against me still endures, and he forbids you to write to me; perhaps he has not given you my former letters. What a world this is! How ingeniously we contrive to make ourselves and others miserable, when, by very much less trouble we might contrive the reverse! If it were not for the solemn promise I made to my dying mother not to seek you or address you except through my father, I would make sure that this letter should reach your hands; at all events, I will write as if I were certain it would reach them.

"In any of the great changes of life, whether of outward condition or of the inward mind, my thoughts revert naturally to some of my early friends at Milford,—to you, dear Miss Grey, more than to any other. I think within myself,—‘I must tell Miriam this;’ ‘Miriam Grey will like to hear that.’ Mr. Shepherd is kind and good; but there are times when we would seek sympathy from a young woman rather than from an old man. It is that time with me now, dear Miriam, for I have done what we used to talk about when we were children. I have written a book, at last; you must read it for the sake of those happy childish talks. The memory of your young smile steals sweetly to my mind as I write, and prompts me to tell you all that troubles and perplexes, yet gladdens me and makes me grateful at this moment; to wit, this my first book. I will tell you how I wrote it. To do so, I must mention a few facts connected with my external life of late years.

(1) Continued from p. 187.

“You know that I had determined to devote myself to medicine as a profession, when Admiral Underwood first found me idling about town. I told you he is wealthy; and that he is a person to whom I am proud to be obliged, for I love and esteem him as he does me. He advanced the necessary money for my medical studies, which I have since refunded,—I should be sorry if it were possible for me to repay the real debt of love, gratitude, and respect, I owe to that good man. I would rather owe him that as long as I have being. It is an obligation ‘at once indebted and discharged. What burden then?’”

“I took my degree of M. D. in London two years ago. Very soon afterwards, as you may have seen by the newspapers, I was, by accident, called upon to attend one of the royal dukes, in a sudden and dangerous attack of illness, during the absence of his official attendant. My treatment was perfectly successful; and since that time there has been no danger of my starving for want of fees, as is the case, alas! with many better physicians and better fellows than myself. Indeed, I had much more practice than I desired; for it has always been my fixed resolve to become a literary man. It was this resolve which influenced my choice of a profession. You may remember my opinion on this subject as a boy. It is not altered now. I still believe that the education and consequent frame of mind of the thorough physician, is, in nine cases out of ten, more calculated to produce what I call a thorough man than the education of lawyers, clergymen, soldiers, or sailors. And it is only from your thorough men that authors of real greatness are ever produced.

“But to return: finding that fashion was making my fortune before my education was half completed, I determined to deal honestly with myself and the world. I gave up my London practice, and came here with Admiral Underwood and his family in the capacity of medical guardian of his only son, a delicate lad of sixteen, to whom I am much attached, and whose life I hope to be the means of preserving. Great part of my time is spent in study,—scientific, philosophic, and (as you may suppose from the country in which I am) artistic. It is scarcely necessary to say that my little Leonora is with me. If it were not my greatest pleasure to keep her always near me—it would be a sacred duty. I can never make amends to her, poor injured darling, for the disgrace of her birth! When I am dead, or away from her, others will make her feel it; but while I live, and can, at any sacrifice of convenience to myself, have her with me, she shall never know the want of a father’s love and protecting care.

“But there is no kind of love and protection that my beautiful child wants now. All the household conspire to make her infancy a round of delights. Her beauty is something remarkable, even in this land of beauty; and at least a dozen painters and sculptors have asked me to lend them my bellissima figliuolina as a model. I have, of course, refused. I will not have an unnatural and unhealthy consciousness developed in her, by such means. Besides being beautiful, she is a child of remarkable intelligence, and so full of winning ways, that it is no wonder we all love her and spoil her (such spoiling I would wish all children to have) from Admiral Underwood down to little Amy.

“And now I must say a few words about these Underwoods—so different from us of the old stock at the Grange. The admiral, without being a Nelson or a Jarvis, is a fine fellow, and well worthy his rank. He commanded at ———, and at ———; both actions highly creditable to him. But these did not make his fortune; it was what is called a mere trifle that did. He was for a long time a messmate of the present king, when they were lads; and the king has never lost an opportunity of showing his esteem for him since. Hence his frequent presence at court, and my own accidental introduction there. The admiral is about the age of my father, and not altogether unlike him. Distant as the relationship is, they have blood enough in common to make an unmistakable family likeness, physical and mental. The admiral is just what my father would have been if circumstances had made him a sailor, a courtier, and a man of the world. His attachment to me from the first moment of our meeting was, undoubtedly, an ‘elective affinity,’ not to be explained on any ground, open and subject to the mere reason. The admiral himself explains it by saying, ‘Blood is thicker than water,’ and that every Underwood must feel himself drawn towards me, because I unite in my single person all the peculiarities of the family. For myself, I love the admiral with a sort of blind, instinctive feeling—such as we all feel towards the nearest blood-relations—and over and above this filial feeling I love and honour him as a man. He is the source and centre of happiness in his home. He has been twice married. By his first wife (a woman of rank and large fortune) he had two children—a son and a daughter. After her death he devoted himself to his profession for many years, being inconsolable for her loss. During that time his wife’s family took charge of the children, who were to inherit a large property. The boy was heir-presumptive to a title; but he died in childhood, to the deep regret of his father and all connected with him, for he was a child of great promise. He had been christened David:—this may partly account for the admiral's attraction to myself. The girl, Edith, was so fond of her brother, that she almost killed herself with grief for his loss. This intensity of feeling in a child of nine years old was very uncommon, and caused all those with whom she was domesticated to look for the development of a nature somewhat different from the average. As these worthy aristocratic persons were in nothing above the average themselves, except in their amount of self-satisfaction, they naturally dreaded and disliked all exhibition of character that was not akin to their own, and looked upon young Edith Underwood much as the owls looked upon the eaglet they had hatched by mistake. They did their best to chain her spirit and train her up in the way in which they thought she should go. In vain; she could not be made to walk in that way. You know the old story of the Martyrdom of Genius by Mediocrity. That was the fate of Edith Underwood's youth. The converse of that old story, the 'Martyrdom of Mediocrity by Genius,' is not so often talked of. Miss Underwood bears witness to it generously, now that she is free; and is of opinion that her stately grandmother, and fine-lady aunts, must have suffered more from her 'vagaries,' as they called them, than ever she did from their miserable, meaningless conventionality, and utter deadness to all true virtue and enthusiasm—making a certain something, which they called propriety, do duty instead; and which, to her clear-sighted pious young soul, was generally a very improper director of thought or action. I have seen real tears in her eyes when she has spoken of the stupid blindness, the serene self-righteousness, with which these naturally kind-hearted and intelligent ladies were in the habit of prostrating their souls every day before the car of their absurd idol, Propriety. The more they were crushed by it, the better they were pleased; so that a keen tormenting sense of propriety was the most active principle within them at all times, and in all places. This sense of propriety she herself outraged every day, by her own account, and with every wish to avoid doing so, for she loved these ladies. However, as she grew older, life with them became impossible. It was being crushed out of her, when her father came home, saw how matters were, and organized a change. Edith was sent to visit one of his married sisters, and accompanied the family to Italy; where she remained until the admiral's second marriage. She then went home to his house in —shire, to meet her stepmother.

"Edith was sixteen—her stepmother ten years older. They were both predisposed to like each other. Mrs. Underwood was, (and I may add is still,) a great beauty—soft, gentle, indolent, and full of admiration for what is called cleverness; by which is meant, I find, any sort of intellectual activity, however small;—not one particle of which Mrs. Underwood possesses herself,—and she has 'the gift to know it,' and the still rarer gift of being unenvious of those who do possess it. I never once heard her regret not being clever—or Edith regret not being beautiful—though, I dare say, before I knew them, when they were both younger, and had not yet learned to accept the inevitable without a murmur, as God's best gift, they may each have mourned heartily the want of that glorious gift which shone forth so conspicuously in the other. I have never heard one woman speak of another with more sincere affection than Edith speaks of Mrs. Underwood; or have I often seen one woman take more genuine pride in another woman's beauty, than she does in that of her stepmother. From the time of her father's second marriage Edith began to be happy.

"I wish I could convey a just idea of my friend Edith. Let me try;—for I am anxious that you should take an interest in all my friends. You will not fall into the error of supposing there is anything like love between us. 'The love of woman, in that sense,' is over for me; my little Leonora, and the memory of my first pure passion, are effectual safeguards against all other loves;—these, and my constant intellectual employment. An active brain is ever the best guardian of an empty heart. But my heart is not empty;—on the contrary, within this household it finds almost as many objects of affection as it can hold. Next to my child, Edith Underwood is the being who sheds most light on my life. Dear, noble, generous Edith! happy am I to be able to love her as a friend only; most unfortunate should I be if it were otherwise; for Edith owns great wealth, and is far above me in station. We are equals only in this household, and in our love of literature and art;—and there is no thought of any other love between us.

"Did I tell you it was she who first found me out and induced her father to seek me? She had remarked some poems signed D. U. in one of the leading Magazines, and made inquiries about the author. My name being that of her darling brother, excited a double interest. She contrived to send me a sum of money anonymously, and unknown to any one. (I have told you she was rich.) This money came, like all gifts which God sends by angels' hands, at a moment when that special gift was the one thing needed. It saved me from some of the worst degradations of poverty; and I blessed the unknown giver. Soon after that, I was struck by the vigour and beauty of a certain prose article, in a miscellaneous volume,—it touched upon a subject which I was meditating for my first book. I wrote to the author, anonymously, expressing the real admiration I felt for his work, and requesting to know whether the book I purposed writing, (the one I have just written,) trenching upon ground which he had any intention of occupying. You may imagine my surprise when I received an answer in the very noticeable handwriting which had accompanied the money gift. Edith Underwood was the author of the article in question, and had no suspicion that her new correspondent was the D. U. to whom she had sent the money. Her letter was charming—too charming, and graceful to be the production of a man. I had been mistaken in the sex of the author of the article, I could not be mistaken as to the sex of the letter-writer, although it was signed only with initials. I contrived to keep up a correspondence with this unknown lady, for there was a mysterious fascination about it. During the dread days of my bondage,—my blindness; when I thought myself so blessed,—I neglected my unknown correspondent, as well as every other thing not connected with one whose name I now breathe only in my prayers. When the storm was past, and I remained helpless and wretched, with nought but a frail infant's life to bind me to the earth, my gentle unknown correspondent sent yet another letter, full of wisdom and womanly sweetness. At the close she bade me expect a visitor, a relation—on the morrow. I was far too miserable to try to avoid this visitor. I forgot him and the letter. He came. It was Admiral Underwood. In five minutes we were speaking like father and son. That interview knit me to him for ever. The next day he carried me off—me and the poor babe to his house. Then I first saw Edith. She met me with the straightforward simplicity of her nature—so like a grown-up child, with a woman's tenderness super-added. I wish you could know her. Your passive and her active nature would combine readily, and form a perfect friendship. You are both ideal women—i. e. women whose specific individuality approaches nearly to the two abstract ideas of perfect womanhood.—for there are two.

"From that day we have been friends, she and I—neither of us being disappointed, I believe, in our anonymous correspondent. She is of a sunny, bright nature—like a summer lake. I have observed that women who, after the first youth has passed, appear glad and cheerful at all times, or at most times, are often those of the greatest depth and breadth of nature: they have learned to subdue selfish sorrow—they take care to keep the fresh current of the upper life pure and sparkling; while down in the depths below, lie the precious relics of shipwrecked hopes and affections. Women, on the contrary, who are given to the display of melancholy, and are constantly putting both mind and body into picturesque positions of grief, are for the most part intensely selfish, and often very shallow in feeling as well as intellect. Until I knew Edith I was not in a condition to make these observations. Among men I had noticed that those who retain a continual sparkle and cork-like buoyancy of nature, after the season of early youth, never have much depth of character. They are very pleasant people, but they do not grapple with the burden of life, they let it slip from them; they are the Celts of the moral world.

"With woman it is otherwise, as I said. Probably, it has been so ordained to enable her to perform well her task of comforter and consoler to man. The gravest wisdom, the loftiest reasoning, are far less efficacious in that task than a sunny gladness in the face, and a heart-music ringing in the voice. Cheerfulness and good temper are not the most dazzling or poetic, but they are among the never-failing charms with which woman holds dominion over man.

"Edith Underwood is almost always cheerful, and her temper is one of the best I know. It is tried enough by every one of us; and most by my Leonora, to whom she acts as mother, governess, nurse, and constant slave. I, myself, must frequently give her annoyance, for I am subject to fits of obstinate moodiness and despondency. She has been mainly instrumental in rousing and bracing my mind to work, by working with me and for me. If it had not been for her, I doubt whether the volume would ever have been written, which you will receive from Mr. Shepherd about the time you ought to get this letter. It is, as I said before, my first book—the first production to which I have prefixed my name. You will read it with interest, Miriam, as a piece of the mental life of your old friend."

"Ah!" murmured Miriam, "how well I remember when you brought me 'The Trail of the Serpent.' It was before I became blind. That is the only one of David's books which I was able to read for myself. I recollect that simple dedication, 'To my best friend, and brightest example in the art of overcoming evil by good.' And that was Edith Underwood! She, indeed, was a helpmeet for him. Tell me, Mr. Shepherd, is she his wife, now?"

"I think she must be, my dear; for it was a daughter of Admiral Underwood that he married. Let me finish the letter, it is nearly ended."

"You will easily understand that I do not send you and Mr. Shepherd this trifle because I am contented with it. It is far otherwise. But my thoughts reverted naturally to my native valley when I first saw this child of my brain in a completed form. 'Who is there,' I asked myself, 'to whom I can send a copy with a certainty of giving pleasure? Only Miriam and my old tutor.' So to Miriam and my old tutor I present copies, praying them to remember sometimes, in their quiet talks, the new author and their ever affectionate friend,

"DAVID UNDERWOOD."

CHAPTER XVII.

DAVID'S MARRIAGE.

"I do not think I can listen to the rest of the letters now, dear Mr. Shepherd," said Miriam, "only read me the one in which he tells me of his marriage. I want to hear that."

Mr. Shepherd took up another letter, and read as follows:—

"DEAR MIRIAM,—In my last letter I told you of my agony when the news of the supposed loss of Leonora and the rest of the children was brought to the house;—of their wonderful escape from the burning vessel, owing to the courage and extraordinary presence of mind of Edith; of the overwhelming joy of their return, two days after we had given up all hope of seeing them on earth again. I told you hurriedly, then, that poor Edith had been the only severe sufferer, and that the injury she had sustained had been caused solely by her efforts (thank God, successful efforts!) to rescue my poor insensible child from that terrible death.

"It is not of death I am going to tell you now, Miriam; nor of sorrow or suffering; but of a solemn chastened joy. At length it has pleased God to make me happy in the enjoyment of a woman's love. You, in your saint-like seclusion in the old tower, in your oblivion of the past, will smile sweetly, I think, to hear that the wild, world-stained David Underwood, is going to be married at last; married to a woman whom you would honour from the bottom of that gentle heart of yours.

"Let me tell you how it happened. Even now I cannot understand how I lived so long in daily communion with her—the warmth of her loving soul circling all round me and permeating my being, and yet I loved her not. But that is false; I loved her and knew it not. Noble, generous Edith! Strong, soft-hearted woman!

"How could I, the fallen one, think of loving her? She—a very angel of love and good works. How could I, the half-taught, dimly-thinking man, aspire to the love of the one woman I have known, who to every charm of her own sex adds the knowledge, and moral strength, and intellectual vigour of the best men?

"How could I, the poor physician, with no fortune but his brain, think of loving a woman who has been sought in marriage by half the peerage, for her large property and her noble connexions?

"On the other hand,—how could I live with Edith Underwood, and not love her otherwise than as I did? The materials for kindling an enduring flame lay for a long time in my heart; there needed only the touch of one living spark to set it ablaze. The spark descended there at last, and the kindled flame needs no fanning now, and will expire but with my life. Edith will be my wife in one little week. Rejoice with me, my early friend.

"Shall I tell you of my blindness and insensibility? Dolt that I was! Edith loved me, and became conscious of her love long ago. Then, fearing that I or some one might discover it, she determined to avoid me, and return to England. This unaccountable determination induced her father to alter his plans. He thought it best to send the whole household back with her. Mrs. Underwood, Edith, the children, governesses and servants were to sail directly to England from Malta; I, and his son, William, were to remain with him there six months longer, as I wished William to avoid a winter in England.

"No sooner had I lost sight of Edith than I began to feel a strange yearning within me. It was not for Leonora, who had gone with her, it was for a sight of Edith herself I longed.

"When the awful news reached us, that the vessel on which they were embarked had caught fire, within sight of the Italian coast, and that all on board had perished; with the speechless horror that crept through my veins at the thought of my lovely child, was added a new feeling—the woman who had slowly and unconsciously won all the love of my mature life, was gone from me for ever. I cannot attempt to describe how I passed the next forty-eight hours. Again, for the third time, life had become a burden almost too heavy for me to bear. But now, through Edith's influence, I knew how to wait patiently for help from above. My stricken soul was arousing itself. The words, 'Thy will be done,' were on my lips, when some one stood beside me, shook me gently, and said, 'They are all saved! Up! up! you are wanted, Dr. Underwood. Mamma says you must come and attend to Edith directly, or she will die.'

"I must pass over that meeting. Leonora was there—they were all there! safe! safe! All but Edith! I unclasped my arms from Leonora, and walked mechanically after Mrs. Underwood to a chamber above. I understood but dimly. I was a physician. Edith was ill; dying,—in consequence of her exertions on board the burning vessel. I must attend her; cure her, if possible; at all events, alleviate her pain. Seeing me apparently indifferent or stupid, Mrs. Underwood added, by way of incentive to my activity, 'It was in saving Leonora that she risked her life at the time, and will perhaps lose it, even now.' Can you guess the feelings with which I stood by Edith's bedside?

"In all my professional experience I have never seen more physical suffering, or more patience and fortitude. It would be incredible to all who were not witnesses of that triumph of the soul over physical agony. Yet it is good for us to repeat,—to try to credit such stories of the virtue of our race. Oh! it is a glorious thing to be a human being! How touching in its union of weakness and strength must humanity be in the sight of God's angels! Ever since that day I have thanked the Creator, from my inmost heart, for having made me a man, and not a being of a higher order. I am of the same race with Edith Underwood, and a thousand more who have shown in their lives 'how divine a thing it is to suffer and be strong.'

"She did suffer! Suffered horribly!—for my child's sake.

"They told me all, afterwards.

"In less than a quarter of an hour from the first alarming cry of 'Fire! fire!' on board the vessel, it was in flames from stem to stern. Edith, always rapid and clear in thought as one of the cherubim, had organized in her mind, and carried into execution a plan for the salvation of our precious group, as soon as she saw that the flames mastered the crew, and that the officers who should have commanded all on board, had lost their presence of mind. She called two of her own men-servants, and ordered them to seize, and lower into the sea, a life-boat, which she was taking as a present from the Admiral to some naval friend in England. It was on a new principle.

Edith and I had taken great interest in its construction, and used to go day after day, with the Admiral, to the English builder's in Valetta, to watch its progress, little dreaming of the not far-distant time when that little boat would be the means of preserving so many precious lives. Edith understood how to manage this boat as well as a sailor. The men were roused to hope by her words, as she explained it to them, and while the rest of the passengers were hurrying purposeless and despairing about the vessel, uttering wild cries, prayers, and imprecations, the two men-servants set to work, silently and energetically, in the corner of the vessel where the boat had been packed away, while Edith flew back to the cabins to collect her flock. Her calm authoritative voice stilled all impotent noise; every one obeyed her instinctively. Mrs. Underwood, in her simple fashion, has told us fifty times how Edith stood in the midst of the terrified women and children like a creature of another world. 'There was not a bit of fear about her. She was only paler, quicker, stronger in the voice, and stronger in the arms than usual. She made us all hear and understand in the midst of the dreadful uproar. She lifted me and poor Mademoiselle B——, for we were so overcome with terror that we could not stand. She put two bottles of wine in a basket, and made little Amy, the bravest among us, carry it. She helped us all on deck, and we stood trembling by (all but Miss D——, who was inspired by Edith, she says), while she got a rope, and, with Miss D——'s help, lowered us all down into the boat, where Jackson and William were waiting. We should have had it taken from us by a stronger party, as Edith feared every moment, but that the flames were being blown over that part of the vessel. The dear girl had made us all wrap ourselves in blankets, without waiting to dress—blankets, or coarse woollen shawls—they would keep off the flames, she said. We should have been burned severely but for this precaution; for the flames came licking their huge tongues all over the edge of the deck where we were, as if greedy for our lives. We all felt them, and were half suffocated. Ah! it was very awful!' And then Mrs. Underwood would pause from over-excitement, and wipe her gentle eyes, and then go on again.

"I cannot understand how Edith could do what she did that night: she did not seem to feel the heat of the flames, or the cold wind; she had nothing on but a woollen shawl over her night-dress, which she had steeped in water on purpose to prevent its catching fire. When we were all in the boat but herself, I remember seeing her look down as if she were counting us all. 'Come! come, Edith,' I cried; 'do not wait there to be burned alive.' 'Make haste, Miss Underwood,' cried Jackson;—'the poor creatures are clinging round our boat,—we shall be swamped.' 'Where is Leonora?' cried Edith, 'where is the child?' That was the first moment she showed terror. Through the roar of the waves and the hissing of flaming timbers as they fell, I heard Edith's words, and I knew that no persuasions would induce her to save her own life till she had rescued Leonora. The poor child, it seems, had fallen into a swoon in her berth in the cabin, and had been forgotten. Jackson's voice shouted the information up to Edith. I could see her face upturned a moment, as if seeking counsel from above; then she leant down again over the edge of the deck, and strove to make Jackson hear, but he could not or would not hear—for he loves his mistress, and would not have been disposed to save us all and leave her. Edith tells us that she said,—'Cut the rope and row for the shore. It will not be safe to wait longer. I will follow with the child if possible.'—In a moment she seemed to disappear in flames. We swayed to and fro in the boat, more dead than alive, while the men and Miss D—— had hard work to keep off the poor frantic wretches who were swimming round it.

"'There she is, God bless her!' shouted Jackson. I looked up, and there stood Edith with one foot on a burning plank, the only footing now remaining on that side of the ship, and holding in her arms the senseless Leonora.' (I must explain to you, Miriam, that Leonora is a large child of eight years old.) 'The rope with which the others had been lowered into the boat was burned. 'Throw her down,' cried Jackson, 'it will be quite safe.' Edith hesitated, she was carefully holding out the child away from the flames, holding her in a most painful position, thrown over one hip and leg, which she kept suspended over the water, while she maintained her balance with the other arm and leg, the first grasping a fallen 'yard,' and the last actually planted in the flames. Presently she made a sign to Jackson, and then slid the child gently down her own side, and so into the boat. As soon as she saw Leonora was safe, she complied with our earnest entreaties and sprang down herself. There! I can't talk about it any more.' And thus usually ends Mrs. Underwood's account.

"It was many hours before they reached land;—and longer still before Edith could have the medical attendance she required. Even if she had been treated immediately after the accident, I do not think it would have been possible to save that poor burned limb. Fortunately, the rest of her body, though much scorched, and giving her for weeks afterwards acute pain, was not seriously hurt. Only that left leg on which she had stood so bravely, that she might keep my little Leonora scatheless. I cannot think of it even now, months afterwards, and familiar as I am with the picture of that noble woman braving the elements and risking her life for a little child, not her own, nor of her kin,—I cannot think of it without a suffocating feeling in the throat, as if all the blood of my heart had rushed there.

"But if you are moved, as I know you will be, Miriam, by this poor account of Edith's heroic conduct on board the burning ship, what will you feel, when I tell you of her fortitude and gentle patience in the sick room!

"When I was first taken to her by Mrs. Underwood, I was still half stupefied by the sudden news of their safe return; but a few moments served to restore my presence of mind, and I acted with the promptitude and energy which I saw the case required.

'Go and fetch the Admiral,' said I, addressing Mrs. Underwood, 'and send for Mr. H—— and Mr. C——,' (the two best surgeons then in Valetta.)

"I was left alone with Edith a moment. We looked at each other. I could not speak. She, pale as a corpse from suffering and exhaustion, the moment before, flushed a deep crimson as if from some strong agony, but her deep clear eyes turned not from mine as she said,—'I see, my friend, I see! You think the leg must come off.'

I made an assenting motion with my head—to speak was impossible. The sound of that sweet voice, the sight of those beloved eyes were fast unnerving me. For, have I not told you, Miriam, there was a strong, full-grown love for that suffering woman, in my heart? She made a motion as if she would give me her hand, I stooped down and kissed it many times, and shed tears,—such 'tears as flow but once a life.' The anguish was unbearable. She spoke soothing words.

"Nay! It is not so much. Do you think I cannot bear to lose a limb for those I love? You shall see. What is it moves you thus?"

"Then I stood up and told her I loved her. It was a moment of strong excitement—genuine untrammelled life. The whole household was on an equality; for Death had been very near, and placed us all side by side. Every feeling was over-wrought, and Love burst its way, regardless of conventional drawbacks.

"Oh, Miriam! How often the strong pain and the acute pleasure seem to make but one pulsation in the heart; but the pleasure throbs most powerfully at last and beats down the pain! There was no need of many words between us. Ere I could believe in my own changed existence, she was folded in my arms, and my trembling lips were pressed to her poor scorched cheek,—to me, more beautiful than that of Hebe.'

"It is not for Leonora's sake?" she asked timidly.

"No! No! No! For your own.—Edith, if this terrible journey had never been—Ah! I don't know how long I have loved you. Always, I think."

"Then now thank God with me," she said; "I can hear all things. Your love is all I ask for on earth. I am very happy."

"We were interrupted; but an immense change appeared in Edith from that moment. She seemed to have subdued all sense of suffering; indeed, the old joyousness, mingled with a brightness never seen there before, sparkled in her eyes. Well might Leonora ask:—

"What makes Edith look so pretty, now she is very ill?"

"The surgeons came. They agreed with me. The leg must come off immediately. The poor father! Brave old man! He wept like a child. Mrs. Underwood fainted when she heard the news. The children were taken away by their tearful governesses, and I remained with the servants and the two surgeons beside the Admiral in Edith's room. She spoke to us both cheerfully, then asked us to leave the room for a short time. She wished to speak in private to the surgeons, she said. It was a kind fraud to save us pain; but a suspicion of the truth flashed across me, and leaving the Admiral overcome by his emotion, at the thought of what he must so soon witness, I stole back into the chamber. My suspicion was well founded. The operation was being performed. I could scarcely believe my eyes. Edith sat up; not only watched the operator, but actually helped to hold the leg which was being amputated. The surgeons were afterwards loud in praise of her fortitude; but she told me it would have required infinitely more fortitude to bear the operation if they had bandaged her eyes as they at first proposed to do. She was right. Imagination is always active with her, and at that time, stimulated and disordered as her nervous system had been, she would have imagined the thing to be far worse than it really was. Seeing the preparations, and actually taking a part in the operation, employed her mind without allowing the imagination to run riot in horrors.

"I will not lengthen this letter by attempting any account of Edith's subsequent weakness and long protracted recovery. Thank God, she is now restored to health, and bears the loss of that precious limb as if it were a matter of course. This lameness is a source of genuine sorrow to her father; but I believe it is looked upon as a sort of charm by all other persons who are capable of appreciating the best beauty, when they see it.

I once heard two officers here talking about Edith. 'What a pity she is so lame,' said one; 'she would be a remarkably fine woman if she were not.' 'I beg your pardon,' said the other; 'she would not be half so fine a woman. She lost her leg in saving a child from a burning ship. I would give my two legs to have saved her little foot.' The common people here, and all the English sailors, take off their hats and say, 'God bless you!' as she passes. The uneducated often know the true hero when they get sight of him.

"In another week Edith will become my wife,—the mother of my Leonora;—and in a month from that time we shall return to England. On my arrival there, I shall write once more to my father for permission to see him and all dear ones at Milford. You will show this letter to him and to Mr. Shepherd. You have, I trust, received from the publisher copies of my books as they have come out. I am now engaged on a fourth, which promises to be better than the others; at all events it will not be spoken so well of by the generality of critics, Edith says, and adds kindly, 'that is no little thing to say in its favour.' As I am of her way of thinking in that matter, I am doing my best to escape the favourable reviews of the—and—and—at hoc genus omne.' But if the Milford Observers think well of my new bantling, it will give me much pleasure. Let Mr. Shepherd know this, and he will, as before, write me your opinion and his own.

"I am,

"Your affectionate friend,

"DAVID UNDERWOOD."

When Mr. Shepherd looked up after concluding this letter, he found that Miriam had lost all consciousness, and had sunk into a corner of the window-seat. He raised her gently, and carried her without much difficulty to the bed. She was but a slight creature. Then, hastily putting the letters together, he thrust them into a drawer, and went down stairs to find Dame Barnard. Nanny Post was still in the kitchen, though it was more than two hours since she first came.

"Nanny," said the good clergyman; "take your donkey and ride as fast as you can to the Grange, and tell Mr. and Miss Underwood, that Miss Grey is seriously ill, and that they had better send for a medical man directly."

"Lord ha' mercy! My poor dear child!" cried Dame Barnard. "And I forgot her, minding the riddle-bread. Away with you, Nanny, and just ask Miss Martha to come to us, for Mrs. Ward ain't much of a help in sickness. Mercy on us! here she comes, in her fine white bonnet and parasol, and a grand gentleman with her. Maybe you're right, Nanny, after all, and it's a wedding she's been to this morning. Who is it with her, do you say? Mr. Mark Underwood! Lord save us! What a work there'll be with his father." And the Dame's observations were brought to a conclusion by the entrance of Mrs. Ward and Mr. Mark, each attired in festal garments. The latter took Mrs. Ward by the hand, and leading her up to Mr. Shepherd, introduced her to him as his wife.

Mr. Shepherd was sorry not to be able to give them a gladder greeting; but he was taken by surprise, and his heart was anxious about Miriam, and after a few words of congratulation, he explained briefly to Mrs. Ward, that he believed Miriam was attacked by the fever prevalent in the district at the time, and begged her to be particularly attentive to her sister.

"I?" And Mrs. Ward looked perplexed. "I believe Mark—"

"We are going off directly, sir," said Mark; "the post-chaise is waiting below. We merely called to tell Miss Grey of our marriage, and to say good-bye. It is not surely necessary that my wife, on her wedding day, should stay to nurse her sister, who may happen to be a little feverish, or out of sorts. Will you like to go up and see her? Or stay,—I would rather you did not, in case of infection. I will call at the Grange, and tell my sisters. Martha will come readily, I am sure; or, perhaps, Miss Shepherd—she is so active and benevolent."

They were about to turn from the door, after saying "Good morning,"—to the amazement of Mr. Shepherd and the old Dame, when they, in their turn, were surprised by the appearance of four persons coming slowly across the fell near the Tower. They were old Mr. Underwood, his daughter Martha, with David and his wife.

(To be continued.)

A WEEK IN JAMAICA IN THE YEAR 1841.

FROM THE DIARY OF AN OFFICER.

Monday morning.—Started, when the rosy-fingered Aurora was opening the gates of light, with four brother officers, on an excursion to the Blue Mountain Peak, with a black guide, who carried a basket of prog on his head. When we left Portland Gap, it wanted twenty minutes of six, A.M. and at eight A.M. we stood on the Peak, which is the highest point of land in the West Indies. A more intricate path than that by which we ascended, it would be hard to find. In some places we climbed as if up a ladder, where, but for the aid afforded us by the trees, we could not have mounted. But by swinging with the whole strength of our arms from their boughs, we raised ourselves. At other times we descended abruptly, and landed more than once on a narrow ledge, commanding a magnificent view to the N. and S. of the island. At last we reached the summit, hungry and exhausted. To dry our clothes, which heavy mists had saturated with moisture, we split into fire-wood the decayed materials of a hut, the scene of former festivities, and heaping them to a considerable height, set fire to them. To appease our appetites, we opened our provision store, still enveloped in mist. Gleams of sunshine struggling through the thick vapour tempted me to climb a tree. When I had accomplished this feat, as if to reward me for my exertions, the clouds rolled up, and opening right and left afforded me a view more like enchantment than reality. From the elevation of 8,000 feet, I looked down on the lower ranges of hills, and beyond them to the plains which skirt the base. Before me, at more than the distance of thirty miles, yet apparently at my feet, the palisades stretched to Port Royal; to the right lay Portland Point, to the left Morant, with all the intermediate "filling in," as painters would say, and all beautiful. The scene was constantly changing, as the restless clouds obscured what had before been visible, or disclosed some bay, village, hill, or valley which had not before been observed. Rivers like silver threads, and innumerable coffee plantations dotted the hills like tiny white spangles on a dark ground.

But how give a perfect idea of the variety of scenery spread beneath and around us, and the still more endless variations of light and shade which pervaded the panorama!—how express in language the richness not only in foliage but in commercial value of the vegetable productions! or how breathe into words a sensation of the light refreshing mountain atmosphere which we there and then inhaled!

In front lay the extensive plain of the south-east portion of the island stretching towards Clarendon and Manchester, until lost in the dimness of the horizon. Kingston lay as in a map, beneath us. Turning to the left, the picturesque valley of the Yallah carried the view to the western seas, while an extreme clearness of vision prevailed.

But in less time than it has occupied me in writing this description, all would be again concealed by a curtain of mist. The clouds would pack together, and the tops of the highest hills alone would remain visible, like islands peeping above them. Here, for the first time, I heard thunder roar and saw lightning flash below me. Watching and hoping for clearer weather we passed some hours. Col R—— and I established ourselves on some yacca-trees, where by using a cutlass we formed a small bower of branches which screened the whole party. About noon we commenced our descent.

On the way down, our sable conductor led us by a precipice and chasm, which until 1815 had formed a gentle slope on the side of a mountain, where stood a dwelling-house and coffee plantation. During the storms which scourged Jamaica in that year, this entire piece of land slipped from the mountain and rolled into the valley, carrying with it fifteen Negroes who were never heard of afterwards. It is supposed that the shock of an earthquake, so frequent here, had opened the mountain in that part, and that torrents of rain pouring into the chasm, had, by acting as a wedge, caused the catastrophe.

The descent cost us less time by forty minutes than the ascent; but scarcely less exertion. We, gave C—— a race for it, as we had heard him boast of his agility. On the way we were met by the overseer of a neighbouring estate, who had been sent by his hospitable mistress to offer us refreshment at her house, delightfully situated among acacias and aromatic shrubs in a gorge surrounded by an amphitheatre of mountains. The dwelling itself is comfortable, constructed, like all Jamaica country seats, to admit the greatest quantity of fresh air. As we proceeded, in willing compliance with so polite an invitation, we encountered a Negro carrying a tray on his head.

"What have you there, friend," I inquired.

"Wedding cake, massa."

"For whom?"

"For myself, massa."

We might have had share of the cake and participated in the nuptial festivities, I have no doubt, if time had permitted us to do so.

We had scarcely parted from him when a Negress at the door of a cottage, and surrounded by a progeny of various hues, attracted our attention. She welcomed us with, "How do, massas?" and after a few words, I said, as we turned away, in Spanish, Vayamos; instantly her ear caught the sound, and addressing me in the same language, she told me it was her native tongue. She had come from Carthagená. I did not lose the opportunity of a little practice with a language which had been familiar to me at Gibraltar; before we left, she made me promise to return; and raising her hands, which she clasped together, her eyes suffused with tears, exclaimed with deep feeling, "Mi patria, viva mi patria;" so strong even with this poor Negress was the love of home.

The lady, at whose "pen" we now arrived, proved to be an antique, roughly carved, and, as she soon told us, was married to her fourth husband, whom she had chosen from a bevy of wooing attorneys, as a protector against the others; "however," she added, "he has given himself up to drink, and is worse than nobody."

We did much credit to her luxurious luncheon, and enjoyed her bottled porter and sangaree.

Pushed on to another "pen," where we were expected to dine and sleep. After a bath, great feasting on turtle soup, stewed eels, corimba, the salmon of Jamaica, with every conceivable luscious fruit, fresh and preserved, and iced champagne in copious libations, we rambled through the coffee ground. The coffee-plaut, which is a shrub, is kept carefully pruned so that it shall not exceed four or five feet in height; the leaves are of a dark green, and the berries look at first like small buds, but as they grow larger, resemble in appearance Siberian crabs on a reduced scale, on one side yellowish, on the other rose-coloured. Shaddockes, bananas, grape fruit, mangoes, akki, avocado pears, jack-fruit and bread-fruit and mountain cabbage are among the productions of this place.

When we returned to the house, we were summoned to the hall to see a Negress perform the Fetish dance, which is evidently of savage origin. The dancer works herself into frantic excitement, gesticulating violently and screaming discordantly until she appears a perfect maniac; then comes the spirit of divination upon her, and she reveals some of the secrets of every individual present, a part of the performance which affords much scope for ready wit, in which this black woman was not deficient. She had evidently during our short stay seized on some of our individual peculiarities, which she turned to full account.

The entertainment then changed; she appeared in the dress of a Negro, in which character her imitation of a black man's style of dancing was perfect. This scene ended, she reappeared in proppid personá, and received a contribution of nearly five dollars.

We all then set to at waltzes and reels, and here again the Fetish woman shone. I never saw better waltzers, untiring and untired, with the thermometer at 85°, the whole household—never small in a Jamaica country-house—partaking in common of the evening's amusement at this bachelor establishment.

It was midnight when we retired, after partaking freely of that insinuating mixture, called planters' punch. It was altogether a glorious day. I was prevented from sleeping by the assaults of mosquitos, which had succeeded in pushing through the gauze curtains intended for my protection.

At higher elevations than the plantation from which I am recording a notice on these magnificent mountains, the temperature is never too high for comfort, and were it not for terrific thunder-storms, such localities would be pleasant at all seasons. One of the guests, whose dwelling is 5,700 feet above the level of the sea, mentioned, that the mercury seldom rises above 75°, and ranges from this to 61°. European fruits and vegetables thrive well here. It is, in short, at this high elevation, an English climate in its brightest and most enjoyable mood, while the people below are broiling or melting.

Towards morning I felt chilly, and enjoyed my blanket, in sympathy, as to quick sensibility of atmospheric changes, with a ring-tailed monkey who occupied a corner of my room. He was dozing, and had his head between his legs as if to keep his nose and ears warm. I counted every stroke of the clock until four A.M.

Tuesday.—Rising at that hour, and leaving our friendly host in his dressing-gown in the verandah, smoking a cigar, we rode at a smart pace in order to be in time for drill and regimental inspection. A delicious plunge into our tank, (which is 50 feet square and 4 deep, and is fed by cool mountain streams conveyed to it by pipes,) before half-past six A.M. when the relieved guard bathed in it, refreshed me. Commenced the duties of the day;—found several new cases of fever among the men;—reported offences in the defaulters' book;—buried poor D—, and read the funeral service, the Chaplain being at Fort Augusta. Heard for the second time a complaint from Serjeant L—, respecting the unmanageableness of his wife;—told him that "a soft answer turneth away wrath," but, at the same time, thought within myself that a supple-jack would be good for such a virago as she undoubtedly is;—attended doctor's inspection at 10 A.M.;—received many letters on regimental matters, and private ones, from England by the Packet;—wrote my reports;—ordered a pipe of Madeira for mess, and had a hogshead of porter bottled;—examined mess accounts, and thought seriously of resigning the management of it. It is not always advantageous to have a character for steadiness and talent in business of this nature; I will not have greatness thrust upon me in this way. As I was contemplating the luxury of a lounge on my sofa and a bowl of sangaree—Creole fashion—S— and G— came in to settle the programme of private theatricals for the next week, to be followed by a bachelors' ball. Asked them to second breakfast (lunch) of course, and thereby lost the siesta which the great heat and my fatigue would have rendered so agreeable. What could have induced the blockheads to come from Lucca in such a glare of sunshine? Received an order from the Deputy Adjutant General to fire a feu-de-joie to-morrow, news having arrived of the birth of a Prince of Wales;—dined at mess;—multitudinous bumpers in honour of our future monarch;—had a quiet musical party, and a dance at the Adjutant's;—nice girls—sang well, danced better, and looked charming;—devilish lobsters for supper. When we separated, the night was clear and lovely;—went to bed wearied and sleepy, but alas! no sleep for me.

I had hardly been shrouded within my mosquito curtains, when my servant came to tell me that Lieutenant M— wished to see me on particular business. Now M— was an active sound-limbed young fellow, rather scampish and always in scrapes. By reason of my unfortunate character for steadiness, he had come to me for advice on an annoying affair. With other officers he had been drinking too freely in the exuberance of their loyalty, and afterwards engaged with some civilians at écarté for high stakes, in violation of the General's recent letter against gambling. One of the party, the overseer of a mountain farm, insulted the militaire. The party broke up in great excitement. M— came to consult me as to the possibility of arranging a hostile meeting before the matter became blown, or of extracting an apology from the offender. There was nothing for it, but to gallop to the plantation, which was many miles distant, and see the person who had occasioned all this fuss. Not a soul did we meet on our way thither, except the sentries on starting, therefore the affair in which we were engaged ran no risk of premature discovery.

The overseer had just preceded us. After a long palaver, in which M— and I talked big, the gentleman acknowledged that he had been wrong and hasty, a common effect of the climate, (had champagne nothing to do with it?) and consented to apologise selon les règles.

We lighted cigars, and wishing him bon repos, retraced our steps as quickly as possible.

Morning had not yet made its threatening inroad on the empire of night, but the figures of some sleeping black fellows, who may be seen towards morning stretched at almost every gateway, (their little stores of yams and vegetables of many sorts, with which they had started from the mountains, laid carefully beside them, and generally their donkeys fastened to some fence and browsing on buds and branches, unconscious of the injury they inflict, and Blacky caring as little about the mischief done to Buckra), indicated that we should barely have time to reach the barracks before veille: this, however, we accomplished.

Wednesday.—Sir W. G— appeared on parade at half-past five A.M. The men turned out beautifully clean, and marched past the General very well. The manœuvring was not so good, but he professed his satisfaction. He then inspected barracks, hospital, and kits. Whilst we were at breakfast, a shot was fired from one of the barrack rooms, and a soldier rushed in, saying, that Serjeant S— had shot himself. This he effected by putting the muzzle of a firelock into his mouth and pulling the trigger with his toe. The unfortunate man had been under a cloud for having defrauded an officer of part of his company's money. A letter was found in his pocket, addressed to his uncle, who is possessed of property in England, stating that he had been leading a very dissolute life since his arrival in the island, and was so cast down by a sense of shame that he had resolved to follow the example of his father, (who had destroyed himself on hearing of another disgraceful act of this young man, who had been flogged for it at Edinburgh Castle). Visited one of my men in the last stage of yellow fever;—saw him die;—the hospital is a melancholy place;—went to a christening;—C— and I acted as sponsors for the child of a brother officer, and had a funous lunch. While we were there, the colour-sergeant's wife was reported to have produced twins,—sharp practice this;—sent a party after two deserters; one of them had decamped because his whiskers had been shaved off as a punishment; we thought it a mild though barberous one;—dressed and dined with the General;—great fuss,—some black fellows having stolen some wine, which had been left out to be cooled; no uncommon occurrence among these dingy sons of freedom.

It would have been a delightful evening to me but for the great heat, which put me into too "melting a mood" to be agreeable and able to offer those petits soins which I wished to perform towards the elegant and fashionable ladies at table. We all afterwards went to a great ball in the assembly rooms. Our band played their new quadrilles;—danced till nearly five o'clock in the morning. I never before witnessed such a profusion of wines and other luxuries, and notwithstanding the prodigious crowd, there was scarcely a perceptible impression made on the good things of the supper table. Iced champagne flowed as plentifully as water. Owing to its influence, two native gentlemen became very bellicose towards each other; a benevolent comet, who sat between them, with affected naïveté offered them the use of his Mantons. This put an end to that altercation. Though there were nearly 1000 persons, the room was cooler than an English one in similar circumstances. There were several browns, and a great many shades of blacks, not only mixtures of colours, but of callings; many of the Shopocracy were there, intermingled with the great functionaries, and one tipsy gentleman with whom I had been dealing in the morning begged to introduce me to his daughter, but as I had the honour of being engaged to a lady of the General's family I escaped a dilemma without giving offence.

Thursday.—The suicide was interred at daybreak without military honours. One of his comrades read the funeral service. I attended the remains of little Coleman, the drummer, to his grave; and such a resting-place! it had nearly a foot of water in it—as miserable a receptacle as the swampy land of New Orleans. Inspected the kits of eight of our lately fine healthy grenadiers, and gave directions for the disposal of them. Such sights sicken me. Will not these deaths speak trumpet-tongued to the dissolute?—No—familiarity with them deadens their impression. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," is the language of our sensualists.—Went through my whole routine of morning duties—Hospital inspection, reports and accounts, &c.—had the satisfaction of finding that the deserters were brought back. One of them, Pat Casey, when overtaken on the mountains, said he had walked so far, that he must be near Dublin.

Set off for a pic-nic, with two of the least romantic of our corps, to the Port Royal mountains, a pretty considerable distance.

The road, which winds through a narrow pass into the heart of the mountains, is rather difficult and very zig-zag, and presents no remarkable features; yet the total ensemble of the scenery is very interesting. I have heard these mountains compared, by a lady of course, to a piece of crumpled green satin, and not inaptly; for there is a peculiar richness in the verdure which spreads over their summits, and clothes the sides of their innumerable projections and indentations, and which is varied by the deeper shade of the shrubs and fruit-trees which abound there. I saw of mangoes alone sufficient to support an army for a month. Several of the Negro huts are picturesquely situated on the tops of smaller hills, whose slopes, studded with plantations of bananas, show that the Negro is not altogether idle, or at least that he labours—by deputy, through his womankind; met several groups of Negresses toiling along the road. Passed a horrid sight, a black man who had died the night before of spasms. The body, already dreadfully swollen, was surrounded by black and brown women waiting for the coroner. A very intelligent white-headed Negro told me that the deceased had been a great drunkard, that he himself was a native of Angola. Though kidnapped and brought to Jamaica at a very early age, he has a vivid recollection of his native land, to which he expressed his desire to return. Met old blind Haffo, a privileged pauper Negro, who had obtained leave from the House of Correction to wander into the country for fresh air. This poor fellow had been landed in the Island blind from the small-pox, which had been fatal to many of the live African cargo of which he was a unit. Though half idiotic, he finds his way, and always carries a wallet, the contents of which are known only to himself, so jealously does he guard it.

Our way lay through a mountain pass, where the river, which supplies a waterfall, forces its way to the lowlands, after crossing and recrossing the stream in many places, under the shade of a grove of acacias, whose delightful perfume embalmed the air. We approached the gorge of the mountain, and were sheltered from the sun by its precipitous sides, which towered hundreds of feet above us, barely leaving room for the torrent to flow through. I felt amazed at the brilliancy of the wild flowers, among which were many specimens of the Epidendrum nutans, some pendant from the forks of the trees like the parasite mistletoe, its thick spikes guarding the tree to which it clung for support; rose-coloured and purple flowers also, whose names I know not, shed their fragrance around. Further up the pass nature appeared in a sterner garb. Pent up within its narrow bed, the noisy stream bounded from rock to rock; how different from the sluggishness with which it terminated its boisterous career in the pool of the lowland, where the pernicious influence of the tropical sun renders it a Dead Sea in miniature! Over our heads stupendous masses of rocks seemed held together solely by ligatures of rope-like creepers, which wound their network round them. From every crevice, apparently even from the bare surface of the rock itself, burst forth thousands of shrubs and plants, the seeds of which, supplied by the prodigality of nature, are wafted from spot to spot by every breath of air. Overtook our party of explorers, interchanged greetings, fagged slowly on through the pass, congratulating ourselves on being sheltered from the sun's glare, and enjoying the various vistas which opened to us as we went along; while the grand luminary, gleaming on the mountains' summits seen at intervals, made the landscape, by contrast with the shade below, more interesting. The water-fall was pleasing. Having dismounted from our horses and mules, we all rambled and scrambled as much as the heat would permit. At this time I met a very annoying mishap. While I was carrying a lady's basket, filled with wild strawberries of the finest flavour, which I had culled for her—dear little Scotch lassie,—as a fit offering to a daughter of the land of mountain and flood, so famous for this fruit, as I was piloting the way before her in very slippery places, my evil genius tripped me. Fortunately, I had let go her hand before I fell: but alas! my fall was attended with a sad disaster: the stretching of my tight trowsers, as ill adapted to the Jamaica climate as is the European constitution, gave way. The anxiety of my fair companion to know if I were hurt furnished me with a hint to leave her to the escort of another gentleman, while I crept, pretending to be very lame, behind a shrub, where, pulling out a pocket handkerchief, I covered the breach and limped on; but that villain J—betrayed me, to the suppressed amusement of the ladies and the hearty merriment of the gentlemen. Feasted under the grateful shade of a Spanish chestnut,—lighted on our way home by myriads of fire-flies in the hedges.

Lay down to sleep, hot and jaded, at midnight;—drum beat at 2 A.M.—fire broken out at Kingston;—marched off with two companies to assist in getting it under; remained actively at work until nearly four A.M. when it was subdued;—damage considerable, notwithstanding our efforts; got into bed at four A.M. to rise at half-past five for parade!

Friday.—After little more than an hour's sleep, up again.—The Colonel harangued the men and read the articles of war—three more deaths! The General has ordered us to leave Up-Camp Fort and go to Fort Augusta, leaving this unhealthy station to the black regiments. 4 officers and 149 non-commissioned officers and privates dead!—Had a fine sight in Kingston of the pride and pomp of war—a grand muster of the militia in the Barrack Square,—band playing Rory O'More, men jostling each other most ludicrously, marching to the tune; some had uniforms, some had none—some wore caps, others hats, and six stands of arms was the whole of their armament. The officers mustered strong.—There was a Negro festival too,—a few petty cotton flags all the display made;—heard a preacher murder the English language in the market-place, while at a corner of the square some drunken Negroes were deafening the community (communication, his Reverence called it) with a tom-tom. Some handsome Jewesses, who like myself were drawn there by curiosity, had more attraction for me than the affair of the festival. During four mortal hours sat on a Court-martial to try delinquents; afterwards rode to Fort Augusta (seventeen miles off) by the Ferry road, to see if quarters were preparing for our detachment,—dined at the Ferry tavern on stewed eels and calipida,—passed for the twentieth time by the famous cocoa-tree whose shade people say covers an acre of ground. It is the fashion to call this road uninteresting, though the luxuriant vegetation on both sides, and groves of cocoa-nut-trees, give it an air of beauty in my opinion.

Though it was late when I reached Fort Augusta and completed my regimental duties there, I consented, as the night was fine, to pull out with some friends in a boat, who were engaged to sup with an extraordinary character in the mercantile navy, who invited them on board his brig. In the course of the evening he told us that four years ago he risked all his capital in a voyage to Africa, for slaves. His escapes from all our cruisers were marvellous. He came to Jamaica with his cargo of Africans, and sailed close to Port Royal. He reached Trinidad and Cuba, though an English frigate sailed almost in his wake, and a war schooner had sailed out the day previously, both of which had been for a month on the look-out for him, the appearance of his vessel and the object of his voyage having been made known to the Commodore at Port Royal, soon after he had sailed for Africa. He seemed quite excited as he described his escape. Had he been taken, he would have been poor for life. He concluded by saying that if England were to send a thousand cruisers to sea, there would still be a trade in slaves. Strange to say, his expression of countenance is benevolent, though he considers the slave-trade in no other light than that of legitimate traffic. Slept this night.

Saturday.—Having provided for my military duties at Fort Camp, I went in the early part of the morning, fishing—caught several mullet, a snook, and a shark, measuring five feet ten inches, and weighing forty-nine pounds. At one time, seeing a Negro apparently lifeless in his canoe at some distance, we pulled off to him. The lazy rascal had been dozing in the hot sunshine as he reclined luxuriously; his feet reposed on the gunwale, and to each great toe was fastened a line; when the baited hooks were caught by a fish, the jerk on his toe aroused him. Sometimes, no doubt, he was humbugged by a nibble. Amused, and yet angry with the fellow for having occasioned us a long and unnecessary row, we pulled ashore, but on landing, our canoe was capsized by the awkwardness of my companion, and all our fish went to the bottom. We were thoroughly drenched, and I had to dress in borrowed raiment; and having equipped and armed ourselves to the teeth, a party of us went off to hunt an alligator. The scene of our sport was a stagnant pool, fringed with mangoes. We embarked on it in a small boat, having for bait a young pig fastened to a double hook, chain and rope. Poor piggy, however, was carried to the bottom by the weight of his chain, and thus the chance of enticing our scaly foe was diminished. We then rigged a float, and making the end of the chain fast to it, and belaying the end of our line, left that part of the lagoon for another, where we had capital sport, shooting galdins, a kind of wader of black and white plumage, considered a delicacy for the table. As the alligator did not show, and we were obliged to go to a race that afternoon, we returned to the fort for an early dinner. The race was capital, and evening was far advanced when I mounted the roan again, and returned to Fort Camp with the agreeable prospect of leaving that pestiferous place finally on the Monday following.

A NAPOLEONIC PICTURE-GALLERY AT BOLOGNA.

THE following sketch of a "Napoleonic Picture-Gallery at Bologna," is from the pen of an accomplished German writer; and in addition to its own graphic merit, derives peculiar interest at the present moment from the description it contains of one of those family portraits in which the painter, by a happy instinct, seems to have foreshadowed at a very early period the future success of Louis Napoleon, at present the absolute ruler of the French Republic:—

Far from the busy market-place of Bologna, through long and silent streets, where only a few foot-passengers are seen walking along beneath the arcades of the houses, and where the young grass is springing up between the stones of the pavement, one enters upon an open square, ornamented in the mediæval style; and there presents itself to our view a palace, erected by the creative genius of Palladio. No restless fiery steeds, no busy retinue of servants, no sound of joyous life beneath the noble porticos,—upon the light and airy staircase,—within the splendid saloons!

At the porter's lodge we requested admission into the Palazzo Camerata, belonging to the Countess Camerata of Ancona, the daughter of Eliza Baciocchi, the niece of the Emperor. The grey-haired domestic led us up a flight of stairs, and opened the door of a princely saloon. It was five o'clock in the afternoon. The variegated light of a September setting sun fell in glowing rays through the lofty windows, whose curtains had been drawn back by our aged guide. A solemn stillness reigned throughout the apartment. We stood before the pictures and statues of the Napoleon family; like the Medici, a true race of kings. Here they are gathered together; and the whole poetry of their appearance, the marvellous uprising of their splendour from out of the wild chaos of the revolution, which the emperor, with Titania might, reduced into form and order, all penetrates the soul of the beholder, as he gazes around him in this apartment. On the wall at the left-hand side of the entrance, hangs a portrait of the Emperor in his coronation robes, resembling the portrait in the Dresden gallery, only that the head here is drawn with more spirit than it is there. The moment of the coronation is not, however, that in Napoleon's life which one desires most to see preserved, for it is not his greatest deed. He readily presents himself to our imagination as a young hero, mounted upon a fiery steed and climbing the Alps, while he points onwards with his uplifted sword to the path of undying fame. One beholds him in spirit, within the plague-hospital of Egypt, before the pyramids, at the bridge of Arcola, or in any of those places where he, a conquering genius, rushed onward in all the fiery confidence of victory, comet-like, throughout the world. One thinks upon him only as the born monarch, on whom Nature in her bounteous mood had conferred the diadem; not as the prince who receives his crown with solemn ceremonial, and surrounded by all that empty pomp which so often stamps a hollow grandeur upon official dignity.

On the right hand of the Emperor is seen Pauline Borghese, upon a crimson velvet seat of antique form, placed before a dark green velvet hanging. She bears a strong resemblance to the Emperor. Her white satin dress, embroidered with gold, is confined around the waist with a golden girdle. Her arms and bust are very beautiful. Beneath the diadem of the princess flows a long veil, and around her fair brow are waving locks of a dark glossy hue. From her full, drooping, almond-shaped eye, she looks forth languishingly upon the beholder, kindling and yet cold, as if she would command as well as beseech the homage of the heart, in the full consciousness that hers was a sovereign beauty. Upon the other side is Joseph, in the uniform of a French general. He is standing in the open air with a decree in his right hand.

Next to him is Caroline Bonaparte, the wife of Murat, who stands upon the terrace of a garden. She wears a flame-coloured robe over a white undergarment, a gold embroidered scarf, and scarlet flowers in her hair. She is less of a brunette than Pauline, looks much less oriental, and has far less physiognomy than her sister; a soft smooth skin, a very fresh complexion, with blue eyes and rich dark hair, the fitting queen of gay and life-loving Naples. Jerome is represented in white uniform with long military boots, leaning against a tree, beneath whose shadow sits his spouse, a Princess of Wirtemberg. She is very beautiful, and with her German physiognomy, looks like a stranger among all the Italian faces around her. This royal lady is very like Queen Louisa of Prussia. She wears a white satin dress, with pearl ornaments and scarlet roses beneath her veil. Jerome, the only one of Napoleon's family who has small, insignificant, contracted features, looks as if he were her attendant.

Louis Bonaparte holds his son,¹ whose age may be about twelve years, by the hand. He has a thorough Bonaparte countenance. He points with his left hand upwards to a rook which he is beginning to ascend, while he turns a fond gaze upon the boy, whom, with his right hand, he is drawing after him. Both are in military costume. The boy has a sort of Hussar dress, red trowsers, blue spencer, and holds in his hand the calpac with the heron's feather in it. Louis resembles the Emperor only in a few of his features, but the boy is altogether extremely like him.

(1) The President of the French Republic.

Then comes Letitia, in crimson gold-embroidered velvet, a diadem of brilliants upon her brow, a true Roman woman; the mother of a world-ruler. She has rich black hair, clear bright eyes, strongly defined features and form; in the lower part of the cheek may be observed that soft fulness which is so often seen among the older Italian women, but no traces of those minute wrinkles which are the silent tell-tales of declining years. Her whole countenance is frank, full and proud. Letitia is conscious of the strength of her own character. It seems natural to her that Napoleon, who was born of her blood, who first drew his breath from beneath her proud heart, should be the ruler of the world. It seems to her quite in the order of things that all her children should be kings, because she and Napoleon had imparted to them so many rays of their own light, that the planets shone as if they themselves were fixed stars. She has assuredly never thought within herself: "My son has heaped honours upon my head!" Letitia has never received a favour. She has born her son into the world, whose business therefore it is to thank her for this favour. She has given life to Napoleon; consequently he remains her debtor, even though he were to lay the sovereignty of the world at her feet. The expression of this peculiar, tranquil self-consciousness of supremacy, which confers upon itself the crown, pervades her whole aspect. A wonderful woman!

On the opposite wall hangs a large picture, descriptive of the Court of Lucca. Eliza Baciocchi, the Duchess of Lucca, is seated with her daughter on a throne-like seat. Her husband, in full uniform, stands on one side, contemplating Gerard and Canova, who are engaged in painting and modelling his wife and daughter. Gerard, in a black frock coat, wears the Order of the Legion of Honour. Young and pretty court ladies, young military men, diplomatists and artists, all of them portraits, fill up the sides and background. This picture is full of vivid and animated expression. All the faces and forms are youthfully fresh; there are no old, worn-out physiognomies—a true symbol of the age and race of Napoleon. They seem to reach onward into the spring-time of a new order of things, breathing a glowing life, bearing rich fruit of many a sort, and disappearing from the midst of us, without ever having faded away. Besides the well-known statue of the Emperor by David, and a lovely group by Canova,—Eliza with her infant daughters in her arms, who are clinging to their mother,—and a charming statuette of the same children by Bartolini, there are several busts in the collection, among which are the Emperor's sisters and wives; Murat, Hortense, and Eugene; not forgetting the Emperor's father, who is represented in the prime of life, and bears the aspect of a youthful Nero. I had, however, the conviction that this head was an ideal one, and placed there by way of completing the collection. It had only a typical, but no personal truth.

The sisters of Napoleon resemble him far more than do his brothers. Among the latter, Lucien is the most like him. He has a prominent nose and a good profile, and there is much manly beauty in the expression of his head. Jerome's features are, as has been already said, very insignificant; but as for the sisters, their heads are like those of finely chiselled antique statues.

Josephine is uncommonly lovely, without, however, any real beauty. A short, delicately formed nose, and the sweetest expression about her mouth and eyes. Hortense is almost German in her form, and has much more decision and seriousness of aspect than her mother. Eugene's bust conveys the same agreeable impression that one receives on meeting with a worthy good man. While gazing upon his noble features, his clear open brow and the calm bearing of his carriage, one exclaims involuntarily, "That was a noble man!" Murat presents a perfect contrast to him—the true model of a handsome but rude Italian peasant: thick curly hair, a full beard, a coarse, broad nose, a wide thick-lipped mouth, such as is not uncommon among the people at Naples. Murat might have made a good Massaniello, and so also might a hundred of the Neapolitan Marinari. Spirited, daring and imperious, indeed, but at the same time rude and commonplace in feature and aspect. Far other blood flows in his veins than in those of Napoleon's family. Even the distinguished appearance of Jerome's wife, the Princess of Wirtemberg, does not reach in some sort the noble expression conveyed to us by Letitia, Lucien and Napoleon. It is the inborn nobility of intelligence and genius, contrasted with that which has descended from a long line of distinguished ancestors, and which at its spring-head gushed from the same source,—the people.

Nearest to the door stands the bust of Maria Louisa. She is not worthy of a place in this apartment. All of those who are destined to live on here in their portraits, were great either through their own souls or at least through the love which they cherished alike in adversity as in success. Maria Louisa is the only traitress in this circle. I know nothing more unworthy than a woman, so placed that she must either prove an angel or a wretch, proving mean and unworthy of the lofty fate which had been assigned to her. To be worthy of the love of a Napoleon was no common vocation. When Napoleon married Maria Louisa, it was with the hope of obtaining an heir to his name and empire; and yet when informed by Corvisart that either the mother or the child must be sacrificed, he exclaimed, "Save the mother!" Surely, from that moment forward, he had the fullest claim upon his wife's devoted love; he, to whom an heir was everything, and a woman's love of so little value. Maria Louisa ought to have abandoned neither her husband nor her child in the hour of need. By the side of the dethroned Emperor, and with her son in her arms,—that was her fitting place; the barren rock of St. Helena, the loftiest throne she could have ascended, from whence her name would have gone down to futurity with imperishable glory, instead of sinking, as it has done, into forgetfulness and contempt.

I did not perceive any picture of the Duke of Reichstadt in this collection.

GLENGARIFF.

No one who sees the engraving from Mr. Creswick's picture of Glengarriff, and is ignorant of the locality, but would suppose the place thus represented to be situated in some far inland territory, almost inaccessible by the feet of the adventurous traveller. How nobly those lofty and rugged hills sweep down to the bosom of the water; and how calm is the surface of the latter, as if the winds of heaven never dared to visit it too roughly! The little castle that crowns that low jutting-out promontory covered with thick masses of foliage, seems rather the abode of the genius of the place than the dwelling of common humanity, while the white sails of those distant pleasure-boats suggest the idea of—

"Spectres that haunt our midnight dreams."

And though the artist has thought fit to connect the place with the living world by the introduction of a group of modern mortals into the foreground of the picture, it seems clear they have only come thither as wanderers passing on to some city of habitation.

Yet Glengarriff is neither out of humanity's reach nor altogether untenanted. On the southernmost part of Ireland, in the county of Cork, where the coast is broken up into numerous long slips or promontories, stretching miles in length out into the Irish channel, and guarded by a multitude of small islands, will be found this truly romantic spot, one of the loveliest which even this beautiful country can offer to the eye. It lies not very far from Bantry Bay, made memorable in the Revolutionary war at the close of the last century, from the threatened invasion of a considerable body of French troops to assist the "United Irishmen," a society whose object was to throw off their allegiance to the British crown. The attempt, however, failed, chiefly owing to the destruction of many of the foreign vessels in a gale of wind, and the loss of large bodies of their troops by the same disaster: notwithstanding all the efforts made by the survivors, the French forces could not succeed in effecting a landing.

Glengarriff, literally the "Rough Glen," is a deep alpine valley about three miles in length, and seldom exceeding a quarter of a mile in breadth, enclosed by precipitous hills. The traveller who wanders through this magnificent valley, encounters majestic trees, oddly-shaped rocks, and gurgling rivulets, the latter every now and then rushing by huge masses of stone, which divide them into a number of silvery threads, as it were, till they meet again in a broader channel, and push onwards till lost in the blue Atlantic. The mountains are of all heights, forms, and varieties of outline. The most prominent among them being the "Sugar-loaf," Steve-na-goil, "the mountain of the wild people," with its conical head soaring into the clouds; and at a considerable distance in the rear of this, is "Hungry Hill," naked and barren, down which runs a stream from the lake upon its summit. This stream, gathering from other sources as it sweeps down the long declivity, breaks at last into a tremendous cataract, eight hundred feet in depth, expanding in its fall, and flinging from its broad sides a spray that seems to enwrap a large portion of the hill with its thick white mists.

From whatever point the eye traverses the glen, it is sure to discern some picturesque and attractive scene; the best view, however, is to be obtained from a comparatively low hill in the immediate vicinity of a chapel that lies to the west of the small village of Glengarriff. But it is from the road to Kennmare that the exceeding loveliness of the valley, and the full glory of the bay, with its numerous islands beyond it, will be most advantageously seen. For three or four miles the way winds round the side of a mountain, dull and altogether void of interest; suddenly the traveller finds himself on the brow of the hill, and then he sees that he is over the glen, some thousand feet above the ocean stretching out far away into space, with the islands on the coast looking mere spots upon the bosom of the waters. The river running through the valley has dwindled into a narrow white line, the trees have assumed broad indefinite masses of dark foliage, and the height on which he stood an hour or two ago has become scarcely larger than an ant-hillock. Midway down are a few scattered cottages, scarcely distinguishable but for the smoke that creeps lazily from them. The silence and solitude of the scene are almost appalling, for there is no song of the mountain-bird to break the hush of nature, unless the scream may be so designated.

"Of the wild eagle from its eyry gazing,"

With what varied feelings does the mind of the thinking man contemplate the union of beauty and sublimity in creation! Its grandeur and loveliness inspire him with admiration and gratitude for such glorious gifts; but with these thoughts come the recollection of his own insignificance, the workings of his restless and ever-dissatisfied spirit, the craving after other incentives to enjoyment, and, more than all, the evil that lies within and around him, chastening and subduing all that should make life happy. Nowhere does this last feeling rise up with such overwhelming power to crush every felicitous emotion as when one stands amid some of the magnificent scenery of Ireland.

THE SCENERY OF AMERICA.

NOTWITHSTANDING that steam, the comparative annihilator of time and space, offers every inducement and facility for travellers to explore other regions than those usually selected by Europeans in general, but especially by Englishmen, America has not yet become a favourite resort with us. A month or so consumed in going thither and returning is a long time for one to be so occupied who can perhaps afford but a very few weeks during the year away from his profession or his business; and even when a man has little else to do but play the idler and "take his ease at his inn," a voyage across the blue waters of the Atlantic, with its disquietudes and possible dangers, is sufficient to deter him from attempting the passage: the remark applies generally, yet there are some exceptions, from whom, as well as from American writers themselves, we have learned all that we know of the physical and geographical phenomena of the country, and of the rapid strides it is making in the great march of human civilization.

And how vast and wonderful has her march been!—how almost instantaneous, as if touched by a magician's wand, has been her transformation from a wilderness to a fruitful field! It is but yesterday, measuring time from the first dawns of creation, that her mountains were solitary places, her interminable forests echoed only the roar of savage beasts and the more welcome sound of singing birds, and her plains were trodden by the foot of the wild red man: her rivers flowed on, century after century, yet conveyed to the inhabitants of the western world no tidings that there existed another hemisphere, richer in natural wealth, and scarcely less extensive than their own. How startling, then, must have been the intelligence that reached Europe of the discovery of America! It would almost seem as if this continent had been purposely intended by Providence to remain hidden till the necessities of the Old World required a new and a wider field for the operations of the great family of mankind, which had grown too large for the restless and expansive spirit of its various members. There then was "ample room, and verge enough," for it to expatiate; a prize for the ambitious, a path for the gold-lover to wander in, a theme for the speculations of the philosopher, and a page, fresh from the hands of its Divine Author, for him who seeks after knowledge. And thither each and all of these respective classes hastened in process of time, many of them bringing back, like the spies sent out into Canaan, "goodly fruits of the land," as incentives to future adventurers; others remained there to possess themselves of its treasures, and abiding by them, handed down the inheritance to their children's children.

Whatever disinclination an Englishman may feel towards the political institutions and some of the habits and customs of the Americans, he must glory in having given to them a language, thoughts, and aspirations, akin to his own. The blood of the Saxon circulates almost wherever human foot has trodden; his voice is heard giving laws and inculcating religion over vast tracts of the inhabited earth; and from his loins are springing up great and powerful nations, destined hereafter to hold the reins of unbounded empire, when those now existing shall be known only through their past histories. With all their nationality, the Americans feel, and are justly proud of this. They look back and associate themselves with the glories England has won in art, science, literature, and philanthropy; and they look forward to what our and their own future success may be in the promotion of universal happiness. Our task now, however, refers less to the social condition of the western hemisphere, than to its present aspect, as built by the great Architect of the universe, and as the transforming hand of man has made it.

The book of nature is a volume none can profitably study who have not feelings in harmony with the subject; the faculty of perception and the sense of enjoyment are essential to a full comprehension of its beauties. Education of the mind and of the heart, if not of the vision, is also necessary to a right understanding of what it places before us. The peasant returning homewards from his daily toil, may, not unreasonably, fancy he "Sees God in clouds, and hears Him in the wind;"

for the whispers of the one and the far-off beauty of the other are audible and thought-giving things, capable of making themselves heard and felt. But his mind has not been tutored to linger over the less exciting objects of creation: the seasons roll on unnoticed, except as they vary his round of occupation; his eye wanders over the broad expanse of meadow, yet he sees not how one blade of grass differs from another blade in symmetry of form and in delicacy of texture; he looks upon the woods skirting the yellow cornfields, whose ripe sheaves are gathered beneath his sickle, but his soul cannot penetrate into their recesses and draw forth happiness from their shadowy depths; nor does the gurgling of the brook, over which he treads on that solitary plank, allure him to contemplation by the ripple of its shallow waters. Mind and feeling must be brought to bear upon the visible works of the Deity, ere that voice can be understood which speaks of their grandeur and their glory. Burns listened to it when he "followed the plough upon the mountain side," and Bloomfield, as he kept watch o'er the sheep-fold, and they answered it in their songs of joy; ay, and hundreds beside these, to whom the gift of words has not been afforded, echo in the silence of the heart the music of their minstrelsy. There is a natural science which neither schools nor systems can teach, but the number is small to whom it is revealed.

All great minds untainted by the world's ambition have revelled in the charms and majesty of nature; while even they whose very names were watchwords of terror to their fellow-men, have been awed into a spirit of meekness by the overwhelming power of the physical universe; and others engrossed,

(1) "The Home Book of the Picturesque." Published by G. F. Putnam, New York.

"From morn to eve, from eve to dewy morn,"

by the din and turmoil of life, not unfrequently rejoice to exchange its pomps and its frettings for the haunts of the turtle-dove, not as dull anchorites, disgusted with the world's follies, but as living men, who would, for a time, hold other and more holy communion. It is a privilege allowed by God to man, when he is permitted to escape from the burdens that weigh down both mind and body, into the sanctuary erected by the hands of Deity himself. "Nature," says Sydney Smith, "speaks to the mind of man immediately in beautiful and sublime language; she astonishes him with magnitude, appals him with darkness, cheers him with splendour, soothes him with harmony, captivates him with emotion, enchants him with fame; she never intended man should walk among her flowers, and her fields, and along her streams unmoved; nor did she rear the strength of her hills in vain, or mean that we should look with a stupid heart on the wild glory of the torrent, bursting from the darkness of the forest, and dashing over the crumbling rock. I would as soon deny hardness, or softness, or figure, to be qualities of matter, as I would deny beauty or sublimity to belong to its qualities." It is the triumph of matter over mind, when the beauty or the sublimity of nature brings our wayward thoughts into subjection.

Pictures are mute teachers, and however great has been the skill of the artist in portraying the varied scenery of the universe, we feel that his works are, after all, nought but painted deceptions; while the world around is a living eloquent reality. We weary of the former; for if it represent a noonday scene, one would not always dwell in perpetual sunshine; and if the locality be pictured in the soft rays of twilight, we long to see it in the brightness of day. But the landscape over which the clouds roll with ever varied motion, changing form and colour with each breath that blows,—alternating light and shadow as they move onward,—never tires, simply because it is always new, always infinite in its peculiarities. The superiority of nature over art, as a source of mental pleasure and profit, cannot be questioned; but we welcome the latter with gladness, when the former is beyond our reach; and thus the elegant volume which has given rise to the foregoing observations comes, with its delicately executed vignettes of American scenery, a most agreeable and pleasant visitor from the distant continent to our sea-girt isle.

In an introductory essay to the book entitled "Scenery and Mind," written by E. L. Magoon with much descriptive power and philosophical reflection, we find the following remarks on the effects which striking scenery produces on the mind.

"We proceed to show that, in the physical universe, what is most abundant, is most ennobling—what is most exalted, is most influential on the best minds; and that, for these reasons, national intellect receives a prevailing tone from the peculiar scenery that most abounds.

"First, in the kingdoms of matter around us, what is most abundant in amount, is most ennobling in use. The mighty magician, Nature, produces the greatest variety of striking effects with the fewest means. There is only a sun, soil, rocks, trees, flowers, water, and an observing soul. Every thing in use depends upon this last, whether to the contemplator 'love lends a precious seeing to the eye.' Deep in the concave of heaven is the luminary revealing all; and deep in the soul of the illumined is a chord tenderly vibrating to the charms of all. The voices of every order of moving things, the silvery tones of flowing streams, the trembling tongues of leaves, the inarticulate melody of flowers, the vibrations of mighty hills, and the dread music of the spheres, all sublunary blending with all celestial notes, are not for a moment lost to the heart that listens. The harp of Memnon is not fabulous, properly interpreted. The devout lover of nature, seated on the mountain, or by the ocean, bathed in the golden sheen of opening day, will have his soul often stirred by melody divine as ever resounded from the mysterious harmonicon by the waters of the Nile.

"Every rational inhabitant of earth is a focal point in the universe, a profoundly deep centre around which everything beautiful and sublime is arranged, and towards which, through the exercise of admiration, every refining influence is drawn. Wonderful, indeed, is the radiant thread that runs through every realm of outward creation, and enlinks all their diversified influences with the innermost fibres of the soul. This is the vital nerve by virtue of which the individual is related to the universe, and the universe is equally related to the individual. Through this, all physical powers combine to relieve spiritual wants. Earth contributes her fulness of wealth and majesty; air ministers in all the Protean aspects of beauty and sublimity; fire, permeating everything graceful and fair, gleams before the scrutinizing eye with a light more vivid than the lightning's blaze; and water is not only 'queen of a thousand rills that fall in silver from the dewy stone,' diffusing a 'dulcet and harmonious breath' from the most sylvan haunts of man to his most crowded home; but from continent to continent 'pours the deep, eternal bass of nature's anthem, making music such as charms the ear of God.'"

We must, however, record our dissent from the concluding observation in this extract, which, as it is placed between inverted commas, we presume not to be Mr. Magoon's; for, not even allowing the licence of poetical allusion, can we admit that any "music" swelling upwards from earth,

"Save the soft notes of charity and love," can "charm the ear of God." It might have done so when the universe stood in its purity as He first created it; but the primeval curse is yet upon the ground, and its echoes are slung back from hill and torrent, telling of man's disobedience and his fall.

The magnificence of Nature! How truly does this term apply to the scenery of America! We speak of the picturesque beauty of our own favoured land; of the elegance, if such an expression may be permitted, of classic Italy and Greece; of the Alpine grandeur of Switzerland, and of the savage gloominess of the North: but in America all is grand, colossal, and sublime. It would seem that since the first dawning of time her rivers had not ceased to widen their banks, and her mountains to grow, and the trees of her forests to rise higher and higher; in no other country are we so awed into reverence by the majesty of terrestrial objects—not grouped pictorially, as they are throughout Europe, but isolated and wild in their patriarchal solitudes. Yet, inasmuch as civilized man requires for his true enjoyment something that will remind him when he roams, that he is not quite out of the reach of humanity, so he will feel less pleasure in the contemplation of the glorious images spread out before him in the prairie and the wilderness, than in the more restricted landscapes surrounding him at home. It is the vastness of American scenery that astonishes an Englishman especially; it strikes sensibly but unsatisfactorily, for there is a limit to human vision, beyond which neither eye nor thought can penetrate with any degree of certainty. But more than all, perhaps, is the absence of those ancient edifices, which speak of the past history of mankind, and are associated with so many proud and interesting recollections;—the ruined castles, the venerable abbeys, the fine old baronial mansions embosomed in verdant woods, or seated beside clear and rapid streams, or standing in ancestral parks, amid the shadow of whose trees whole generations of noble and powerful families have lived and died: Nowhere do such objects appeal so strongly as in our own land; and they are scarcely less influential on the mind of the foreign visitor who finds his way to Ragland, Chepstow, and Kenilworth, Tintern or Kirkstall, Crewe-Hall and Knole.

Walter Scott and Fenimore Cooper are the two greatest descriptive painters of their respective countries; each of them has written like a poet, and immortalized the scenery of his native land. In the volume now lying before us the latter writer makes some very truthful remarks on the comparative beauties of Europe and America. We place our own quarter of the earth first, only because it is regarded as the "mother" of the other, and as such is entitled to precedence. After expatiating upon the rich "bits" of landscape that greet the eye of the traveller on all sides throughout the more picturesque parts of populated Europe;—the graceful winding curvatures of the old highways, the acclivities and declivities, the copses, meadows and woods, the half-hidden church, nestling among the leaves of its elms and yews, the neat and secluded hamlet, the farm-house, with all its comforts and sober arrangements; he goes on to say:—

"The Old World enjoys an advantage as regards the picturesque and pleasing, in connexion with its towns, that is wholly unknown, unless it may be in the way of exception, among ourselves. The necessity, in the middle ages, of building for defence, and the want of artillery before the invention of gunpowder, contributed to the construction of military works for the protection of the towns of Europe, that still remain, owing to their durable materials, often producing some of the finest effects that the imagination could invent to embellish a picture. Nothing of the sort, of course, is to be met with here, for we have no castles, have never felt the necessity of fortified towns, and had no existence at the period when works of this nature came within the ordinary appliances of society. On the contrary, the utilitarian spirit of the day labours to erase every inequality from the surface of the American town, substituting convenience for appearance. It is probable there is no one who, in the end, would not give a preference to these new improvements for a permanent residence; but it is not to be denied that, so far as the landscape is concerned, the customs of the middle ages constructed much the most picturesque and striking collections of human habitations. Indeed, it is scarcely possible for the mind to conceive of objects of this nature, that are thrown together with finer effects, than are to be met with among the mountainous regions, in particular, of Europe. We illustrate one or two that are to be met with in the Apennines, and the Alps, and even in Germany, as proofs of what we say. The eye, of itself, will teach the reader that Richmond and Boston, and Washington and Baltimore, and half-a-dozen other American towns that do possess more or less of an unequal surface, must yield the palm to those gloriously beautiful objects of the Old World. When it is remembered, too, how much time has multiplied these last, it can be seen that there are large districts in the mountain regions of the other hemisphere that enjoy this superiority over us, if superiority it can be called, to possess the picturesque at the expense of the convenient. The imagination can scarcely equal the pictures of this nature that often meet the eye in the southern countries of Europe. Villages, with the chiselled outlines of castles, grey, sombre, but distinct, are often seen perched on the summits of rocky heights, or adhering, as it might be, to their sides, in situations that are frequently even appalling, and which invariably lend a character of peculiar beauty to the view. There are parts of Europe in which the traveller encounters these objects in great numbers, and if an American, they never fail to attract his attention, as the wigwam and the bark canoe, and the prairie with lines of bison, would catch the eye of a wayfarer from the Old World. To these humbler mountain pictures must be added many a castle and stronghold of royal or semi-royal origin, that are met with on the summits of abrupt and rocky eminences further north. Germany has many of these strongholds, which are kept up to the present day, and which are found to be useful as places of security, as they are certainly peculiar and interesting in the landscape."

But it is time our attention was directed to some of the exquisite little plates that embellish Mr. Putnam's book, and we open it on a charming rural sketch made by Huntington, near the village of Rondout, not far from the mighty Hudson, and about ninety miles from New York. The view represents one of the tributary streams of the mighty river flowing between low banks; in its waters are reflected the scarlet leaves of the maple, the silvery lining of the willow, the vivid emerald of the oak, the white blossom of the locust-tree, the orange-berries of the ash, and the deep dark green of a few pines whose heads have been lopped by the storms of many winters. In the centre of the mass of foliage stands a tiny cottage, with the smoke from its low chimney curling up amid the umbrageous shadows of the trees; a group of cattle are quenching their thirst in the water that flows amid large stones into the foreground of the composition, and a flock of water-fowl rests on its surface. It is a picture our own Creswick or Lee might have painted.

The neighbourhood of the Catskill Mountains seems to be a favourite place of resort with the artists of America: a view of a scene in their vicinity, from the pencil of J. F. Kennedy, introduces us to one of the numerous cascades which form so prominent and picturesque a feature in the scenery of the country. The peculiarities of this portion of America, and its effect upon the mind of Washington Irving, when a boy, are graphically described by him in the volume before us.

"The Catskills form an advanced post, or lateral spur, of the great Alleghanian or Appalachian system of mountains which sweeps through the interior of our continent, from South-west to North-east, from Alabama to the extremity of Maine, for nearly fourteen hundred miles, belting the whole of our original confederacy, and rivalling our great system of lakes in extent and grandeur. Its vast ramifications comprise a number of parallel chains and lateral groups; such as the Cumberland Mountains, the Blue Ridge, the Alleghanies, the Delaware and Lehigh, the Highlands of the Hudson, the Green Mountains of Vermont, and the White Mountains of New Hampshire. In many of these vast ranges or sierras, nature still reigns in indomitable wildness; their rocky ridges, their rugged clefts and defiles, team with magnificent vegetation. Here are locked up mighty forests that have never been invaded by the axe; deep umbrageous valleys where the virgin soil has never been outraged by the plough; bright streams flowing in untasked idleness, unburthened by commerce, unchecked by the mill-dam. This mountain zone is in fact the great poetical region of our country; revisiting, like the tribes which once inhabited it, the taming hand of cultivation, and maintaining a hallowed ground for fancy and the muses. It is a magnificent and all-pervading feature that might have given our country a name, and a poetical one, had not the all-controlling powers of common-place determined otherwise.

"The Catskill Mountains, as I have observed, maintain all the internal wildness of the labyrinth of mountains with which they are connected. Their detached position, overlooking a wide lowland region, with the majestic Hudson rolling through it, has given them a distinct character, and rendered them at all times a rallying point for romance and fable. Much of the fanciful associations with which they have been clothed may be owing to their being peculiarly subject to those beautiful atmospheric effects which constitute one of the great charms of Hudson River scenery. To me they have ever been the fairy region of the Hudson. I speak, however, from early impressions, made in the happy days of boyhood, when all the world had a tinge of fairy land. I shall never forget my first view of those mountains. It was in the course of a voyage up the Hudson in the good old times before steamboats and railroads had driven all poetry and romance out of travel. A voyage up the Hudson in those days was equal to a voyage to Europe at present, and cost almost as much time: but we enjoyed the river then; we relished it as we did our wine, sip by sip, not, as at present, gulping all down at a draught without tasting it. My whole voyage up the Hudson was full of wonder and romance. I was a lively boy, somewhat imaginative, of easy faith, and prone to relish everything which partook of the marvellous. Among the passengers on board of the sloop was a veteran Indian trader, on his way to the lakes to traffic with the natives. He had discovered my propensity, and amused himself throughout the voyage by telling me Indian legends and grotesque stories about every noted place on the river, such as Spuyten Devil Creek, the Tappan Sea, the Devil's Dans-Kammer, and other hobgoblin places. The Catskill Mountains especially called forth a host of fanciful traditions. We were all day slowly tiding along in sight of them, so that he had full time to weave his whimsical narratives. In these mountains he told me, according to Indian belief, was kept the great treasury of storm and sunshine for the region of the Hudson. An old squaw spirit had charge of it, who dwelt on the highest peak of the mountain. Here she kept Day and Night shut up in her wigwam, letting out only one of them at a time. She made new moons every month, and hung them up in the sky, cutting up the old ones into stars. The great Manitou, or master spirit, employing her to manufacture clouds; sometimes she wove them out of cobwebs, gossamers, and morning dew, and sent them off flake after flake, to float in the air and give light summer showers—sometimes she would brew up black thunder-storms, and send down drenching rains, to swell the streams and sweep everything away. He had many stories, also, about mischievous spirits who infested the mountains in the shape of animals, and played all kinds of pranks upon Indian hunters, decoying them into quagmires and morasses, or to the brink of torrents and precipices. All these were doled out to me as I lay on the deck throughout a long summer's day, gazing upon these mountains, the ever-changing shapes and hues of which appeared to realize the magical influences in question—sometimes they seemed to approach; at others to recede; during the heat of the day, they almost melted into a sultry haze; as the day declined, they deepened in tone; their summits were brightened by the last rays of the sun, and later in the evening their whole outline was printed in deep purple against an amber sky. As I beheld them thus continually shifting before my eye, and listened to the marvellous legends of the trader, a host of fanciful notions concerning them was conjured into my brain, which have haunted it ever since."

A picture by the President of the New York Academy of Arts places before us a noble specimen of these Catskill Mountains, and another, by T. A. Richards, delineates a noble group of the same range beside Coweta Creek, in North Carolina. We could linger over these scenes, for we love the mountains, and could write a homily about the "everlasting hills," up which the thoughts climb as if they would penetrate the clouds that settle on their summits. We would speak of Ararat, rearing its lofty head amid the waste of waters when the dove brought back the olive-branch to the ark; of Sinai, terrible with the thunders and lightning of Divine power; of Nebo, on whose summit Moses saw the "goodly land" he was forbidden to enter—and died; of Carmel, whose mysterious fire consumed the sacrifice of Elijah; of Lebanon, with its giant cedars; and of Olivet, that witnessed more than human agony; besides the long list of those made memorable by other facts than sacred history narrates, where patriotic heroism triumphed over tyranny, and religious faith fled before persecution. But instead of giving the reader our own ideas of the thoughts that rise within us in the contemplation of such material phenomena, we prefer extracting the description of a Transatlantic autumn, written with much elegance by an American lady, Miss Cooper, to elucidate one of the pictures we have just referred to.

"There is always something of uncertainty, of caprice, if you will, connected with our American autumn, which fixes the attention anew, every succeeding year, and adds to the fanciful character of the season. The beauty of spring is of a more assured nature; the same tints rise year after year in her verdure and in her blossoms; but autumn is what our friends in France call 'une beauté journalière,' variable, changeable, not alike twice in succession, gay and brilliant yesterday, more languid and pale to-day. The hill-sides, the different groves, the single trees, vary from year to year under the combined influences of clouds and sunshine, the soft haze, or the clear frost: the maple or oak, which last October was glorious crimson, may choose this season to wear the golden tint of the chestnut, or the pale yellow of duller trees; the ash, which was straw-colour, may become dark purple. One never knows beforehand exactly what to expect; there is always some variation, occasionally a strange contrast. It is like awaiting the sunset of a brilliant day; we feel confident that the evening sky will be beautiful; but what gorgeous clouds or what pearly stars appear to delight the eye, no one can foretell.

"It was a soft evening, early in October. The distant hills, with their rounded, dome-like heights, rising in every direction, had assumed on the surface of their crowning woods a rich tint of bronze, as though the swelling summits, gleaming in the sunlight, were wrought in fretted ornaments of that metal. Here and there a scarlet maple stood in full coloured beauty, amid surrounding groves of green. A group of young oaks close at hand had also felt the influence of the frosty autumnal dews; their foliage, generally, was a lively green, worthy of June, wholly unlike decay, and yet each tree was touched here and there with vivid snatches of the brightest red; the smaller twigs close to the trunk forming brilliant crimson tufts, like knots of ribbon. One might have fancied them a band of young knights, wearing their ladies' colours over their hearts. A pretty flowering dogwood close at hand, with delicate shaft and airy branches, flushed with its own peculiar tint of richest lake, was perchance the lady of the grove, the beauty whose colours were fluttering on the breasts of the knightly oaks on either side. The tiny seedling maples, with their delicate leaflets, were also in colour, in choice shades of scarlet, crimson, and pink, like a new race of flowers blooming about the roots of the autumnal forest.

"We were sitting upon the trunk of a fallen pine, near a projecting cliff which overlooked the country for some fifteen miles or more; the lake, the rural town, and the farms in the valley beyond, lying at our feet like a beautiful map. A noisy flock of blue jays were chattering among the oaks whose branches overshadowed our seat, and a busy squirrel was dropping his winter store of chestnuts from another tree close at hand. A gentle breeze from the south came rustling through the coloured woods, and already there was an autumnal sound in their murmurs. There is a difference in the music of the woods as the seasons change. In winter, when the waving limbs are bare, there is more of unity in the deep wail of the winds as they sweep through the forests; in summer, the rustling foliage gives some higher and more cheerful notes to the general harmony; and there is also a change of key from the softer murmurs of the fresh foliage of early summer to the sharp tones of the dry and withering leaves in October."

But there is a gem of an engraving, after a picture by R. W. Weir, that instinctively brings us back to the "old country." That church with its low, square tower, its long sloping roofs, and its ivied walls, must have been transported to the west banks of the Hudson, from one of the southern counties of England: it stands upon rising ground that descends gently into a green, narrow valley studded with oaks, elms, and other stately trees, mingled with shrubs, and in which flocks of sheep are quietly grazing; at the back is a range of lofty bold hills, looking barren and bleak. We can fancy we are listening to the sound of the bells chiming along the valley, as we used to hear it, on some calm Sabbath morning, carried down the stream hard by the home of our boyhood, and gathering into the house of prayer rich and poor, the unlettered and the man of understanding. The scene is one that might dictate an "elegy" to another Gray, so beautiful is it, so unostentatious, so suggestive. The church in question is the "Church of the Holy Innocents," situated, as before remarked, on the west bank of the Hudson, about a mile south of the Military Academy at West Point; it is somewhat more than a century old. There is an affecting incident related of the building of this edifice.

"While two or three persons at West Point were contemplating a plan for the erection of a church, somewhere near the spot on which the one in question now stands, for the benefit of the neighbouring population, and as a centre of missionary operations in the surrounding country, embracing a large section of the Highlands, one of their number—Prof. R. W. Weir—moved by an afflative dispensation of God's providence, in the death of a child, made an offering of that child's portion to God, as the beginning of a fund for the building of a church, to be called 'The Church of the Holy Innocents.' He subsequently added to this sum other offerings of his own, and of a few other persons at West Point and elsewhere, who felt an interest in the undertaking. The simple, but chaste and beautiful sanctuary, erected to 'the honour and glory of God,' is the fruit of these offerings."

"The whole interior, marked by unity of design, by perfect simplicity, and by a quiet solemnity, cannot fail to shed its hallowing, subduing influence over the soul of every worshipper who enters there, in sincerity and truth, to worship God; while the exterior of the sacred temple, with its grey, unheaven walls, its very irregular outline, its simple rural aspect, harmonizes most strikingly with the rough, wild mountain scenery in the midst of which it seems to have sprung up, itself a work of nature. And its tower, pointing heavenward, its cruciform outline, its cross-crowned peak, tell unmistakably its holy character, and serve to remind all who enter or behold it both of the end and of the faith to which God is calling them."

Our time precludes us from extending our tour with the artists and authors of the "Home Book of the Picturesque," willing as we are to prolong such pleasant, variable, and instructive company: we would gladly sail with them up some of those noble rivers and broad lakes they have sketched and talked about, and to which we have scarcely made reference; and we should also like to tell something more of those wild legends and historical facts, associated with the places here portrayed; but we have space for neither.

The traveller visits the East that he may linger over the scenes of sacred and classic history; he would see all that is left of Thebes and Nineveh, the sites of Babylon and Palmyra, the relics of Athenian grandeur, still beautiful in their decay, and of ancient Jerusalem, "trodden of the Gentiles." He traverses northern Europe, where the tower and castle carry him back to feudal times. He crosses the Alps and stands amid the broken tombs and dilapidated aqueducts of the Roman Campagna, or before the art-treasures of Naples and Florence: all these are the pride of nations that have gone or are passing away. But he crosses the Atlantic only to find himself in a new world—new in its physical appearance, new in its ideas and institutions, young and vigorous in energy and action. What its hereafter destiny may be, none can tell; that America will play no laggard's part in the future history of the world, it were unreasonable to doubt, when her broad valleys shall be filled with a numerous and intellectual peasantry, and the banks of her majestic rivers lined still more than now with thriving towns and cities. And although power and nobility of character are not always linked together, we may affirm, remembering from whose loins her people have sprung, and that the elements of true greatness have grown with her growth, that those gifts of intelligence and of natural advantages which have been lavishly bestowed upon her, will be used generously and wisely for the good of others.

SHORT NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Two Families. By the Author of Rose Douglas. 2 vols. Smith, Elder & Co: Cornhill.

THE story of this simple, but powerful tale, is an illustration of the motto which is stamped upon the title-page—"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

The incidents flow, rather than arise, one from out the other; the origin of the hero of the first "family" is well conceived—working his way, stealthily and steadily, with a very, very little leaven, to leaven the selfishness and cunning which is part and parcel of himself, and yet cherishing one humanizing influence in his heart. The author reads human nature keenly, and correctly, and with a kindly spirit; sorry for his flaws, its mistakes, its corruptions; while for the sake of that truth she (?) never violates, tracing them with unerring fidelity; but her heart expands, and her style improves, when she displays the workings, the strength, the truth, the purity, of the Christian struggling with adversity and sorrow, and triumphing in the end—as only Christians can triumph.

The author's great forte lies in the delineation of character, and a power in scenic description we have rarely, if ever, known surpassed; there are many pages which are as fine highland landscapes as Creswick or Landseer could place upon their canvas. We never unravel a plot in a review, (though, indeed, there is, properly speaking, no plot in this tale of contrast;) if it destroys the interest we hope our readers would feel in its perusal; but we regret, in this instance, that we have no room for extracts. The heroine of the second "family" is as pure from world-stain as the hero of the first is marred by the desire for accumulating whatever gives influence or its semblance; and the development of the characters which dwell among those everlasting heath-clad hills, is truly artistic; but the volumes have the highest claim on the gratitude of the mothers of the rising generation. The lesson on the importance of "training a child in the way he should go" is most wisely and beautifully developed, and the death-bed of the pampered daughter of wealth and indulgence is as real as anything that we know of in the world of fiction; it is a fearful showing of a great truth, and mothers should take it to heart.

We cannot close this too brief notice of "The Two Families" without directing attention to one other scene, of a very different nature—a vigil, kept among the heath-clad mountains of the Scottish highlands, by a wife beside the body of a beloved husband, who has been killed by the accidental discharge of his fowling-piece, and whom, guided by his dog, she has found, far—far away from any habitation. The scene is depicted with the strength and tenderness of a master-hand, and is deeply pathetic without one extravagant word or overstrained sentence.

Home and its Pleasures. Simple Stories for Young People. By MRS. HARRIETTE MYRTLE. With eight Illustrations, by HABIOT K. BROWNE.

The Village Queen. By THOMAS MILLER.

Child's Play. With Seventeen Drawings, by E. V. B. Addey & Co. 21, Old Bond Street.

WE hope in a little time to organize a system of brief yet comprehensive reviewing, which will be acceptable to our readers. We have looked out from Mr. Addey's beautifully illustrated publications three of different styles and degrees of merit.

HOME AND ITS PLEASURES consists of simple stories for the young, the very young, by a very good friend to children—Mrs. Harriette Myrtle; the illustrations are printed in colours—and those who remember the illustrations to the books of our youth, will be more disposed to admire the taste and beauty which distinguished Mr. Candell's "getting up" of the "picture books" he produced.

Mr. Addey is following his example with spirit and success. We are disposed to play the censor with "children's books," for we know their importance, and their influence on the ductile minds of the young; and we also know the advantage arising from correct forms, and forms of beauty, being placed before children. This pretty and pleasant book is quite a nursery treasure.

THE VILLAGE QUEEN, is a pastoral story by Thomas Miller, another established favourite, and one whom it is pleasant to meet in the green lanes or green fields he loves so well. This volume is worthy a place in every drawing-room: for in addition to its simple unaffected tale, it is richly adorned by water-coloured drawings by Edward Wehnert, John Absolon, William Lee, and Harrison Weir. Mr. Miller relates the criticism of a pretty gipsy girl who, upon being shown an engraving, said it was all wrong, because "the trees were black instead of green." Certainly, sunshine is upon the illustrations of this brilliant volume—sunshine enough to satisfy the gipsy girl; and the cattle by Harrison Weir are almost worth the price of the volume.

CHILD'S PLAY, is another exquisite drawing-room book, of which we could say much, had we space.

BLIND ROSA.

BY HENRIK CONSCIENCE.

(TRANSLATED BY MRS. HOWITT.)

On a splendid summer day in 1846 the diligence was rolling along the great highway from Antwerp to Turnhout at the regular hour. The horses trotted, the wheels rattled, the carriage creaked, the driver clucked incessantly with his tongue in order to quicken the speed of his cattle, dogs barked in the distance, birds soared up from the fields high into the air, the shadow sped alongside of the diligence, and danced along with its peculiar motion amongst the trees and bushes.

Suddenly the conductor pulled up not far from a solitary inn. He leaped down from his seat, opened the door of the diligence without saying a word, slapped down the step, and put out his hand to a traveller, who with a knapsack in his hand descended to the road. In the same silence the conductor again put up the step, closed the door, sprang again into his seat, and whistled gently to intimate to the horses that they must move. The horses trotted on; the heavy vehicle pursued its monotonous career.

In the mean time the traveller had entered the inn, and seated himself at a table with a glass of ale before him. He was a man of more than ordinary size, and appeared to be about fifty. You might at the same time have supposed him to be sixty, if his vigorous carriage, his quick glance, and a certain youthful smile about his lips, had not testified that his soul and senses were much younger than his appearance. His hair was grey, his forehead and cheeks covered with wrinkles, and his complexion bore the stamp of early age which excessive exertion and long-continued care impress on the countenance. Yet, at the same time, his breast heaved with vigour, he bore his head upright, and his eyes still gleamed with the fire of manhood. By his dress you would take him for a wealthy citizen; it had nothing peculiar, except that the frock-coat buttoned to the throat, and the large meerschaum pipe which hung at his breast, bespoke a Flemish or a German officer.

The people of the house, having attended to his demands, again returned to their occupations, without taking further notice of him. He saw the two daughters go to and fro, the father renew the fire with wood and turf, and the mother fill the kettle with water; but not one of them addressed to him a single word, though his eyes followed earnestly every member of the family, and although in his friendly glance might have been read the question—"Do you not recognise me?"

At this moment his attention was caught by the striking of a clock which hung upon the wall. As if the sound had painfully affected him, an expression of disagreeable surprise appeared in his countenance, and chased the smile from his lips. He stood up and contemplated the unlucky clock while it went sounding stroke after stroke, to the number of nine. The mother observed the singular emotion of the stranger, and placed herself in wonder at his side; she too looked at the clock, as if to discover what he found so remarkable in it.

"The clock has a pleasant sound—has it not?" said she. "It has now gone for twenty years without the hand of the clockmaker touching it."

"Twenty years!" sighed the traveller. "And where, then, is the clock which hung there before? What has become of the image of the Virgin which stood here upon the mantelpiece. They are both probably broken and gone."

The woman looked in astonishment at the stranger, and replied:—"The figure of the Virgin, Zaana broke as she played with it as a child. But it was really so pitiful, that the priest himself had advised us to buy another. Here stands the new one, and it is much handsomer."

The traveller shook his head dissentingly. "And the clock," continued the hostess, "you will soon hear. The wretched old thing is always too late, and has hung from time immemorial in the lumber-room. There! now it is just beginning to buzz."

And in truth, there came from the adjoining room a peculiar, croaking noise. It was like the hoarse note of a bird which slowly wheezed out "Cuckoo! cuckoo!" But this extraordinary sound called into the traveller's countenance a beaming smile; accompanied by the hostess, he hastened into the lumber-room, and there with glistening eyes gazed on the old clock, which still had not got to the end of its "Cuckoo! cuckoo!"

Both daughters approached the stranger with curiosity, and stared with wonder at him, their large eyes turning from him to their mother full of inquiry. The looks of the damsels awoke the stranger to consciousness, and he returned to the room, followed by the three women. His heart clearly felt very happy, for his features glowed with so attractive an expression of pleasure and good-will, and his eyes bedewed with tears glanced so brightly, that the two young girls with evident sympathy approached him. He seized their hands and said:—

"You think my conduct strange, eh, children? You cannot conceive why the voice of the old cuckoo delights me so much. Ah! I too have been a child, and at that time, my father, when he had done his work, used to come and drink here his glass of ale. When I had behaved well, I was allowed to accompany him. For whole hours have I stood and waited for the cuckoo opening its little door; I have danced and leaped to the measure of her song, and admired in my childish simplicity the poor bird as a masterpiece. And the sacred image of the Virgin, which one of you has broken, I loved it for its beautiful blue mantle, and because the little Jesus-child stretched its arms towards me, and smiled as I smiled. Now is the child—myself—almost sixty years old, with grey hair and furrowed countenance. Four-and-thirty years have I passed in the steppes of Russia, and yet I remember the sacred image of Mary, and the cuckoo, as if I had only been brought hither by my father yesterday."

"You are from our village, then?" said Zanna.

"Yes, certainly," answered the stranger with a joyous precipitance. But this announcement had not the anticipated effect; the girls only smiled familiarly; that was all; the intelligence seemed to give them neither pleasure nor pain. The traveller turned to the mother:—

"Well," said he, "what is become of Baes Joostens?"

"You mean Baas Jan," answered the hostess; "he died about twenty years ago."

"And his wife, the good stout Petrouella?"

"Dead too," was the answer.

"Dead! dead!" sighed the stranger; "and the young herdsman, Andries, who made such handsome baskets?"

"Also dead," replied the hostess.

The traveller dropped his head and gave himself up to gloomy thoughts. In the mean time the hostess went out into the barn to relate to her husband what had passed with the unknown guest. The host entered the room carelessly, and awoke by his noisy wooden shoes the stranger out of his reverie. He sprang up, and with an exclamation of delight, rushed with outstretched arms towards the host, who coldly took his hand, and almost with indifference looked at him.

"Don't you either know me again, Peter Joostens?" cried the stranger, quite confounded.

"No, I do not recollect ever to have seen you," replied the host.

"No! Don't you know who it was that ventured his life under the ice to rescue you from an otherwise inevitable death?"

The host shrugged his shoulders. Deeply wounded, the traveller continued, almost moved to tears:—

"Have you actually forgotten the youth who defended you against your bigger comrades, and supplied you with so many birds'-eggs, that you might make a beautiful garland for the may-pole? He who taught you to make so many pipes of reeds, and who so often took you with him when he went with the tile-burner's cart to market?"

"Something of the kind floats dimly in my memory," answered the host; "my late father used to tell me that when I was about six years old I was very near perishing under the ice; but that tall Jan drew me out, and that he went away with the rest in the emperor's time to serve for cannon fodder. Who knows now where his bones lie in unconsecrated earth? God be merciful to his poor soul!"

"Ah! now at length you know me!" exclaimed the stranger joyously; "I am tall Jan, or rather, Jan Slaets."

As he did not receive an immediate answer, he added in surprise:—

"You recollect the good shot at the bird-shooting, who for four miles round was reckoned the best sportsman, who every time carried off the prize, and who was envied by the young men because the girls showed him the preference? I am he, Jan Slaets of the hill."

"Very possibly," said the host, incredulously; "at the same time, do not take it amiss, my good Sir, if I do not remember you. Our village has no longer a bird-shooting; the shooting-ground is converted into private property, and for a year past has been unoccupied, owing to the death of the possessor."

Deterred by the cold reception of the host, the traveller gave up the attempt to make himself known; but as he prepared to go further, he said calmly:—

"In the village here there live a good many of my friends who cannot have forgotten me. You, Peter Joostens, were very young at that time. I am persuaded that the brick-maker, Paul, will rush to my arms the moment that he sees me. Does he yet live in the clay dale?"

"The brick-yard became, many years ago, a prey to the flames; the clay-field is cultivated, and bears now the finest hay. The meadow now belongs to the rich Mr. Tirt."

"And what has become of Paul?"

"After their misfortunes, the whole family went away. . . I do not know certainly, perhaps he too is dead. But I observe that you talk of our grandfathers' time, and it will be difficult to get answers to all your questions unless you go to the grave-digger. He can reckon up for you on his fingers what has happened for a hundred years past, or more."

"I can believe that; Peter Jan must have reached his ninetieth year."

"Peter Jan? That is not the name of the grave-digger; his name is Lauw Stevens."

A glad smile illumined the countenance of the traveller.

"God be praised," he exclaimed, "that he has at least left one of my comrades still in life!"

"Indeed! was Lauw your friend, Sir?"

"Not exactly my friend," replied the traveller, shaking his head: "we were always at loggerheads. Once, in the heat of our strife, I flung him from the little bridge into the brook, so that he ran great risk of drowning; but above thirty years are flown since then. Lauw will be glad to see me again. Give me now your hand, good Joostens; I shall often come to drink a glass of ale with you here."

He paid, took his knapsack under his arm and went out. Behind the inn he took his way through a young pine-wood. His interview with the host, although not very animating, had, nevertheless infused comfort into the heart of the traveller. Memories from his childhood transported him; memories at every step crowded upon him, and gave him new life. True, the young wood could say nothing to him; in its place stood formerly a tall pine-wood, whose trees had concealed so many birds'-nests, under whose shade the refreshing bilberries had ripened. It had faded with the wood as with the inhabitants of the village,—the old trees had fallen, or were cut down, and a new generation, who were strange and indifferent to him, had taken their places. But the songs of the birds which resounded on all sides were still the same; the wind murmured complainingly as before through the branches; the cricket sang as it used to do, and the fresh aroma of the wood still filled the air. All objects had changed, but the work of eternal nature had continued in its principal features the same. Thoughts like these arose in the traveller's soul, and now glad and inspirited he continued his way without looking up from the ground till he came out of the wood.

Here opened before his eyes the wide extent of fields and meadows, amongst which the brook's silvery thread coursed playfully its way. In the background, at the distance of a quarter of a mile, the pointed spire of the church lifted aloft its gilded vane, which gleamed in the sunshine like a morning-star; and still beyond it the windmill whirled its red wings.

Overcome by an unspeakable emotion, the traveller stood still—his eyes filled with tears, he let his knapsack fall, and stretched out his arms, while his countenance glowed with love and rapture. At the same moment the bells rang for Angelus. The traveller fell on his knees, sunk his head deep upon his bosom, and continued thus for a considerable time, immovable though trembling. A prayer streamed up from his heart and lips; this was evident as he cast his eyes full of inward thankfulness towards heaven, and lifted his clasped hands to God. He then took up again his knapsack, and said, with his gaze riveted on the church-tower:—"Thou at least hast not become changed, thou little church, in which I was baptized, in which I celebrated my first communion, in which all looked to me so wonderful and so holy. Yes, I shall see them again, the Sacred Virgin in her garments of gold, and her silver diadem; St. Anthony with the little friendly swine; St. Ursula and the devil with the red tongue, of which I so often dreamed! and the organ, upon which the sexton played so beautifully, while we sung with all our hearts—

"Ave Maria
Gratia plena!"

The last words the traveller sung aloud, while a tear trickled down his cheek. Silent and dreaming he went on till he came to a little bridge, which led over a brook into a meadow. There his countenance brightened, and he said with emotion:—"Here I first pressed Rosa's hand! Here our eyes confessed for the first time that there is a happiness on earth which seizes irresistibly our hearts, and opens heaven to the young! As now, so then shone the yellow iris flower in the sunshine; the frogs croaked full of the enjoyment of life, and the larks sang above our heads."

He went over the bridge, and said aloud to himself:—"The frogs which witnessed our love are dead; the flowers are dead; the larks are dead!—Their children now greet the old man, who like a spectre returns home from the past times. And Rosa, my beloved Rosa! livest thou still? Perhaps . . . probably married and surrounded by children. Those who stay at home forget so soon the unhappy brother who wanders over distant lands in sorrow and care." . . . His lips moved as if he were smiling:—"Poor pilgrim!" he sighed, "there wells up again in my heart the old jealousy, as if my heart yet remained in its first spring. The time of love is long gone by! . . . But so be it; if she only knows me, and remembers our former relation, I shall not repent the long journey of eighteen hundred miles, and will then willingly lie down in my grave, and sleep by the side of my ancestors and friends!"

A little further, and near the village, he went into a public-house, on whose sign there was a plough, and bade the hostess bring him a glass of ale. In the corner by the fire sat a very old man, who stared into the fire as immovably as a stone. Before the hostess had returned from the cellar, the traveller had recognised the old man. He drew his chair close to him, seized his hand, and said gladly:—

"Thank God, who has let us live so long, Baes Joos! We yet remain from the good old time. Don't you know me again? No? The audacious lad that so often crept through your hedge, and stole your apples before they were ripe?"

"Six-and-ninety years!" muttered the old man, without moving.

"Very likely, but tell me, Baes Joos, is the wainwright's Rosa living yet?"

"Six-and-ninety years!" repeated the old man with a hollow voice.

The hostess came with the ale, and said:—"He is blind and deaf, Sir, don't give yourself the trouble to talk with him; he cannot understand you."

"Blind and deaf!" exclaimed the stranger, disconcerted. "What irreparable devastations time commits in the space of thirty years! I walk here in the midst of the ruins of a whole race of men."

"You were asking after the wainwright's Rosa?" continued the hostess; "our wainwright has four daughters, but amongst them is no Rosa. The eldest is called Lisbeth, and is married to the footman; the second is named Goude, and makes caps; the third is Nell; and the youngest Anna: the poor thing is short-sighted."

"I am not speaking of these people," exclaimed the stranger with impatience; "I mean the family of Kobe Meulinck."

"Ah, they are all dead long ago, dear Sir!" was the hostess's reply.

Deeply agitated, the traveller paid for his ale, and left the public-house with a feverish impetuosity. Out of doors he pressed his hand upon his eyes, and exclaimed in despair:—"God! even she! my poor Rosa—dead! Always, always the inevitable word—dead! dead! Then shall no one on earth recognise me! Not one kind eye shall greet me!"

With a staggering step, as if he were drunk, he plunged into the wood, and pressed his throbbing head against a tree, that he thus might by degrees recover himself. He then directed his course towards the village. His way led him across the solitary churchyard, where he remained standing with bare head at the foot of a crucifix, and said:—"Here, before the image of the Crucified One, Rosa gave me her word that she would remain true to me, and wait for my return. Sorrow overwhelmed us; upon this bench fell our tears; in deep grief she received the gold cross, my dearly purchased pledge of love. Poor beloved one! perhaps now I stand by thy grave!"

With this sorrowful observation he sank motionless upon the bench, where he long continued sitting, as if unconscious. His eye wandered over the churchyard, and the small mounds of earth which covered the freshest graves. It grieved him to see how many of the wooden crosses were fallen with age, without the hand of a child troubling itself to raise again these memorials on a father's or a mother's place of rest. His parents, too, slept here under the earth, but who could show him the spot which their graves occupied?

In this manner he sat long, sunk in gloomy reverie; the unfathomable eternity weighed heavily on his soul, when a human step awoke him out of his dreams. It was the old grave-digger, who, with his spade on his shoulder, came along by the churchyard wall. Misery and indigence might be read in his whole exterior: his back was bent, and through his constant labour with the spade had become crooked; his hair was white, and wrinkles ploughed his brow; though strength and spirit still spoke in his eye.

The traveller recognised at the first glance Lauw—his rival, and would have willingly sprung towards him; but the bitterly disappointed hopes which he had already experienced held him back, and inspired him with a resolve to say nothing, but to see whether Lauw would know him again.

The grave-digger remained standing some paces from him, contemplated him awhile with common curiosity, and then began to mark out a long square with his spade, and to prepare a new grave. From time to time, however, he continued to cast stolen glances at the man who sat before him on the bench, and a secret melancholy joy gleamed in his eyes. The traveller, who deceived himself as to the expression in the grave-digger's countenance, felt his heart begin to beat, and expected that Lauw would come forward and name his name.

But the grave-digger still continued to look him sharply in the face, and then put his hand into his coat pocket. He drew out a little old book, bound in dirty parchment, to which was attached a strap with a lead pencil. He turned round and appeared to write something in the book.

This action, accompanied by a triumphant glance, astonished the stranger so much that he stood up, advanced to the grave-digger, and asked him in surprise, "What do you write in your book?"

"That is my affair," answered Lauw Stevens; "for a confounded long time there has stood a vacant place in my list: I make a cross by your name."

"You know me, then?" exclaimed the traveller, with the liveliest joy.

"Know you?" answered the grave-digger, jeeringly; "that I cannot exactly say; I only remember, as if it were yesterday, that a jealous fellow flung me into the brook, and nearly drowned me, because the wainwright's Rosa loved me. Since that time many an Easter taper has burnt—"

"You did wainwright's Rosa love?" said the stranger, interrupting him; "that is not true, let me tell you."

"You know that well enough, you jealous fool. Did not she wear for a whole year the blessed ring of silver that I brought with me from Scherpenhevel, till you yourself took the ring by force, and cast it into the brook?"

The traveller's countenance brightened into a melancholy smile.

"Lauw! Lauw! the recollection of the old times makes children of us again. Believe me, Rosa never loved you as you fancy. She took your ring out of friendship, and because it had been blessed. In my youth I was rude and harsh, and did not always act in the best manner towards my comrades; but should not the four-and-thirty years which have operated so annihilatingly on men and things, have calmed down our evil passions? Shall I, in the only man who has recollected me, find an irreconcilable enemy? Come, give me your hand; let us be friends; I will make you comfortable for your whole life."

But the grave-digger drew angrily his hand back, and answered in a caustic tone,—

"It is too late to forget. You have embittered my life, and there passes no day but I think of you. Is that, think you, to bless your name? You, who contributed so much to my misfortune, may easily guess."

The traveller struck his trembling hands together, and lifting his eyes towards heaven, exclaimed,— "God! hatred alone recognises me! hate only never forgets!"

"You have done well," continued the grave-digger, "to come back to rest amongst your departed ancestors. I have kept a good grave for you. When the headstrong long Jan lies under the earth, the rain will wash misery from his corpse."

The traveller trembled in every limb at this rude jest. Anger and displeasure kindled in his eyes. But this hasty emotion quickly vanished; dejection and pity took their place.

"You refuse," he said, "to extend your hand to a brother who returns after four-and-thirty years; the first greeting which you give to an old comrade is bitter mockery? That is not well of you, Lauw. But let it be so; we will speak no more of this. Tell me only where my late parents are laid."

"That I don't know," said the grave-digger; "it is full five-and-twenty years since, and since that time the same spot has certainly been thrice used for new graves."

These words made the traveller so sorrowful, that his head sank on his bosom, and with an immovable look he continued lost in his melancholy thoughts.

The grave-digger proceeded with his labour, but he also seemed to linger over it, as if a gloomy thought had taken possession of him. He saw the deep suffering of the traveller, and was terrified at that thirst of revenge which had caused him thus to torture a fellow-mortal. This change of mood showed itself even upon his countenance; the bitter mockery disappeared from his lips, he contemplated for a moment with increasing sympathy his afflicted comrade, advanced slowly towards him, seized his hand, and said in a low but still heart-touching voice,— "Jan, my dear friend, pardon me what I have said and done. I have behaved cruelly and wickedly to thee: but thou must remember, Jan, that I have suffered so much through thee."

"Lauw!" exclaimed the stranger with emotion, and shaking his hand, "that was the violence of our youth. See how little I thought of thy enmity, for I felt myself infinitely happy when I heard thee name my name. And for that I am grateful to thee, though thy bitterness has gone to my heart. But tell me, Lauw, where is Rosa buried? She will rejoice in heaven when she sees us thus as reconciled brothers stand upon her last resting-place."

"How! Rosa buried?" exclaimed the grave-digger; "would to God that she were buried, poor thing!"

"What mean'st thou?" cried the traveller; "does Rosa yet live?"

"Yes, she lives," was the answer, "if that terrible fate that she has to endure can be called life."

"Thou terrifiest me. For God's sake tell me what calamity has happened to her."

"She is blind!"

"Blind! Rosa blind! without eyes to see me;—woe! woe is me!"

Overwhelmed by anguish he advanced with uncertain steps to the bench, and sank down upon it. The grave-digger placed himself before him, and said,—

"For ten years has she been blind . . . and begs her daily bread . . . I give her every week two stivers, and when we bake we always remember her with a little cake."

The traveller sprang up, shook powerfully the grave-digger's hand, and said,—

"A thousand thanks! God bless thee for thy love to Rosa! I pledge myself in His name to reward thee for it. I am rich, very rich. By evening we will see one another again. But tell me now, at once, where Rosa is to be found: every moment is to me a hundred years of suffering."

With these words he drew the grave-digger along with him, and directed his steps toward the churchyard gate. Arrived there, the grave-digger pointed with his finger, and said,—

"See there, by the side of the wood, there rises a smoke from a low chimney. That is the house of besom-binder Nelis Oom; she lives there."

Without waiting for further explanation the traveller hastened through the village towards the indicated spot. He was soon at the dwelling. It was a low hut, built of willow wands and clay, but on the outside neatly whitewashed. Some paces from the door four little children were playing and amusing themselves in the bright sunshine with planting in circles blue corn-flowers and red poppies. They were bare-foot and half-naked; the eldest, a boy of about six years old, had nothing whatever on but a linen shirt. While his little brother and sisters looked at the stranger with fear and shyness, the boy let his eyes rest steadily on the unknown one, full of curiosity and wonder.

The stranger smiled at the children, but advanced without delay into the hut, in one corner of which a man was busy making besoms, while a woman sat with her spinning-wheel by the hearth. These people could not be more than thirty years of age, and at the first glance might be perceived their contentment with their lot. For the rest, all around them looked as clean as country life within such narrow space will allow. The stranger's entrance obviously surprised them, although they received him with kindness and offered him their services. They were clearly of opinion that he wanted to inquire his way, for the husband put himself in readiness to go and show it him. But he asked with evident emotion whether Rosa lived there? and the husband and wife cast astonished looks at each other, and could scarcely find words to answer him.

"Yes, good Sir!" said the man at length; "Rosa lives here, but at present she is gone out a-begging. Do you wish to speak with her?"

"God! God!" exclaimed the traveller. "Cannot you quickly find her?"

"That would be difficult to do, Sir; she has gone out with Trientje, to make her round for the week, but we expect her in an hour's time; she never stays out."

"Can I wait for her here, good friends?"

Scarcely had he uttered the words, before the man hastened into the next room, and fetched thence an easy-chair; which, although of rude workmanship, appeared more inviting than the still ruder chairs which stood in the outer room. Not satisfied with this, the wife took out of a chest a white cushion which she laid in the chair, and requested the stranger to sit down. He was astonished at the simple but well-meant attention, and returned the cushion with many thanks. He then sat down in silence, and let his eyes glance round the room, as if to discover something which might speak of Rosa. As his head was thus turned aside, he felt a small hand gently thrust into his, and his fingers stroked. He looked round curiously to discover who bestowed on him this mark of friendliness, and he met the blue eyes of the boy, who with heavenly innocence looked up to him, as if he had been his father or brother.

"Come here, Peterken!" said the mother; "thou shouldst not be so forward, dear child."

But Peterken did not seem to hear this warning, and continued to hold the hand of the stranger, and look at him. The stranger found the friendship of the child unaccountable, and said,—

"Dear child, thy blue eyes penetrate deep into my soul. As thou art so friendly, I will give thee something."

He put his hand into his pocket and took out a little purse with silver clasp and pearls that changed colour in the light, and gave it to him, after he had dropped into it some pieces of money. The boy gazed on the purse with great delight, but did not let go the stranger's hand. The mother approached, and desired the child to go away.

"Peterken," said she, "thou wilt not be rude; thank the gentleman, and kiss his hand."

The boy kissed his hand, stooped his head towards him, and said in a clear voice, "Many thanks, tall Jan!"

A clap of thunder could not have so startled the traveller as his own name thus pronounced by the innocent child. Tears started involuntarily from his eyes; he lifted the boy upon his knee, and now gazed deeply into his face.

"So! dost thou know me, thou blessed angel?—me, whom thou never saw'st before! Who taught thee my name?"

"Blind Rosa," was the answer.

"But how is it possible that thou hast known me? It must be God himself who has enlightened thy childish mind."

"O, I know you very well," said Peterken; "when I lead Rosa about to beg, she always talks of you. She says that you are tall, and have dark fiery eyes; and that you will come back again, and bring us all such beautiful things. And so I was not afraid of you, good Sir, for Rosa had bade me to love you; and you are to give me a bow and arrow."

The child's simple confidence made the traveller perfectly happy. He kissed him hastily and with tenderness, and said in a solemn tone:—

"Father! mother! this child is rich? I will bring him up and educate him, and richly endow him. It shall be a blessing to him to have recognised me."

Joy and amazement overwhelmed the parents. The man stammered forth,—

"Ah! you are too good. We ourselves thought that we knew you, but we were not so certain of it, because Rosa told us that you were not so rich a gentleman."

"And you too knew me, you good people!" exclaimed the traveller. "I find myself amongst friends. Here I have relations and a family . . . while hitherto I have only found death and forgetfulness!"

The wife pointed to a smoky image of the Virgin which stood upon the chimney-piece, and said:—
"Here every Saturday evening burns a light for the return of Jan Slaets, or for the repose of his soul!"

The traveller directed his eyes in devotion towards heaven, and with a voice full of emotion, said,—

"Thanks be to thee, O God, rich in love, that thou hast made affection more powerful than hate! My enemy has shut my name within his heart, with the dark feeling of his spite, but my friend has lived in memory of me, has inspired all around her with her love, has kept me here present, and made me the favourite of this child, while eighteen hundred miles separated me from her. O God be praised, I am rewarded to the full!"

A long silence followed before Jan Slaets could subdue his emotion, which inspired the people of the house with respect. The husband returned to his work, but held himself ready to hasten to the service of his guest. He, with little Peterken still upon his knee, asked quite calmly,—

"Good mother, has Rosa lived long with you?"

The wife, as if preparing herself for a long explanation, took her wheel, set it by his side, and began:—

"I will tell you, good Sir, how it has gone on. You should know that when the old Meulinok died, he divided his property amongst his children. Rosa, whom nothing in the world could induce to marry—I need not tell you the reason—gave her share wholly up to her brother, and only asked in return to live with him during her life-time. At the same time she employed herself in making ornamental articles, and by this means acquired a great deal of money. There was no need to leave this to her brother, and she employed all her gains in doing good. She attended the sick, and paid for a doctor when it was necessary. She had always a pleasant word to encourage the suffering, and some delicacy to offer the sickly. We had scarcely been married six months, when my husband came home one day dreadfully ill of inflammation on the lungs; the cough which you now hear is the consequence of it. We have to thank our merciful God and the good Rosa, that our poor Nelis is not now lying in the churchyard. If you could but have seen, dear Sir, what she wholly and solely out of love did for us! She brought us additional bed-clothes, for it was cold, and we were wretchedly poor. She sent for two physicians from the next parish, and had them to consult with the doctor here on my husband's condition. She watched by him, alleviated his sufferings and my trouble by her affectionate conversation, and she paid all that was necessary for food and medicine; for Rosa was esteemed by everybody, and when she requested the ladies of the estate or the peasantry to assist the poor, she was never refused. Six whole weeks was our Nelis confined to his bed, and Rosa protected and assisted us till he, by degrees, could resume his work again."

"How I long to see the poor blind one!" sighed the traveller.

The husband raised his head from his work; tears glanced in his eyes, and he said with emotion,—

"If my blood could give her her sight again, I would freely spend the last drop of it."

This exclamation powerfully affected Jan Slaets; the wife observed it, and with her hand gave a sign to her husband to be silent. She then continued:—

"Three months after God gave us a child, the same that sits upon your knee. Rosa, who bore it to the font, desired that it might be christened Johan, but Peter, my husband's brother, who was godfather, a good man, but somewhat self-willed, insisted that it should be called Peter, after him. After a long discussion, the boy received the name of Johan Peter. We call him Peterken after his godfather, who still insists on its being so, and who would be angry if it were otherwise: but Rosa will not hear him called so; she calls him constantly Janneken. The boy is proud of it, and knows that she calls him Janneken because it is your name, good Sir."

The traveller pressed the boy with transport to his breast, and kissed him passionately. With silent admiration he gazed into the boy's friendly eyes, and his heart was deeply moved. The wife went on:—

"Rosa's brother had engaged with people in Antwerp to collect provisions in the country round, and ship them to England. Trade was to make him rich, it was said; for every week he sent two carts to Antwerp. In the beginning all went well; but a bankrupt in Antwerp reduced all the gain to nothing for poor Tirt Meulinck, who was bound for him; scarcely could he pay half his debts. Through grief on this account he is dead. God be merciful to his soul!"

"Rosa, after this, lived at Nand Flink's, the shopkeeper, in a little room. The same year the son Karl, who had been away as a recruit, came home with bad eyes, and fourteen days after the poor young man became blind. Rosa, who was sorry for him, and only listened to her own heart's suggestions, attended him during his illness, and led him by the hand in order to amuse him a little. Alas! she herself took the same complaint, and from that time she has never seen the light of day. Nand Flink is dead, and his children are scattered about. Blind Karl lives at a farm-house near Lierre. Then came Rosa to live with us, and we told her how gladly we saw her with us, and how willingly we would work all our lives for her. She accepted our invitation. Six years are now flown, and God knows that she has never received from us a cross word; for she is herself all affection and kindness. If it be a question of doing something for her, the children are ready to fight which shall get to do it first."

"And yet she begs," said the traveller.

"Yes, good Sir," said the wife, with a certain pride; "but that is her own fault. Do not imagine that we have forgotten what Rosa has done for us; and had we suffered hunger, and must have taken the yoke upon us, we would never have obliged her to beg. What think you then of us? Six months we kept her back from it; but beyond that point we could not prevail. As our family was increasing, Rosa, the good soul, thought she would become a burden to us, and wished, on the contrary, to help us. It was impossible to hinder her from it; she became sick of sorrow. When we saw that, after the half year we gave way to her desire. For a poor blind person it is, nevertheless, no shame. At the same time, though we are poor, we do not make a gain of what she earns by begging. She will, ever and anon, compel us to take part with her; we cannot always be at strife with her, poor thing! but we give it her double back again. Without her knowing it she is better clad than we are, and the food we set before her is better than our own. There always stands at the fire a separate little pan for her. See here; to her potatoes she has a couple of eggs and melted butter. Of the remainder of her gains, I believe, from what I can learn by her words, that she is laying up a little hoard till our children are grown up. Her love deserves our gratitude, but we cannot oppose her will."

The traveller had listened in silence to the whole relation, but a happy smile upon his lips, and a mild lustre in his moistened eye, showed how much his heart was moved. The wife had ceased to speak, and occupied herself again with her wheel. The traveller remained awhile sunk in deep thought, when, setting the boy hastily down, he advanced towards the husband, and said in a commanding tone:—

"Have done with your work."

The besom-maker did not comprehend his meaning, and was startled at his unusual tone.

"Give over your work, and give me your hand, farmer Nelis."

"Farmer P?" said the besom-maker, astonished.

"Yes," exclaimed the traveller; "fling the besoms out of the door; I will give you a farm, four milch cows, a calf, two horses, and all that is necessary for housekeeping. You do not believe me," continued he, and showed the besom-maker a handful of money. "I tell you the truth. I could at once give you the necessary sum; but I respect and esteem you too much to offer you money. But I will make you the proprietor of a farm, and protect your children both before and after my death."

The good people looked at each other with the tears streaming from their eyes, and did not seem rightly to comprehend what was passing. While the traveller was about to make them fresh promises, Peterken pulled him by the hand as if he had something to communicate.

"What wilt thou, dear child?"

"Herr Jan," answered the boy, "see, the peasants are coming home from the field; I know now where I shall find Rosa. Shall I run and tell her that you are come?"

The traveller seized Peterken's hand, and drew him with impatience towards the door, as he said, "Come, come, lead me to her!" And while he made his adieu to the people of the house with his hand, he followed the child, who went with rapid pace through the midst of the village. So soon as they came to the first house, the people ran in wonder from shop and yard to look after them, as if there were something extraordinary. And truly, they presented a singular spectacle; the child with his little shirt and bare feet, who laughing and playful skipped along holding by the hand of the unknown one. The astonished people could not comprehend what the rich gentleman, who at least seemed to be a baron, had to do with the besom-binder's Peterken. Their astonishment still increased as they saw the stranger sloop down and kiss the child. The only thought which occurred to some of them, and over which they now gossiped at every door, was that the rich gentleman had purchased the child of his parents to bring him up as his own son. People from the city who have no child of their own are often wont to do so; and the besom-maker's Peterken was the handsomest child in the village, with his large blue eyes and his light curly hair. At the same time it was extraordinary that the rich gentleman took the child with him in his bare shirt.

The traveller strode rapidly forward. The whole village seemed to him to be magically illuminated; the leafy trees shone in their clear verdure, the low huts smiled at him, the birds sung with a transporting harmony, the air was filled with a balsamic odour and the warmth of life.

He had turned his attention from the child, to enjoy this new happiness. During this time, he had fixed his eye on the distance to transpire the dark wood which, at the other end of the village, seemed to close up the way.

Hastily, the child pulled him by the hand with all his power, and cried:—

"See there!—there comes Rosa with our Trientje!"

And actually there came forward, by a house upon a great by-road, an elderly blind woman led by a child of five years old.

Instead of rapidly accompanying the child, the traveller remained standing and contemplated with pain and sorrow the poor blind one, who, at a distance, approached with unsteady steps. Was that his Rosa, the handsome, amiable girl, whose image still lived so young and fresh in his heart? But this contemplation lasted only a moment: he drew the child along with him, and hastened towards his friend. When he had arrived at about fifty paces from her, he could no longer command himself, but cried out in the highest transport,—"Rosa! Rosa!"

The instant that this sound reached the blind one's ear, she drew her arm from that of her leader, and began to tremble as if she were seized with a fit of the ague. She extended her arms, and with the cry,—"Jan! Oh, Jan!" sprang forward to meet him. At the same time she drew up a ribbon which hung round her neck, and exhibited with an agitated mien a golden cross.

The next instant she fell into Jan Slaets's arms, who, amid unintelligible words, attempted to kiss her. But the blind one prevented him gently with her hands, and as this wounded his feelings, she seized his hand and said:—

"Oh, Jan! Jan! I swoon with delight . . . but I am bound by an oath . . . come with me—we will go together to the churchyard."

Jan Slaets did not comprehend Rosa's meaning, but in the tone of her voice lay something so solemn, and at the same time sacred, that without opposition he complied with the wish of his friend. Without taking heed of the people of the village who surrounded them, he led her to the churchyard. Here she directed her course to the seat beside the cross, and obliged him to kneel by her side while she said,—"Pray with me; I have vowed it to God."

She, at the same time, elevated her clasped hands, breathed forth a warm prayer, and then flinging her arms round her friend's neck, she kissed him, and sank exhausted but smiling on his breast.

During this time, Peterken skipped about amongst the villagers, who stood in wonder around, clapping his hands, and crying one time after another; "That is tall Jan! That is tall Jan!"

On a fine autumn day of the year 1846, the diligence rolled along the great highway from Antwerp to Turnhout, at the regular hour. In haste the conductor drew up not far from a solitary inn, and opened the door of the carriage. Two young travellers sprang laughing and exulting out upon the road, and stretched their arms like escaped birds who again in full freedom try their wings. They gazed around them on the trees, in the beautiful blue autumn air, with a joy which we experience when we have left the city, and with every breath can enjoy free nature. At the same instant, the younger traveller turned his eyes upon the fields, and exclaimed with transport:—"Listen! listen!"

And in truth, there came through the wood the indistinct tones of a distant music. The air was quick and lively, you might almost fancy that you heard the accompanying dance. While the younger one in silence pointed with his finger, his companion said in an almost ironical tone:—

"In the shade of the lindens, to the trumpet's joyous note,
In the dance a gay crowd doth exultingly float;
And amid all the throng, like ocean waves flying,
There is no one who thinketh of suffering and dying."

"Come, come, dear Jan, don't rejoice thyself so beforehand. Probably, they are celebrating the election of a new burgomaster."

"Nay, nay, that is no official joy. Let us too go there and see the peasant girls dance—that is so charming."

"Let us first drink a glass of ale with Peter Joostens, and ask him what is going on in the village."

"And give ourselves up to the unexpected jollification, eh? So be it."

The two travellers entered the inn, and thought they should die of laughter the moment they put their heads into the room. Peter Joostens stood erect and stiff beside the fire. His long blue holiday coat hung in rich folds almost down to his heels. He greeted the well-known guests with a heavy smile, in which a certain feeling of shame manifested itself, and he dared not move himself, for at every motion his stiff shirt collar cut his ears.

At the entry of the travellers, he exclaimed with impatience, but without turning his head:—"Zanna! Zanna! hasten thee: I hear the music, and I have already told thee that we shall come too late."

Zanna came running in with a basket full of flowers.

She looked so charming with her crimped lace cap, her woollen gown, her rose-coloured bodice, the large golden heart at her breast, and her earrings. Her face was flushed with the bloom of the most joyous anticipation, and resembled a rose which opens its closed bud.

"A beautiful peony which blows on a fine summer day," observed the younger companion.

Zanna had fetched the two desired glasses of ale, and now hastened out of the door with her flowers, singing and laughing. Still more impatiently shouted Peter Joostens with all his might:—

"Lisbeth! if thou dost not come directly, I will go away without thee, as sure as I stand here."

An old clock which hung by the wall pointed at the same instant to nine, and struck with a hoarse tone, "Cuckoo! Cuckoo!"

"What wretched taste is that!" said one of the travellers; "have you sold the handsome clock, and hung this up to plague yourselves the whole year through with its death-note?"

"Yes, yes," said the host, smiling; "make yourself merry, at your pleasure, over this bird; it brings me in yearly fifty Dutch guilders—a good crop that needs no tillage."

Four cannon shots were heard at the same moment.

"O heavens!" shrieked Peter Joostens; "the feast has begun. The women take my life with their hunting here and there."

"But, Peter Joostens," asked one of the travellers, "what is this that is going on in the village? Is it the wake?—that would be odd on a Thursday—or is the king coming to the village?"

"It is a very extraordinary thing," replied the host; "it is an unheard-of thing. If you knew the story, you might fill a whole book with it, without any invention. And the old cuckoo here has its place in Blind Rosa's story."

"Blind Rosa!" said the younger traveller, astonished; "what a charming title! That would make a fine counterpart to 'The Sick Youth.'"

"Nay, that won't do!" said the elder; "if we go out together to collect material for stories, we must honourably divide the spoil."

"Well, we can hereafter draw lots for it," said the younger, half regretfully.

"In the meantime," observed the elder, "we actually know nothing. Pull down your detestable shirt collar from your ears, Peter Joostens, and begin and regularly tell us all; and for your reward you shall have a book as soon as it is printed."

"Now I have no time for it," answered the host; "I hear my wife coming down stairs; but come along with us to the village, and on the way I will tell you why the cannon are fired and the music plays."

The hostess entered the room, and dazzled the travellers' eyes by her dress, so did it blaze in all the colours of the rainbow. She rushed up to her husband, pulled up his shirt collar again higher than ever, took his arm, and issued out of doors with him. The two travellers accompanied them, and Peter Joostens related on the way to his attentive hearers the whole story of Tall Jan and Blind Rosa; and though he had almost talked himself out of breath, he became besieged with all sorts of questions.

They learned of him, however, that Herr Snaets bought of him the old cuckoo clock, that it might hang in its former place in the inn; that tall Jan had been four-and-thirty years in Russia, and in the fur trade had become a very rich man. That he had bought an estate, and meant to live upon it with Blind Rosa and the besom-maker Nelis's family, whose children he had already adopted. That he had given the grave-digger a considerable sum of money; and, finally, that this evening there was to be held a grand folks-feast on the estate, for which occasion a whole calf was to be roasted, and two whole copper-fuls of rice furmety to be boiled.

Peter Joostens ceased as they came behind a house upon a great by-road. And now the travellers listened no longer, for they were resolved to be present, and see all the gaiety which offered itself to their gaze.

All the houses in the village were adorned with green boughs, bound together with garlands of white and many-coloured flowers, and between these, over the heads of the spectators, hung everywhere festoons, with small lamps and with large red letters. Here and there stood a stately may-pole, with hundreds of little flags glittering with tinsel, and adorned with garlands of birds'-eggs and pieces of glass. Along the sides of the way the boys and girls had laid wreaths of flowers upon silver-white sand, and bound them together at regular distances, showing the alternating initials J. and R. for Jan and Rosa, the invention of the schoolmaster.

Amongst all this ornament swarmed a throng of spectators from the neighbouring villages to witness this extraordinary wedding. The young travellers went from one group to another, and listened to what the people said. But before the procession, which came over the fields, arrived at the village, they hastened to the church, and placed themselves in front of it on a mound so that they might overlook the whole.

They beheld the procession with a feeling almost bordering on veneration . . . and it really was so beautiful and touching that the heart of the younger one beat with poetic rapture. More than sixty young girls from five to ten years of age came, clad in white, and with childhood's enchanting smile, like little bright clouds floating through the azure heaven. Upon their free locks, hanging around their fresh countenances, rested garlands of monthly roses, which seemed to contend in beauty with the vermeil lips of the children.

"It is like a saga of Andersen's," said the younger of the companions; "the sylphs have quitted the bosoms of the flowers. Innocence and simplicity, youth and joy . . . what an enchanting picture!"

"Ah, ah!" said the other, "there come the peonies! and Zanna Joostens goes first."

But the younger one was too much affected to notice this unpoetic speech. He gazed with delight on the taller maidens, who in full splendour, beaming with life and health, followed the lesser ones. What a train of full-grown young women in snow-white lace caps! How their blushes added to the sweetness of their countenances! How enchanting was the modest smile about their lips, resembling the gentle curling of the waters which the zephyr on a summer's evening produces on the surface of an inland lake.

Ah! there comes Blind Rosa with Herr Slets, her bridegroom! How happy she must be! She has suffered so much! She has been reduced even to the beggar's staff. For four-and-thirty years she has succoured and nourished her soul with a hope that she herself regarded as vain . . . and now he is there, the friend of her childhood, of her youth. Led by his hand, she now approaches the altar of that God who has heard her prayers. Now shall the vow made by the cross in the churchyard be accomplished, and she shall become Jan Slets's wife. On her breast glitters the simple gold cross which Tall Jan gave her. Now she listens to the joyful congratulations, to the song and music which celebrate his return. She trembles with emotion, and presses his arm closer to her side, as if she doubted whether her happiness was real.

After them came Nelis with his wife and his children; they are all clad as wealthy peasantry. The parents go forward with bowed heads, and wipe the tears of wonder and thankfulness from their eyes, so often as they look upon their blind benefactress. Peterken bears his head proudly erect, and shakes his light locks, which play about his neck. He leads his sister by the hand.

But what troop is that? The remnant of the camp which the power of time has laid waste. About twenty men followed the children of Nelis. They really present a singular spectacle; they are all grey-haired men or bald. Most of them support themselves on their staves; two go on crutches, one is blind and deaf, and all are so worn out and exhausted by long years of weary labour, that one might imagine that death had by force brought them again from their graves.

Lauw Stevens went first, and stooped so that his hands nearly touched the ground; blind Baes from Plogen supported himself on the miller's grandfather. These old men constituted the remains of the generation which lived when tall Jan flourished in the village, and by his youthful courage always asserted for himself the first place. After them came the people of the village, men and women, who were invited to the wedding.

The train entered the church . . . the organ was heard accompanying the solemn hymn. The younger traveller drew his companion aside in the churchyard. He stooped down, turned round, and presented to the other his closed hand, out of which the ends of two benches of grass protruded.

"In such haste? why so?" asked the other.

"Proceed," said the younger; "the subject pleases me, and I would willingly know whether it will fall to me or not."

The elder one drew a bent; the younger let his fall upon the ground, and sighed, "I have lost!"

This is the reason, good reader, why the elder of the travellers has told you the story of Blind Rosa. It is a pity; for otherwise you would have read in beautiful poetry, what you have now read in prose. But fortune another time may be more auspicious to you.

THE SCOTTISH SOLDIER OF FORTUNE.

THE character of the mercenary soldier is not, perhaps, one of the most estimable under any circumstances. Yet it has been generally assumed only by brave men. The Scotch and the Swiss have gained themselves a name for valour and fidelity in the wars of Europe, though literally selling their services to the highest bidder. The distinctions gained by the former, probably from bringing into the field, besides their swords, some share of education, or, as an illustrious representative of the order has been made to phrase it, "the learning acquired at the Marischal College of Aberdeen, gentle bluid and designation," would really seem to redeem to a considerable extent the odium of having adopted as a trade what the men of other nations affected to select only as a career of honour. And although in the character of Dugald Dalgetty Sir Walter Scott has adhered to the low vices of the mercenary, mingling, with irresistible comicality, his pride, pedantry, and respect for pay and rations, in one ludicrous compound, it is well known that the love of military service was inspired into the Scottish youth of the seventeenth century by purer motives, and cultivated by them to better purpose. This was fully shown in a work published in 1714, entitled, "The Scots Nation Vindicated from Reflections cast on them in an Infamous Libel, &c." Sir Walter Scott has certainly chosen the proper description of personage to evoke the whole humour of the character; but the lists of gallant Scots, and the records of their warlike actions still preserved in foreign archives to some extent accessible to the mere English reader, destroy entirely the historical truth of his too celebrated picture. In humour, too, Dalgetty is nothing to his prototype Lesmahago: of this Scott himself appears to have been aware, since he acknowledges that the existence of that doughty captain alone must deprive him of all claim to originality. The Edinburgh Review seems to have overlooked this fact in describing Scott's ludicrous combination of the soldado with the divinity-student as entirely original. But Lesmahago is the very man: his absurd descent from his rosinante at the Durham inn door, which excited the screams of Aunt Tabitha and her hand-maidens; the very coat he wore, the cloth of which had once been scarlet trimmed with Brandenburgs, now totally deprived of their metal, and the holster caps and housings of the same stuff and antiquity; but, above all, the sunmeret and display of his patched head-piece, which the mob mistook for either a scold or a broken head, both equally opprobrious, but which the lieutenant afterwards solemnly explained away; his stiff civility, self-conceit, pedantry, awkwardness, rudeness, and disputatiousness, all mark him out as the real original on which Dalgetty was moulded.

We have to thank Mr. Grant, the author of several chivalrous and military memoirs and romances, for renewing attention to the class whence these caricatures are drawn, and, by selecting as an illustration one of the most illustrious of their order, contributing a tardy meed of justice to men of great military talent and renown, whom it would really be outrageous to laugh into oblivion with the Dalgettys and Lesmahagos of fiction.

The cavalier whose memoirs have been chosen to illustrate the lives of these military adventurers is Sir John Hepburn—of the Hepburns of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian—"whose conduct and bravery," says his biographer, "won for him the preeminence of being esteemed the best of that warlike age next to the great Swedish leader," namely,—Gustavus Adolphus. Though in the Swedish service Hepburn never attained higher rank than that of colonel, the estimation in which he must have been held is attested by the command of nearly 40,000 infantry having been confided to him in the entrenched camp of Nuremberg, when there were many field-marsals and generals in the army. His Swedish Brigade became afterwards the famous Regiment d'Ilebrun in the service of France; and—what renders its exploits still more interesting—is now the Scots Royals, or first regiment of the British line. So that in this instance the military laurels earned in foreign service were ultimately transplanted to our native soil.

The house in which this military hero was born is still shown in his native village of Athelstaneford. The causes which tempted him to leave it for fields of foreign strife are readily traced; namely,—the union of the crowns in this country, and the scarcity of military employment as contrasted with the wars for religious supremacy which were then convulsing the continent of Europe.

Sir Walter Scott has referred more especially to two military memoirs of the period in question, in his Introduction to the Legend of Montrose, from both of which he furnishes characteristic extracts, besides the extraordinary title ad longum of "Munro his Expedition with the worthy Scots Regiment called Mackeyes, levied in August 1626." Munro, whose work Sir Walter affects to treat as written in a great measure in the humour of Captain Dugald Dalgetty, was the friend and companion in arms of Sir John Hepburn, and figures conspicuously throughout his memoirs! Sir James Turner, the other military authority consulted by the great novelist in his construction of the character of a Scottish soldier of fortune, though regarded as a person of superior pretensions to Lieut.-Col. Munro, from having written a treatise on the pike exercise, called "Pallas Armatæ," stands confessedly—from the extract of his "Memoirs" printed by the Bannatyne Club, and quoted by Sir Walter himself as a passage which Captain Dalgetty, had he kept a journal, might have penned—the true original. "It is such," says he, "as the genius of De Foe would have devised, to give the minute and distinguishing features of truth to a fictitious narrative." Probably the author had in his eye the "Military Memoirs," since commonly ascribed to De Foe, of which Mr. Grant speaks in Hepburn's Memoirs, as "that somewhat apocryphal work, the 'Memoirs of a Cavalier,'" quoting, however, one of the many and remarkable conversations in which Hepburn, Gustavus, and others illustrious in these wars, are made to participate, by the adroit crassement of the author of the "Robinson Crusoe" and the "History of the Plague in London."

The hero of De Foe's "Memoirs" is an Englishman, but on his first appearance in France is made to state that when inquired of "who they were?" they called themselves Scots, "for as the English were very much out of favour in France at this time, the peace having been made not many months, and not supposed to be very durable, because particularly displeasing to the people of England, so the Scots were on the other extreme with the French. Nothing was so much caressed as the Scots, and a man had no more to do in France, if he would be well received there, than to say he was a Scotsman." By this process De Foe's Memoirs also became those of a Scottish cavalier.

From the long list of Scottish officers in chief, appended amongst the notes and illustrations to his book, by Mr. Grant, we are led to entertain, however, a higher estimate of the character and position of the military adventurers of the seventeenth century than we should be warranted in adopting, even from the distinguished career of Hepburn. Of these officers no fewer than three were Field-Marsals, viz. Sir Alexander Leslie, of Balgonie, famous in our own religious wars of the period, as Earl of Leven; Sir Patrick Ruthven, afterwards Earl of Forth; and Sir Robert Douglas of Whittinghame. Four Generals likewise figure on the list, viz. James Marquis of Hamilton, beheaded by Cromwell; Andrew Ruthven, afterwards Earl of Teviot; Sir James Spence of Wormiston, afterwards Chancellor of Sweden; and George Earl of Crauford-Lindsay, Colonel of a Dutch regiment, whose end was tragical, having been slain by one of his own phlegmatic lieutenants, whom he had struck with a baton. The lieutenant was acquitted by a court-martial, but "General Lealy," says "The Scots Nation Vindicated," "being the Governor of Staten, where the earl was buried, caused him (the lieutenant) to be immediately apprehended, and shot at a post," one instance out of many of the extraordinary power and authority wielded by these Scots commanders. The Master of Forbes was also Lieutenant-General; and Lord Hugh Hamilton, Sir David Drummond, Sir James King (Lord Ythan), Sir James Ramsay, Sir John Ruthven, &c. Major-Generals: Sir John Hepburn stands at the head of a long array of Colonels and Lieutenant-Colonels, second of whom stands Robert Munro, already noticed, afterwards

Major-General of the Scots army in Ireland; and in succession such men as Sir James Lumsden, afterwards Major-General in Scotland, Sir James Hepburn of Waughton, Sir Donald Mackay, (Lord Reny,) Sir James Ramsay the Fair, Sir David Leslie, (Lord Newark,) Ludovic Leslie, and many other Leslies, Hamiltons and Munros, Forbesses, Sinclairs (of the Caithness family), Lindsays, Cunninghames, Ramsays and Stewarts. The swarm of captains and subalterns of course was innumerable; for Burnet asserts that nearly the whole Swedish army was at one time officered by Scottish cavaliers.

Fifteen hundred men embarked at Leith, for the Bohemian wars, under Sir Andrew Gray, who had been recruiting in Scotland in the spring of 1620, and had formed a camp on the property of Monkrig, belonging to the Hepburns, in East Lothian, and situated near Athelstaneford. Hepburn joined this expedition, to which it seems there was added a deportation of 120 moss-troopers taken on the border flagrante delicto, and given to Sir Andrew Gray for soldiers by the lords of the Privy Council. The inducements held out to the adventurous volunteers in these Scottish bands, Mr. Grant well illustrates in the case of one Edmond, the son of a Stirling burghess, whose elevation to fame and fortune was the well-earned reward of personal valour and prowess. Edmond on one occasion swam the deep and rapid Danube, without armour and his sword between his teeth, in front of the Austrian lines, slipped past the sentinel, and, favoured by the gloom of night, penetrated to the very heart of the Imperial camp, where by a daring union of stratagem, strength and courage, he contrived to gag, bind, and carry off the great Count de Bucquoi, their general, recross the river, and present his prisoner to the Prince of Orange. Great wealth and the rank of Colonel were conferred on Edmond for this exploit. It is recorded to his honour that he liberally shared his affluence with his poor and humble relatives at home. Mr. Grant relates of him an incident not less spirited than praiseworthy. "None," he says, "stood higher in the favour of Prince Maurice, than Colonel Edmond; and it is related that when standing one day in a public parade, surrounded by a number of glittering cavaliers and officers of high military rank, he was accosted by a stranger, who, to win his favourable notice, professed to have come recently from Scotland, where he had left his relations well, and concluded by naming several persons of high rank. 'Begone, Sir,' replied Edmond indignantly, as he turned from him to the gay group around, 'I know not this person who comes to flatter my vanity; for, I must inform you, Sirs, if you know it not already, that I have the honour (and I shall ever be proud of it) to be the only son of an honest baker and freeman, in the ancient borough town of Stirling.'" Such then are we fairly warranted in believing was the gallantry that animated the humblest, as well as the highest, of the Scottish cavaliers.

Bohemia then owned a Scottish queen, Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James VI.; and the Scottish bands, who had repaired to the German wars in her cause, engaged themselves in the interval betwixt the overthrow of the Elector and the appearance of the Great Gustavus in the field, in the service of the States of Holland, then sorely pressed by the Spaniards under Spinola. At the sanguinary battle of Fleura, 30th August, 1622, Hepburn, Hume and Sir James Ramsay were the captains who led the Scottish bands, that evinced the greatest bravery. Leaving his bands under Hepburn's guidance, Sir Andrew Gray returned to Scotland. Hepburn led the Scottish remnant into Sweden, and tendered their services to Gustavus Adolphus. The court and camp of Adolphus were then the great military school of Europe. The cavaliers of rank were usually apparelled in the richest stuffs, and wore the most beautiful armour that the forges of Parma and Milan could produce. And Mr. Grant tells us that Hepburn, in the splendour of his arms and attire, outshone his comrades so far as to draw upon himself the reprehension of Gustavus. The Swede, however, in 1625, appointed him Colonel of one of his auxiliary regiments, that of which the First or Royal Scotch Regiment of the British line is now the direct representative. Burning for distinction, Hepburn acquitted himself with equal valour and ability. Gustavus is said to have ascribed his great victory at Leipzig to Hepburn's Scottish brigade alone. The Scots, in fact, first introduced military discipline into Sweden. Even the Dutch regiments in the service of Gustavus were many times glad to beat "the old Scots March," when they designed to intimidate the foe. Recruiting extended throughout all parts of Scotland during most of the Thirty Years' War; and "until the era of the Covenant," says Grant, "the drums of the Scots-Swedes rang in every glen from Caithness to the Cheviots." A song circulated by the Sergeant Kites of these times says:—

"Germani, Sweden, Denmark are smoking
With a crew of brave lads others provoking;
All in their armour bright
Dazzling great Caesar's sight,
Summoning you to a fight. Tan-lara-ra-ra.
Oh, viva, viva Gustavus we cry!
Heir we shall either win honor or dye!"

The consequence of all this was that many families of Scottish extraction were founded in Sweden, and that Leslies, Montgomeries, Gordons, Duffs, Hamiltons and Murrays are in that country familiar names of families flowing from the honourable Scottish cadets of the wars of Gustavus.

Accompanying Gustavus to the Vistula, Hepburn, in an attack upon the town of Mewe, defended himself for two whole days, on a rock that was defensible, against the whole force of the Polish army, whilst Gustavus achieved the relief of the town by supplying it with men and ammunition. When the Poles at length abandoned their trenches, it was computed that each of Hepburn's soldiers had killed his man. They had lost only a seventh of their own number.

Hepburn, knighted for his eminent services, next attended Gustavus in his invasion of Germany, with more than a thousand officers, and twelve thousand soldiers, all Scotsmen. Hepburn, on arriving in Pomerania, was placed under the chancellor Oxenstierna, who, being apprised that by a daring midnight attack, Munro, with a few Scottish Highlanders, driven by shipwreck on the Isle of Rugen, had re-won that fertile spot for Gustavus, despatched Munro's old friend and fellow-student, Sir John Hepburn, with his "invincibles" to his succour, as the Austrians were closing in on all sides. Hepburn here assumed the command under a commission as governor of Rugenwalde, and mustering, arming and disciplining 8,000 among the gentlemen and boors of the island, soon cleared all Further Pomerania of the Imperialists.

In the second campaign of Gustavus against the empire, Hepburn, in his 30th year, without any increase of rank, received command of a brigade, denominated Hepburn's Scots Brigade, or the Green Brigade (as other divisions of the army were designated Yellow, Blue and White Brigades). It seems that the colour of the soldiers' doublets, scarfs, feathers and standards was green. Instigated by Gustavus to revenge the slaughter of the Scots at New Brandenburg, Hepburn and Munro side by side led on the Green Brigade to the Gueben Gate of Frankfort on the Oder, hung their petards and stormed the quarter. One Scottish pikeman slew eighteen Imperialists with his own hand; and Lumsden's regiment alone captured nine pair of colours, for which Gustavus told the brave cavalier of Fife to ask whatever he wished that a king could bestow, and he should have it. And in the assault Hepburn was wounded by a shot "above the knee that he was lame of before."

The most dashing of the Scots expeditions to the German wars was, perhaps, that of 6,200 led by the gallant Marquis of Hamilton from Leith in July 1630, after much groundless detention upon a charge preferred against the Marquis by James Stewart, Lord Ochiltree, who accused him of aiming at the Scottish crown. The accusation was proved to be unfounded by a trial, and Lord Ochiltree for his pains remained in durance in Blackness Castle for twenty years, having only been liberated by Oliver Cromwell. Landing by mistake at Wolgast, the Scots on their long march suffered from the consumption of German bread, new honey and German beer, which did not "agree with their constitutions." But they were all completely armed; and the brightness of their unsullied mail, glittering from the armourer's hands, contrasted strongly with the rusty harness of the Scots veterans in the camp of Gustavus. Their leader, too, outshone the Swedish monarch, and rivalled the princes of the empire in the magnificence of his table, his equipage and liveries. Forty volunteers composed his train of pages. Two hundred chosen yeomen in complete steel were his body-guard. And on arriving in the camp at Werben, Gustavus made many apologies for the poor quarters he could afford him.

After many incidental services of merit and importance, Hepburn was with the King of Sweden on the plain of Leipzig. The Saxons were lost, and Count Tilly in person was preparing to charge the Swedes and Lvonians at the head of his main body, when Gustavus selected 3,000 Scottish musketeers, with 2,000 horse posted on their flanks, to interrupt their triumphant career. By an oblique movement Hepburn then threw his brigade into the ground deserted by the Saxons, where the Imperialists, led by the savage John of Tsercla, conspicuous in his conical hat and red feather, were already within pistol-shot. The Scottish regiments here amazed the Imperialists by for the first time firing in platoons. Hepburn led them in person in full military trappings which outshone all in the army, the laurel in his helmet, and sword in his hand. The pikemen in front—three ranks stooping, and three erect, six volleys at once were poured from the faces of their squares—the pikemen charged, the musketeers clubbed their muskets, and the columns of Tilly were broken and driven back with frightful slaughter by the regiments of Hepburn, Lumsden and Keay.

After many more brilliant services on the Rhine and in the march on Bavaria, amongst others capturing a castle and leading the van on the Lech, Hepburn was made Governor of Munich. Confronted with Wallenstein at Nuremberg, Gustavus unhappily had high words with Hepburn, whose fire and spirit could not brook such even from a king. He instantly threw up his commission and withdrew, declaring that he would never more unsheath his sword in the quarrels of Sweden, although Gustavus loved him well, placed more confidence in him than in any other officer, and had just appointed him to command half the infantry of his vast army of 70,000 men. Gustavus was also considered to have treated ungenerously the Marquis of Hamilton, who, with Hepburn, remained within the beleaguered walls of Nuremberg, an idle spectator of the warlike scene. Munro succeeded to the command of the Green Brigade. Yet when Gustavus, entrusting his strong camp to the militia of Nuremberg, crossed the Rednitz with his whole army in order of battle, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, 1632, Hepburn, destitute of any command, rode near the king, mounted on his charger, and in his complete suit of inlaid armour, a close casque with gorget, breast and back pieces, pauldrons, vambraces and gauntlets, with pistols at his saddle, as if going on service. At one part of the conflict, finding no able officer near him who could hasten to examine the ground for a proposed attack, Gustavus requested this service of Hepburn, who complied and reported the attempt practicable. And again, when it became necessary to draw off the Swedish regiments which had advanced too far, Gustavus addressed himself to Hepburn, to order these regiments to retreat; and accepting the service because it was a hazardous one, the cavalier executed the task with daring and decision, and marched the troops, which must otherwise have been cut off, back to the king's post.

Hepburn, attaching himself to the Marquis of Hamilton, quitted Gustavus at Neustadt, and returned to London by way of France. One month after Hepburn quitted his standard, the great Gustavus was slain on the plain of Lutzen, November 6, 1632. His large rowelled spurs, richly ornamented and gilt, taken off his heels when he was killed on the field of battle, by Colonel Hugh Somerville, his aide-de-camp, are now preserved in the Museum of Scottish Antiquaries, at Edinburgh.

Hepburn, on his arrival at the Court of St. James, was knighted. The Swedish Intelligence, the chief source of Mr. Grant's information, was at this time written down from conversations held by the editor with Sir John Hepburn, Lord Reay, and other Swedish officers. Hepburn could have remained but a few months in Britain, as early in the succeeding year he obtained from Louis XIII. the command of a regiment composed of various old Scottish companies, serving in the army of France. Sir Andrew Gray, Sir John Seaton, and numerous Scottish officers and soldiers were then in the French army. The cuirassiers and archers of the Scottish Guard, in their white surcoats and gorgeous half-armour of the brightest steel, were all gentlemen of the first Scottish families. Hepburn gained in France the friendship of the Cardinal Dukes of Richelieu and La Valette. The eight hundred years' league with Scotland was cordially remembered by Frenchmen. But the pride and bearing of the haughty soldiers of fortune gave rise to the popular expression, "proud as a Scotsman"—"fier comme un Ecossais."

One of those who first trailed a pike under Sir John Hepburn in Alsace and Lorraine, was John Middleton, a poor private soldier, who afterwards became Earl of Middleton. Hepburn bore the baton of Marshal-de-camp in the invasion of Lorraine, at the age of thirty-six.

Forming a junction with the Swedish army of Duke Bernard at Landau, the latter was taken into the French service with four thousand horse and seven thousand foot: these last almost entirely Scotsmen, the remnants of the gallant Scots veterans so long led by Gustavus—all that survived of the Green Brigade. The whole were incorporated into the Corps styled the Régiment d'Hebron—a regiment ordered by Louis XIII. to take the right of all others then being embodied.

Having somewhat rashly ventured to examine the principal breach at the siege of Saverne, the brave Hepburn fell, struck by a shot from the ramparts, in the joint of his gorget, where it failed to protect him. Thus the glitter of the rich armour in which he so much delighted, was probably the cause of his death. He was borne away by a party of faithful Scottish soldiers, as the gallant Turenne, sword in hand, stormed the same breach, at the head of a strong French and Scottish column. He was buried in the old church of Toul in French Lorraine, where Louis XIV. erected a monument to his memory, which bears record of his having been "the best soldier in Christendom, and consequently in the world."

Chronicle of Ethelfeld.

BOOK FIFTH.

ALFRED the king sent a company of spearmen into the north, to demand of the monks of Lindisfarne (who had found refuge in the monastery of Crayke) the loan of the Durham Book. And in pledge thereof, he sent his holy ring and golden circlet with gems ysette, for the said monks to have and hold until that he the book should restore. Were the time and place convenient, I would now relate the dangers these spears met by the way, and the number of days their journey lasted; howbeit, they wonne back at length unto the royal vill, and with them brought the book, which the monks humbly prayed that the king of his mercy would neither dog's-ear nor deface. Now the king, being advertised that the book was at hand, did instantly remit and set aside the matters he was then engaged in. And sending for the queen, and for me Ethelfeld, that we his pleasure might partake, he spent the entirety of that afternoon, and much of sundry afternoons following, in contemplating with us the delineations and devices which had taken the good bishop of Lindisfarne twenty and two years to execute.

Now, when I saw what good limning might in very deed amount to, I apprised my own craftless attempts as meanly as the king himself could do—(howbeit, he had never made merry with them again;) and with much zeal and application I set myself to copy as many of the borderings and initial letters in the Durham Book as time would allow, in colours of azure, and green, and violet, and yellow, and scarlet, and gold. For Werewrith the chaplain had learned the art of preparing gold for the illumination of manuscripts; and the way he did it was this. He filed the gold very finely, brayed it in a mortar with the sharpest vinegar¹ he could get, (which proved to be some home-made wine my loved mother had made of her own grapes, and sent to the king; but we never did her to wit of what it came to,) and whenas it turned black, he poured it forth. Then he added unto it some salt or nitre, which dissolved it and made it fit for use.

Also, for he was clever in little things, he wist how to prepare parchment much better than I had done; and also vellum. His method with the first was this: he let it lie, by the space of three days, under lime; then stretched it, scraped it well on either side, then dried it, and stained it of what colour it liked him best. It pleaseth me to wit how all things should be done, albeit some things it pleaseth me not to do.

About this time, my father brought to Winchester our royal lady Ethelswitha, queen of Mercia; and then returned after a while to his duty on king Buhred, who was purposed he should accompany him to Rome. His royal spouse was meantime to remain in the safeguard of her brother, king Alfred. Thus we had two queens, Ethelswitha, at court; which some people peradventure thought one too many. Howbeit Alfred the king was always very kind unto his own cyth and cunn; and thus it fell that Ethelswitha his sister lived upon him many a day; and when the troubles of the country increased, became no small burthen unto him. For this queen was one of those, who, while for ever giving out that they are nobody, are yet always expecting to be treated like somebody. Howbeit, the king at length persuaded her to go into a monastery; and I am thankful to say it was not mine.

(1) Continued from p. 219.

(2) Ecet: i. e. acetum.

Ethelswitha, that is to say my sister, had no need to fear the comparisons that could not fail to be made between her and the queen of Mercia, there being as much difference between them as between fescue and cord-grass.¹ For whereas my sister had always been of excellent beauty, there was now no woman equal unto her for fairness, in or about the court. And whereas the queen of Mercia's hair was of reddish yellow, and rather harsh, Ethelswitha's was of the palest brown, silky, and a marvel for length. And sometimes, for the greater state, she let it down to its full length, confined only by a circle of pearls: but more commonly she put it up in shining coils, like Judith of Bethulia in the song; whence the king would call her "the woman of the twisted locks." And whereas the queen of Mercia's eyes were of a cold grey colour, and somewhat too prominent, Ethelswitha's were blue, with soft shadowings round about. And whereas the queen of Mercia did nothing from morn to night but exact service and talk like the foolish, Ethelswitha was ever caring for others. And whereas the queen of Mercia always loved to be helped to the best, Ethelswitha always helped her to the best. And whereas the queen of Mercia was full troublesome unto her brother, and Ethelswitha loved him as her own soul, it came to pass that the king wearied a little of his sister, and loved his wife exceedingly.

Now, by reason of this queen's coming into Winchester and taking so much upon her, it naturally befel that I lost my place a little; not only as second woman at court, but in the thoughts of the king and of the queen: and thus my approaching profession ceased to be the chief thing talked of. Alfred the king was minded to build and endow a noble monastery for randlike virgins at Shaftesbury, and to make me the mitred abbess thereof; but the house, which was to be of solid stone, would take long to raise; and moreover he was rather short of money; wherefore he and my father thought it good that I should become postulante at Wareham Abbey in Dorsetshire, which is dedicated to St. Etheldreda, or, as we say in the vulgar tongue, St. Audrey. The mothers and sisters amounted but to twenty; and were had in reputation, as well for the simplicity of their rule and their sanctity, as for their deft handling of the needle, and their skill in making sweetmeats. Wherefore, I was taken thither by my good father, to do the abbess to wit of my intentions. We were three days on the road, and slept one night at Winborne. The holy mother received us right kindly: she was pleased at the honour and wealth about to be conferred on her house; add to which, as I have since learned, the arrival of a new face in a religious house is as that of an angel. We saw nought of the nuns, save in the chapel. The abbey, which stood aloof from the town and castle, on a little peninsula formed by the confluence of two rivers, was getymbrade² on piles of oak and alder, by reason that the marshy ground would not bear the weight of stone, and was surrounded by many willows and rushes. The chapel had, till of late, been thatched instead of leaded; and, for lack of glazing to the windows, the swallows and sparrows had been used to fly in and out, chirping and screaming, and to build their nests within the roof.

I returned with my father to Winchester, to await some needful forms. I saw a couple of treow-whirtas by the road side, a-making of a gate, the posts whereof lay on the ground; and I noted that as much of the wood was prepared to lie under the ground as above it, for the greater strength. Then remembered I Eadwulf's homely saying; and was a little troubled that I had indeed seen but the outside of a nunnery. At the king's palace gate were gathered many men and horses; and one of our own freedmen, stepping up unto my father, said, "The lady Eadburga hath arrived." Then my heart rejoiced, for that my blessed mother, who had made the journey by short stages, had reached the royal vill. And when I saw her loved face, with the deep lined marks of her late pains on it, that were no pains now, I felt gladlike that heaven had restored her dear life and listened unto my vow, and I was ready to yield myself up, a willing ransom. Alfred the king looked grave but yet kind, when he saw me; and, saith he, "Thou hast taken the first step now, and wilt not, I think, fall back." I saw he would not think highly of me if I did.

Then, or ever my father returned unto king Buhred, which he very shortly did, we had a little snatch of family happiness, before we parted for ever: for I saw his face no more. Very bitter-sweet was our communing together; but my mother was a very conscientious woman,³ and would on no account put a stumbling-block in my path by her lamentations. I wonder, even now, that they opposed not my vocation a little earlier, nor bemoaned it a little more than, it seems to me, they did. After all, I was very young and tender. . .

Howbeit, Alfred the king had other burthens on his mind. It fell one day, that I was illuminating a capital G with gold and with scarlet and with purple, when he came and stood beside me, overlooking me. I thought that peradventure he was again making merry at my expense; and was about to ask him what fault he was now finding, when I heard him give

(1) Cord-grass is remarkably stiff and strait; fescue affords excellent pasturage.

(2) Built of timber; like Croyland monastery.

(3) She was living in the time of Aseu, who speaks of her in terms of high praise.

“a deep sigh; and, looking up, saw he was not thinking of my work in any wise, but of something afar off. And seeing me look up, he saith, “Woe is me, my sister! . . . I wis not if to any good I have as yet been born. The land is full of foemen:—what have I done? nothing. The land also is full of misery,—what have I done? nothing. The land also is full of ignorance, and so is its king, and what have I done? nothing. Woe is me!”—I said, “All men love you, my king.” He said, “But I despise myself. For I know something should be done, and I know not how to do it, nor what it is. . . . Ho! the happy man that ever had a sword hanging over his head by a single hair! And yet so it always is with me!” And he groaned in himself and turned away.

Another time, we were riding at a breathing pace, through the green shaw, when we heard a countryman behind the bushes say to his fellow, “Thou didst not vail thy cap unto the king.” And the other made answer, “Na, I wunna. For, as comely as he is, wi’s blue eyen an’ white teeth, he’s as cruel as a viking, an’ strings up poor knaves an’ they do but say bent-grass is fox-tail. I’se none of such vikings.” Then the king said to me under his breath, bitterly, “So, all men love me! . . . I am a viking! sorrow is mine, my sister! I did but seek to keep them from notorious lying and violence and taking of bribes by a few examples: and they say I hang men for mistaking one grass for another!” Then considered I, and saw that of all men kings are born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward; and I pitied him in my heart. Also I saw that nothing mundane, including worldly pomp, royal estate, beauty of person, conjugal felicity, can give entire peace; which cannot be found out of ourselves, nor yet in ourselves, but only in God. Howbeit, I did not yet apprehend this perfectly.

As about this time, Alfred the king returned the Durham Book to the monks of Lindisfarne; offering them twenty hides of land, with men and horses thereto belonging, if they would part with it. But they would not; forasmuch as they alleged its value to be above rubies: therefore they returned him his circlet and holy ring.”

Also about this season began the doctrine of transubstantiation, newly brought over from France, to be much spoken about and spoken against among us. To me Æthelfled it seemeth the people of that land must needs, like the Athenians of old, be ever running after some new thing: inasmuch as, not many years back, they took up the religious worship of graven images, and thought to bring us unto it; albeit, we would not hearken unto them. Also, there are those among them that fable a place cleped purgatory, where the souls of them that were neither bad nor good (as though Christ spake of any but the sheep and goats!) are to be kept until that the prayers of the living set them free. I can only say that it will be a bad day for England when these corruptions are allowed to creep in and establish themselves among us: peradventure they will, for that we are too wanting in suspicion and too fond of imitating our neighbours; howbeit, I hope it will not be in the time of me Æthelfled: they shall not be countenanced in this house if I can help it.

Now, the time of my admission as postulante drawing nigh, my women were busied in making me the given number of white tunics; and I divided among them as impartially as I could, my pale and dark tunics, and all the rest of the gay coloured raiment I no longer should want. For simplicity and uniformity of attire is the first rule of the religious life. Natheless, my white tunics cost double the price of the coloured, and were more trouble to make. For there were certain folds in the wide sleeves I was minded to have fitted with much nicety, for the greater grace; which cost my maidens much trouble and some tears: whereupon Urfried, my mother’s woman, was heard to say there was less trouble in fitting a bride than a nun. Urfried would fain have all the credit to herself; and when the younger women tried the fitting and missed it, she was heard to say, “Young people are wonder’ wise now a-days; and yet I have been thought to know a cricket from a grasshopper.”

Now Æthelswitha’s mind was that I should enjoy as much world’s-pleasure as possible in the little time me remained: whereas, I desired, and my mother me upbore in it, that I should thenceforth partake of nothing that should interfere with my vocation.

Nevertheless, there was a pleasure, the only one in store, and a full brief one, the which my heart fastened on as greedily as it could have done on any pleasure of the world. This was my looked-for journey to St. Audrey’s in company of the king and the queen, who were minded to see me to the last, and who, I thought, would afford me even pleasanter and dearer companionship than even my father had done; and I wis that the imaginings of this journey, its halts and short stages, and my naturally being foremost in my companions’ thoughts, blinded me no little to the obscure darkness beyond. But mark how mundane things turn out! My mother was too feeble for the journey: Alfred the king was detained at court by pressing business; and he behoved to allot the conduct of the progress to the last person I could have wished to go with me. I ventured to name this slightly unto the king. He said, “Why?” . . . Alas! how hard a matter it sometimes is, when “Why” is asked, to give a straightforward answer! . . . I did not, and the matter stood as it was.

Now Æthelswitha was purposed in her heart to go with me, at least one day’s journey: nothing could shake her. So a company of spears was appointed; and the Mercian queen, thinking it promised fair to be a pleasing party, and being no ways minded to keep house with my mother, spake of going and returning with Æthelswitha. Truly this would have spoiled all; and if she had had the least ribblike feeling, she would not have thought to thrust herself between the parting embraces of two dear sisters. Happily, she gave it up; partly because Alfred the king went not, partly, methinketh, because that her hair always roughened much, riding in the wind, let her smear it ever so much with honey. And thus, my loved sister and I had not the trouble of her company.

(1) See Alfred’s Boethius.

(2) This narration rests on no better authority than that of Æthelfled, which, we need not repeat, is none at all. Some late literary frauds have made us tender on this subject. The Durham Book is one of the most interesting relics in the MSS. Department of the British Museum.

I will not say much of my parting with my mother: it could not fail that we should weep sore; howbeit, I dried mine eyes as soon as I could. Whoever you are, now a-reading this book, you cannot need to be told that great stir was occasioned at St. Audrey's by the arrival of the queen, who thought fit to go with me the whole way. All that day there was bustle and festivity; the day following commenced my three days' retreat, which I bore better than I had looked for; that is, more brave-like, but I think, not much to my spiritual good, for my thoughts were all in tumult. Then I confessed, and we all went to mass, (the queen had received the king's concurrence by a special messenger;) then I, in white yclad, stood outside the chapel door, and knocked. The priest and holy mother asked what I wanted. I made answer that I desired to be admitted as postulant into the community. They let me in, and led me up unto the altar. Then the priest cut off a small lock of my hair, and blessed me, and gave me a rosary. I arose, and went away, quite self-collected. At noon Ethelswitha departed.

In going up unto the altar, I had heard some one whisper unto my sister, "What a beautiful postulant!" which I tried not to attend to, nor remember. But how weak and wrong a thing to let me hear such an ejaculation at such a moment! For, doth not a single dead fly taint the box of precious ointment? And my self-devotion was at that moment as ointment poured forth at my Saviour's feet. Thus we add to one another's sins and to one another's burthens.

When Ethelswitha had departed, the holy mother summoned me into her chamber, and told me in detail the rule of the house.¹ While she was yet speaking, some one tapped at the door; and she said, "Come in," and proceeded with her discourse. A nun entered, who straightway kneeled down within the chamber, and continued in that posture until the holy mother had brought her speech to a close, which she did not hasten, but rather drew out. Now I Ethelfled had continually seen persons kneel unto the king and to the queen, and unto mine own father and mother, but had never known them thus left long together without being bidden to arise; and the newness of the sight was accompanied by commiseration for the nun, who appeared feeble in body, and frequently changed colour. Howbeit, the holy mother at length said composedly, "Thou mayst arise, daughter;" whereupon, the nun gat from off her knees, approached the holy mother, kneeled again, kissed the hem of her garment, and then delivered some trifling message. This little occurrence went much to the heart of me Ethelfled: I wist somewhat of the authority and dignity of the matres monasterii without doots, as, how that a mitred abbess was exempt from the jurisdiction of the diocesan, having in herself episcopal authority within her precincts, and also taking her seat in the great council of the nation; but I had neither beheld nor conceived the extent of her rule over her house, nor the amount of subjection of body, will, and thought, exacted of every soul within it. For albeit I had been bred up by an aunt who was an abbess, or, as we say in Saxon, abudine, yet the children in a monastic school see nought of the nuns' interior lives, wherefore my introduction to it was new and somewhat revolting to me.

The holy mother had scarce concluded her speaking, when the last Angelus rang us to the chapel, where I was ware of twenty pair of round eyes furtively gazing at me. After prayers came supper; and I found that my admission was to be kept as a kind of festival: though there was but a humble feast, after all. The sisters had treen' platters; and only the holy mother and I had silver spoons. Indeed, mortification was their rule; but they seemed willing to depart therefrom, too, all they could. As saith Tieme, "He helped him to the best, though it were but a marrow-bone." My seat was next the holy mother, which I took for a pleasing recognition of my rank; howbeit, I shortly learned it was only because I happened to be the only postulant. Recreation being permitted, there ensued some attempt at general discourse; but it proved so dull that I was glad when the bell tolled for complines. Then we all formed in solemn procession; and, with slow step and heads abased, proceeded to night-prayer. A novice read the prayers and we made response; while candles were lighted before different shrines. Then we remained awhile in silent meditation, very hushed and still: then one of the sisters read a discourse: then the holy mother blessed us: the portress brought in the house keys and laid them on the altar, saying, "O holy Father! preserve us this night from all evil!" Then we each kissed the floor; and proceeded orderly, silently, and in the dark, each to our own cell. There, having knelt in prayer, each again kissed the ground, saying "Dust I am, and to dust shall I return:" then crossed herself and lay down, saying, "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to you I commend my spirit."

I Ethelfled could neither sleep nor weep, nor even think. A tight cord seemed tied across my heart: spiritually speaking there was one. Wherefore I lay awake and still: and, at dead of night, I heard stealthful footsteps along the gallery. Two nuns and two novices were on their way to the chapel, to spend the consecrated hour.

At four in the morning we arose. We went in procession to the chapel. We spent an half-hour on our knees, in silent meditation. The bell rang the first Angelus.

(1) It is a disputed point whether the Anglo-Saxon monasteries were not under a simpler and more primitive rule than the Benedictine.

After this, we brake our fast. Milk, bread, and a white ill-made cheese, were placed on a table without a cloth. Each had a treen cup and platter. Each maintained silence. One read aloud. After breakfast, I was about to go and wash my hands, but was rebuked, and told I must first ask leave of a professed nun. Thereat I Æthelfled was moved in spirit: howbeit I gave no token thereof. Many a stone lies under the smooth water.

Then we went to our appointed duties: some to their needles, some to their books, some to their psalmody, some to ministering unto the poor. My business lay in the scriptorium. It was the pleasure of Alfred the king that I should obtain a competent knowledge of Latin; it being, indeed, very much against his rightwise will that the church prayers should not be in the vulgar tongue; since he would have had all men pray not only with the lips, but with the understanding also. Therefore it was that I Æthelfled, with his and the holy mother's concurrence, applied myself diligently unto the study thereof. And albeit I lamentably missed the aid of the king's chaplains, whose place my new teachers very poorly supplied, yet by uncommon application on mine own part, I progressed fast if not well: inasmuch as, though I never attained unto writing Latin with purity, yet my readiness in it exceeds that of any woman I know, to say nothing of many a priest, of that sort whom the king is wont to call abbey-lubbers.

Now in this respect, I soon found, and have continued to find all my life, that the labour brings its own reward. As saith the wise King, "If thou incline thine ear unto wisdom, and apply thine heart unto understanding, yea, if thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding, if thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures, then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord and find the knowledge of God." And this heartiness of application brought it to pass that the hours I spent in the scriptorium soon became the happiest of my day: and I even learned to love the death-like stillness, only broken by the twittering of the sparrows outside the window,¹ and the security from any more importunate interruption. Howbeit, just in the middle, it might be, of a difficult sentence, the second Angelus would ring; and after prayers came dinner; and after dinner, the hour of recreation, when it was singular to note after what various and child-like fashions the sisters would relax themselves . . . all under the holy mother's eye; and in her hearing, too!—and if she heard a word she thought amiss, (and they were many,) the recreation was suspended; which, save for the punishment of the rest, I should never have been sorry for, for it was no recreation to me. At the hour's end, the bell tolled twice; then each nun crossed herself, knelt down, repeated Pater Noster and Ave Maria, and returned to her allotted duty; and then my real recreation began. For, if I returned not unto the scriptorium, I applied myself, still at the will of the king and of the holy mother, to the study of church music; which, as understood and practised in this abbey, was, I must say for it, exceeding bad. In king Alfred's royal chapel, I had been used, aforetime, to have my soul lifted as unto heaven, while listening, as Aldhelm saith, "to the great organ with a thousand blasts, the car being soothed by the windy bellows, while the rest shone in the gilt chests." Also the sweet singers had transported me much with their holy hymning after the fashion of John the priest, who first brought the Roman method of singing into our island; and I learned many of their sacred chants by ear, and could finger them on the organ; and oft-times I regretted that there was no better method of marking the time apportioned to the square characters that signified the notes than that derived from the quantity of syllables inscribed over them. For some syllables should be uttered shortly, and some long drawn out, even as long as the breath will last without making the singer red in the visage or constraining to an abrupt conclusion: and, to facilitate this, I e'en invented a way for mine own use, which Alfred the king laughed at and yet said had good in it: to wit, setting the words beneath instead of above the notes, and placing above each note a numeral to signify how long the singer should hold his breath, whether while one might deliberately count one, two, three, or four. And this invention I was fully persuaded in mine own mind would greatly improve the practice of psalmody; and whensoever I should be abbatisse, I resolved to impart it to my nuns; but meanwhile it was necessary that I should study it a little more myself; wherefore I took every occasion afforded me by the holy mother, which was chiefly of an afternoon, to pursue the study of music all I could. And it commonly fell, that just as I was beginning to lose remembrance of things terrene and restraints conventional, and was upsoaring to heaven's gate like a lark, the last Angelus would ring. Then the rest of the round went on: in describing one day I describe a hundred.

Now the second night of my postulant's life, though I could not sleep, I could weep. Methought I saw Æthelswitha with her little child in her arms upstretching its tiny hands and pulling her hair over her face; and my pale mother, grave-like, sitting by and looking on as if she noted them not, but were thinking of me. Then I wept and wept, and thought of Æthelswitha's last whisper, 'Remember thou hast taken no vows as yet, thou hast only desired to enter the community,' and I was sore bested. Then, while as I lay weeping, I minded me of Eadwulf's bringing the news of my mother's illness, and of my going into the king's chapel what time as rang the second Angelus, and vowing a vow to dedicate myself a willing servant unto the Lord, if so be my mother's life might be spared. And as soon as I bethought me of this, my soul was no more tost, but I yielded to a quiet peace, and crossed my hands on my breast, and presently fell on sleep.

(1) Æthelr. literally, eye-hole.

Next day, I was summoned into the presence of the holy mother. She bade me give up any little trinkets and keepsakes I might have about me that might still keep up some remembrance of the world without. Reluctantly, I gave up one or two little love-tokens, I had hoped, from their simplicity, I might retain; but there was one, I affirm and declare by whatever is solemn, that I remembered not at the time, nor indeed, had on my person: to wit, that lock of king Alfred's hair which was cut off the first time of all that ever he came unto our house; and which I had since crypted with one of Ethelwitha's, and now was using as a book-mark. I declare I remembered it not: afterwards, I thought it was too late, the time was gone by, it would seem so silly and shameful to produce it; the holy mother would think I had kept it back of purpose, which I had not,—I had clean forgotten. Besides, that word 'whatever thou hast about thee' . . . and I had it not about me. So there could be no sin. Howbeit, methought I would confess it to the priest next time, and do as he bade me. Yet, as it fell, I in very deed forgot it that time; only to remember it again afterwards; so that it became a burthen unto me. Then I hid away the book-mark; but I wist where it was; had I had access to fire or candle, I would have consumed it. And so I fretted and was sorry for my sin; and at last told of it with tears, and said truly, I had forgotten it at first, and should I keep it now or give it up? To my great surprise and relief, the priest (he was very old and indulgent, though not very clever,) seemed to take little heed about it, and said I might keep it. Oh the joy of that permission! It was not that I cared so much, in very deed, about the book-mark, (albe it was the last token of those I loved,) as that it had been the occasion of sin unto me; and I thought that the holy mother had been the first cause of that sin, by exacting something of me that God would not have required.

Bearing this occurrence in mind, I have ever been very lenient with the young persons committed to my keeping; quick to detect deceit even about trifles, but gentle with them, and not exacting. For why should we increase each other's burthens? Are they not already heavy enough?

There were a few curiously illuminated missals and manuscripts in our library, to which I was allowed access; and a sister named Paula was proficient in this art, and gave me much instruction: so that I became skilful in the execution of delicate borderings and ornamental letters. When I had prosecuted this art some months, I happened to obtain a view of the Psalter I had illuminated for king Alfred, which he had lent unto the holy mother; and, alone as I was in the scriptorium, my cheeks were warmly suffused, when I beheld what miserable performances I in my folly and ignorance had set before the king. "What could he and must he have thought of them? and how was it he laughed no more?" were questions that troubled me greatly. At last, methought I was grieving more heartily for having been guilty of a laughable folly, than I might peradventure do for a serious sin. Whereat I took heart, and resolved to be a good artist even yet. He that stumbleth and falleth not, bettereth his pace.

Albeit the first week of my new course seemed as though it never would end, my neck grew used to the collar at last; and the zeal with which I applied myself unto my studies took off for the season all sense of wearifulness and mood-sourceness. Howbeit, my sedentary life and overmuch labour of the brain presently disordered my health. Thereat, the holy mother took grief; for, if I died before my profession, what would become of the goodly hereditaments that were to be alienated to the monastery? Moreover, she was well affected towards me: none the less so for my being the queen's sister, though she lost no occasion of showing that worldly distinctions were made no account of within abbey precincts. Nevertheless, seeing me fall sick, albeit I needed not to be sent into the infirmary, she somewhat abated the rigidity of the rule in my case, and caused me to exchange the too diligent employment of my pen for a certain measure of exercise in her garden. Even this was little enough for one that had been used aforetime to so much exercise in the open air; and whilens I paced the narrow walks amid the flower-beds, I mused in my mind whether women served God more rightlike for being mewed up like birds in cages; and whether, when I came to be abbess, I might not, in this respect, any wise remit the rule.

Now, while I was at my pen, the sisters were mostly at their needles: their embroidery was a very miracle for delicateness; and as it was much in request in the world without, and brought no small gain unto the abbey, they were habituated to work garments of empty pride in diversified colours, which I Ethelfled secretly thought inconsistent with their profession. For had they not by their own examples borne testimony against the wimples and the tunics of this world, the cyrcles, the mentels, and the fine linen? And had they not adopted, instead of a stomacher a sackcloth, and instead of well-set hair baldness, and I was nigh to saying, instead of much washing and bathing, a great indifference to the application of fresh water? Sorry am I to say it, but so it was: never have I yet been able to understand why, to present the cleaver heart unto God, we should go with unwashed hands: never could I see the peculiar sanctitude of St. Cuthbert's practice of wearing his leathern boots day and night for months together till they dropped off his feet; nor was there anything I less admired in Queen Etheldreda, abbess of Ely, and our patron saint, than her wearing none but woollen under-garments, and rarely using a hot bath. Howbeit, these things must of course be approached with reverence; and there may be something very improving in dirt, though I Ethelfled have never been able to find it, but on the contrary have always endeavoured to inculcate among the poor that resorted unto me for an alms, that cleanliness was next to godliness.

To a certain extent, it was indispensable to the sisters who broidered fine linen, or they would have marred their work. A new pattern was to them a thing of infinite moment. Discovering this, I recreated myself by inventing¹ and tracing for them figures of saints, angels, men and women hunting and hawking, greyhounds, eagles, peacocks, &c., the which they with their minute stitches ywrought in the perfectest manner. I think the Babylonish garment that made Achan to sin could scarce have been rarer than some of the robes which they worked; but they were too stupid to be able to depart from what was set down for them in any wise, without involving themselves in difficulty. Alas for the poor sisters! they were more like grown children than I had wist that women might be. The second evening that I abode among them, I had a moving instance of the slavish degradations to which they were subject. During supper-time, a sister was constrained to prostrate herself on the floor, and trace thereon the form of the cross with her tongue, for having betrayed some signals of impatience when one of the mothers chode her for having disfigured her work by pricking her finger. And while I was sorry at heart, and could not forbear casting wistful glances at the holy mother, who immovable sat, the others only smiled among themselves, and had no touch of compassion for her, the poor sister.

When I thus noted, day by day, how foolish and unspiritual were these my allotted companions, to cast my lot amongst whom I had absented myself from the angelical discourses of holy Neot, the deep reasonings of our Mercian Werewulf, and the heavenward aspirations of Alfred the king, I was dismayed within myself at the thought of becoming like these my associates, who only served to deaden my devotion. My walk with God became spiritless and languid: I confessed it with tears unto the priest: he prescribed the usual penances and remedies; and, after all, concluded with bidding me look forward to my new abbey. The first stone had, indeed, not yet been laid; but an assured hope, however distant, gives the soul a stay; and in my mind I saw it already getymbrade and gefrætwan,¹ leaded and glazed, with loud bells and deep-sounding organ, and beheld myself the mitred abbess, taking precedence of the abbess of Wimborne in the great council, and ruling a community of holy and high-born sisters, all spiritual, all intellectual, all meek-spirited, and all profoundly attached unto myself. Then considered I and bethought me, how we would relieve the poor, nurse the sick, instruct the ignorant, entertain noble travellers, illuminate manuscripts, send alms to foreign parts, and be well reported of all Christendom. Then mused I in my mind that at the present time my practice in sundry of these acts of mercy was but small; I wist not the properties of herbs like Gunfrid, nor to dress wounds like Urfried, nor to use the vein-knife like my blessed mother, nor to infuse cooling drinks like Ethelswitha. Wherefore I made prayer unto the holy mother that I might take my turn in the infirmary, which she readily granted. Herein I found two or three trifling cases, and one that was like to be protracted of long time, to the great trial of patient and nurse. . . . to wit, an afflicted sister called Mildred, who I think was as great a sufferer as the nun Tortgith of Barking, that was bound in the bonds of excruciating disease nine years, till at length her bones would hardly hold together. Is it not in Bede?

The skin of this poor nun was as colourless as parchment, and her frame so attenuated as that I could lift her with ease; and such were her patience and sweetness that I clave unto her in love, and found no greater pleasure than in ministering unto her night and day. And whereas her former nurses were well-nigh wearied out, and had grown somewhat fretful at being incessantly hindered of their sleep, they were thankful to be quit of their charge. And she, exchanging help that was begrudged for help that was proffered in love, conceived for me a deep and grateful affection, and seemed to take a new lease of life; albe it proved to be but a blaze of the expiring taper in the socket. Now, of this poor nun, I wist no more than that she was a thegn's daughter; for it was our rule to hold no discourse with each other concerning our forepast lives; wherefore she in like manner knew no more of me than that I was sister to the qucen. However, she made out, as was no hard matter, that I was sorry of cheer, and took to the cloister unkindlike. Wherefore, at those seasons her pains intermitted and gave her a little rest, she spake angel-like of the cares and temptations of this sorry world, and its short duration; and the long duration of the glory-bright heaven, and how little it would matter when once we had attained unto it, and saw our Lord in the face, through what tribulations we had passed to reach it, except indeed, that every tear shed would be another pearl in our crown. And she told me that when she found herself pining for a sight of the green fields, she thought how gay and enamelled would be the fields of glory, and when for the blue sky, she thought how blue would be the sky of heaven, and when for dear faces and old friends, how she should there have them for ever and ever, besides many new ones, as well or better worth knowing. Hearing her thus discourse, I became insensible or indifferent to my late afflictions; and she just lived to see me take the white veil, and then departed in peace, without need of the rosary expressly blessed by the Pope to procure her a happy death, for which the holy mother had sent to Rome. I looked out of window as her happy spirit fled, to see was there a trail of glory, but there was nothing of the sort, nor yet any audible sound of celestial singing; and yet I believe she went straight to heaven, for all that.

Now, as touching the white veil, which, had it not

(1) In later times, we find Dunstan designing patterns for a lady's dress.

(2) Adorned with tooth-like ornaments or zig-zags. The word getymbrade, though strictly applicable only to wooden buildings, was in common use even to express stonemasonry.

been for Mildred, I might never have taken at all, in spite of the contumely, so disappointed was I of what I had looked for in a convent life. . . The holy mother sent for me one day, while Mildred was still in the body and hard wrestling with her last enemy, and my mind was so pre-occupied with her, and mine eyes so accustomed to the darkened room, that the light of the gallery seemed strange to me. . . The holy mother did me to wit that the king and the queen had heard of my tender ministrations to the afflicted sister, and were marvelously moved thereat: that they esteemed and revered me beyond what they had ever done before I entered the cloister, and were purposed to show their uncommon sense of my deservings by coming to see me take the white veil: that I was a light set upon an hill that could not be hid; and othermuch to the same purport, which with earthly pride and human vanity elated the mind that, on entering the holy mother's chamber, had been set on far better things. The end was, that at that moment I felt no averseness to engage for all that was expected of me; and the preparations which thereupon immediately ensued for the approaching festivity, filled the whole abbey with jocundity, and made me see smiling faces wherever I went. Every one now was so kindly affectioned towards me that it seemed as if hitherto a cloud had been between me and them which had prevented me from discerning their merit: whereas, I believe, a transitory gleam of sunshine, a lighting of a dull landscape, would have been the better image. Even the nun Mildred, reviving a little ere she sped away into the realms of light, took an innocent pleasure in the richness of my dress, and the tiring of my hair, which she would smooth down with her thin hand: and, to please her, I would smile in her face whenever our eyes met; so that I seemed, even to myself, to be more light of heart. But then came my nine days' retreat, in silence, solitude, and fasting, which brought my soul more acquainted with itself than ever it had been yet. I think, if it had been protracted ever so little more, I should have gone mad, the pressure was so heavy. As it was, I had dreams and visions, sleeping and waking, of good and bad angels and many unutterable things, so that sometimes I could scarce forbear shrieking aloud. At length came a dull apathetic fit of waiting, and counting the days and the hours that divided me from Ethelswitha; and then a heavy, dreamless sleep. Therefrom I was awakened by the holy mother in her blindest voice; she told me the king and the queen had arrived, and the bishop was ready to confess me, and then I should dress, and sup in the parlour.

Oh, it was no simulated joy with which I greeted my sister! Saith the king, "So, Ethelfleda, you hold on to the end!" and I knew from his look and tone that he trusted I should do so in very deed, and would have been sore amazed and troubled had I given any signal of wavering. From that moment I took my part and played it. Oh, how gay was our supper! how sleepless the night that followed it! Awake I had been dreaming, and, when I might as well have dreamed, I could not sleep. The holy mother, on supervising my attire before I entered the royal presence, had said, "Thou wilt sadden the queen's heart, dear daughter, if she seeth how pale thy cheeks have waxen with nursing thy poor sister;" and would have touched them with a little stibium, a thing I looked not for in a nunnery; howbeit, though I dared not gainsay her with my lips, mine eyes did so in silence so plainly that she, smiling, said, "Thou art red enow, now. . . we will let nature hold her own"—and stayed her hand.

That night, methinks the king told me more of the current affairs of the realm during the foregone year than the holy mother would have recommended my hearing; but who shall say unto a king what doest thou? Wherefore I had matters to stay my mind upon for many a day: and persuaded I am that the cognizance of moving transactions takes our thoughts from too intent self-scrutiny and too harassing afflictions about petty troubles. The sisters being all so jocund without any simulation, Ethelswitha was advised to say, "How happy you all seem here! Were I not a queen, I would fain be a nun." And the king, eating our placentas, which, indeed, were very delicate, said, "If you holy ladies are always eating these good things, no marvel you are so fat and well-liking". . . If, indeed!—I have often since thought of their sayings.

There were certain law-deeds and parchments, abalienating certain of the portion of lands allotted to me, unto the abbey; but the most part was kept back till I should take the black veil. After the king and the queen had retired unto the guest-chamber, I remained kneeling before the host, until the first nocturn. At day-break, I received the holy communion. Then I was dressed as a bride, and the queen herself adorned me with jewels and sleeked my hair with the silver comb she had used in my childhood. When she saw mine eyelids quiver, she kissed me and said, "Thou art quite worn out, dear child, by thy tending of that poor nun." Then my bride-maidens led me to the steps of the altar. Then we sang "Domine, non sum dignus." Then the bishop blessed my novice's dress, and cut off a large tress of my hair. Then I retired into the house, carrying my consecrated habit, and I was clad in it, and my hair cut short round. Then I returned, carrying my late garments, which, after answering the appointed questions, I trampled on before the altar. Then the bishop blessed me and gave me a crucifix and a rosary.

The rest of the day was given to recreation. Mine was taking Ethelswitha to the bed-side of the poor Mildred, who looked on her with great reverence and affection, and spake certain words which the queen said in after-time she never forgot. When the king, the queen, the bishop, and all the gay train had departed, I in my new habit returned to the infirmary, where the poor Mildred now lay in one of her paroxysms. Feeling my hot tears drop on her face, she openeth her eyes, and gazing on me with an intense-like love and gratitude, saith "Sweet angel!" But I for myself was a-weeping.

But this was my best place. I held unto her till she died: and thereon returned to the scriptorium, and completed for king Alfred a copy of the Gospel of St. John, the reading whereof for the first time was to my soul's immortal good. Howbeit, I marvelled to find therein no word of abbeyes nor monasteries, nor of the celibate life, and spake thereof unto the confessor: but he said St. John's was a supplementary gospel, very good and profitable as far as it went; but wanting in many particulars I should find in the other gospels. So I took his word for it, having no help for it, and learned of St. John all I could till I attained unto the perusal of the other gospels, which occurred not until I had taken the black veil; and then, though I found therein no warrant for the celibate state, I had no help for it, and was forced to hope that though they sanctioned it not, they would not have forbidden it.

Now this my manuscript, being of a far different execution from the Psalter formerly mentioned, gave the king great contentation, and he caused it to be enclosed in a golden case, with precious stones beset, which, he said, was, after all, but a poor husk for so rich a kernel. The first page was in gold capitals on a pale lilac ground; the second in gold capitals on a dark blue ground.' This labour occupied nearly the entirety of my year's novitiate, and, there being then no question whether or no I should profess, I took the vows with all the privacy and solemnity thereto belonging. My nine days' retreat found me in a quieter and more solemnized state of mind than when I was wavering between one course and another. I confessed, as before death, unto the bishop, and received pontifical absolution. The day was ushered in by the tolling of the great bell muffled, as if I were in very deed dead; then ensued high mass, the celebrants and altar all in black. While the requiem was singing, the mothers and sisters drew nigh the sanctuary, each bearing a lighted taper. I prostrated myself on a black cloth, mine arms extended as if on a cross, during the litany for the dead. Then the bishop removed my white veil, and I retired into the sacristy, where my head was shaven. Then my head was covered, and I returned unto the bishop, who blessed my black veil and my cof. The holy mother produced the parchment inscribed with my vows, which I repeated in a low voice only to be heard by the bishop and herself, he holding the host before me, to represent the very person of Christ, to Whom I was now giving myself for ever. Then I signed the parchment on my knees; and the holy mother signed it; and then the bishop covered me with the black veil, and gave me the host; and I kissed the holy mother's feet, and we sang, "Domine, non sum dignus." Thenceforth I was called mother.

This was another step, and a very awful one in my life. I was not yet nineteen years of age, but I seemed to have left the world many years. Sometimes that appeared a dream, sometimes this; but I clave to Christ all I could, only that what were meant for my helps sometimes proved my hindrances. And now and then the question arose, Do we love Christ the more for seeing the world through a black veil? However, while we continue in the body, the veil must in many things remain on our hearts. Questionless, the world will look small enough, anyway, when we come to leave it.

My experiences, searching as they were, were presently exchanged for those of another sort, by the unexpected demise of the holy mother. She was of middle age, hale and hearty; but, one fast day, she ate too freely of a raw sallet, which she wist full well her stomach could not bear. Well-a-day! we all have our temptations, and we know we are not to abide here for ever; and she had the use of the blessed crucifix that came from Rome, too late for Mildred; nevertheless, it saved her not from strong spasms and convulsions. Wherefore, I, setting no great store by the same when it came into my possession, made a present of it to one who thought more of it, and who, on any wise, is the happier for it while she liveth, whatever case it may give her at her death.

In some measure unto my surprise, I found myself unanimously elected abbatiassa in the late holy mother's place. There was, indeed, none other nun among the sisterhood so well born, so well endowed with goods, nor so generally beloved; and I had always supposed I should eventually be Abbess of Shaftesbury; but there were so many elder women than I, who had been long time in the convent, that I was taken at unawares, and much startled at my new position. Though desiring free action and authority, I found myself unprepared, and gave myself much unto prayer. Five abbesses were present at my consecration, which was very imposing; and in private they favoured me with the results of their own experiences on many matters, some of which I found profitable, others not. The nuns offered me their homage with a heartiness that was genuine enough, for they concluded, from my youth and inexperience, they should enjoy some abatements to their rule. Howbeit, I passed the entirety of sundry days and nights in retreat, fasting, praying, and reflecting; and having at length made out my future course, I proceeded to work it out, in the manner I shall record in my next book, which I am stedfastly purposed shall be my last, and wherein I shall have something moving to relate, touching our salvation from great danger by Alfred the king.

(To be continued.)

(1) Vile Cott. MSS. Tit. A. 2: a copy of the Gospels that belonged to Athelstan.

FEMALE SERVANTS IN THE BUSH.

BY MRS. TRAILL.

"Let not ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, their destiny obscure."

I HAVE often heard families complain of the difficulty of obtaining and retaining good female servants, especially when they first come to this country, and dwell with much bitterness on the insolent freedom of manner they experience. That, while the rate of wages is nearly doubled, they are worse served than by even indifferent servants at home.

In Canada the demand for labour has hitherto exceeded the supply, and will do so for many years to come, excepting in places where a strong tide of emigrants has poured in on account of some tempting advantage offered them,—such as the carrying on of public works on an extensive scale. The servant knows her own value, and is not unnaturally disposed to take advantage of the necessities of her employer; she is in point of fact less dependent on her mistress than her mistress upon her. Such being the state of things, it is impolitic to commence your acquaintance with your newly hired female servant by assuming an air of haughty superiority over her,—assuming an attitude of defence before attack is meditated.

In a new country like this the same order of things does not prevail as in England, and something of dignity must inevitably be ceded if you wish to live peaceably with all men. Even servants fresh from the comforts and conveniences of good service at home, find much cause for discontent and unhappiness when they come to Canada. The change is not less felt by them than by ourselves: they also have to learn to conform to the ways of a strange country; they also feel the bitter pains of expatriating themselves, though they have more to gain and less ultimately to lose, by the exchange than we have; but their regrets for a season are often as acute. Let us, then, think of these things,—let us learn to treat them as human creatures, as fellow-creatures, subject to like feelings of joy and sorrow as ourselves, and let them see that we do so not because it is our worldly interest but because we are their Christian mistresses. Begin, then, by treating them with kindness and consideration. Servitude at best is a hard portion to bear; let us endeavour by judicious kindness to lighten the yoke of bondage. Take an interest in their happiness—their general welfare; lend a patient and not unwilling ear to their little histories; for they have all something to tell of their former trials that drove them to this country, their early wanderings and troubles in the first settlement they made, the hardships, sorrows and sickness they have met with. Believe me that much interesting matter may thus be obtained, some useful knowledge acquired, some valuable lesson of patience learned, by which your own heart may be benefitted and improved, and what is equally valuable, a feeling of confidence established between yourself and your household servants, who feel by these little acts of sympathy, that you do not despise them.

Truly do I subscribe to the fine sentiments of the poet whose truth must have been felt and experienced by every one capable of feeling aright,—

"Where is the heart of iron mould,
Stern, inaccessible and cold,
That melts not when its proud distress
Is balm'd by pity's gentleness?"

Irish servants are more plentiful than English or Scotch, and you will find a marked difference between those that come from the Catholic, and those that come from the Protestant counties; the former are generally less neat in their persons, and less perfect in their household work, but they are easily contented, more cheerful, good humoured, and respectful, quick to take offence where their country or religion is sneered at, and I might add, less trustworthy in word; they smile and joke, and yet have a latent feeling of jealousy in their hearts if you have offended them, which is only suffered to break forth when occasion suits. The Irish Protestants are clean, active, full of expedients and energy, more truthful and upright in their dealings, approaching nearer to the Scotch in many of their characteristics, than to their Catholic brethren; or to the English. Indeed it is often hard to distinguish, but for their tongue, the emigrants from the North of Ireland and the West of Scotland, the complexion often fair and ruddy, and the family names also assimilate. We have Gordons, and Hamiltons, Dunbars, Campbells, Macdonalds, and a host more of Irish Scotch names.

Though our best servants are from among the Protestant Irish, your pleasantest are found among the Catholic families. The most violent prejudices exist, the fiercest animosities are to be found between the Catholics and Protestants of this ill-fated portion of the British dominions, often ending in deadly quarrel; the party spirit is not extinguished by emigration, and as long as an Orange lodge exists in Canada, never will. They seem in some respects a distinct race, but in some points are brothers and sisters—in revenge and in pride, in that broad humour and smartness of repartee which seem common to them all, high and low, rich and poor, Catholic and Protestant, and a spirit of hospitality that makes you welcome to the homeliest or the richest fare. This virtue (and it is a great one) belongs peculiarly to the Irish; what they have is set before you with a heartiness and warmth of manner that is beyond all praise.

Irish pride is proverbial; and though I have sometimes been almost provoked into a smile at its absurdity on some occasions, still I regard it as a national trait that would if cannily guided lead to better things.

An Irish servant (the poorer and more destitute she is, the prouder) will never acknowledge poverty to have been the cause of her parents' coming out to Canada; she will voluntarily attribute emigration to any other motive than necessity. Nay, none of them will confess that they knew anything of hard labour till they came to Canada,—their fathers were farmers, and they had servants themselves, and only put their hand to work when absolutely inclined, to amuse themselves in that way. This you may believe if you are sufficiently credulous; but as it does no good to contradict them I seldom do so, unless by cross questioning to draw them out a little, and notice the variety of character, and their curious subterfuges, when hard pressed with a home question that was difficult to parry.

I have generally found myself most efficiently served by choosing my female servants when I could among the daughters of small farmers; young persons who have been brought up and almost bred in the country. These are generally speaking industrious, active and useful, well versed in all the various household labours of a Canadian settler's farm, proud of displaying their skill in the work of the house, and will often render valuable service on the farm in hay-making and harvest time. Ask this as a favour, however, but never demand it as a right, for they are tenacious of their dignity; though accustomed to work like labourers in the fields at home, they know they are not compelled to do so when hired in the capacity of household servants, unless some specific bargain be made to that purpose.

At home the young women often are compelled to assist in the clearing of the land, piling brush, heaping logs, hoeing and planting corn and potatoes, reaping, binding, anything and everything that they can lay their hands to; nay, I have even known instances of their chopping firewood, and helping to underbrush a fallow, previous to its being cleared of the larger timbers.

It is often to escape the wear and tear of this out-of-door toil that a farmer's daughter leaves her home to hire out for some months,—to rust herself, she will tell you, and to earn a little pocket-money to be laid out in finery which she dare not ask at her father's hands;—not that real and actual necessity impels them, for of the substantial comforts of life they often see more at their father's table, than at that of their master or mistress.

There is frequently among girls thus brought up a degree of familiarity of manner that savours a little too much of Yankee independence to be quite agreeable to persons accustomed to the obliging and obsequious manners of servants in Britain, and many of my fair countrywomen are disgusted at this trait in country servants: at first I was inclined to run restive myself, and openly to express my dislike to it, causing an immediate feeling of hostility amounting to insolence in return; but as I found it awkward to be left at a minute's notice, at an inconvenient time possibly, with a large wash of half-dried and un-ironed linen, or expecting friends, or worse, ill, and unable to do the work of the house myself, or to procure another to do it in the place of the departed one, I adopted a more politic line of conduct, which, perhaps, may by some be thought to savour too much of the wisdom of the serpent. But as I avoided rousing angry and resentful feelings, and the end was gained without offence, I think I may say it leaned also to the harmlessness of the dove.

As an instance of my ruse, I had hired a fine clever industrious girl, daughter to one of the small farmers in an adjacent township, one unaccustomed, however, to the restraints of servitude, and associating on equal terms with all her neighbours, men of substance, who had hewed for themselves an independence out of the thick forest. When Anne first came to live with me, she annoyed me by lingering in the parlour when I had guests, and not unfrequently putting in some remark of her own on a subject under discussion. Once or twice she seated herself in the same room with me, and caressingly laid her hand upon my arm while examining my needle-work. Now she was so clever, so useful, and so obliging, that I did not like to say anything harsh to wound her feelings; but one day, having occasion to speak of a former servant, I said I liked her but for one thing, she was apt to forget herself at times, and once actually laid her hand upon my shoulder, and even took a seat on the sofa at my side. "And this you know, Anne," I added, "was not respectful, and gave strangers a very low opinion of her breeding; they thought she was so ignorant of proper manners, for you often see that even among my own friends, they frequently wait to be seated, till they are asked."

I never had occasion after this to give even the least hint about over familiarity; Anne had tact enough to comprehend the implied reproof, and I enjoyed the comfort of an excellent servant for a twelvemonth.

Another of my damsels used to annoy me by humming, or singing, while dusting the furniture, or laying the cloth. One day Mary asked me a question respecting her predecessor, who was a neighbouring settler's daughter.

"Pray, Ma'am, did you like Rose as a servant?"

"Rose had a bad temper, and often made herself very disagreeable, and there was one habit that she had, that was very annoying to me. She used to sing and hum tunes when in the parlour, and one day a lady said to me, 'Do you allow your servants to sing in the parlour?' (this was literally the case.) And this you know, Mary, was very mortifying to me, but I named it to Rose, and she had the good sense to leave off the practice." From that time Mary never troubled me with any specimen of her vocal powers, excepting in the kitchen, where I had no objection to them: "A word spoken in proper season, how good is it," saith the wise king of Israel, who certainly had studied human nature very closely.

I had a nice good-humoured rosy Saxon-looking English girl in my house for some months, full of practical usefulness, but with a mixture of shrewdness and simplicity in her manners that made me smile. I used to be amused by her remarks on this country, and often listened to her details of humble life. One day she told me the little history of the troubles that forced her father to leave his native country. He bad by turns been a blanket weaver at Frome and Devizes, and when the trade became so bad that he could not live by his wages, he resumed his original occupation of labourer, and was one of the Marquess of Bath's numerous tenantry; but even here he found bread hard to earn, though Hannah, a lass of fourteen, and her mother, still worked at the loom or carled and spun at home in the cottage, and the boys kept sheep on the commons for the farmers. Still things did not go on well, and at last they fell into arrears with the landlord, and the furniture, loom, and wheel and all were sold for rent by the order of the steward; and so sorrow upon sorrow, and trial upon trial came, till their hearts were well-nigh broken. "Just then, wages were very low and work hard to be procured, and we could scarcely get food," said Hannah. "My father was suspected of snaring hares—and there were few that did not near us—and the overseer was savage when we came for our weekly allowance when father was sick and out of work. Uncle Henry had got a notion in his head some time before, and had gone off to Canada, and he found plenty to do, and plenty to eat and drink, and good wages, and wrote to my father to come out. Well, this was not easy, for we had no money to pay his passage, and he went to the overseer, and he told him to go about his business and work, and not leave his family chargeable to the parish. Well, I cannot just say how he picked up means to go, or who stood his friend, but go he did, unknown to the parish, who would not have let him off—and then came a hard time to us, for the parish folks were all angry when they found us all left on their hands, though mother and I did all we could, and so did the boys, and hard fare we had and hard times—and so a year wore over, a long hard year to us it was. At last we got a word in a letter sent to Devizes, that father was well and had got land and a bit of a shanty up, and we were to go to him as soon as we could find the means. Mother, she went off to the overseer and told him how she was wanting money to get us all out to Canada; but though the parish had to allow us something weekly to keep us alive, not one penny would they give her to get rid of us all, and he stormed and blustered and abused father; but then mother let him just know her mind, for her blood was up, and she said he was a fool, for the family would cost more in time than what she wanted for our passage money; but he only huffed her the more, and called us all vagabonds and poachers.

"Well, mother comes home in great distress—at last a neighbour came in, and when he heard what troubles we were in, says he, 'Why do not you go to my Lord Marquess's steward or to the Marquess himself?' So mother gets up and tidies herself, and says, 'Then I go to his honor's ownself;' and so she went and takes us all with her as clean as she could make us. Now the Marquess was at home, and he was so good as to speak to mother and to hear all her story, and when he had heard it he got quite savage-like with the overseers, and the Marquess said, 'Now don't tell it to I,' because he was riled like at them." This speech, repeated with the most earnest simplicity, almost overcame my gravity—but the Marquess gave them an order on his steward for money to take them all out and something for sea-storers. Hannah's mother was a wise woman to tell her own tale and plead her own cause with the great man.

I forget now all the simple wonderings that filled the minds of Hannah and her brothers and sisters at everything they heard and saw in their voyage out, and up the great river, and right glad were they when they met their father at Coburg, for they had exhausted every morsel of provisions and had begged a few turnips at some place to keep them alive—and when they came up through the woods near forty miles, they had to journey on foot. How strange it seemed to persons accustomed to the wide open treeless downs that form so striking a feature of that portion of England from whence they had emigrated. "What a strange waste of wood, and sticks, and faggots, we thought it as we journeyed, and when we used to sit down to rest on our way, I used to gather up all the loose branches and pile them in little heaps on the path, and say, 'Oh, mother, do'ee look here, we will come and fetch these to make fires with one day,' and then father would laugh at me and say, 'Why, Naunty, I have burnt more wood in one day than we ever burnt in all our lives at home.' And how we did stare at the great log heaps that fall, and still, I would think what a pity to destroy what thousands of poor creatures would go miles to fetch to warm themselves with in England, and dare not pick a stick to light their fires out of the hedges or woods." Hedges, indeed, there are few or none, for the enclosures are all of stone, not like the bowery law-thorn fences of Norfolk and Suffolk and Essex. The old man had settled among some of his own country folks, and so they were soon visited by old familiar faces, and a short time reconciled them to the change of country, and though they had their privations and hardships at first, they laboured in hope, and are now surrounded by many comforts; my little maid is at this time a careful busy thrifty wife, well-to-do in the township, with cows, and pigs, and fowls, and flocks, and herds, around her homestead, and three or four rosy, fat, well-clothed children, as good-tempered and English-looking as their mother. I wish the Marquess of Bath could but see them!

THE RECLUSE.¹

A STORY OF THE COAST OF FRANCE.

IV.

On recovering consciousness Annette found herself at home, surrounded by neighbours who, under pretence of taking care of her, had hastened to her bedside to gain all the information they could. They were all eager to learn why the young girl had been in the grotto of Castelli with Lewis Marzon, and how it happened that the tide had surprised them.

(1) Continued from p. 211.

Annette could only escape their cross-questioning by feigning weakness, which prevented her answering. When they found they could learn nothing they retired one after another, after forming endless conjectures more or less distant from the truth. The poor girl heard enough to perceive that the real cause would soon be known, if indeed it were not already discovered, and she trembled at the thought of what might take place. On his return from Turbale the following day her father would hear everything, and, after what had passed between them that day, she could not hope to deceive him. He would think the meeting at the rocks of Castelli an appointment with the young man, and the audacity of this disobedience would inevitably lead him to take violent measures.

Tortured with anguish, knowing not on what course to decide, and, unable to endure the misery of uncertainty, the young peasant determined to rise and go to the rector's house in order to ask his advice. She found the venerable priest in his garden enjoying the evening breeze. It was one of those lovely summer evenings in which night appears unwilling to disturb the calm beauty of the scene by casting her shadows over the earth. Annette saw the rector walking in the large avenue formed by a double row of pear-trees, at the end of which appeared a sun-dial bearing the inscription, "Et regit et regitur." He had just heard of Annette's adventure, and was very much surprised to see her.

"God be praised! I thought you more seriously unwell, my poor Annette," said he, tenderly; "and I am happy to find you already recovered from so terrible an accident. You are come, I trust, to render thanks to Him who has preserved you."

"For that and for something else besides, Monsieur le Recteur," replied the young girl, timidly; "for I am in great trouble, and you alone can aid me."

"Even if it were not my duty I should most willingly do all in my power to assist you," returned the old priest. "Let us hear what you have to say."

Annette looked down the dimly-lighted avenue as if she feared being overheard.

"Excuse me," said she, in a low voice, "but I would rather speak to you in another place."

"Where, my child?"

"At the confessional."

"At this hour the church is closed, you know," observed M. Lefort; "and if we return to the parsonage old Cattie will see you, and then she might talk about it; trust to me, therefore, my child, and stay here. God is everywhere present, and I promise you that none but He and myself shall hear you."

Thus saying he led the fisherman's daughter to an arbour situated in a corner of the garden. He placed himself in the darkest seat and pointed to a wooden stool, on which the young penitent knelt down. A few birds, startled by this unexpected visit, chirped as they fluttered about in the trees surrounding the arbour; then all was silent, a distant murmur alone being audible, borne by the summer breeze, which was fragrant with the perfumes of the rose and clematis.

Annette then commenced, under the form of confession, a narration of all that had taken place since the morning. Having once conquered the first trepidation, she confessed everything without reserve and without omitting the smallest circumstance, for she unconsciously experienced pleasure in speaking of this attachment, which it would, of course, be necessary for her now to give up. The aged priest permitted her this last and melancholy joy; he listened patiently until she had finished her confession and was interrupted by her tears. He then spoke, not in a tone of reproach, but with compassionate gentleness; he showed her the danger of this attachment, disapproved alike by universal opinion and the wish of her father. He then proved to her the necessity of separation, which she herself had feared would be requisite for her own reputation and Marzon's safety. There now remained the difficulty of making the young man share this sentiment. M. Lefort undertook the task himself; he praised Goron's daughter for her conduct, urged her to bear the trial nobly, and sent her home, if not perfectly resigned, at least more tranquil.

On the following day, which was Sunday, she awaited her father's return with a mixture of fear and impatience; but the hour of service arrived, and neither Goron nor Lubert had made their appearance. Annette went to church with a sad heart. The people in their Sunday attire were arriving from the surrounding villages, and all were talking about the adventure at Castelli. She could only shield herself from the general curiosity by taking refuge near the altar. When there her first glance fell on Lewis Marzon. Annette knew not the result of his interview with M. Lefort, and feared to look on him. Kneeling before the altar, she kept her eyes fixed on her book, and endeavoured to think exclusively of the prayer, while, despite her utmost efforts, she found her thoughts constantly wandering. It was only in the middle of the service, when M. Lefort entered the pulpit, that she ventured to raise her head. The priest had selected for his text the following words—"Blessed are they that mourn!" and although the sermon was as simple and short as usual, the young girl could not listen to it without being deeply affected. It seemed as if the consolation spoken of by the aged man was intended especially for herself and Lewis; but when, at the conclusion of his sermon, he recommended to the prayers of his parishioners one of their number who was shortly to leave Piriac, Annette felt her courage fail. She turned suddenly towards Marzon; he was at his usual seat, so pale and so sad that she closed her eyes and covered her face with the book she held in order to conceal her tears. The service concluded before she had gained strength to conquer her emotion. She remained in the same position and buried in grief, whilst the church was being gradually deserted, and groups of gossips were forming in the cemetery and on the harbour.

Several boats had just returned in order to take shelter from the violent wind that was rising. After having examined the horizon and made their remarks on the stormy weather that was in prospect, the fishermen and farmers who were assembled began to talk of the occurrences of the preceding day, with numerous versions of the matter and ill-natured comment thereon. Lubert, who had just disembarked, heard them at first without paying much attention; but when Peter arrived and explained how he had saved Annette and Marzon, he ran to Goron, who was superintending the arrangement of the boats, and related in his own style what he had just heard. The sailor guessed more than he heard; he left his boats quickly, joined the group, and inquired minutely what had happened. A few words sufficed to make him understand the whole affair. His first inquiry was for Marzon.

"He is saved. Did you not hear? Are you afraid your daughter is a widow already?" said Peter, laughing.

"Then he is in the town?" resumed Goron.

"I saw him just now at church."

The sailor drew his cap over his eyes and buttoned up his waistcoat.

"Long Mark!" exclaimed he, turning to his companion, "we must have that fellow dead or alive."

"I will run and bring him to you," replied Lubert, moving towards Marzon's cottage. At that moment the latter issued from it with Julius, carrying a stick with a small bundle at the end on his shoulder. Goron hastened towards him, seized him by the hand, and dragged him towards the group of fishermen.

"What do you want, M. Goron?" inquired the young man.

"I want you to tell me here before all these people why Annette was with you yesterday in the grotto," said Goron, with a look of ill-concealed hatred; "but I demand the truth, do you hear? Nothing but the truth; for, by heaven! if you do not tell it, this shall be your last falsehood."

"I have no reason to tell an untruth," answered Lewis, in a sad but perfectly calm tone. "You threatened, it appears, to do some injury to me; your daughter was afraid; and as she went to fetch 'la Rougeande,' came down to the rocks of Castelli to warn me."

"And they talked so loudly that they did not hear the sea coming in," added Peter, with a boisterous laugh; "the devil take me if that needs any further explanation!"

Goron turned towards the fisherman with his clenched fists; but, reserving his rage for Marzon, he exclaimed fiercely—

"Do you hear that, vagabond! There! thanks to you, Annette's character is taken away."

"Do not think that, M. Goron," returned Lewis, eagerly, "a joke is not an opinion; those who have known your daughter from her childhood will not be so ready to condemn her; and Peter himself, who saved her body, would not wish to take away her good name."

"No, by my faith!" said the fisherman, touched by the youth's appeal to his benevolence; "may the crabs eat my eyes if I intended to injure Annette! What I said was merely for the sake of talking, and because everybody knows that you are fond of her."

"It is false!" exclaimed Goron, stamping with rage. "Thunder and lightning! tell him it is false; tell him that Annette is nothing to you, that you know she is too far above you in station; tell him that you never thought of her! Tell him directly."

"Pardon me, M. Goron, but I cannot tell an untruth," replied Lewis, mournfully, but firmly.

"Then you confess your insolence, bastard!" cried the now furious sailor. "Do you hear that, Lubert? This is the fellow who wanted to usurp your place."

"Very good!" replied "tall Mark," who had not hitherto taken part in the discussion, but who now seized the opportunity of putting in a word; "now we shall find out who is to be conqueror. Come, make haste—take off your jacket."

"It is useless," answered Lewis, quietly; "I know that you are stronger than I."

The spectators raised a murmur of surprise.

"Do you see that? He is afraid!" cried Lubert, triumphantly, turing up his sleeves and showing his muscular arm; "but nevertheless I should like to punish him all the same."

"No," observed Goron; "that is my business;" and, advancing to Marzon, he continued, with closed teeth:—"You are afraid of 'tall Mark,' miserable coward! Come, let us see if you will have more courage with another."

He had slowly raised his hand, and now struck the youth on the face. The latter started; the colour rushed to his cheeks, but he did not make the slightest movement.

"What!" exclaimed the captain, maddened by this calmness, "have you not even courage to defend yourself? Must I renew the attack?"

A second blow, then a third, reached Marzon, who still remained immovable. This time a cry rose from the fishermen. Insult and abuse were heaped upon the young man; without replying, he quietly wiped off the blood which covered his face.

At the first blow struck by the captain, Julius had darted to his brother's aid with a stone in each hand; but, on seeing that he attempted no defence, he remained at a little distance astounded and almost indignant. As to Goron, disarmed in spite of himself by the passive attitude of his adversary, he again had recourse to abuse, when he was interrupted by loud cries, in the midst of which his own name and that of Lubert were alone distinguishable. He turned round, and perceived several of the inhabitants of the village approaching and pointing to the sea.

"Well! What are they shouting for in that manner?" inquired Peter.

"There! Look at the isle of Mât!" answered the voices.

"At the isle of Mât? Well, what next? What's the matter?"

"The signal of distress!"

All eyes turned to the spot mentioned, and the flag was seen distinctly, although in the distance.

"The devil take me if it is not indeed a signal of distress!" observed Peter, "for the Béarnais does not sport his flag for a mere trifle."

"He is likely enough to need assistance, for when we were last at the island bringing home the cattle, he was very ill," added a farmer.

"Who, then, will go to his aid?" inquired a woman.

"That is Goron and Lubert's business," replied Peter.

Every one looked towards the two sailors; but Goron, who had been carefully examining the weather, shrugged his shoulders.

"Goron and Lubert are not sea-horses," observed he, quickly; "let the sailors, if there are any, look before them."

The sea, in truth, presented at that moment a most terrible and formidable aspect. The foam-topped waves heaved like enormous mountains; a north-west wind was blowing violently, and a deep roar was heard along the coast like an ominous warning. Near the horizon a few streaks of light were visible between the clouds, but the rest of the sky was enveloped in obscurity.

"To tell the truth, the weather looks bad," said Peter; "it is getting worse every minute, and those who leave the harbour have only to commend themselves to their patron saints, for neither oar nor sail can be of any use."

"You know very well," said Lubert, "that no Christian would think of going out as long as this gale is blowing."

"Ah! if I had a boat!" exclaimed Marzon, who from the first had been looking anxiously at both sea and sky.

"Long Mark" turned towards him.

"A boat!" repeated he, satirically, "and pray what would you do with one, coward?"

"What you dare not do," replied Lewis, whose eyes sparkled with animation; "I would go and assist him who has need of aid."

"You!" exclaimed Lubert, bursting into a rude laugh. "Ha! ha! bravo! well done! Do you hear that, eh? good people! The bastard has forgotten what happened just now."

"Just now," returned Marzon, "I told you that you were stronger than I; now prove that you have as much courage; take your boat and let us set out together for the island."

Lubert appeared embarrassed. He looked at those around him, and seeing all eyes fixed on him, raised his shoulders, and, addressing Goron, said, with a sheepish air,—

"What do you think of that, captain? The 'scallor gleaner' thinks himself braver than us!"

"If I am mistaken, come with me," said Lewis.

"Thank you," replied "Long Mark," with an expressive shrug, "I do not wish to furnish a meal for the sharks."

"Then you would leave a poor solitary man without assistance!" exclaimed Lewis, with animation, and looking on those around him. "Ah! God will now avenge me. Just now you deemed me a coward because I yielded to one stronger than myself; but it is chance that gives strength, whilst courage depends upon ourselves. Let those who laughed at seeing my blood flow now prove that they had a right to laugh. I defy them in my turn. Let them give me a boat and take one themselves; it will be a duel on sea with a good action or death at the end. Is there no one here but myself who has sufficient courage?"

"There is at least one besides," exclaimed Annette's father, who had been listening attentively to the young man's proposal; "if it were to hell itself, it should never be said that Goron refused to go. Take Lubert's boat; I will go with him in my own!"

"With me?" cried "all Mark," in alarm.

"Are you afraid?" asked the sailor quickly; "then stay where you are, I will go alone."

"It is not that, captain," stammered the giant, evidently hesitating between the dread of peril and that of contempt, "but the thing is impossible, seeing that Marzon cannot manage my boat alone . . ."

"Well, will there not be two of us, great coward?" exclaimed Julius. "Are you really going to stay behind at this time because the sea is stronger than you? Come, Lewis, let us leave him in his shame, since he dares not do as we do."

The child took his brother's hand, and both hastened to the boat, which they began instantly to prepare. Goron proceeded to do the same with the second boat, assisted by Lubert, whom terror had deprived of his naturally small amount of sense. In the meantime, the spectators assembled on the quay were freely expressing their fears, and unanimously condemning the rash enterprise. The women in particular, attracted by the announcement of this singular challenge, declared that it was a shame to let human beings rush on thus to certain death, and urged the men present not to permit them to leave the shore; but old Peter shook his head.

"The white caps know nothing about it," said he, seriously; "now it is a battle between them; their honour is at stake, and, as far as it concerns Marzon and Goron, it were better to perish than fold back at this time."

His companions assented in silence; but the women exclaimed that such a combat was offensive to God, and that they were thus exposing their souls as well as their bodies to destruction. Some one proposed telling the rector and Annette, and a messenger was despatched in search of them.

The two boats had just been launched, and the men were rowing to the entrance of the harbour; they arrived there at the same instant, and stopped to hoist the sails. It was a solemn moment to the spectators. They looked with feverish interest on the two boats, now sheltered by the harbour, but separated only by a few feet from the raging sea. When the sails were hoisted, there was a general movement, and some cries of terror were heard. Marzon and Goron, who were at the helm, turned round and waved their hats. Almost at the same moment the boats, which had left the harbour and were entering upon the open sea, started like two race-horses, so much inclined that the lower part of their bulwarks were brought to the water's edge. They were approaching the great channel where the strong current augmented the danger, when Annette and the rector arrived on the quay. On perceiving the sails, the poor girl uttered a faint cry, clasped her hands, and felt her strength failing.

"Heavens! it is too late," murmured she, leaning against the cemetery wall.

The aged priest himself was unable to restrain an exclamation of grief; he eagerly inquired of the attendant fishermen the circumstances of the challenge, and when they had related everything, he asked in a low tone if the danger were really great. The fishermen looked at one another without answering, save by shrugging their shoulders. At length old Peter, who was diligently watching the barks, made an ominous gesture.

"Except the ebb tide, which is in their favour, everything is against them," said he; "the wind is due south, and they are obliged to keep in a current where every wave may dash over them. Without mentioning that, if they can manage to get near the island they will meet with a squall or two there, and then, woe betide them! Besides, your reverence himself can perceive that the sea does not look right; on all sides there are those short waves that dash a boat to pieces; the storm is under the water, and that is far the worst. Look how the sea heaves! One would think the devil were at work. But after all, one can never call men lost as long as they have a plank under their feet, and a sail over their head; however, if I were in their shoes, I must confess I should have no hope save in the mercy of God."

"Then let us apply to Him," said M. Lefort, devoutly, "and seek from Him what we cannot perform ourselves,—namely, a miracle!"

With these words he entered the cemetery, and stopping at the foot of the cross, commenced aloud the prayer appointed for sailors in distress. The women, kneeling on the graves, repeated the responses, whilst the men, who remained standing and bare-headed, looked alternately at the priest and the ocean. Annette remained in the midst of them, and although her hands were clasped, and her lips mechanically repeated the prayers, her eyes remained fixed on the sea on which all she loved was exposed. The two barks continued to tack about at a short distance from each other, but differently managed. Whilst that of the young man proceeded cautiously, tacking more frequently and avoiding the current, Goron's vessel, as if impatient of pursuit, sailed close up to the wind, notwithstanding the violence of the tide. Several times it appeared buried in the waves, whence it rose again with difficulty. The oldest of the fishermen expressed in low voices their disapprobation of the captain's conduct.

"He is trying to get there first from pride," said one; "may God forgive him! pride will ruin him."

"He is changing his tack already," said old Peter; "he is always too soon."

"He is just getting into the whirlwind," returned the first speaker; "by heaven! this is the time to pray for him, friends."

The boat was approaching a kind of cloud which played on the waves, and appeared in front of the sun like a dark mass. Beyond appeared the tale of Mât, illumined by the dull red light that always accompanies a storm. On approaching the whirlwind, Goron's boat appeared to rise out of the sea, and darted like an arrow into the dreadful cloud: that of Marzon, which arrived a few seconds later, entered obliquely and more quietly. The disappearance of the two barks created a sensation which was betrayed by a general silence. All the spectators were watching, with out-stretched necks and terror-stricken hearts; but minute succeeded minute, without witnessing any reappearance, and fear was changed to agony. The most experienced of the fishermen, who had calculated the time necessary to escape from the whirlwind, looked at one another and shook their heads mournfully.

"That is what I dreaded," said he who had formerly spoken, in an under tone. "When a boat gets into these whirlwinds, it is almost sure to be all over with it. Nothing can stand before them."

"Hold!" interrupted Peter, converting his hand into an imaginary telescope. "Cannot you see something down there, just coming out of the mist?—close by the island—waving about over sea—look!—above the wave! It looks like a white sail."

"It is a shattered vessel!" exclaimed a young fisherman of keener sight.

At this exclamation the prayer was interrupted; the women and M. Lefort himself hastened to the water's side. The object indicated by old Peter was now distinctly visible: it was indeed a boat, but dashed almost to pieces and filled with water. Annette, who like the rest of the group saw it but too plainly, fell on her knees and stretched out her hands towards the sea, sobbing violently, whilst the women around her testified their compassion in that loud, boisterous manner which far from allaying grief, tends only to aggravate and increase it. Suddenly another cry arose from those who were still watching, and all hands pointed to a spot on the horizon. A second vessel was issuing from the cloud, with its keel almost out of the water.

"Look! the red sail! it is Marzon!" exclaimed old Peter.

"He is going to the aid of Goron," added all the voices.

"Provided he arrives in time!"

"He has shaken out a reef!"

Marzon appeared in truth to have cast his prudence to the winds; he was hastening with full sail towards the shattered bark. On reaching it, the spectators saw him take down his sails, and they concluded that he was endeavouring to save his shipwrecked opponents; although, on account of the distance, they were unable to discover whether he was successful or not in his endeavours. Each one hazarded a conjecture almost instantly opposed; at length, after a long stay, variously interpreted by those on land, Marzon again put up his sails and turned towards the island, evidently with the intention of landing at the "cote espagnole." As soon as he was out of sight, M. Lefort went to Annette who was still on her knees, buried in despair.

"Rise, my daughter," said he in a tone of mild authority; "whether you have to thank God for his preserving care, or seek consolation from him, come and pray." And taking her hand, he led her into the church.

V.

WHILE the inhabitants of Piriac, assembled on the quay, were indulging in numberless conjectures, and Annette was still praying fervently before the altar of the Virgin, the objects of their solicitude and prayers were safely lodged in Leo Marillas' hut on the isle of Mët.

Near the hearth, on which a fire of dried sea-weeds was burning, appeared Goron and Lubert, who had been saved almost miraculously by young Marzon's courage. Their attitudes, which were characteristic, presented a striking contrast the one to the other. Goron, on recovering his consciousness, had resumed his usually stern and gloomy air, and humiliated rather than terrified by the shipwreck, was silently wringing the water from his sleeves. "Long Mark" on the contrary, with dilated nostrils, staring eyes and pallid lips, was trembling with fear, and muttering disjointed exclamations. The agony he had endured while clinging to the wreck before Marzon came to their rescue, had deprived him of all his strength, and his limbs failed with his courage. He might have been compared to an oak of healthy and robust appearance, but rotten inside, which the first tempest quickly fells.

At one end of the hut, Marillas lay motionless on a sailor's hammock, breathing in the short, quick manner which indicates approaching dissolution. Bending over him was Lewis, who, with intense anxiety, was watching the struggle between life and death, while at the foot of the bed knelt Julius, who was repeating the only prayer he had been taught by his mother.

After a tolerably long silence, Goron rose from his seat, shaking himself like a wolf on issuing from his den; he moved towards the narrow window which looked on the sea, and returning to the fire-place said quickly, and in a low voice to "Long Mark:"

"Come, get up! the wind is falling, it will be calm directly, we must take advantage of it to fish up the boat."

"Where? what boat?" stammered Lubert, turning towards the captain with a sheepish look.

"The one you caused to be dashed to pieces for want of getting the sheet-rope ready," replied Goron, angrily; "it must be close to the island; take your own boat, and we shall be able tow it in."

"What! do you want to set out again already," exclaimed Lubert, "when the sea is running as high as it is now? May I be drowned if I expose either my body or my boat at present!"

The sailor looked at him with contempt.

"Pray take care of your precious carcass," said he with a scornful laugh; "just because you have had a good soaking for a few minutes you are as terrified as a woman! The sea-water has drowned your courage."

"Be it so!" interrupted the giant, hastily, shuddering at the recollection of the past; "but I advise you not to talk about that, seeing you are the cause of it all."

"Then was it I, pray, who did not attend to the latching properly?" inquired Goron satirically.

"It was you who compelled me to follow you," returned Lubert, bitterly; "when the 'sea-shore gleaner' challenged us to embark, did I want to accept his proposal? I would willingly have made him hold his tongue with my fists; but you accepted his challenge from false shame. It was truly worth the trouble of coming here at the risk of one's life, to hear one's self abused!"

Marzon, who was still at the bed-side of his dying friend, turned round and motioned them to be silent.

"Not so loud, for Heaven's sake!" exclaimed he, "Marillas can hear you."

Lubert lowered his tone and said between his teeth: "Yes, yes, we have made a pretty mess of it, the captain has something to be proud of indeed! It will be lucky for him if he only loses his boat!"

"Well, I know where to find it," replied the sailor, putting on his jacket, "and since you have not courage enough to help me, I will go alone."

"Monsieur Goron will not, I hope, refuse to permit me to accompany him," said Lewis, advancing towards him; "but I should not like to leave poor Marillas at this crisis, and there is nothing to fear for the boat. I secured it by the two anchors, with the head to the wind; it cannot be injured; you would find it in the same situation if you left it for a week."

"That's not a bad idea!" observed the captain, evidently bestowing his praise on the youth with embarrassment and repugnance; "I did not think you such a good sailor."

"Monsieur Goron forgets that at one time he used often to take me out to assist him," said Marzon, "and in a good school it is easy to learn."

The captain glanced quickly at Marzon, as if doubting the sincerity of the compliment; but the manner was so unaffected and the face so truthful that he felt constrained to receive it in the same spirit in which it had been offered.

"Very good!" said he, "then we will wait, and when the sea is as calm as a pond, perhaps, 'Long Mark' will find courage to take an oar."

"Be quiet with this nonsense!" exclaimed Lubert, ashamed of his cowardice, but unable to subdue it, and at the same time irritated by being reminded of it; "really, captain, you are enough to make a lamb savage! One would think you wanted me to be drowned!"

"You would have been so by this time, had it not been for Marzon," observed Goron, sarcastically, knowing by his own experience how humiliating this idea would be to "Long Mark."

The latter stamped on the ground angrily.

"Thunder and hail! I was not speaking about that!" returned he: "besides, it was a service he rendered you as well as me."

Marzon attempted to interfere, but Goron and Lubert would not permit him to interrupt their dispute.

"Thank the bastard for having taken your boat," said Goron, tauntingly; "if you had managed it, it would have been at the bottom of the sea by this time."

"I should at any rate have been able to buy another," replied Lubert, "seeing that I am not a beggar like some people!"

"Do you mean like me?" inquired his companion.

"Not you so much as others," returned Mark, with a rude laugh, "since my money is on the point of entering into your family."

Goron, who had resumed his seat by the fire, sprang up hastily.

"Neither you nor your money shall ever enter my family, detestable coward!" exclaimed he.

"Well done, captain," murmured a feeble but distinct voice.

Goron looked round: the face of the dying man was turned towards the fire; his respiration seemed more easy, and there was a singular lustre in his eye. Marzon hastened towards him with an exclamation of joy.

"God be praised! you are better, Marillas," said he, bending over him; "it was only a crisis, and now it is passed."

The Béarnais looked up at his young friend, and a faint smile played on his parched lips.

"Get the taper and the holy water ready, nevertheless," resumed he, in a slow voice, as if careful of using it; "but before dying, I shall at least have the satisfaction of knowing that Annette will not marry this Hottentot."

"I would rather see her carried to the cemetery with the white crown on her coffin!" said the captain, casting a look of anger and contempt on Lubert.

"It were better to lead her to church with the white bouquet," observed Marillas, "and that would be easily done, captain; for here is a young man deeply in love with Annette, and if I heard rightly, you were not sorry to find him so near you just now, on the water."

"I do not wish to deny the services that have been rendered me," replied the sailor with a gloomy air.

"That proves the commencement of a desire to reward them," continued the Béarnais, "and perhaps Annette might be prevailed upon to undertake the task without much difficulty."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Lubert, striking his hand on his thigh with a contemptuous laugh, "there's a son-in-law who would decidedly be a credit to Goron! I should just like to know what he will say, when the mayor asks him whose son he is?"

"He will answer that he is the son of his own courage and abilities," said Marillas; "These are parents you have not had, 'Long Mark,' for if you had been left unprovided for, like Lewis, instead of gaining an honest livelihood by picking up what you find on the beach and the rocks, you would now be wandering about on the roads with thieves or beggars."

"As you please," said Lubert, not knowing what to answer; "I was not speaking to you, Béarnais; pay attention to your own affairs, and leave those in peace who have yet strength to live. Besides, it is no good for you to talk; Marzon will be no less a beggar or more able to keep a wife for all your fine speeches; besides, he does not know how to do anything."

"You have seen that I can manage a boat," observed Lewis.

"When you can find any one to lend you theirs," added "Long Mark;" "but pray tell us where your own is?"

"Here," interrupted Marillas quickly; "I will show it you," and motioning Lewis to assist him, he raised himself on his left elbow, slipped his right hand under the pillow, and after feeling about for a few moments, drew forth a leather case, which he opened. Louis-d'ors glittered on the counterpane. "There are nearly fifteen hundred francs here," continued he; "this is twice as much as will be necessary for purchasing a boat. If I live, Lewis will pay me by degrees as he is able; if I die, as you may be certain I shall, this is all for him. What can you say to that, 'Long Mark'?"

"Me! nothing, monsieur Leo," said the giant, who had never before seen so much gold, and who felt intimidated by the presence of the possessor of such a sum; "of course the captain will be sure to favour Marzon now; but, nevertheless, I cannot understand why you have taken such a dislike to me?"

The dying man slowly raised his hand and pointed to the wall at the foot of the bed; the "cobiau" killed by Lubert was hanging there with its half-opened beak and powerless wings. Lubert, disconcerted, bowed down his head.

"I warned you that an hour would come in which the feeble would avenge themselves," said Marillas, bitterly; "try to remember this lesson. And, you, Goron, do not sacrifice the happiness of your daughter to false shame; give your hand to this brave youth in token of your good-will."

The sailor hesitated. He looked first at the gold scattered on the bed, then at Lubert, who was twirling his cap round his finger with a sinister expression on his dark face, and lastly, at Marzon, whose countenance was radiant with hope, and suddenly coming to a determination, he exclaimed,—"I care not what they may say! After all, I did not know Lewis; he is a real sailor. Annette and he may arrange the matter as they please, and the sharks devour me if I interfere with them."

He extended his hand to Marzon, who seized it with a cry of delight, and turned to the Béarnais. "Ah, now you will live to see the happiness which you have caused!" exclaimed he, falling on his knees by the bed-side in a transport of joy.

The dying man could not reply immediately. Giving one of his hands to the young man, who covered it with kisses, he placed the other on his head in silence; two little tears trickled down his livid cheeks. At length he made an effort, and murmured,—“God bless thee, my son! thanks to thee, I die with the happy thought, that some one will love me after my death.”

Marzon attempted to protest against the last clause, and began to enumerate the chances of recovery which still remained; but Leo motioned him to be silent and began to explain his last wishes. He desired to be buried in the island, and requested that the object of the first voyage made in Marzon's boat, should be a visit to his grave. He bequeathed to the young man and his future bride all the cattle he possessed, but, only on receiving a promise that it should never be given up to the knife of the butcher; then came the explanations relative to his affairs. Until evening, he was thus engaged with Marzon; at midnight he grew visibly worse, and at sunrise he died with his head resting on Lewis's shoulder.

All his wishes were fulfilled. Annette and young Marzon were, thanks to him, happily married, and came every year, on the anniversary of his death, to pray at the spot where he lay, until the erection of the fort in the centre of the island necessitated the removal of Leo Marillas' remains to the cemetery at Piriao, where a rudely carved stone indicates the place of his sepulture.

THE COAST OF GENOA.

It would be exceedingly difficult to point out a single tract of country throughout Italy that does not present some remarkable feature of individual or historic interest which distinguishes it from all others:—Rome, in her ancient renown, and even in her present aspect of venerable grandeur,—Venice, with her city of palaces, beautiful even in decay,—Florence and Milan, also rich in architecture, and holding the choicest treasures of art; and Genoa, presenting from the sea one of the most magnificent prospects that can charm the eye of the traveller; noble edifices extending more than two miles along the shore, palaces and gardens, churches and convents, rising behind, like an amphitheatre, on the steep sides of lofty hills, whose summits are crowned with formidable ramparts, batteries, and forts, grim and formidable protectors of the loveliness lying beneath them. Rogers has elegantly described the appearance of Genoa as he approached it from the waters of the Mediterranean:—

“’Twas where o’er the sea—
For we were now within a cable’s length,
Delicious gardens hung; green galleries
And marble terraces in many a flight,
And fairy arches flung from cliff to cliff
Wildering, enchanting; and, above them all,
A palace, such as somewhere in the East,
In Zenastan or Araby the blest,
Among its golden groves and fruits of gold,
And fountains scattering rainbows in the sky,
Rose, when Aladdin rubbed the wondrous lamp;
Such, if not fairer; and, when we shot by,
A scene of revelry, in long array
As with the radiance of a setting sun,
The windows blazing.”

We who have lived at a period when half the civilized world were leagued against each other, and who have known armies,—numbered only by tens of thousands, and fleets,—measured only by the enormous bulk of their vessels,—meeting in hostile conflict, may almost smile to read of the comparatively puny warfare once carried on by the little Italian republics. And yet for centuries, at intervals, Genoa fought with Pisa till she subdued her, and with Venice, which almost shared the same fate. Trained at an early period of her history to maritime warfare in defending herself from the attacks of Saracenic invaders, she seems, though deeply engaged in the peaceful occupation of commerce, to have imbibed a passion for that game which, as Bishop Porteus says:—

“Were their subjects wise, kings would not play at;”— so that so long as she had any galleys of her own, she was always burning and sinking those of her adversaries, whether Christian or Infidel; and from that noble succession of bays which present themselves before us in the exquisite Turner-like engraving here introduced, sailed forth the fleets of Andrea Doria, to attack the armaments of Barbarossa, and of Filippino Doria, to vanquish those of the Imperialists.

We must say a word or two about Andrea Doria, for he was one of the most remarkable men in Genoese history, and one of the greatest characters that Italy produced during the middle ages. He was born of a noble family, in 1466, and having lost his parents at an early age, embraced the profession of arms, serving under several princes in Italy, till Francis I. appointed him commander of his fleet in the Mediterranean. The French were at this time in possession of Genoa, oppressing the citizens contrary to the promises they had voluntarily given. Doria remonstrated, but ineffectually, and a secret order for his arrest having arrived, of which he had received intimation, he retired from the city, and sending word to his nephew Filippino to join him with the galleys which he had fitted out at his own expense to aid the French cause, he tendered his services to Charles V. The offer was accepted, and Doria immediately proceeded to Genoa, and with the assistance of the inhabitants, who favoured his views, expelled the forces of Francis. Charles offered his ally the sovereignty of Genoa; but the latter chose rather to re-organize the government of the republic, and place it on a surer foundation than before by uniting the various factions that had hitherto distracted the public councils. He established an executive, by whom he was appointed censor for life, with the proud title of "Father and Liberator of his country." Having thus secured peace at home, he resumed his naval career as admiral of Charles V., and highly distinguished himself against the Turks and the pirates of Barbary. When age had incapacitated him from active service against the enemy, he retired to Genoa, where he lived honoured and esteemed by his fellow-citizens till his death in 1660, at the age of ninety-four years. The house in which he resided before he had reached his highest dignity is still in existence.

Another individual whose name shines illustriously in the history of the republic was Marco Griffoni, the last of a race of merchant-princes, and at that time considered the richest citizen in Europe. His liberality seemed even to grow with his wealth, which he used to say he "held only in trust for others." He had long raised his voice against the constant wars in which his countrymen engaged, till he became weary with urging upon them the blessings of peace. At length his cheerfulness, his generosity, and his desire for the public good seemed entirely to leave him, and from that period, as we learn from a note in Rogers's "Italy," he was seen sitting, "like one of the founders of his house, at his desk among his money bags, in a narrow street near the Porto Franco, giving no longer to any, but lending to all—to the rich on their bonds, and the poor on their pledges; lending at the highest rate and exacting with the utmost rigour. No longer relieving the miserable, he sought only to enrich himself by their misery; and there he sat in his gown of frieze, till every finger was pointed at him in passing, and every tongue exclaimed, 'There sits the miser!'"

The hour of his triumph, however, came at length, for which he had endured the railing of scorn, and the pity of the tender-hearted. The city had long suffered under excessive taxation to carry on the wars, and had become depressed and turbulent, in consequence of the exaction. Peace was proclaimed; but Griffoni still thought that the lesson which war inflicts was as yet imperfectly known to his countrymen; so for some time longer he permitted them to bear the burdens imposed to fill the public exchequer, and satisfy the demands of the public creditor. But when he thought the "measure of their calamities was full, and the lesson was deeply engraven in their minds, though his hair had long grown grey," he resumed his former noble character, and generously came forward to redeem the debts of the nation out of the treasures his seeming parsimony and selfishness had accumulated. A statue was voted to his memory after death, but the wisdom he would have taught was buried with his ashes. Like the war-horse, Genoa "snuffed the battle from afar," and chafed restlessly till she had again mingled in the conflict.

MY CINCINNATI LANDLORD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PICTURES OF LIFE IN MEXICO."

If you had been in the habit of passing the door of the "Double Revolver," in Cincinnati, at sunset, you would have had frequent opportunities of forming an idea of the volubility of Ebby Chaddock, the landlord. The guests of the little wooden "store,"—situated as it was in a rural outskirts of the town,—were seldom of the tamest; and Eb, in a passion, was deemed quite "onpossible." Loud and comical appellations as of "savagous wild-cats" and "bayboon screamers," would at times make the rafters ring, and the very hickory-sticks on the hearth tremble as they mouldered away; while threats exploded in the direction of "hotting," "routing," or "progressing," any "whole rilins, bilins, and dixins" which the four walls happened to contain. You might reasonably conclude, on such occasions, that a refractory frequenter had endeavoured to "fix" an imputation on my landlord's favourite "fixing"—the "mint-julep." For in the "Double Revolver's" mint-julep, Ebby Chaddock "consaited" his strength to lie; which was said by some, moreover, to be a fortunate circumstance, "considerin' what powerful little strength it had of its own."

How it came to pass that folks made such observations on the "Hoosier" I cannot imagine. Personally I never believed that the Witch of Endor had been, at any period, the originator of Ebby's recipes; though it was silyly whispered that, having her for a familiar, he was not familiar enough with the use of other spirits; and that his "strong waters," in consequence, were little better than "water bewitched." I was never guilty of believing that he could make she'y-cobblers out of "stirrup-ile," portsnob out of "burnt-birches," and gin-cocktail out of "pumpkin-sarce." I never inclined to the opinion that there was an intimate connexion between his sangaree and "oakum-ends;" that his timber-doodle could be distinctly traced to "pigeons'-milk;" or that his egg-nog had a great affinity to "parsley-foam." I scout such notions entirely. Take Ebenezer Chaddock apart from "the way of a trade," and he had many good points; he was neither a "loafer" nor a "rowdy," but a "genu-ine roarer," and "pretty much of a rual rasper."

My landlord's personal appearance was singular, yet characteristic. With a figure unusually tall and powerful, broad and wiry, his movements possessed all the elasticity of extreme youth; his face was large though sunken, and utterly devoid of beard or whisker, to counterbalance which, however, his forehead was covered with such rich dense masses of greyish-black hair—hanging straight over his face—that his eyes shone from behind them like two rays of light struggling through thick foliage. His features were good-natured, but keen; which last quality, he used to say, had been of great use to him in cutting his way through the world. He generally wore an old blue jacket—much too small for him—consisting of a straight upturned collar, a short waist, and sundry radiant brass “scourers,” and looked—in his flapping striped pantaloons and star-like buttons—an apt emblem of his country, a huge, powerful, overgrown “boy human.”

Eb Chaddock, in his youth, had been a great traveller, and, now that he had reached middle age, had assumed the character of a great talker; loving to “progress” over his old haunts, in conversation, as much as he had done their “progress” in reality, and rarely better pleased than when he could “draw out” his customers to a treat of the “long-bow,” of which he made very “considerable” use. One of his favourite hobbies—resulting most likely from his bygone excursions—was the formation of a kind of rustic museum of curiosities, animal and vegetable; which collection gave rise to never-failing anecdotes and oft repeated witticisms; and tended, by its interest and attraction, to make the “free and independent” landlord still more “independent” of his guests.

In homely square boxes, of different sizes, and with glazed fronts, round three walls of the “Double Revolver’s” principal apartment, Ebby’s “specimens,” as he termed them, were arranged; and an odder assemblage of odd things, within such limited compass, it would have been difficult to find. In one corner was a case containing the harmless skin of a once formidable Bengal tiger, side by side with some examples of oriental sheep and kids, over the bones of which, when living, he would have delighted to luxuriate. Another box was devoted to the preservation of manifold, and many-folded, snakes of the most brilliant hues and varied markings; in what would once have been an alarmingly close vicinity to which beautiful parrots and cockatoos, birds of paradise and tiny humming-birds, were placed. Dried plants and leaves of different ramifications, and other curious vegetable productions, were also ranged around, together with a few minerals and fossils. One of the Hoosier’s especial pets was a stuffed English fighting-cock—valued perhaps for the number of battles he had won in the days of his flesh, ere his stomach had turned to straw; and this hero had been put into a proudly strutting attitude in his glass tomb, like a highly impertinent satiro on glory.

Dry jokes had been occasionally cut on a few of my landlord’s acquisitions; how he had at one period been in possession of a “raal, ondeniable, genu-ine” stuffed mermaid, and how, at another time, he had made great interest to obtain the fins and tail of the “great sea-serpent;” but these were sore subjects, on which it was dangerous to tempt Ebenezer too far. Perhaps the greatest and most genuine curiosity about the store, however, was a living and active Negro, drudge-ordinary to the establishment, its proprietor, and its frequenters. His colour was of two or three shades lighter than common, which circumstance had earned for him the facetious appellation of “Iceicle;” to which name, or its abbreviation of “Icy,” he invariably answered. Though in other respects well-made and healthy, he had lost his right arm, which had been amputated, together with two fingers from the left, in consequence of the cruelties practised upon him by a former master. Yet, in spite of his crippled state, the poor fellow’s zeal, activity, good-humour, and energy, won the good-will of visitors, and were truly marvellous.

And now I will tell you how I found out that Ebby Chaddock—with all his smartness—had a very warm place somewhere in his heart.

A cosy group were one evening lounging over their favourite “moist weaknesses,” round the stove in Eb’s common room, and being equally chatty and thirsty, the services of the bustling “Iceicle” and a young assistant were in even unwonted request. There was the Hoosier host in an important attitude and the middle of a story, with his head raised, his back against the white-washed wall, and his large knees planted upon the log-table before him. A dissipated Pawnee Indian, dressed in a ragged blanket, was partaking of charity in the shape of whiskey, at the hands of a lively, patronising, little blade—a pleman—with red head and dirty hands, and yecept “Gambling Dawkins,” doubtless in allusion to his peculiar “tossing” and luck-tempting propensities. A strapping, weather-beaten sailor, a native of “old Virginny,”—his face a mass of seams and wrinkles, and his head adorned with that now nearly extinct ornament, a pig-tail—was exchanging solemn nods, and “Wals,” and “Darn its,” with my landlord. The story on the carpet, (if such a term may be allowed in connexion with a room where any dry floor-covering would have been a blessing,) appeared to interest the whole company, with the exception of a few very old stagers, not worth describing, who had obviously heard it a “guess few” times before.

“Wal, Cap’en!” said Eb to the Virginian, “trew as I’m sittin’ hyer, that air boey” (pointing to a huge stuffed boa-constrictor in his collection,) “arter causin’ ondue worrit and con-trivance, an’ arter dewin’ on-knowin’ mischief—bodily swallowin’ up thirteen hosses an’ four humans—was brought clar down by mey at last. An’ awsome progress it was tew get him tew kick the buckit, on any tarms whatsoever. But dio he did, arter all; we dissecciated his throat, an’ I got his skin and presarved it. Thar it is at this present mouthin’.”

“Gosh!” briefly and pithily remarked the pig-tailed listener, at this juncture.

“In a jungle in the Inglis that was, Cap’en,” resumed our host, “whar I picked up my Iceicle. Icy, yew may sence, had been tryin’ tew put the alope on his owner—a darned onconecionable varmint as had pretty nigh tortured the skin aff his bones. It was no go, howsoever, he was ketched agin, and for condign punishment they hung him up tow a tree in the wood by the pits of his fore-paws, for the vulture tew finish him right away. ‘Wal! I appeend tew pass thataway with the serpent’s skin, an’ thar the critter was hangin’, moanin’, and screechin’, like mad. As as he sensed me, he set up a cry like a thousand and one enterwaulins, and sez, sez he —

"Evenin', Eb Chaddock! How air yew?" exclaimed a coarse man, entering the apartment at this instant. "Smart and slick, as usual, I 'pinionate? Eh! old screamer?"

I thought, at first, that it was the somewhat irreverent and unduly familiar epithet of "old screamer," which produced such a perceptible shade on my landlord's brow when this man appeared; but I soon found that there were other reasons for it. Ebby replied to his salutation by a growl and an uneasy writhing upon his chair. The story of "Icy's" discovery was stopped midway; marks of distlike exhibited themselves on the countenances of several of the guests, and the remainder glanced inquiringly at each other.

The new-comer was low in stature, but squarely and strongly built, and the length of his arms and fingers was peculiar. His complexion was swarthy, and clouded with bluish-coloured seams about the mouth, deepened in their effect by the long wiry ridges of uncombed black hair that hung upon his shoulders. His features were harsh and broad, his eyes small and piercing, his mouth perpetually drawn and puckered into meanness; the expression of his face, altogether, displaying a repulsive admixture of extreme cunning and brutal ferocity. Dressed in loose white pantaloons, heavy boots, coarsely-twisted broad straw-hat, and light grey blouse, he carried a pair of revolving pistols and a large-sized bowie-knife at his belt; besides a huge whip with a massive leaden handle and thick lash which he constantly boied, evidently from long habit, under his left arm. It scarcely needed a glance at this last formidable appendage to ascertain the profession of this person. He was a slave-dealer.

Jack Matthews—this was his name, though by a process peculiarly American it had been transmuted among his friends to "Major Matthas"—could scarcely have been unconscious of the very unwelcome reception he had met with from the host and guests of the "Double Revolver." If he had noticed the disgust his presence excited, however, (a disgust generally felt towards the slave-dealer even by those who profit by his transactions,) he evidently made up his mind to face it out and make himself as comfortable as possible under the circumstances. Swallowing half a tumbler-full of raw spirits—set before him by the junior "help" in waiting—without so much as winking or stopping to draw breath, he endeavoured, for the second time, to engage our host in conversation.

"How's business in yewr part ev the country, landlor'?" he said. "Lookin' up, I 'pound; eh now? Do tell!"

Eb Chaddock, however, responded not to this query; but pretended to be wholly occupied in a whispered "confab" with the Virginian.

"Wal, landlor'! Yew hain't rose so high as toe be above speakin' yet, I guess!" resumed Matthews. "How's business with yew, I say? Makin' yewr fortin', eh, Eb? How's the city? How's niggers?"

"Better ask them yew deals with," laconically replied my landlord.

"But about that air black o' yewra, though, Eb Chaddock," pursued the trader. "I tell yew that a 'supid deal o' work might be got out ev him yet, I do; an' yew war a 'tarnal rowdy not toe let me have him when I was up hyer afore! Wal! I won't be oncommon fractious and oncompromisin', if yew'll make him over toe me at this im-mediate speakin'. How many dollars win yew say? Now! Ex-pedite, dew! I'll hand out a goodish price considerin'. He'll dew smartly, I say, for one-handed pickin' or clearin', and —"

The conclusion of this magnanimous offer was interrupted by the entrance of the Negro in question. The poor fellow tripped into the room in his usual confiding and unsuspecting manner—a pleasant smile gleaming in the whites of his eyes and in his "double row of ivories," as he prepared to wait upon the guests, with whom, as I have already observed, he was a favourite. No sooner did his eye fall on the person and accoutrements of the trading "Major," however, than his demeanour underwent a significant change. His skin became of a perceptibly paler hue; his flesh began to creep and quiver with emotion; his eyes projected from their sockets in affright. His limbs seemed wholly unable to support his weight; and exclaiming in a half-fainting state, "Oh! Massa Chaddock, me no go! No let Icy go, massa!" he tottered to the wall of the apartment for support.

My landlord, at first, appeared inclined to resent the proposal of the dealer in a rather summary manner; but quickly taking a fresh thought as to his mode of proceeding, he coolly turned over the quid in his mouth as a preliminary, and glancing round upon the spectators as who should say, "See how I will draw him out," he thus addressed the "Major."

"Supposin', for the sake of argument, I wanted tew make a deal for Icy, as yew say, Jack Matthas, I calculate I'd not sense whar tew have yew. I'm far from shewer yew could tip speltro enough for him! The vallee on him is im-mense, I assart; so willin' and ondustrious, he is. The critter is a su-payrior help, I tell yew. What could yew say for him, jest supposing sich a sell now; for the pleasure of argiment?"

"Wal, landlor'!" eagerly rejoined the trader, "as I said toe yew afore, as blacks is skase, an' little business toe be worked at this nick ev time, I'll make yew a oncommon lib'ral offer. I could only dew it, mind, but as that air chap's fit for pickin' and sortin'. I'll fork over eighty dollars for that air black! Thar!"

"Tew little," briefly remarked our host.

"Tew little! Wal, Eb Chaddock, if that ain't a tarnal high kick o' yourn, then I don't know!" exclaimed the "Major." "What dew yew want for him, Eb? Let's be sensin' that."

"Oh! massa, massa! no sell Icy! no sell! Icy serve till him die. Oh! massa, no sell, Icy pray!"

Such were the piteous exclamations of the half-frantic Negro, as he sunk upon his knees at his master's feet; and it was an affecting sight, indeed, to note the hopeful and despairing alternations of his visage, as he furtively gazed from time to time, first on his beloved old master, and then on the enemy of his race.

"Easur now," said my host, looking down upon him kindly; "I rayther 'pinionate, Major, I shan't part with Icy, arter all; not at no price!"

"Iv he dew sell Icy, I shall keep a broad chalk atween mey and Eb Chaddock's store, to all etarnity, and longer, I guess!" put in the little picman, benevolently.

"He'll be sartain more use to you nor him, Eb," reasoned the owner of the pigtail.

"A hundred dollars, then!" the dealer instantly proposed. "Come now!"

"Tew little."

"An' twenty. Thar!"

"Tew little."

"Wal, landlor'! hyer's an offer then. As blacks is skase——"

"I say, Jack Matthas!" exclaimed my landlord, in an altered voice, "jest make yewself skase, afore I spile yew! What a fule yew air," he continued, rising from his chair, "not tew sence I've been only rilin' yew, all this time! Why, if I ear onder any onfort'nate necessity tew part with that air poor critter, which arn't likely, I'd rayther put a pair o' bullets in his breadbasket myself, than lot him tew sich a darned, onderhanded, black-hearted, blood-suckin', wallopin', cowardly loafer of a 'tarnal villaint, as you air, Jack Matthas, if yew stum'p'd all the speltre yew air worth on the 'hool airth!"

The effect of this totally unexpected speech upon the trader,—delivered as it was in a thundering voice, and with all my landlor's energy of manner,—was truly terrific. Springing to his feet, with flashing eyes, and the foam starting from his lips, he shrieked rather than shouted,—

"How daur yew, Eb Chaddock? Tarnation thunders! what in the name of all the darned fiends has possessed yew, to jabber like that toe me? Thar's not a human breathin' that can accuse Jack Matthas with onjustice in his dealin's! Thar's not a human daurs! or I'd shute him dead as saut salmon! Yaw! I'd shute him! I would—dead!"

In a transport of rage, he at this instant drew a pistol from his belt, and attempted to point it at Eb Chaddock; but ere he could succeed, the tall Virginian sailor had sprung upon him, seized his arms,—though the pistol exploded in the struggle,—and forced him down on a wooden bench in the room, where he lay struggling and biting at his adversary like a captured beast. Our host, however, speedily made an end of the matter by taking the prostrate ruffian by the shoulders, and, by a slight exertion of his tremendous strength, thrusting him in double-quick time through the outer room and out of the door, which he closed and fastened after him. The report of a pistol was heard, quickly followed by another and another, and we were just rushing out of the apartment, apprehensive that some serious mischief had occurred, when we were met at the door by our host, flushed to the forehead with excitement, and a scornful smile playing about his puckered mouth.

"The outrageous varmint!" he said, "the screechin', roarin', barbarious, own-cousin tew a darned hyæna! He's wasted his lead on the roof and door-posts this time, praise the pigs; but it has rised my back, for this evenin', rayther! That's a fact!"

Oh! it was beautiful to behold the countenance of the Negro "Icicle" after the disappearance of his enemy; to witness the outpouring of his gratitude and attachment to his master:—to see the tears of joy springing from his eyes, and flowing down his dark cheeks, on his deliverance! I could not but believe, as the small assembly at the "Double Revolver" broke up that night, that my landlord, although the subject of his kindness and protection was ONLY a Negro-slave, had received a rich reward!

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.

BY JANE M. WINNARD.

CHAPTER XVIII.

GREAT THINGS AND SMALL.

"AND this is the Grey Tower!" said Mrs. David Underwood, half aloud, as she rode slowly up the Fell, while her husband walked beside her, holding the bridle of her pony. Mr. Underwood and his daughter Martha, who had accompanied them from the Grange, had fallen behind, out of hearing. They had been silent for some time; David, occupied with his own thoughts and memories, and Edith occupied with them too. At length she raised her eyes, which had been fixed with a mild gravity upon her husband's figure, and seeing the picturesque old building, standing a hundred yards or so above them, on a broad ledge of the Fell, she exclaimed—

"And this is the Grey Tower, David!"

He turned his face towards her quickly:

"Yes, Edith. Do you like the look of it?" And he watched her steadily as she replied, scanning the old tower from battlement to basement, as she spoke.

"Very much. Every human habitation has a peculiar physiognomy: the spirit of the bygone inhabitants seems to inform its aspect. This old tower is noble—venerable—beautiful. It does not frown. It may be but the effect of the summer sunshine, but I could almost fancy there was a smile upon its ancient front, and that the ivy-wreaths hanging from its broken battlements were waving a welcome to an old friend. Cavalier Lovelace sang truth:—

"Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
This for a heritage."

(1) Continued from p. 243.

You never said enough in praise of this Grey Tower, David. No wonder! The whole scene is beyond all praise. It does not look as if it were part and parcel of the turbulent suffering world in which you and I have lived so long. I am glad you passed all your early years in this place. It is holy ground to boys such as you must have been. Its grandeur, its simplicity, its imperturbable repose, have helped to form your character more than your pastors and masters had any idea of. You are right when you say, 'There is no such thing as inanimate nature!' Why, this valley, these fells, and that noble old ruin, speak eloquently without discourse of reason. They have breathed their spirit into you. The very air that blows around us, now noiseless and scentless as it is, holding no commerce with trees or flowers, only with the broad earth and the fathomless sky, has a vigour, a fine freshness in it, which is very much like some things you have written."

"It seems to have excited your imagination at all events, and to have made you eloquent. Edith, you are very good to look on this place with such loving eyes." And David Underwood's hand stole up to hers. They stood still in silence, gazing around, waiting for his father and sister. Edith's eyes were again fixed on the tower, and something like a cloud passed over them.

"What are you thinking of, dear one?" asked her husband. She turned her look away from the tower to his face, and smiled with her eyes, but not with her lips—they were pale.

"Well, Edith! What was your thought?"

"A foolish one."

"Nay, I must have it, then, if only for its rarity. Speak, my Diotima—wisest of women!"

"Nay! thus invoked, I must hide my folly, for very shame."

"My darling, then!—dearest of women!"

They looked at each other with a half smile, which melted into a look of anxious affection. Edith, woman-like, was the quickest to carry off her anxiety a moment after, by words—those useful conductors of the electricity of overcharged souls;—half playful words, that carry off, but do not retain the perilous element, yet indicate the quarter where it has accumulated, and whence the desolating storm may come.

"I was thinking," she said, smoothing the pony's mane with the fingers of one hand, and slightly pressing the palm of the other against that of David's, in which it rested; "I was thinking that if it were among the rights of woman to choose where one would be born, and of what race, I would have been born in that old tower, and my name should have been—"

"Edith Underwood," interrupted her husband. "Nothing else; nothing else. I would not have you other than you are,—no, not if it were in my power to invest you with the soft rosy light that my boyish love lent to another. Edith, you must not harbour such thoughts; they are not, and they cannot come to good!"

She pressed his hand more firmly now, and looked into his face with a grave smile.

"I could not, if I would, harbour such thoughts."

Your love, like the strong mountain breeze we are inhaling now, has long ago whirled away all noxious vapours of that kind. It was but a passing mist, a mere fancy;—as I told you, a foolish thought! Here come your father and sister; and now, I think, you had better all go on and leave me and White Surrey to take our pleasure together in a canter over this glorious moorland." Then, as the other two came nearer, she spoke lower. "David, indeed, indeed, it will be better so. I am a woman, and know by intuition what you can only reason about with the dead certainty of arriving at a wrong conclusion. I will not be present at your first interview with Miss Grey. Trust me, dearest, it will be best—with her shrinking, delicate, gentle nature, you must not give her too much to bear at once. On no account must she be betrayed into any exhibition of extraordinary feeling on this occasion. No woman likes that. Give her time to control her feelings, and all will go right. I will come to the house presently. There!—Let me go!—'Thoughtful for others,' am I? Nay, that is my peculiar form of selfishness—when the others concern you. 'Thy people shall be my people.' Miriam Grey has long been one of my people; and it is a matter of some consequence to me that she should not hate me at first sight."

David could not speak. He felt reluctant to tell his wife that he had already met Miriam. The recollection of his own emotion in the early morning when he had been alone with her in the North Turret, and had inadvertently called forth the long buried love from Miriam's heart, now tongue-tied him;—that recollection, and many feelings connected with both these true hearted women. Edith saw that he was struggling with some strong inward pain. She had talked that he might not feel oppressed by the silence between them. Now, she would have been silent, that he might feel how thoroughly she desired to sympathize with him; but Mr. Underwood and Martha were beside them, and she must speak, to save David from speaking. She did so. She asked and answered questions about the scenery and the people of Milford, until they came very near the old gothic doorway which served for entrance to all comers to the Tower. Then, seeing a lady in a white bonnet stepping out, Mrs. David Underwood turned her horse slowly round.—"You must let me have a canter, now, I think, Miss Underwood, and I will join the party in half an hour. Good bye for the present." Then with a quick affectionate glance at her husband she was about to ride away. "Edith!" he said aloud. She held in the horse and glanced towards him again. "I will not detain you more than a minute; but I have a word to say." Mr. Underwood and Martha went forward to meet Mrs. Ward. David laid his hand on White Surrey's neck, and spoke in a low clear tone.

"For my sake, or for that of Miss Grey, Edith, you need not stay away. We have met already this morning. I have much to say to you concerning that meeting at another time, in another place. Come in with me now."

"I cannot, David. Give me time. I am but a woman. I must get courage to face the one creature on earth who is formidable to me. I shall love her—be to her all that you can wish; but just now I would rather not come in her sight."

"You cannot come in her sight, Edith. Miriam has become blind."

"Blind! Ah!" And the noble mouth quivered with pain, and the affectionate eyes, after the first look of astonishment, were closed, as if to shut out the idea, or perhaps to realize it. "Blind! That is dreadful! The beautiful Miriam Grey! Yes, I will go with you." She dared not look at her husband; but she pressed his hand more firmly than before.

At that moment she saw an old gentleman, a clergyman, come quickly forward before a group of persons collected about the door of the Tower. He hurried up to the spot where they were, and laid a hand upon David's arm. She knew that it could be no one but Mr. Shepherd. He spoke in a low tone of alarm and sorrow, and she could not help bending down from the saddle to listen.

"Some one must be sent immediately to D—. Miriam Grey is seriously ill—she must have medical advice. It is this terrible fever, I fear. Can you hasten to Torrington, David Underwood, and send on a messenger without delay?"

David looked at the speaker as if he had not quite comprehended the words. His wife spoke to him—she had recovered herself.

"Will it not be better for me to ride over to Torrington, and send on a messenger, while you go at once and see Miss Grey?—Till her own medical attendant arrives," she added, turning politely towards Mr. Shepherd, "her friends could not perhaps do better than consult Dr. Underwood."

"True, true; I had quite forgotten. He is a better physician than any we can obtain here. Come, David, there is no time to be lost. I tell you she is dangerously ill. Some cases I have known end fatally in forty-eight hours. Come, David Underwood."

David's face had become pale and stern. But his voice was unbroken as he said,

"Are you certain that it is a case of the kind you described to me last night?"

Mr. Shepherd reiterated his opinion. Then, after a moment's reflection, David turned to his wife,

"You must not come with me now; you must not enter the Tower. Remember the children. Go back to Torrington—you will find the servant waiting down yonder. Ask Sir Ralph to send some one to D—— for —" he looked at Mr. Shepherd.

"Dr. Burns has always attended Miriam."

"—for Dr. Burns, then. Say that I will take charge of Miss Grey until he arrives,—I and Mr. Shepherd, who has had some experience in similar cases among his parishioners, and who has the necessary medicines. Ride as fast as you can; I will be with you in the evening. I trust to you to lose no time in this matter. Now, Mr. Shepherd, I am ready."

And David, after another glance at Edith, turned away, and, without noticing any persons near, walked straight to the portal of the tower, and thence, scarcely pausing, he ascended the old stairs he knew so well with Mr. Shepherd and Dame Barnard, and entered the high chamber where lay Miriam Grey.

Mrs. David Underwood remained where they had left her, for a few moments after they had disappeared from her sight. She glanced rapidly over the venerable front of the tower searching for a certain window. High up in one of the turrets she saw one wide open—it was gothic-shaped and ivy-wreathed; it was the window of Miriam's bedroom, she felt sure. After looking at it earnestly for an instant she turned her horse's head, and rode down the fell side to the spot where the groom had been left to await their return from the visit which they had purposed paying to the ladies at the tower.

The man rode up at her signal, and she said,

"Go as fast as you can, Jackson, over to D—. Find a Dr. Burns who lives there, and request him to come without delay to attend Miss Grey of the Tower, who is dangerously ill. After that, return to Torrington Hall, and tell Sir Ralph Grey that your master has been detained here by Miss Grey's illness; that he is waiting till Dr. Burns arrives, and that I shall return with him—probably not until late this evening. I trust to you to lose no time. And, Jackson," she added, as the man was setting spurs to his horse, "ask to see Miss Leonora when you reach the Hall, and give her this ring."

She took a diamond ring from her hand, and gave it to Jackson, who stowed it away carefully in an inner pocket, and then galloped off.

Should any of my readers desire to know the meaning of this little transaction, which probably reminds them of similar ones related of "a faire lady," "a golden ring," and a "little foot page," in old ballads, I can satisfy their curiosity, though at the expense of the romantic effect of this incident in my story. It is simply this—Leonora was a proud little maiden of eleven; and often set her young sister and brother an example of naughtiness and disobedience to nurse and governess. Her mamma had discovered that by enlisting Leonora's pride on the side of her duty, the duty stood a very fair chance of being thoroughly performed. She had therefore been in the habit of sending to Leonora that particular ring whenever she expected to be detained away from the children longer than usual. Leonora was to wear it until her Mamma's return, and while she wore it, was bound by a grave promise to abstain from all voluntary acts of naughtiness, and to assist in keeping the little ones good. As Leonora very seldom wore this symbol of authority over herself, it produced a powerful effect on her conduct, and made her all that the authorities set over her could desire her to be.

Perhaps this trifle in Mrs. David Underwood's domestic policy may be a useful hint to those high and mighty powers, the professed good managers of families, and may induce them to regard her with a little less contempt and ridicule than they are wont to bestow upon geniuses and fine ladies who attempt to manage a household. They may also respect her for being able to think of small duties in the midst of great excitements, and for being, at least, a thoughtful step-mother. To speak truth, Leonora was seldom out of her thoughts.

Mrs. David Underwood watched Jackson until he was out of sight, and was about to turn back, when she observed an old post-chaise coming up the fell. The horses had white ribbons, and so had the postilion. The latter turned his head frequently towards the Tower, as if he were becoming impatient. Edith looked round also, and perceived two persons, evidently the bride and bridegroom, walking towards the chaise. They passed close to the place where she was, and looked curiously at her. She in return gazed at them. It was a look of mutual dissatisfaction, I fancy.

"Can that hard common-looking man be David's brother? Can that simpering wax-doll be Miriam Grey's pretty sister?" thought Mrs. David within herself.

"Dear me, Mark, what a very plain woman! Your brother must have married her for her money," exclaimed Mrs. Mark Underwood.

"Of course he did, my dear. She looks as if she had a will of her own."

Mrs. Mark Underwood, who certainly had none, took the last remark as an indirect compliment to herself, and stepped into the chaise, well pleased to think that she was better looking and more amiable than her sister-in-law. And thus she and her husband disappeared from Milford for awhile.

A short time after this, White Surrey was walking soberly along, apparently quite conscious that his mistress was not thinking of him nor of the way they were to go, and that it behoved him to take the direction of their course upon himself, when he pricked up his ears with astonishment, at the sight of a little old woman on a donkey, riding "fast and furious," just in front of them. His mistress, who rode with her head bent down as if in deep thought, started when White Surrey brought her up beside this singular group. Nor was it a thing to be taken by the most imperturbable people as a matter of course; for I assure you, Nanny Post, riding in "haste, haste, post haste," all alone, over a bare moor, had a very German witch-like look, as Mrs. David Underwood thought at a first glance. The wild way in which she occasionally balanced herself with both arms, while her cloak floated out behind, reminded a solitary traveller rather unpleasantly of the Brockenberg: and he would be apt to look around for other old women on goats and alligators and broomsticks, hastening to a Wal-purgis Nacht. At a second look, Edith was not less astonished by Nanny's bright, piercing black eyes, and the queer, inquisitive look she gave as she nodded briskly at the new comer, and said, without pausing in her ride, jerking out the words after the manner of those who talk on a galloping donkey,

"Glad to see you in these parts, my lady. We've had a sad missing o' Master David, these many years. What a mercy he's come back—A great doctor. I'm going down to the Vicarage—physic. Miss Grey's took dangerous.—Back in half an hour. Maybe you are going to the Tower. The old Dame's crying like a child, and Miss Martha's up in Miss Grey's chamber. And that Mrs. Ward—hughe!—I've no patience with her!—She got such a sweet, dear young man for a son! God knows best—I think it's a good riddance of both. I never liked Mr. Mark's underhand ways—hard ways to poor folks, too. Good morning, glad to see you—and Master David—Good morning!"

And away went Nanny, never pausing to look behind her at the lady. Edith, however, though by no means in a merry mood, stopped awhile to laugh at the singular effect produced by Nanny and Bob, as seen from behind, going at a desperate pace down to the village. This last incident served to rouse Edith completely from her reverie, and gathering up the reins, she directed White Surrey's head towards the Tower again.

CHAPTER XIX.

MRS. DAVID UNDERWOOD'S UNCONVENTIONAL CONDUCT.

WHITE SURREY showed so much familiarity with the ground when they came close up to the building—now rounding a heap of fallen stones, now stepping carefully among scattered ones—that Mrs. David Underwood concluded he had often been there before. If White Surrey could have spoken, he would have told his present mistress that he had been for four years the property of Miss Grey, and therefore it was no wonder he was quite at home near the Tower. As to his stepping carefully and safely amid a wilderness of fallen stones and tangled briars, he would have told her that he had been purchased and trained by old Mr. Underwood, for the express purpose of carrying Miss Grey when she became blind; and that Mr. Underwood would not have been satisfied unless her steed could make his way up to the door in the ruined turret. As the stable was situated somewhere behind the said North Turret, White Surrey's movements in that direction were always surprisingly quick, considering the nature of the ground. Ponies, like other people, are the creatures of habit; and White Surrey, finding his head stable-wards on the present occasion, began threading the stony labyrinth of the ancient flower-garden, bent upon seeking repose in his old quarters. At first, Mrs. David tried to turn him away from the heaps of rubbish, among which he seemed to be wandering vaguely—but voice and hand were unavailing in the task; and, at length, the ruined turret itself riveted her attention so forcibly, that she ceased attempting to control the animal. She had seen many finer ruins, larger, grander, and with far loftier architectural pretensions—ruins of temples, palaces, cathedrals, abbeys, baronial castles, replete with old world-famous associations. The Historic Muse had endowed them with the spoil of Time; they were all rich in national memories. But this little ruin—the fragment of an old house, unknown to fame, spreading its shattered semicircle of wall towards the sun—tapestried with ivy and moss and lichens, fascinated her by its quiet beauty. She had never seen anything like it. There was nothing grand or proud in its decay—it seemed neither to regret nor to struggle against its destiny, but to bear it contentedly. Like a conscious creature submitting to a higher power, the rifted turret had learned to make the best of its fate, and to brighten its downfall by a smile that was far more touching than the gloomiest frown. At least, so thought Edith as she approached nearer and nearer, and noted the gay flowers blooming high up in sheltered fractures of the wall—the ivy wreathes waving gently from the summit—the small birds fluttering to and fro within it, and the luxuriant wild roses that they scattered in a soft shower on the moss at each flight.

"Yes," she thought. "This place, so beautiful in decay, can have no stern memories connected with it—no deeds of blood—no vengeance; I had well nigh said, no sin—no sorrow; but it has been a human habitation, and where man has dwelt, death and sin and suffering must come."

Just at this point in her musings, White Surrey came to a stand-still, immediately in front of the opening into the area of the turret. As he could not be induced to stir, Mrs. Underwood dismounted, intending to fasten him to something while she inspected this singular place; but she had no sooner touched the ground, than he trotted off as he had been wont to do, and in less than a minute had disappeared on his way to the stable. Such behaviour in a poney that she had hitherto found perfectly tractable, somewhat astonished the lady; but as it was useless for her to think of recovering him, lame as she was, Edith dismissed him from her mind for the present, and began to examine every object around her with much curiosity. As she stood at the opening of the ruin, she faced the ancient flower-garden, and was not long in perceiving that it had been a garden, though now it seemed, at a first glance, little better than a wilderness strewn with the stones which had fallen from the building.

"That might be restored," she thought.

Just then the voice of a linnet close behind her poured forth a flood of song. It burst upon the silence so suddenly, that Edith was startled. Turning round, she saw the little brown bird with its bright eyes, perched on the topmost bough of the briar rose-tree, just as her husband had seen it in the early morning.

"It is a linnet," she exclaimed half aloud; "David's favourite bird; and singing, too, amid his favourite flowers—wild roses;" and she stretched forth a hand to gather a spray. "Was it here that he learned to love linnets and briar-roses?"

The bird ceased his song and flew away as she moved across the soft turf to the grassy seat already described. She sat down where Miriam Grey had sat a few hours before, and looked long at the prospect. Through the breach in the wall by which she came in, she could see the village and the whole valley of Milford basking in the sunlight, hemmed in by lofty fells, rising peak behind peak, till they were lost in the distant clouds.

"Ah! this is the sketch he made from memory. Now I recognise Milford as he has so often described it. But why has he never spoken to me about this lovely ruin?"

Her bright eyes wandered curiously over the inner surface of the turret, over the moss-covered area and the couch on which she sat. These had been cared for—tended recently; it was a place that some one loved. She saw that it was connected with the Grey Tower—that it had formed one of its four circular turrets. Her eye fell on the sunken doorway, and she guessed that it led into the inhabited portion of the building. Again she examined the ruin, and gazed forth over the prospect. Presently her thoughts shaped themselves thus:—

"It must be so. This place is sacred in his mind. As a child, he played with Miriam Grey here; as a youth he learned to love her, here. What imaginative boy could see a beautiful girl in such a spot as this, day after day, and not love her, or fancy that he loved her?"

Edith was a very woman and had often wished to believe that her husband's first love was but a romantic fancy. Poor Edith! She was a great deal too clear-sighted to believe that, even when he more than half believed it himself; and now, as she felt the influence of Miriam's favourite haunt upon her own mind, she could not believe it at all.

"No! no!" she said to herself; "David was not a boy to indulge in baseless fancies; nor is this a flimsy fanciful place. It is instinct with reality—the reality that comes to us so rarely on the earth—the reality of beauty, love, peace, and happiness. It is a blessed place. A material ruin, useless to shelter a man's body; but a spiritual home—a stronghold for the soul, where it might grow wise and loving, and learn the true meaning of the word life. It was here that my David learned it first; I am sure of it. And this Miriam Grey was indeed his first love."

She looked pale as she thought of these things; pale, and a little sad; but not resentful, or bitter or angry. Edith Underwood had a clear religious spirit—a heart turned to God so trustfully, that the light of his countenance rested always upon it. Religion is very much an affair of temperament. The severe man will talk of living in the fear of the Lord, and the gentle one will talk of living in the love of God, as long as some men are constitutionally severe, and others are constitutionally gentle. Each one is religious or irreligious after his kind. Miriam Grey's piety was chastened, sober, resigned and unwavering; Edith Underwood's was ardent, glad, hopeful, but sometimes swayed by earthly feelings. As she now sat thinking of all that her husband had told her about his early love, and imagining all that he had not told her,—probably imagining a great deal more than the truth,—the brave good heart within her was strongly moved; but never once did it rise in rebellion against God, or question the justice and wisdom of his dispensation.

"Only if I might have been this Miriam Grey!" her heart whispered mournfully. "If I had but been associated in his mind with all this secluded calm! If he had loved me as a little child—as a beautiful girl! If he had loved me only because I was lovely and gentle, and his own heart overflowed with the desire of loving! That is a first love—the pure spiritual instinct impelling the heart towards the good and beautiful. It thinks not, reasons not, and is nevertheless unerring."

"Nay, that is folly! A first love is often erring, and mistakes all that glitters for pure gold. With common natures first love is frequently a delusion—the offspring of vanity and frivolous excitement; but with my David it could not have been thus. The girl he loved at eighteen could never become unworthy of his love; what is more, can never cease to be loved. And I! what am I? Consider it well, Edith Underwood! Away with all paltry jealousies. Down!—down, thou selfish, exacting heart!" She pressed her two hands tightly over her forehead and eyes.

"Yes, yes, let there be no affectation of virtue. It is hard to feel that I am second where I have for so many sweet years believed myself to be first. I cannot give up that happiness with magnanimity. I am even ashamed at my own fond credulity in thinking I could ever supply the place of that early love. I am clever, cultivated, well placed in the world; I could understand and sympathize with his intellectual progress. I have been very useful to him." A slight shiver passed through her at the words. "Men do not love a woman for all that. It is beauty and not utility that creates love. I have been useful to him,—he esteems, respects, admires me, and I have the second place in his heart—perhaps the third—for Leonora— This is morbid unprofitable speculation. David has been a faithful, true husband to me, and I have no right to pry into his secret thoughts. I, who love him, and am his wife! I need not fear that he will forget what is due to me. His noble loyal nature will do right at any cost to his own feelings. While I am mourning selfishly over that early love of his, he, perhaps, is learning that it was not dead all those past years; that it was only sleeping; and he will reproach himself bitterly. At this very moment the life-blood in his heart wages war with the enforced calmness of the brain; while he counts the fever throbs of Miriam Grey's heart, he remembers that he is bound to suppress all love for her. My poor David! If she should love him still,—should in the sore trial of sickness allow him to perceive it!

—Alas! alas!—my truthful, generous husband! And I have been so selfish as to think first of myself! What, if I am second or third in his heart!—It is something to have a place there at all. With God's help, I will deserve it.

"It is now my first duty to support him in doing his. The sight of me, in these old familiar haunts, beside Miriam Grey, will be painful to him, but it will be salutary. I can bear the pain, and the humiliation of seeing how he feels the contrast; of being a source of annoyance. It will be salutary for me too. I have gloried too much in being the wife of David Underwood. Henceforth I shall be more humble."

She rose up, and after taking a few minutes to compose herself, advanced to the old door, and tried to open it. It gave way at her touch, and swinging back gently, disclosed a matted passage. She stepped into it, and the door closed again behind her. The passage was long and narrow; a dim light penetrated through it from a lattice at the further end. Edith proceeded towards it, and half way down she came to another and a broader passage, which conducted her into a square hall neatly paved with red tiles. There, in front of her, she saw the open door-way by which her husband and Mr. Shepherd had entered the house. Seeing no one about, and hearing no sounds, she advanced to the door of a room which opened into this hall near the entrance. It was a large old-fashioned kitchen. There was a pleasant smell of fresh-baked oat-cake, which hung on lines stretched across the ceiling in the north-country fashion, and a bright sunlight streamed over polished kettles and saucepans, through a wide Gothic window that commanded a view along the valley. It was a cheerful old place. Edith's attention was soon called from the room to poor Dame Barnard, who lay in a corner, sobbing bitterly.

"What is the matter, my good woman? are you hurt?" asked Edith, stooping down beside her.

The old woman turned her head in a little astonishment at the sound of an unknown voice, and looked hard at Edith.

"You are very kind, ma'am. I don't recollect you just now."

"Never mind that. Let me help you up. Did you fall down?"

"Yes, ma'am. To think of my falling down at such a time, and spraining my good-for-nothing old ankle! If I was to do it, why couldn't I do it before Nanny went, and then she might have sent some one up from the village. But everything is going wrong to-day. Ah! poor dear child! If it should turn out to be the real bad fever."

And the old woman, having been assisted by Edith into a chair, recommenced sobbing. Just then a bell was heard to ring violently.

"Ah! they want something; that cold water, I dare say."

And Dame Barnard looked towards a large cistern of water, and tried to get up. Edith pressed her gently back into the chair.

"If you have sprained your ankle, you cannot carry a can of water up-stairs. Sit still; tell me which way to go, and I will carry it."

And Edith immediately unfastened the skirt of her habit, and took it off, and laid aside her hat.

"Do you mean that, ma'am?" asked the old dame; "well, you've a kind heart, anyhow; and if you know my mistress, maybe you're proud to wait on her, now she's like to be very bad. Take care! it's heavy. Eh! deary me! but you're lame yourself! and you can't carry that weight of water with those little hands."

"You shall see," said Edith, smiling; "I'm very strong. There!" and she lifted the can with apparent ease; "which way am I to go? No! no! you must not get up; I'll come down and look at your foot presently. Which way?"

"Across the hall; there you'll see the stairs. Go up. It's a weary height. Keep on till you come to a broad landing at the top, and there's Miss Miriam's door right before you. What will they all think when they see you? Perhaps you'll tell Miss Martha what's the matter?"

"Yes; I've come to help Miss Martha. I'm a relation of hers;" and so saying Edith went out, carrying the water can.

"Oh! ay! that's it! I thought you had a lottle of the Underwood air," thought Dame Barnard to herself, "though you are such a grand-looking lady."

Edith had taken no easy task upon herself. To go up-stairs was always a trouble to her now; for the false leg was a poor substitute for the real one; and the water-can was heavy. Still she persisted, and had just reached the top of the stairs, when she saw her husband leaning against the balustrades above, with his handkerchief pressed to his eyes. He had left the room for a moment to control his emotion. Hearing some one on the stairs, he stood upright, and looking another way, said quickly,—

"Come! come! my good woman; you have been a long time. Have you brought the water?"

Then receiving no immediate reply, he turned to look at the person approaching, and seeing who it was, he exclaimed,—

"You? Edith!" Then darting forward he seized her burden, and looking grave and very much annoyed, said, "What is the meaning of this?"

"Don't be angry. I would not have carried it if it had not been necessary. The old servant has fallen down, and sprained her ankle. I happened to be with her when the bell rang. She said it was for this water, and—"

"And so you brought it. You are a strange creature, Edith."

"Not to you, David. Surely you understand that I am deeply anxious about this illness of Miss Grey's—that I would render any assistance in my power."

"The best assistance you can render is to go home to the children, and keep them and yourself away from infection. I thought I had requested you to do so." He spoke very constrainedly.

"You did," she replied gently; "I have attended to your request in every particular but one. Jackson has gone for Dr. Burns, and will afterwards carry my orders to Leonora and the rest. I ventured to remain here."

"Why?"

"Because my first duty is here, David. You are in trouble, and I will not leave you."

She took his hand and kissed it.

He trembled slightly, and said, "You are very good, Edith, but I would rather be alone."

"But I will not leave you alone to watch the dangerous sickness of a dear friend. Give me my fair share of your sorrow, David. Believe me, I shall love Miriam Grey, and be but too happy to assist you in restoring her to health."

Her husband made no reply, but pressed his lips hastily on her head. She looked into his eyes, and shrank back from their expression for a moment; and then, winding her arm round his neck, she whispered, in a voice choked with tears,—

"Nay, dearest, we must hope. Do not think that yet. You are, perhaps, not calm enough. Dr. Burns will soon be here. Let me, David, I intreat you, let me go with you, and nurse Miriam Grey."

He folded her in his arms, and murmured, "God bless you; do as you will."

Then turning from her he walked a few paces apart to a small loop-hole window, and there stood gazing out upon the sky. Edith remained where he had left her, and with downcast eyes abstained from watching his emotion. Perhaps even David, much as he knew of the nature of the noble and good woman, could not have appreciated the generous love and sorrow that swelled her heart at that moment, or the delicate respect which forbore to look on his grief. Perhaps he thought, if indeed he thought about it at all at that instant,—he may have thought that this was an ebullition of romantic generosity on Edith's part,—a desire to perform an act of self-sacrifice by devoting herself to the service of a woman whom her husband had once loved. For David Underwood was well aware that some women like to admire their own virtue, much more than they care to have it admired by others; and that with them, as with one of Jean Paul's heroines, "an inclination to perform premeditated acts of kindness is the only littleness." I say, David Underwood may have thought this; but if he did think so, he was mistaken, and was speedily undeceived. Edith acted thus from no romantic generosity towards a person she had never seen, and whom as yet she had no special reason for liking, but from a principle of duty, and an instinct of love to her husband. Because she loved, she desired to comfort and assist him in his present suffering, and because she believed it to be her duty as a wife to keep in David's remembrance his true position as a husband and a father, she had determined to remain with him now, if he would permit it. She knew that he could not loosen the ties which bound him, even in thought, without enduring a bitter repentance; for his nature was a true and loyal one: and this repentance she wished to save him.

After a few moments David turned round. Something in her attitude touched him deeply. He approached and said—

"What is it you wish me to do, Edith?"

"To take me with you into that chamber, and to allow me to nurse your patient," she avoided repeating a name that he might not wish to hear.

"Be it so," he replied; "your assistance will be of great advantage. Her sister is—gone away, and my sister cannot be well spared; my father's health is much shaken. He must go home. If you remain, Mr. Shepherd need not send his sister as he proposed. She would be a terrible woman in a sick-room."

"You might be provoked to order her to begone before she had remained six hours, as you did that chattering lady at Leipzig."

And Edith was pleased to see her husband smile slightly at the recollection of his prompt and energetic measures on that occasion.

"I should be more likely to throw Miss Shepherd out of the window," he said.

"Then, my dear David," said his wife, assuming a funny little look of mock alarm, and stooping down once more to take up the water-can, (a female ruse to hide feelings remote from fun or alarm,) "pray let me be installed in office at once, to prevent any such scandale. Do not let us complicate our difficulties further by a trial for manslaughter. The physician is lord of the sick-room; but I don't think his power extends to throwing old ladies out of the window. However, if you will invest me with authority as nurse, I will take temptation from you. I mean, I will keep Miss Shepherd at bay. She shall not enter the room. I'll frighten her."

David understood his wife, and he could not help taking her head between his hands, and pressing a long kiss on her forehead.

"God bless you, my own Edith! What should I do without you?" His voice faltered.

"You would throw your tutor's sister out of the window, and you would have had to wait a long time for this water. Oh! I am a very useful woman." There was the least possible touch of bitterness in the last sentence.

David felt, without understanding it. He kissed her again, and then said, as he took the water-can from her hands, "Come to Miriam now. She is sleeping uneasily,—the fever affects the head. We must apply cloths steeped in cold water all over it immediately, before she wakes."

Edith stepped on to open the door, and in another minute was by Miriam Grey's bedside.

Mrs. David Underwood saw nothing in the chamber for several minutes except the face of Miriam Grey. It was disturbed frequently by convulsive twitches—there was a hot, hectic flush on the cheeks and forehead, and the blue-veined eyelids did not quite cover the glassy eyes. She did not see there the beauty she expected. The calmness, the angelic sweetness, were not there now. She could only see a face that might once have been beautiful; but, with every feature distorted by pain, there was no beauty to be discovered there now, except by the eye of affection. Poor Miriam had been undressed by Martha and Dame Barnard, and now lay within the bed in a very uneasy slumber, muttering rapidly, moving her head from side to side, and tossing her arms to and fro. The only words that were distinctly audible,—and those recurred more often than any other, were—"David!" "His wife!" "They never told me!" When Edith heard these last words she looked in search of David. He was standing at a table near the bed, pouring water into a basin. Then, steeping a cloth in it, he advanced to the pillow, and laid it skilfully over the patient's head. A slight shudder ran through her frame, and she drew her breath suddenly, but she did not open her eyes. Edith saw that her husband turned pale, though every other sign of emotion was suppressed. She spoke no words, but, turning away from the bed, beckoned Martha aside. They went to the window, passing by Mr. Underwood, who sat at a table with his head resting on his hands, and his eyes fixed on the patient. Mr. Shepherd sat in a great chair, near the bed, with closed eyes and folded hands, as if in prayer.

"Dr. Underwood—David—wishes me to stay and nurse Miss Grey. He can trust me in cases of dangerous sickness better than a strange nurse who might misunderstand him."

"Of course. It is very good of you, though. It is too much trouble. I was just perplexed on this subject. Father must go home. It will not do for him to stay here. Look at him. If you would kindly stay for a few hours till I can come again or send some one. Poor Mrs. Barnard is too old to be active enough."

"My dear Miss Underwood, set your mind at ease on one point. All that the best medical skill and the most assiduous nursing can do for your friend shall be done. David and I will remain with her. Take your father away, and Mr. Shepherd; they can do no good. No one must remain here who is not wanted. David will not allow it, I know; nor will he allow any visitors—both for the patient's sake and their own—in a fever like that. Tell Miss Shepherd this. Come yourself, dear Miss Underwood, and I will meet you outside the house whenever you like; it is as well not to enter it. Another thing I must request you to do, my dear. The old servant has just sprained her ankle. You must find some active, trustworthy person to help her—a young girl, who can run up and down stairs quickly, and without making a noise. Now, come and show me where I shall find clean linen for Miss Grey—towels, sheets. Is there a medicine chest?"

Martha took her sister-in-law to a small inner room where Miss Grey kept all these things. Here she assisted in taking off the rest of her riding gear, and found a dressing-gown of Miss Grey's which Edith put on instead. That done, they returned to the sick-room and bade each other good bye in a silent pressure of the hand at the foot of the bed. Martha then whispered a few words to her father, who rose at once from his seat. She did the same to Mr. Shepherd, who rose also; and each, after casting one last lingering look at the poor sufferer, followed Martha out of the room. Wherever else men take command, in the sick-room they obey women implicitly and by instinct. David, who sat beside the patient, saw their movement towards the door, and glanced inquiringly at his wife. He understood by her look in reply, that she had contrived to send them away.

"It was quite right," he whispered. "But I must speak with my father and Martha. Take my place here, and change the cloths frequently."

He left the room, and Edith took his seat beside Miriam Grey's pillow.

It was a strange position! For a moment or two Edith could not help recalling the course of the morning's events. She had come from Torrington Hall that morning, anxious about her husband's meeting with his father, which was to have taken place; and which, as the reader knows, did take place the previous night. It had been arranged by David that she was to come alone to see his sisters, and be introduced to his father, if, as he hoped, time had softened his father's heart towards him. On her own account, Mrs. David Underwood was but little troubled about the meeting with her husband's relations. She was determined to make them like her, and she had never yet known a determination of that kind to fail. But there was one person in Milford whom she trembled, brave woman as she was, to think of meeting; whom she had determined not to meet that day, if by any womanly tactics she could avoid doing so.—That person was Miriam Grey. It was not jealousy, nor envy, that prompted this avoidance; her conscience acquitted her of both those ill-feelings; and she was glad of it, now that she was alone with the gentle woman who had first won David's love.—How different were the circumstances of this dreaded meeting from those she had sometimes imagined. She had pictured Miriam's beauty as something "too bright and good for human nature's daily food;"—Raphael's Virgins and young saints were scarcely so pure, so lovely as her dream of Miriam Grey. She expected to be vanquished, won in a moment by the serene sweetness of her gaze to feel how far superior she was to women such as herself. The good Edith had a foolish habit of mistaking herself for one of a class of clever women, good for nothing but to make a noise in the world and do a great deal of small work there, which might just as well be left undone. Miriam Grey was in her imagination the personification of beauty and gentleness, and she almost felt ashamed to think how far inferior in those qualities, the glory and the crown of womanhood, she must appear in David's eyes. But now that she saw Miriam shorn of all that soft radiance, sick, fevered, restless, Edith would have made a considerable sacrifice to restore Miriam to her natural health and beauty, that she might have looked on her first as she really was. "Now," she thought within herself, "I shall never know how beautiful she really is." By tending I shall learn to love her, and then I shall certainly think her beautiful. Poor sufferer!" she murmured tenderly, as she felt one of the small hands which were flung towards her at the moment, "How hot and dry!" She then removed the cloth from her head and placed a fresh one there. In doing so she remarked the extreme beauty of Miriam's hair. While she was looking at it, the poor parched lips moved convulsively, and Edith heard the words.

"What have I done to be so wretched?—David! David!—Why did you stay away?—Married!—I do not love him! No! no! That was over long ago. But,—but"—Here the voice died away, and suddenly Miriam started up in bed, and burst into tears. Her eyes were open; she was awake—conscious. She looked eagerly round the room, and at last her eyes rested on Mrs. David Underwood. She gazed at her intently.

"Who are you?" she said in a very low tone; "are you?—Yes,—you are,"—

"Edith Underwood!" said Edith, kneeling down and taking Miriam's hand. "You are very ill. I have come to nurse you if you will allow me." And without another word between them Miriam laid her aching head on Edith's shoulder and sobbed like a child.

Edith was murmuring the soft honeyed words she used to address to her children into Miriam's ear when David entered the room. He was unable to approach them for several minutes—he was so disturbed by tender feelings. But it behoved the physician to interfere. Gently he separated them, and said gravely,

"Edith, my dear, Miriam's life depends upon our care and control of our feelings. Get her well, and she shall weep as much as she likes. Now she must be kept quite quiet."

(To be continued.)

THE FRIENDS.

THE introduction of this engraving, from a drawing by J. W. Wright, affords an opportunity of making a few remarks upon the history of water-colour painting, and the high position it has attained in this country of late years. Mr. Wright, for a considerable period, held the post of secretary to the Old Water-colour Society, whose annual exhibitions were for many years graced by his excellent drawings of subjects analogous to this, simple in character, pleasing in his method of treating them, and faithful as natural representations.

Painting in water-colours is a comparatively modern invention, for though some of the old continental artists made drawings with the brush, or, to speak more professionally, with the camel hair pencil, they worked only in tints of ink or umber; it never seemed to enter their minds to use colours on paper, either for historical or landscape painting; which is the more surprising, when we recollect to what perfection the art of illuminating was brought in the middle ages and the period immediately following these. An exception to the above remark must be made in favour of those artists who practised fresco-painting and distemper, both of which are executed in water-colours upon walls properly prepared for the purpose; and there is no doubt but that the earliest painters, prior to the appearance of Van Eyck, the supposed discoverer of oil-painting in the middle of the fourteenth century, painted solely with colours mixed with strong gum-water, or other solid matter to give body to their vehicles, and afterwards varnished their pictures, so as to make them in appearance somewhat similar to oil-paintings. The name by which water-colours was formerly designated is aquarelle.

This department of the fine arts is essentially English, for nowhere has it been so extensively practised and with so much success as among ourselves. In power, richness and purity of tone, we have brought it on an equality with oils, while in delicacy and transparency of tints it far surpasses the latter vehicle, especially for atmospheric effects. The first artist whose attention was drawn to water-colours as a means for representing landscape and topographical scenery, was Paul Sandby, towards the end of the last century, but the most he effected was to lay in his outlines with a broad reed-pen and Indian Ink, putting in his shadows with ink also, and then washing thin tints of appropriate colours over the respective parts of his subject, in feeble imitation of their natural colours. Contemporaneous with Sandby, but a little later in his practice, was Rooker; he advanced the art a step or two in his attempts to represent local colour in buildings, &c.; but he always thought that water-colours would never reach sufficient power to form what might truly be called a picture. Wilson and Gainsborough were sometimes accustomed to sketch in this style; but as the fame of these artists rests on their oil-pictures only, they can scarcely be classed in the list of water-colour painters. Hearn, who was borne in 1744, and died in 1817, worked with greater success than any of his predecessors; so did John Cozens, who died about 1799; their drawings were more complete in harmony, more chaste in effect, and tasteful in execution; still they had little pretension to colour.

It was about the period when Cozens died, that there arose two men whose genius laid the foundation for the present elevated position of this art; they may legitimately be called the founders of our school. The first was Thomas Girtin, born in 1775, who died at the premature age of twenty-seven. The other was our great landscape-painter, Turner, the Royal Academician, whose remains have only within the last few months been laid in the Cathedral of St. Paul. Drawings from Girtin's hand were really pictures, and he was truly a painter, passing hours and days on the then most picturesque banks of the Thames, at Lambeth, sketching the old dilapidated dwelling-houses, potteries, mills, and other suitable materials for illustration, with which that locality abounded, and which it still shows, though far less numerously and effectively. He then travelled into the north of England, Scotland, and Wales, improving his style and producing works in which the hues of nature were copied with a fidelity that in those days was considered almost magical. Still, admirable as are his drawings, and highly as they are yet valued, they are very far behind the works of many of his immediate successors, and more so of living artists.

It seems almost superfluous to speak of Turner, whose name is a "household word" with every lover of art. His drawings, like his oil-pictures, exhibit two distinct epochs of his practice;—the one distinguished by the closest and truest imitation of nature in all her simple beauty, marvellous in delicate execution,—the other, glowing with all the gorgeousness and poetry of his art, even to a point generally considered extravagant. It would be difficult to say which are now most in request, but some of his earlier drawings—and of small dimensions too, such as one would measure by inches—have sold recently for sums varying from one hundred to two hundred guineas each.

In the year 1805, the number of artists practising water-colour painting had so largely increased, and the art had become so popular, that a body of these gentlemen formed themselves into a society for exhibiting their works apart from the rooms in Somerset House used by the Royal Academy, and where they considered full justice was not rendered them. Thus was the Water-colour Society established, and among its earlier supporters we find the names of Turner, Glover, Hearn, Crissall, Cotman, John Varley; and somewhat later Prout, Havell, Wright, Robson, most whom were associated with the men whose works now adorn the gallery in Pall Mall East, making up, perhaps, the most elegant and select pictorial exhibition in the metropolis. The strength of this institution has always laid in landscape-painting.

But it was found necessary some years after to open another channel for the further development of this art, so popular had it become; consequently, in 1835, another body of younger artists, assuming the title of the "New Water-colour Society," instituted an exhibition of their works annually at a gallery in Pall Mall, which is not less worthy of a visit than the older society. Some of the best historical and figure subjects produced in water-colours have ornamented the walls of these rooms.

It would seem almost impossible to carry this art further than it has already reached, in all those requisites that constitute good painting: our school is admired by all foreign artists who see what it produces, and who are always ready to acknowledge its vast superiority over every other. We must, however, take one objection to a practice now much in vogue with many water-colour painters, which can scarcely be called legitimate; this is the use of body-colours, or solid colours, in their foregrounds and other parts, giving the appearance of oils to their work. We believe this to be totally unnecessary to give power, which may be sufficiently attained by the usual method, and it certainly detracts from the character of a pure water-colour drawing.

IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE AUTUMN OF 1851.¹

FROM LETTERS AND MEMORANDA OF FREDERICK BREMER.

IV.

London.—Its physiognomy.—The day-side.—Popular pleasures.—The Parks.—The Zoological Gardens.—The British Museum.—Egyptian Hall, Dioramas.—State of Luxury.—Contrast.—The night-side.—The Wretchedness of the great City.—St. Giles's.—Westminster.—Rage.—Contrast.—The breaking-in of Light.—Missionaries.—Model Dwelling-houses.—"Boarding-house."—Public Baths and Wash-houses.—Schools.—The Dormitory.—Emigrants' Home.—Literature for the People.—Australia Felix.—Insufficiency of all these Remedies.

LONDON! great, magnificent, wonderful London! was the thought which presented itself again and again during my peregrinations and my visits to various districts of this immense city, and at the contemplation of its rich, varied physiognomy. From the city, where trade lives, strives, and posits its books, speculates and battles for life and death in smoky, gloomy streets and alleys, to Hampstead, where the country joins the town, and children ride upon asses over green hills and dales; from the crowded, noisy Strand, which you can scarcely cross for the throngs of omnibuses and carriages which are unceasingly driving along it, to the silent, elegant Belgravia; from the closely built portions of the city, where human beings live in crowded courts and wretched dens, like moles in the earth, without pleasure and without light, to the immense, magnificent parks,—justly called the "lungs of London," where people wander calmly beneath green trees, or beside the clear little lakes, on which rare water-birds swim rejoicingly; from Westminster to the Tower, from St. Paul's to Pall Mall and Piccadilly, and so on; all along the Thames, the broad Thames, with its affluent life, with its splendid bridges, with its steam-boats, swift as arrows, which bow down their chimneys as they shoot onward under these bridges,—what an abundance of great, characteristic and strong feature is here combined with beautiful detail!—the splendid palaces, the elegant detached houses with their gardens before them, the markets with their flowing fountains, the numerous small green enclosures, with their trees and bushes, which are met with everywhere and there as a refreshment to the eye of the wanderers;—these, and many other similar objects. And on all hands that great preponderance of substantial, wealthy, handsome, well-built, well-arranged houses.

In especial must I remark the way in which London, and, in fact, in which all English towns go out into, or up into, the country. It is not, as in many other nations, by the houses becoming smaller, uglier, by smoking chimneys becoming more numerous, marshes more extensive, the refuse of the city more perceptible. No! on the contrary, the gardens become more numerous and more extensive, the houses handsomer and more open, the streets of the town expand and become rows of beautiful villas and cottages, stone becomes less rare, flowers more frequent, the grey is changed into green: one remarks a something "con amore" in the care which is bestowed upon every dwelling, upon every grass-plot, in the luxuriant growth of every creeper which is trained up the walls of the houses and which engarlands their windows; in every iron palisade, which at once encloses and ornaments every plot of garden ground, and by the meaning of that English word comfort being above all things made evident to the mind of the observer.

In the midst of the city itself one does not think so much of this; other interests have here their life or—death. Because the great, closely-built city, where human beings live in dense masses, where they live, so to say, one upon another, in secret or open warfare for bread or the means of existence,—the city becomes always, in a certain respect, a home of death for humanity.

When God, however, created man, he placed him not in a city, but in a garden; and people have now begun to be aware of this in England. Men of high cultivation, and even of high birth, deliver lectures and print pamphlets on the evils of great cities with their densely-built habitations, and on the injurious effects which they produce on the human soul, as well as on physical life. And people are already taking measures by which, as cities grow, breathing room may grow also, and are preparing for the inhabitants the means by which, even here, they may preserve health, cleanliness, and the fresh enjoyments of life.

London, though in cleanliness, fresh air, general regulations, and the great number of detached houses standing in their gardens, which in this respect far exceeds most other great towns, has yet not been able to avoid the curse of the great city: I saw that,—I saw behind the magnificent quarters, behind the stately palaces, streets and markets, where the luxury and pomp of city and aristocratic life flourished in their fullest extent, that there were hidden regions, streets and lanes where might be seen the very opposite of all this—haunts of human wretchedness, of human tatters both outward and inward. I wished also to see these with my own eyes; to see St. Giles's and the dirty quarters behind Westminster; because I endeavour to see, everywhere, the best and the worst, the heaven and the hell of existence in all spheres of life. I wished to see it also in the life of London; and I saw it.

I began to speak of the city's bright side when I described the Great Exhibition with its cheerful life, and I will yet linger a few moments over this side of London life and over some of its gay scenes,—namely, those which may be enjoyed by all, or by nearly all classes, and which are therefore properly the people's pleasures.

(1) Continued from p. 301.

Of these, none were more agreeable to me than the promenades in the great Parks—Hyde-Park, the Green Park, Regent's Park, which last, alone, is several English miles in circumference. On Sundays, one sees them crowded with well-dressed people, mostly of the working classes; children tumble about freely on the green turf, which remains green and fresh notwithstanding, or feed with bread the beautiful swans or other aquatic birds which swim about on the river-like winding pieces of water. There stands also in one corner of St. James'-Park a row of cows, from which, if the pedestrians choose, they can drink new milk, and thus taste the pleasures of rural life; neither do other refreshments fail; but the best refreshment here is, after all, the fresh air, the wandering beneath green trees, the sight of the pleasure-takers, of the sports of the children, and the views which are obtained of beautiful palaces and churches. Queen Victoria may often enjoy from her royal residence of Buckingham Palace, the cheerful sight of her people thus wandering for their pleasure. Yes, it is to be feared that she, like other queens and kings, sees too much of this side of the life of her people, and thereby comes to forget that there is any other.

London possesses two scenes of popular enjoyment on a great scale, in its British Museum and its Zoological Gardens. In the former, the glance is sent over the life of antiquity; in the latter, over that of the present time in the kingdom of nature; and in both may the Englishman enjoy a view of England's power and greatness, because it is the spirit of England which has compelled Egypt and Greece to remove hither their gods, their heroic statues: it is England whose courageous sons at this present moment force their way into the interior of Africa, that mysterious native land of miracles and of the Leviathan; it is an Englishman who held in his hand snow from the clefts of the remote Mountains of the Moon; it is England which has aroused that ancient Nineveh from her thousands of years of sleep in the desert; England, which has caused to arise from their graves, and to stand forth beneath the sky of England, those witnesses of the life and art of antiquity which are known under the name of the Nineveh Marbles, those magnificent but enigmatical figures which are called the Nineveh Bulls, in the immense wings of which one cannot but admire the fine artistic skill of the workmanship, and from the beautiful human countenances of which glances oriental despotism with eyes—such as those with which King Assuérus might have gazed on the beautiful Esther, when she sank fainting before the power of that glance. They have an extraordinary expression—these countenances of Nineveh, so magnificent, so strong, and at the same time, so joyous—a something about them so valiant and so joyously commanding! It was an expression which surprised me, and which I could not rightly comprehend. It would be necessary for me to see them yet again before I could fully satisfy myself whether this inexpressible, proudly, joyous glance is one of wisdom or of stupidity! I could almost fancy it might be the latter, when I contemplate the expression of gentle majesty in the head of the Grecian Jupiter. Nevertheless, whether it be wisdom or stupidity—these representations of ancient Nineveh have a real grandeur and originality about them. Were they then representatives of life there? Was life there thus proud and joyous, thus unconscious of trouble, care, or death, thus valiant, and without all arrogance? Had it such eyes? Ah! and yet it has lain buried in the sand of the desert, lain forgotten there many thousand years. And now, when they once more look up with those large, magnificent eyes, they discover another world around them, another Nineveh which cannot understand what they would say. Thus proudly might Nineveh have looked when the prophet uttered above her his "woe!" Such a glance does not accord with the life of earth.

In comparison with these latest discovered but most ancient works of art, the Egyptian statues fall infinitely short, bearing evidence of a degraded, sensual humanity, and the same as regarded art. But neither of these, nor of the Elgin marbles, nor of many other treasures of art in the British Museum which testify at the same time to the greatness of foregone ages, and to the power of the English world-conquering intelligence, shall I say anything, because time failed me rightly to observe them, and the Nineveh marbles almost bewitched me by their contemplation.

It is to me difficult to imagine a greater pleasure than that of wandering through these halls, or than by a visit to the Zoological Garden which lies on one side of the Regent's Park. I would willingly reside near this park for a time, that I might again and again wander about in this world of animals from all zones, and listen to all that they have to relate, ice-bears and lions, turtles and eagles, the ouarg-ouarg and the rhinoceros! The English Zoological Garden, although less fortunate in its locality than the Jardins des Plantes in Paris, is much richer as regards animals. That which at this time attracted hither most visitors was the new guest of the garden, a so-called river-horse or hippopotamus, lately brought hither from Upper Egypt, where it was taken when young. It was yet not full grown, and had here its own keeper—an Arab—its own house, its own court, its own reservoir, to bathe and swim in! Thus it lived in a really princely Hippopotamus fashion. I saw his highness ascend out of his bath in a particularly good humour, and he looked to me like an enormous—pig, with an enormously broad snout. He was very fat, smooth, and grey, and awkward in his movements, like the elephant. Long-necked giraffes walked about, feeding from wooden racks in the court adjoining that of the hippopotamus, and glancing at us across it. One can scarcely imagine a greater contrast than in these animals.

The eagles sat upon crags placed in a row beneath a lofty transparent arch of iron work, an arrangement which seemed to me excellent, and which I hope seemed so to them, in case they could forget that they were captives. Here they might breathe, here spread out their hugo wings, see the free expanse of heaven, and the sun, and build habitations for themselves upon the rock. On the contrary, the lions, leopards, and such-like noble beasts of the desert, seemed to me particularly unhappy in their iron-grated stone vaults; and their perpetual, uneasy walking backwards and forwards in their cages—I could not see that without a feeling of distress. How beautiful they must be in the desert, or amid tropical woods, or in the wild caverns of the mountains, those grand, terrific beasts—how fearfully beautiful! One day I saw these animals during their feeding time. Two men went round with wooden vessels filled with pieces of raw meat; these were taken up with a large iron-pronged fork, and put, or rather flung, through the iron grating into the dens. It was terrible to see the savage joy, the fury, with which the food was received and swallowed down by the beasts. Three pieces of meat were thrown into one great vault which was at that time empty, a door was then drawn up at the back of the vault, and three huge yellow lions with shaggy manes rushed roaring in, and at once spring each possessed himself of his piece of flesh. One of the lions held his piece between his teeth for certainly a quarter of an hour, merely growling and gloating over it in savage joy, whilst his flashing eyes glared upon the spectators, and his tail was swung from side to side with an expression of defiance. It was a splendid, but a fearful sight. One of my friends was accustomed sometimes to visit these animals in company with his little girl, a beautiful child, with a complexion like milk and cherries. The sight of her invariably produced great excitement in the lions. They seemed evidently to show their love to her in a ravenous manner.

The serpents were motionless in their glass house, and lay, half-asleep, curled around the trunks of trees. In the evening by lamp-light they become lively, and then, twisting about and flashing forth their snaky splendours, they present a fine spectacle. The snake-room, with its walls of glass, behind which the snakes live, reminded me of the old northern myth of Nastrand, the roof of which was woven of snakes' backs, the final home of the ungodly—an unpleasant, but vigorous picture. The most disagreeable and the ugliest of all the snakes, was that little snake which the beautiful Queen Cleopatra, herself false as a serpent, placed at her breast; a little grey, flat-headed snake which liked to bury itself in the sand.

The monkey-family lead a sad life; stretch out their hands for nuts or for bread, with mournful human gestures; contentious, beaten, oppressed, thrust aside, frightening one another, the stronger the weaker—mournfully human also.

Sad, also, was the sight of an orang-outang, spite of all its queer grimaces, solitary in its house, for it evidently suffered ennui, was restless, and would go out. It embraced its keeper and kissed him with real human tenderness. The countenance, so human, yet without any human intelligence, made a painful impression upon me; so did the friendly tame creature here, longing for its fellows, and seeing around it only human beings. Thou poor animal! Fain would I have seen thee in the primeval woods of Africa, caressing thy wife in the clear moonlight of the tropical night, sporting with her among the branches of the trees, and sleeping upon them, rocked by the warm night wind. There thy ugliness would have had a sort of picturesque beauty. After the strange beast-man had climbed hither and thither along the iron railing, seizing the bars with his hands, and feet which resembled hands, and also with his teeth, he took a white woollen blanket, wrapped it around him in a very complicated manner, and ended by laying himself down as a human being might do, in his chilly, desolate room. They say that he will not live long in this country.¹

After this, all the more charming was the spectacle presented by the water-fowl from every zone,—Ducks, Swans, and Co. all quite at home here, swimming in the clear waters, among little green islands on which they had their little huts. It was most charmingly pretty and complete. And the mother-duck with her little, lively golden-yellow flock, swimming neck and heels after her, or seeking shelter under her wings, is at all times one of the most lovely scenes of natural life—resembling humanity in a beautiful manner.

Even among the wild beasts I saw a beautiful human trait of maternal affection. A female leopard had in her cage two young cubs, lively and playful as puppies. When the man threw the flesh into her cage, she drew herself back and let the young ones first seize upon the piece.

Crows from all parts of the world here live together in one neighbourhood, and that the chattering and laughter was loud here did not surprise me, neither that the European crows so well maintained their place among their fellows. That which, however, astonished and delighted me was, the sweet flute-like melodious tones of the Australian crow. In the presence of this crow from Paradise—for originally it must have come therefrom—it seemed to me that all the other crows ought to have kept silence with their senseless chattering.—But they were nothing but crows, and they liked better to hear themselves.

Parrots from all lands lived and gus jelled together in a large room, and they there made such a loud screaming, that in order to stand it out one must have been one of their own relations. Better be among the silent, dejected, stealthy, hissing, shining snakes than in company with parrots! The former might kill the body, but the latter the soul.

Twilight came on, and drove me out of the Zoological Garden each time I was there, and before I had seen all its treasures. Would that I might return there yet a third time and remain still longer!

Among the places in London which were much

(1) The orang-outang is dead since Miss Bremer's visit. He died of inflammation of the lungs, and, with truth it may be said, much regretted. During his short life in the gardens he had shown himself docile, and remarkably intelligent.—TRAVERS.

visited at this time by the millions of strangers who streamed hither, was the Egyptian Hall,—a temple or museum for the remarkable things and curiosities from all foreign lands, which are travelling through the world, together with extraordinary men, animals, conjurers and conjuration,—a temple of novelty which ought to be found in every great city, for the support and refreshment of the spirit of curiosity in the human breast. I saw here a couple of beautiful dioramas, and these were a glorious and extraordinary delight. What is the use of giving oneself a deal of trouble to travel through far countries, in the face of danger by land and sea—to make great efforts to be in time for the railway-train—to get up in the night to go on board the steam-boat or by diligence—to eat food which does not agree with one—to lose one's luggage and all one's clothes—to be paying one's money away all day long—to have an empty purse and weary body—in a word, to do battle with a thousand difficulties,—when one can, here at the Diorama, sit quietly upon a bench, listen to music, and for a shilling behold Europe, Asia or America pass before one, exhibit their ruins, their rivers, their capitals, their temples, and beautiful natural scenes before one's eyes? Thus it was that I here beheld Egypt and the Nile travel past me; saw the ancient pyramids and temples with their colossal statues; saw Copts and Turks reposing beneath the palm-trees, and European tourists smoke their cigars under the nose of the old gods of the Hindoos; saw Sirius ascending brilliantly above the Nile; saw the beautiful head of the Sphinx glancing upward from the desert sand, whilst night rested above the desert, and Canopus looking down upon it—a sight which I shall never forget! Beyond this, I allowed the journey from London to Calcutta to journey past me; by Malta, and the Mediterranean, through the desert by caravan, with camels, Arabs, and so on to Ceylon and Hindoostan with its cities and Hindoo temples. And it is impossible for me to say how convenient and entertaining I found it all.

Among the luxurious establishments of London, I heard much said of the clubs; palace-like houses where certain corporate bodies in the government or the city have their place of meeting arranged for their own especial accommodation, and where everything which is most recherché in food and in wine, and every article of life's luxury is provided for the use of these gentlemen. I was shown the Lawyers', the Merchants' and the United-Service Club Houses, with many others. Men of all classes who have good incomes may here enjoy themselves every day, without any other danger—than that of here forgetting the nobler business of life and their better self; for these magnificent abodes are the promoters of selfishness and the desire for self-indulgence; and the man accustomed to the refined enjoyments of the club not unfrequently comes to despise the more frugal meal of home, and simple domestic pleasure. He is afraid of taking an amiable wife because he might be prevented from having his delicate club-house dinner; and the man thus corrupted by luxury, renders himself incapable of life's best enjoyment. Ah! he does still worse than that, because the evil which self-indulgence begets is not negative, is not merely individual!

And now from these halls, where the thirst of pleasure—a beautiful, false Delilah—seeks to lull men to sleep and rob them of their strength, and the saloons where self-indulgent women trifle away life in vanity, and worse still, although they have not their public club-houses for this purpose, I will pass over at once to scenes which present the strongest contrast and resemblance to these places—the quarters in London where the wretched, the poor and the openly criminal of the community have also their clubs and places of meeting, the great revelation of the dark side of life.

I had already seen it many times, even in the rich splendid parts of the city. I had seen in front of magnificent shops, filled with bread and confectionary of every kind, women stealing along with pallid countenances and glances which earnestly demanded what the lips dared not to ask; I had seen children coming out of the gross streets of the Strand, children with eyes so beautiful that I could have kissed them, but clothed in rags and covered with dirt which was revolting, and I proposed to myself to see the “night-shade” of London life in its fullest bloom. The poison-flower of this name, so dangerous to the noblest feelings of humanity, and thence seizing upon life, grew here in luxuriance—that I knew—not in nature, but in human life.

And I saw it, saw it in St. Giles's, and in particular in a part of Westminster, the whole quarter, streets and lanes, filled with wretched half-humble-down houses, windows stopped up with rags, rags hanging fluttering in the wind outside the houses, as if they were banners; everything in tatters, everything dirty, wretched! And human beings with traces of the ale-house upon them, traces of every species of vice, of crime and want and misery; pallid-faced women and men, great, ill-conditioned boys and girls, who in the middle of the day idled about doing nothing; in fact “the dangerous classes” were here in vigorous growth! But even into this realm of darkness had the light of the sun begun to penetrate.

Only a few years ago it was not safe even for the police authorities to venture into this quarter, and several persons of the better class who had ventured into houses here were never afterwards heard of. Some, however, ventured in yet again, and came out scathless. Clergymen, “the Missionaries of the Poor,” dared to come hither without fear, because they too were poor in everything but the strength of eternal life;—they dared to come hither; visited the sick and dying, penetrated into every corner and nook, helping, comforting, admonishing, and bearing away with them the intelligence of what they had seen and experienced into a higher class of society. That was the beginning. After that came men of respectability, birth, fortune, men—yes, and women also, of high acquirements, who turned themselves hither both with thought and deed. Thus real and powerful material means were enlisted in the service of humanity. A broad street was opened through the densest portion of the district, through the worst abodes of darkness, and was now in progress of completion. An old house which had been purchased and converted into "Model Boarding-houses," stood close beside the former den of thieves, whither guests had been inveigled and plundered, if not murdered.

"I expected this summer to have seen many of my countrymen," lamented a fat and ugly French hostess, to one of her wretched neighbours, "but I have had scarcely any. My room stands empty!"

I did not much wonder at that when I went through this room, up in a third story, and afterwards saw the rooms in the large model eating-house just by, established by Lord Canning, and where everything, although in the highest degree homely, was remarkable for cleanliness and order. This house was under the management of respectable people, a man and his wife, with a fixed salary, who had one hundred boarders, all men. Five or six beds stood in each room. Fresh air, cleanliness and good order prevailed everywhere; I saw also a lodging-house somewhat of this kind, but for decayed gentlemen. Each of these had, besides a small sum weekly, a bedroom together with fuel and the privilege of reading in a common room. Each cooked his own food by his own fire.

I saw in the eating-room here, as well as in the kitchen, several highly original countenances, good studies for a Boz or Hogarth, and evidently still estimable ruins of a better and not insignificant humanity. It seemed to me that I could observe traces of genius or humour of so high a degree that something great might have come out of them if they had not gone astray or lost their balance. However that might be, still these figures, with their remarkable noses, seen by the light of the fire, with their pipes or their tea-cups, each one busied for himself in that large warm room, produced a peculiar appearance, not unpleasing nor without interest. They had shelter, companionship, a certain independence, and a certain comfort, these old gentlemen. They might wait in peace for the great "sitting-day."

I saw also a newly-erected Ragged School in this quarter, but the scholars were evidently yet an uncultivated set of urchins, who had great need to go to school. Public baths and washhouses had been also established here, and these were assiduously visited on Saturdays. Who does not see in all this the commencement of a better state of things? and already this has begun through these means in various parts of London. In many of the worst and poorest parts of London have model lodging-houses been established, or are about to be so, together with public baths and washhouses.

I visited one of the larger model dwelling-houses, in company with the good and cheerful Mrs. C., whose countenance belongs to that class which ought often to be seen in dark places, because it is like sunshine. The building, a large well-constructed block, with accommodation for twenty families and one hundred and twenty-three single women, was known by the appellation of Thanksgiving Buildings, because it had been erected the year after the last visitation of the cholera in London, and in grateful acknowledgment of its ceasing in a quarter where, in consequence of the unhealthiness of the houses, it had been most fatally prevalent. In truth, a beautiful mode of returning thanks to God; worthy to be considered and imitated!

We visited a few families. The doors of their dwellings had handsome knockers upon them, and everything in the interior was arranged with the same well-considered attention as in Prince Albert's cottages. The mistresses of these families, agreeable-looking young women, with many children, took an especial pleasure in showing us how easily and abundantly the fresh water flowed forth by merely turning a little tap. They seemed to place a particular value upon this. The rooms were light, and in arrangement and number similar to those in the dwellings I have already described. One of the women, mother of two little children, lamented that the rent was high, and that she was unable to do anything to assist her husband in providing for the family. Formerly, and while unmarried, and in the employment of a dress-maker, she had been able to earn seven shillings a-week. She mentioned this with a melancholy expression; and one could not but, while listening to her, think upon the deplorable manner in which the education of the poor woman is circumscribed, and which allows to her hand no other occupation but that of the seamstress. How easily the woman's work at home, in manufacture or art, might be advantageous both to the husband and the family!

A bath and washing establishment were in progress of preparation within the building. The rooms for single women were yet empty; nor were, indeed, all of them complete; and even when they are finished, I hope that they may not become occupied, at least by amiable women. Each room is intended for two occupants, each of whom will pay one shilling per week as rent; and the rooms are so small and so entirely devoid of comfort of any kind, that it required an effort to look at them. I could not help thinking of the magnificent club-houses. Not that I would have such for women; but, nevertheless, I would have something a little nice, and with some convenience—yes, and with something attractive in the neighbourhood; this is a mere act of justice which I would demand for these lonely ones!

The great public washhouses present a gladdening sight. Hundreds of women stood here, each one in her little alcove, with her steaming wash before her, busy and cheerful.

"I can get all my washing done in two hours," said a woman to me, with sparkling eyes, beside whom I stood.

"And how frequently is it needful for you to wash?" inquired I.

"Once a week," replied she, "I have a husband and five little children."

One may fancy this woman doing her washing at home, drying and ironing it on the Saturday in the only room in which is the whole family, in order to have the clothes ready for the Sunday; one may fancy the husband coming home on the Saturday evening from his week's work in order to enjoy rest and refreshment with his family—and finding the room full of wet clothes, damp, or filled with steam during the ironing process; the wife, occupied by her work, tired, and perhaps cross, the children in the way, or else—out of the way, in order to make room for the wet clothes! If the husband, under such circumstances, did not leave home and wife in order to find rest and refreshment at the alehouse, he must have had the soul of a martyr and hero!

In these new public washhouses, the wife can do the whole of her washing and have it ironed and finished in two hours. And it was in the highest degree interesting to observe the means by which this operation in all its various departments can be carried on so rapidly and so well, and at the same time, for so small a payment.

The baths are also much frequented by the lower classes, but that most generally on the Saturday. And then the numbers are so great, that the lobbies are crowded with people waiting for their turns. Both these institutions are of incalculable benefit to the domestic life of the poor.

What the model dwelling-houses are and may become for the same class, the following anecdote may suffice to prove.

"On one of my visits to the Metropolitan buildings," related to me Dr. S. S., one of the noble men who was foremost in their establishment, "I saw a woman standing at her open door. She greeted me so pleasantly, and with so kind an expression, that I was involuntarily compelled to stand and speak to her. She invited me into her dwelling, a sitting-room and kitchen, (but which also was a sitting-room,) showed me how prettily arranged she and her husband had everything here, the beautiful, extensive prospect from the window, and how convenient was everything within; she showed me their flowers, books, birds, and seemed to be made most sincerely happy by all these things. I fell into conversation with her, and by this means became acquainted with her history.

"We have been in better circumstances," said she; "at one time, indeed, we were very well off. But my husband became surety for a friend in whom he had as entire faith as in himself. His friend, however, became bankrupt, and by this means we lost nearly all that we possessed. We were obliged to sell a part of our furniture, and to remove from our comfortable dwelling to one much worse, but of a rent which we could afford. Here, however, new misfortunes met us; everything began to go downward with us; we were obliged to sell the greater part of that which was yet left, and again to remove. We took a house in one of the suburbs of London, the best that we could get for the low rent which we could now afford. But it was a gloomy, damp, ugly, and in the highest degree inconvenient dwelling. When my husband used to come into the gloomy, chilly room, he became, as it were, struck with numbness. He sat silent, without taking pleasure in anything; he could not even open a book, and reading used formerly to be his greatest delight. "It is all over with us now," thought I to myself, "and we must sink down into wretched poverty."

"One day, however, I saw by chance, in the newspaper, an advertisement of rooms here at a reasonable rate, and I thought, if we could only manage to get into these rooms, he would perhaps come round again. I persuaded him therefore to let us go and look at them. These rooms which we now have, were fortunately still untenanted; and as we could produce the required certificate of character and respectability, we were accepted as tenants. My husband had not been long in these cheerful, excellent rooms, before he again took to his books, and began to work afresh. "Thank God!" thought I, "now are we right again!"

"And so it was. My husband now earns good wages, and is promised an advance in them. Our rent costs but three shillings a-week. We are now again getting on in the world—God be praised!"

And a hand extended to the sinking;—light, air, health, hope to those who sit in darkness—behold, these are offered by this institution of a truly Christian community, to the children of desolation. Prepare ye the way of the Lord!

"If you could remain longer with us," said the same friend of humanity to me, "I would take you with me in my walks through the city, and I would show you, not our palaces and places of magnificence, but our wretchedness, and that which we do to alleviate it."

And I have now seen sufficient thereof for me to say, that much is done, but that still more yet remains to be done. How much may be conceived from this single fact, that out of the immense population of the London poor only about fifteen hundred persons can be accommodated in the model dwelling-house!

In connexion with these establishments will I mention two of a similar design which I visited during my stay in London. One of these is known under the appellation of "The Dormitory for Thieves." This was the undertaking of a single individual, and still depends, in a great measure, upon the extraordinary courage and clear-headedness of this one man, together with private assistance which his undertaking has received from noble-minded women and men.

Mr. Nash was a teacher in a Ragged School. Just opposite the school was an open shed, beneath which Mr. Nash observed that early in the morning a number of youths, of from about seventeen to twenty years of age, assembled, who appeared to have no other place of shelter. Before long he fell into conversation with them, and learnt that such was the case, and that these youths spent the greater part of the night, as well as of the day, on foot for the purposes of theft or plunder. He inquired from them whether they would be willing to give up this miserable occupation for something better. All declared that they had no higher wish than to do so. Mr. Nash then proposed to them that they should pass through a probatory period of two weeks, during which they should be placed in a solitary room, and have no other food than bread and water. After this time of trial, if they passed well through it, he promised to receive them into the school, and teach them some trade, of which they themselves should have the choice, and which would thus open to them a respectable path for the future. The boys willingly entered into the plan, and, under the oversight of Mr. Nash, commenced their noviciate on bread and water; a pound weight of bread each a-day, in a solitary room, but without fastenings. Some of them grew weary in a few days, and went out again to cheat and to steal, but the greater number persevered, and with these Mr. Nash commenced the institution called the "Dormitory," which soon extended itself, and now contains about fifty pupils, and at which forty or more candidates present themselves weekly, young men of from sixteen to thirty years of age, who are desirous of leaving the paths of vice. The great school for juvenile offenders, situated a few miles from London, receives only children under fifteen years of age. I very much regret that my time was too short to allow of my visiting it.

The house designed for the Dormitory was now building, and Mr. Nash was therefore compelled from want of room to reject each week many young men who were desirous of being received on trial. The fifty who had successfully passed through the heavy probation,—a short one, it is true, but a sufficient trial for young men with hungry stomachs, unbroken wills, and unaccustomed to discipline,—were employed in various rooms as shoemakers, tailors, carpenters, smiths, printers, and so on. They scarcely looked up, and were zealously occupied by their work. Three young men, of from eighteen to twenty, underwent, as best for them, their trial in an empty room the doors of which stood open. They had determined upon pursuing a certain trade, and had firmly resolved upon amending their course of life. I saw among these young men many pleasant, hopeful countenances, and some also which it required courage to admit into an institution for improvement.

But this Mr. Nash has a countenance which is remarkable for great courage and the most cheerful confidence. And, perhaps, it is precisely this very courage and this cheerful confidence which are most needed and of which there is most want in society. Perhaps there would not be found anything altogether irremediable in the world if we had only this right courage, this right trust—in the strength of resurrection!

The fallen youths in this institution are taught not merely a handicraft trade, but, as a matter of course, first and foremost the principles of Christianity. Many of them are destined for emigration, and, after having well passed through their apprenticeship, obtain aid for their outfit and their voyage, which is in a general way to Australia. For Australia Felix is a picture which floats before the eye of the converted youth as the goal and reward of his industry and his good conduct during his apprenticeship. And the beautiful skies of Australia seem intended by Providence as a symbol of mercy, to entice home the prodigal but repentant son of earth.

I hear at this point an objection which is often made.

"You are promoters of crime, inasmuch as you assist the criminal more than the innocent; inasmuch as the quality of thief becomes a letter of recommendation to 'the Dormitory for Thieves,' and thence to Australia."

This objection would be just if no protecting, aiding hand were stretched forth to guiltless and destitute youth. But in England this objection is overruled by many benevolent institutions. Among these is the Emigrant's Home for young persons who can produce certificates of blameless life, and who wish to emigrate, but have not the means of so doing. I visited the Home, where young women of the working class and of good character are received for a time, examined, and afterwards enabled to leave the country and to obtain situations in the English colonies. Between seven and eight hundred young women had, within rather more than a year, been sent abroad from this Home, their passage paid, and services obtained for them in the colonies, mostly in New Zealand and Australia. In the Ragged Schools also is Australia Felix a land which stands before the souls of the children as a future home with a brighter sky and better prospects for them than their native land, and the sending them thither is a reward for their progress in learning. From thirteen to fifteen years of age they are sent thither,—that is to say, to the southern part of the continent, where the climate is most healthy, and where none of the convict population are to be met with; these, as is well known, being confined to the northern coast. The children obtain situations in the families of the wealthy colonists, still remaining in connexion with the mother-school which sent them out; and their letters to the teachers and their friends, about the country and the people of that new world to which they have removed, diffuse the utmost pleasure and excite the deepest interest in the old home. I read some of these letters printed in small, neat, stitched pamphlets, which are sold and circulated for a few pence, together with many other small writings of the same price and form. I read with great interest these child-like, naïve descriptions, fresh with morning dew, from the new world. And this led me to a more intimate acquaintance with the popular folk-literature of England. This subject, however, is too great to be treated of here, and demands a separate chapter. Merely a few words in short.

In order that it may actually be an advantage to the child to learn to read in the school, it is of importance that when it leaves the school it may find something good to read,—something improving for the understanding, something ennobling for the heart. Rich men's children have this in superabundance; the children of the poor have long had, and still in many countries have, when they leave school, no other reading of an amusing kind to go to than wretched ballads, rude stories, immoral tales and pictures, which degrade mind and taste,—and they form themselves accordingly. In England, and in various cultivated countries, people have begun zealously to provide for the needs of the reading portion of the lower classes. Societies have been formed both in the Episcopal Church and other religious bodies, for the diffusion of useful and entertaining reading, designed especially for the youth of the lower classes who have the wish to read, but who have not the means of purchasing expensive books. Small works illustrated with beautiful vignettes circulate in England by thousands, especially narratives, biographies, and such like, which are calculated to please the most uneducated as well as the most childish mind. The number of these writings, and so-called "tracts," which are sold at from one penny to sixpence each, is immense in England. They circulate over the whole country, and may be met with in all the bookshops.

In the Ragged Schools, in the Model-boarding houses, in the Home for poor emigrants, in the Dormitory for thieves, in many benevolent institutions, had I seen a copper-plate portrait of a handsome middle-aged gentleman, holding a roll of paper in his hand, from which he seemed about to read. This was the portrait of Lord Ashley, now Earl of Shaftesbury. It was thus that he stood up, time after time, in Parliament, with narratives which he had collected and written down from the life of the working classes of England, with its neglects and necessities, its temptations to crime, and its bitterness against society, especially in the manufacturing districts. It was thus that he continued to stand forth and to plead, spite of opposition, derision, reproach, and threats, until he aroused that universal attention, and that universal sympathy for the sufferings of the lower classes of society, which he made it his mission to search into and to alleviate. Thus, he became the promoter of important reforms, and of many excellent institutions for the oppressed and the fallen of the labouring classes. Thus, he became so well known for his spirit of active human kindness, that not long since, the thieves of London, to the number of more than a thousand, if I am not mistaken, sent to Lord Ashley, requesting that he would meet them at a certain place, which they named, where they wished to ask his advice, as to how they might get into some better way of life. Lord Ashley undertook to meet these thieves. These dangerous classes had laid aside their fearful aspect for the occasion. They came now as repentant children to a father, to whose counsel and guidance they would submit themselves. During this meeting, his lordship wished to give a small sum of money to an old man, but not having small change with him, produced a sovereign, and asked if some one would go out and get change for him. Many hands were stretched forth, and Lord Ashley gave the gold coin to a boy, who immediately sprang out with it. As he remained a considerable time away, a general uneasiness spread itself through the assembly; all looked eagerly towards the door, all were evidently anxious that he should not abuse the confidence of his lordship; and when, at length, he returned with the proper amount of change, a general satisfaction showed itself.

I am sorry not to know more about this conference, nor what advice Lord Ashley gave to the thieves, because it must have been something beyond mere theory. The Dormitory, as a preparatory institution, and emigration to countries where there is plenty of honest labour and labour's wages, are good practical means, which Lord Ashley could refer them to.

And it cannot be denied, that England in its extensive and as yet scantily-peopled colonies, has an excellent mode of assistance and resource for its dangerous population, and in especial for its superabundant population. And one cannot but acknowledge that it is the increasing emigration to these colonies which gives England at this time freer breathing-room and a more vigorous life.

Nevertheless, even this aid is insufficient,—is not the fundamental aid, but merely temporary aid,—and ruin and danger would, even with it, always recur, and again implant themselves in England, and in every new England, if there had not, within the working classes themselves, arisen at this very time a movement, a vitality, which,—I openly acknowledge it,—appears to me the actually new and saving life of this age; the actually progressive, yet at the same time, truly conservative, new life of society, the latest, freshest shoots on the world-old tree of Yggdrasil.

Although not fully able at this time to go into the subject with any degree of completeness, I must yet say sufficient thereon to induce noble and unprejudiced minds to give to it the attention which it deserves.

(To be continued.)

CHIKAGOU AND TONIKA.²

A PASSAGE IN THE ABORIGINAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES.

BY MISS RACHEL G. HEYER.

CHAPTER I.

On the west bank of the Mississippi River, on a high bluff commanding a view of many miles of that

(1) This anecdote is substantially true, excepting that the actor in it was Mr. Mayhew instead of the Earl of Shaftesbury.—TRANS.

(2) [We copy the following striking and graphic story from an American Contemporary, "Sartain's Union Magazine of Literature and Art"—a work of established as well as of merited repute. Occasionally, we shall, no doubt, find in this periodical, and in others of similar character issued in "the States," much that cannot fail to interest and inform our readers. We shall consider ourselves fully justified in adopting any such material, always, of course, acknowledging the source. We need scarcely say, that the periodical works of the States borrow from us very freely: they are at perfect liberty to do so; we shall, indeed, rejoice to see that our labours here are made useful to our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic; and they will not, we feel sure, grudge us an equal advantage in consulting their pages for the benefit of our readers.]

turbid and impetuous stream—now the site of the beautiful town of Natchez—was situate, in 1729, the village of the Natchez tribe of Indians. South of this, at the distance of about three-quarters of a mile, stood the French fort of St. Rosalie, containing a small garrison under the command of Captain du Chopt, who was also governor of the colony in its immediate neighbourhood. This colony consisted of some two to three hundred persons—men, women, and children. And these were made up of soldiers, traders, agriculturists, artisans, and lastly, of gentlemen; by which we mean the poor relations of some of the French nobility, who had come out under the auspices of the great financier, Law, to make their fortunes, and to find a grave. The settlement of these émigrés joined immediately on to the Indian village, and was in many respects like it; except that here and there something of a more ambitious form than a hut met the eye, and claimed the distinction of a house. This proximity of habitation made the inmates very neighbourly in their ways and communications. There was, therefore, going on, a gradual fusion of the races and languages, which, had no serious event ruptured their harmony, might have furnished our linguists with a new field for etymological investigation. The Indians, who were a shrewd and quick-witted people, were not long in acquiring a very free use of the patois; while their own tongue, remarkably expressive and copious, gave evidence of a fund of observation and reflection which the student of mere book-knowledge would be slow to credit. The French, indeed, were their superiors in the arts of civilized life: that is, they professed the Christian religion, had a chapel, and had a Capuchin clergyman in the person of Father Philibert, who was also a missionary among the Indians—some half-dozen of whom were neophytes. But as to their morals—it is not necessary to make any very nice distinctions. Savage or civilized, mankind have among them about the same proportions of brute nature. Put both together in the wilderness, and they will soon learn to meet each other half way.

Extending back from the edge of the bluff that overlooked the river, might have been seen, on a sultry afternoon in the latter part of the month of August, a collection of huts constituting the Natchez village. Each hut was erected in accordance with the caprice or taste of its owner, without regard to beauty in form or order in relation to its neighbours; so that the whole, as an exhibition of architectural design, might not have excited the admiration of a modern Pollio. Could the author of the "Vestiges of the Creation" have looked down upon it from the cloudy eminence of his cosmological theory, he might have derived from the view another argument in favour of the dispositions of unintelligent affinities, and pointed to the development of a general figure that arose out of no apparent intention. The arrangement, however, had at least this advantage, that no one individual's taste was sacrificed to a general desire of uniformity; and if each individual was pleased, the aggregate of the pleasure was a public blessing. There were, at the same time, two objects which rose into view above the line of the common level. The first was the temple—an edifice with an arched roof, surrounded by a palisade, upon the points of which were exposed some half-dozen score of human heads; some half, some wholly, denuded of the flesh, bleaching and festering in the hot air. The next erection of importance was the residence of the Great Chief; or, as he was called, the Brother of the Sun. This was built upon an elevated platform of earth, and was more spacious than any of the others. The Brother of the Sun himself was not at present visible, but had retired from the presence of the greater luminary of the world; contenting himself, as an evidence of his existence, with an occasional puff of smoke from his pipe, while he sat within the door. His three young wives lay in a quiet snooze, by the side of a large dog, on some mats at the further end of the royal residence. Most of the huts were likewise silent, their inmates probably indulging in the siesta or the pipe. To diversify the scene, one might observe, here and there, little groups of negroes, male and female, young and old, sitting quietly by the side of their huts, enjoying with lazy delight the hot beams that fell directly upon their black and unctuous visages. They were slaves, whose occupation was in the fields of maize and melon patches. But it was now a season of great drought; and it seemed as if all nature was resting from her labours, and lay panting in the glare and heat of day. The foliage was covered with dust—the grass burnt to a bright dry brown—the Mississippi rolled in heavy masses of muddy water in its contracted bed—and no form of life, whether of beast or bird, broke the solemn stillness. Scarcely a breath of wind whispered in the universal repose; while the sun went on his sultry way, looking down through the red haze upon the cracked and gasping earth, as if he was prepared to light a general conflagration.

Presently, there emerged from one of the huts into an open space near the western quarter of the village, an old Indian, arrayed in the most grotesque fashion. Upon his head he had secured the horns of a buffalo. His shoulders were covered by a broad collar of porcupine quills. Around his loins he had, wrapped a scarlet cloth, in which were stuck several small images, made of a kind of red earth. He held in his right hand a long reed, with a perforated bulb at the end of it, through which he forced bubbles of water. In his left, there was an instrument resembling a child's rattle, which he ever and anon shook in the air. In his wide savage lips he held his pipe. As soon as he had advanced into the middle of the open ground, he began to throw his body into the most singular forms; to pirouette like a Fanny Ellsler, and to howl louder than a Lablache or a Benedetti. Then he would stand still; blow the water upwards through his reed—shake his rattle—send a cloud of smoke out of his nostrils; and, seizing one of the little images from his belt, hold it upwards to the sun, and sing forth his uncouth incantations. With this extravagance and noise, you may be sure it could not be long before the whole village was awake and looking upon the Medicine-man. For it was old Umqua, whom the Great Chief had commanded to bring the rain.

Among the lookers-on was a brave, distinguished no less by his gigantic proportions than the singular combination of intelligence and ferocity expressed in his countenance. This was Paatlako, whom the Great Chief had selected for the husband of his sister, the Princess Tonika. It would be difficult to say what interest he took in the scene; for he was regarded by both French and Indians as a man of little faith, and was often a thorn in the side of the mild and pious Father Philibert, who, just now, came moving along under the shadow of his broad shovel hat, like a dried specimen of Gallic humanity wrapt in a black serge-gown. Paatlako no sooner saw him, than he beckoned him to come and witness the spectacle. The good father immediately joined him; but, being far from edified, could not forbear expressing an unfavourable opinion of Umqua's superstition to the astute savage. Paatlako laughed in his dry, short way, and asked the father what it was that offended him.

"Such foolish idolatry!" he replied; "to think there is any grace or power in those carthen images he worships!" For Umqua was now holding out in his extended hand one of these clay deities, and apparently addressing it with much fervour.

"Umqua," observed Paatlako, "worships a bit of clay, and you worship a bit of bread; I don't see the great difference."

"The difference," replied the Capuchin, not a little scandalized, "is in the purpose."

"The purpose!" exclaimed Paatlako, as if puzzled, and looking the shrinking father full in the face.

"Yes," said the latter, "the one is a holy mystery; the other a wicked superstition."

"No superstition can be wicked," rejoined the brave, "that is honest. An honest savage is better than a false Christian. Umqua is honest." This reply was so true, that the don père winced, shrugged his shoulders, but said nothing.

"Umqua," continued Paatlako, "prays for rain. Unless rain come, he loses his head. We tolerate no impostors. You Christians pray. You say the Great Spirit hears you. But he don't answer. Eh! Now if Umqua is not honest, he won't hear him. Then, we cut off his head. Of what use is he as a medicine-man, eh?"

"But, he prays to an image that can have no power with God."

"Why, then, do Christians pray to images?"

"We do not pray to images, but the departed saints whom they recall to mind."

"Good!" exclaimed the savage, "so does Umqua—the spirits of our great chiefs."

"But," once more retorted the father, "they cannot send rain; they have no power with God."

"All good men have power with the Great Spirit," was the answer.

Meanwhile, Umqua continued his invocations. The water blown from the reed issued in little bubbles, that showed their gilded spheres for a moment in the sun, and then burst and disappeared, like the imaginary schemes of vain mortals. The smoke curled upward in white thin columns, like plumes upon the head of beauty; and ended, like the thoughts of beauty, in airy nothing. Umqua had now nearly wearied the attention of his auditory, when his dark little eyes suddenly lighted up with sparkles of savage pleasure; he uttered the deep guttural ugh! of surprise; and darting a column of smoke from his mouth, followed it with an attentive smile, as it rose slowly and heavily upward, and was caught by a light breeze and wafted away. So with the bubbles, they no longer floated upward, as before, but swept along and broke upon the ground. The quick eyes of the savages around him—without troubling themselves with the philosophy of these phenomena—saw in them evidences of a sudden atmospheric change. Umqua now ran toward the edge of the bluff, and holding up his hand, pointed to the south-west. There, strips of long white cloud lay upon the horizon, which slowly unfolded themselves into undulating dark masses. By-and-by, these rose up toward the setting sun, and stretched themselves out as if to seize and submerge his light in their vapoury bosom. The breeze freshened. Sharp flashes of lightning darted and trembled along the tops of the distant mountains. Then came the low deep tones of the thunder. The sun descended into the sea of clouds; and from all quarters there rushed into mid-air streams of funereal drapery to invest the skies. Then came the raindrops. Then the uproar of the winds contending among the struggling and hoarse-complaining trees of the forest. The inhabitants sought their huts, and left the tempest to do its work alone in the darkness.

CHAPTER II.

THE morning broke in a glory of golden splendour: and, as the yellow beams struggled over the mountain tops, and lit up the dripping foliage, the village began to awaken. For, in his wigwam, the Indian, like the civilized man, is a lazy animal. Now small wreaths of blue smoke struggled through the open tops of the huts, and the distant sound of the drum at Fort St. Rosalie set all the curs to barking, and the papooses to dancing and screaming. The first adult person who entered upon the scene was the Great Chief. He emerged in stately majesty from his door, looking towards the east. As the sun presented his red disk above the horizon, his mortal brother greeted him with three profound salaams, three loud salutations, and three puffs from his pipe; then slowly raising his right hand, pointed his index finger directly into the sun's eye, as if his intention had been to put it out. But, thankful we are to say, that was not his purpose; for, raising it up toward mid-sky, he carried it over and rested it upon the western termination of the line of day. And this was simply to say: "Brother, that is the way in which you are to go. Now, attend to your business, and I will attend to mine;" when he turned and retired. Now, whether this was a necessary direction for the sun; and whether, if it had not been given, it would have risen into the heavens at all, it is not for us to say. Suffice it for all sceptical inquirers to know, that the path was always pointed out, and that the sun, obedient to the behest, always followed it. I leave the solution of the doctrine of cause and effect, in this instance, to the hands of more able metaphysicians than the writer of this history.

The termination of this ceremony, however, seemed to be the signal for a general uproar. The huts poured forth their tawny inhabitants, of both sexes and all sizes. There was a rattling of cooking utensils, firing of guns, barking of dogs, and screaming and yelling of savages. Umqua no sooner appeared, than he became the centre of attraction. He was oppressed with gifts and compliments. He had brought the long-desired rain. The faith in him was now unbounded. But the old man, as if desirous to escape from the embarrassment of so much honour, wandered out of the village towards the bluff. But the restless and wicked Puatlako was there before him. With what intent, nobody knew; and I am free to say, was nobody's business. He no sooner saw Umqua approach, than he ran up to him, and clapping his hand upon the medicine-man's head, shook it as if he had intended to twist it from off his shoulders. "Ah, Umqua," he exclaimed, "head on strong enough yet!"

Old Umqua received the compliment which the remark implied with a silent smile; which smile was not the most fascinating that ever adorned the human countenance—for old Umqua was immensely homely. But that did not prevent him from entertaining a pleasurable appreciation of the great fame and veneration his late successful application to the unseen powers had earned for him. And here an Indian may be as happy as an Alexander.

Further conversation was precluded at this point, by the arrival of a canoe on the shore below them, containing a solitary Indian. His business was to acquaint the Great Chief with the intended visit of Mamautouensa, chief of the Kaskaskians, and Chikagou, chief of the Michigans, followed by a few braves. This was a visit of ceremony, and would take place in the afternoon. The Indian was accordingly conducted to the royal residence. While delivering his message, let us bestow a few words upon the visitors.

Mamautouensa, chief of the Kaskaskians, was an old man, in no respect remarkable, except for the mildness of his disposition—which was remarkable in a savage. But, as he appears in this history because he was there introduced by the old French chroniclers, and not because he performed any remarkable action, we merely mention his name, and leave him to enjoy his immortality immovable as a fly in amber.

Chikagou, chief of the Michigans, on the other hand, was a person to challenge a much more particular attention; as well upon account of his moral and intellectual, as of his physical qualities. He was now probably about twenty-three years of age, tall and well formed in person, with light, graceful limbs, a fine countenance, adorned and lighted up by eyes of a deep, meditative expression—sometimes rather sad than brilliant, but always interesting. His voice was deep and musical—fit for the terrible or the tender. His manners were free, yet courteous. His dress was fitted with more taste and elegance—and we may add, there was more of it—than was usual among his compeers. But all this will be easily accounted for, when we inform the reader that Chikagou had passed the greater part of a year in Paris, where he had been the lion of the court and the ladies. He had been taken thither by one of the Jesuit Fathers, as a rare specimen of an Indian convert, with the view to excite a sympathy in the public in favour of their American missions. Chikagou was an apt scholar and ready observer. He had learned to read, write, and speak the French language with a fair degree of facility. He had also imbibed a fondness for some of the French ways, and brought away with him many tokens of French favour; and, among the rest, a gold snuff-box, a present from the Duchess of Orleans. But a year's residence in the great metropolis more than satisfied him, and he longed to return to the hunting-grounds of the free West. Chikagou was also a member of the Roman Catholic Church; and had not failed to engraft upon a noble nature, some principles of Christianity, which subdued his more savage points of character, and gave him the air of a gentleman. Still, upon the whole, he was a savage—at least in his tastes and modes of life. He was not to be wholly educated out of these; and we don't know whether it would have been a positive benefit to him if he had. For he now had few, if any of the vices, and many of the virtues of both conditions of society.

In the village, the preparations for the reception had gone forward with a degree of bustle suitable to the greatness of the occasion. Immediately in front of the Great Chief's residence, and on the same platform, there were arranged four seats, covered with red cloth. The residence itself was adorned with a variety of savage ornaments, and, among the rest, several muskets, swords, powder-horns, &c. Mats were disposed around for the lesser personages. The four seats were reserved, two for the Great Chief and Tonika, and two for the distinguished visitors. The reason why Tonika was thus preferred to the exclusion of the sovereign wives, was this:—As you descended to the South, the democratic principle among the aboriginals became merged in the monarchical, and sometimes the monarchical in the despotic. The government of the Natchez was a sort of despotism, in which, if upon special occasions the Great Chief consulted his inferiors, he did so as an act of grace. This, however, was frequent. The government was hereditary in the family of the Great Chief, who claimed with his brethren across the water, the "right divine of kings," with far less of wrong doing. But the succession was in the offspring of his sister, and not in that of his own wives; because, as was alleged, he was not sure of the faith of these; conjugal fidelity not being a virtue cultivated by the married pair of Natchez. All the Great Chief could say was, in the language of the meditative Turk, "If Allah wills it that my wives should be faithful, they will be faithful. But Allah alone knows." Whoever, however, should wed his sister, the issue must be royal. There could be no doubt of that. Let us here, in parenthesis, recommend the adoption of this rule to the sovereigns of Europe. It would prevent much uncertainty, and more scandal.

But what shall we say of Tonika? She was born of the same mother as the Great Chief. But, if the ladies of the grant around Fort St. Rosalie had been consulted upon the question of her legitimacy, they would have had the boldness to affirm that Tonika's father had been a gentleman émigré, noted for his noble blood and gallantry in court and camp. Her brother cared nothing about this; and as for Tonika, nobody could blame her, for her parentage had not been of her own choosing. As it was, many personal advantages followed. Tonika was rather a brunette than a savage—tall, graceful, with large black eyes, crimson lips, rather full than wide, and cheeks whose blushes were seen struggling through their brown complexion, like the sun through a thin cloud of vapour. And although Tonika was imperious in temper, and rather despotic in her household relations—as became a savage princess—she knew how to humble herself in the little chapel of Father Philibert, and to wet her breviary with tears of tender penitence, as they fell from those large, proud eyes; for Tonika had been carefully taught by the good Father, and her voice trained to lead the choir in their Sunday services. Her religion, however, taught her one thing which her instructor had not looked for,—to despise her French neighbours for what she could not but regard as their hypocritical profession of attachment to the principles of their church. They were frivolous, licentious, and profane. That she had many friends among the people of the grant, was to be expected; and many admirers, though some of the latter were rather too ardent to be relied upon. Foremost amongst these was Captain Chopart, whose attentions were not only very particular and very pressing, but proffered with an air of superiority that wounded the pride and procured the hatred instead of the favour of the Princess. The Captain, nevertheless, had made up his mind to possess her; and only awaited an opportunity and an excuse to carry out his intentions—not being very scrupulous in a point of honour, where a savage was concerned. But Tonika held in check a friend of whom the Captain had no fear. This was Paatlako, who, at the beck of her finger, would have torn him to pieces, regardless of consequences. But she hesitated to bestow upon a suitor whom she had not yet accepted, so decided a token of her confidence.

This was the condition of persons and things, when the Great Chief appeared at the door of the royal residence, his head adorned with a crown of red and white feathers, his dress displaying an absurd quantity of brass buttons, and other tawdry furniture—which was intended to give his majesty an appearance of dignity becoming his station. He took his seat. Then came Tonika, more tastefully apparelled, yet not without some marks of native fancy. Sandals of red morocco adorned her feet; a tunic of glossy blue stuff, quite ample, and trimmed with white, was gathered upon her left shoulder, and fell over a white petticoat. Upon her half-naked bosom hung a golden cross—the gift of Madame Chopart. Her massy black hair was parted in the middle of her smooth, broad forehead, and tied à la grecque behind. Her head was surrounded by a crown of blue and yellow flowers. Thus attired, she was the personification of beauty and grace; her bold and free manners rather recommending than detracting from her general appearance. She seated herself, and the cortège was immediately arranged. Presently, two drums, two fifes, and a bugle appeared; gracefully loaned by Captain Chopart, for the occasion. The Captain himself, together with others of the grant—ladies and gentlemen—followed; for what Frenchman can resist the attractions of a spectacle? The bugle sounded, the drums beat, the fifes sent forth their spirit-stirring notes, when the stranger chiefs, followed by their braves, approached the royal presence. The Great Chief arose, and in an oration, which has not been preserved by history, welcomed the warriors, and invited them to take their places in the seat of honour. Suitable replies were made—rather long-winded, as custom required, but courtly. But, if we are thus obliged to omit a report of the speeches—which may be accounted for by the fact that the stenographic art was unknown to the French at that time,—we do not labour under a like disadvantage in regard to the pantomime. To be sure, we might avail ourselves of the privilege of greater writers, such, for instance, as Plutarch and Thucydides, and present the reader with some pertinent remarks of our own—of which, I doubt not, the speakers would have reason to be proud, and by which their reputation for wisdom and eloquence would be greatly advanced. But, as a veracious and scrupulous historian, with becoming self-denial, we limit our ambition to a relation of facts.

The Great Chief had counted, with absolute certainty, upon astonishing his visitors, and, as it were, striking them dumb, by his magnificent reception. How it was with old Mamautouensa, I don't know—for although the Indian entertainer feels great pride in such displays, the entertained takes as much in saying nothing about them:—which is far more Christian-like than the manner of visitors in "good society," who go away to ridicule the host, and depreciate the entertainment. But, with regard to Chikagou, all this was labour lost. He was a man of the world, and had seen greater sights than these. He was not to be dazzled by such trumpery. There was, nevertheless, something there which he had not seen before; and that was the magnificent Tonika. For this sight he was not prepared; and his eye no sooner fell full upon her and drank in the vision of her superb beauty, than drums, trumpets, red cloth, feathers, and wampum, all vanished into a base unreality. He had heart, soul, eye, and ear for nothing but Tonika. There was nothing there but Tonika. The Court of Versailles, though not without its beauties, and beauties too who had cast beaming and expressive eyes upon Chikagou, had never presented him with anything to equal this specimen of womanhood.

As for Tonika herself, it would be doing her feminine judgment the greatest injustice, to deny that she was equally moved by this apparition of her beau idéal. That she had never before seen anything comparable to this savage-civilized, was natural enough; for the world could not show his superior. Her large black eyes spoke volumes of love and admiration. Her proud bosom heaved with the most tender emotions; and her whole frame seemed articulate with a language which the young chief read with an intelligent and passionate sympathy. When, therefore, he ascended the platform, she arose, tendered him her hand, and welcomed him in a tone of marvellous sweetness. They were soon lost in each other's conversation. Chikagou was not a man to let so favourable an opportunity pass without finishing a conquest so auspiciously begun.

But, how was this regarded by the lookers-on? As for the Great Chief, he was the centre of attraction to himself, and saw nothing but the homage that ended there. Captain Chopart was not an indifferent spectator. He shrugged his shoulders, swore, scowled, and went away more possessed—both by Tonika and the devil—than before. But, there was another person who saw and painfully comprehended the whole; who, in a fury of jealousy, could scarcely restrain himself from falling upon the stranger chief and burying his knife in his bosom. This was Paatlako. He glared upon his rival with the ferocity of a tiger. He rose,—he sat down; he stuck his tomahawk into the ground; he groaned. His mouth was parched with a burning thirst, which it seemed as if nothing but the blood of Chikagou could allay. When, therefore, the feast which followed the ceremony of the reception was ended, and all had retired to rest, Paatlako alone was awake. He arose from his mat. He wandered out to the bluff and back again. Then his steps turned involuntarily toward the tent of Chikagou. His sense of the sacred obligations of Indian hospitality could scarcely restrain him from attacking the guest of his tribe in his sleep. This, however, would insure him disgrace and death. Still, he could not help stealing softly toward the place where he lay. What was his surprise, then, to see two braves sitting, one on each side of the entrance, with his back to the tent, fast asleep? They were sentinels, which Chikagou, in imitation of the royal custom at Versailles, had introduced into his own household. Paatlako cautiously retired, and sought his hut, in his passion, to wrestle with himself through the long night.

TO MARY.

BY FRANCIS BERNHOFF.

MARY MAIDEN.

MAIDEN Mary, while I write,
Maiden art thou, blushing bright
As rosy dawn, and pure as light.

From orchards clouds of incense rise,
From young spring-flowers, whose liquid eyes
Look lovingly on friendly skies.

Music and odours fill my room,
From birds that sing, and violets' bloom,
Sleeping my senses with perfume.

Above, below, yea every sod
Of teeming earth, or wormy clod,
Pulse conscious of a present God.

Love's budding time o'er thee hath past,
Summer blossoms rare thou hast,
Harvest hopes will gather fast.

Life to thee hath been a dream
Of dear delights; adown its stream
Thou'st floated full of joy supreme:

Adown Life's current, calm and clear,
Widening, deepening, year by year;
Now thou'rt safely anchor'd here,

Hopeful, trustful, on the shore
Of Life's vast ocean; evermore
Hearing the surging billows roar,

Where treacherous sweeps the eddying wave,
Gulphing alike the vain, the brave,—
Pleasure's votary,—passion's slave!

But, fear not Mary—trust thy guide;
Trust the strong arm by thy side,
To stem for thee life's fiercest tide.

MARY WIFE.

MAIDEN Mary, thou art flown;
Maidenhood to Wifehood's grown;
Matron Mary comes anon.

Launch'd on wedlock's rocky sea,
Duties new will come to thee;
Let clear-eyed Faith thy pole-star be.

Though ills may fall, and densely shroud
Thy fairest hopes; with faith endow'd,
Love beams the brighter for the cloud.

While earnest Truth controls thy barque,
'Twill safely glide, Love's favour'd ark,
To shores of light,—through tempests dark,

Remember, though awhile we tread
The dusty garden of the dead,
Eternal love shines overhead.

What, though a speck be on the leaf?
Bend not thy soul to unbelief;
Love's doubting is the grief of grief.

No work is perfect; every flaw
That dims thy gem, should only draw
Thy heart to Love's divinen law.

Trust on! where faith is at the root,
Love, true, will blossom, branch and shoot;
Guard well the flower, and win the fruit.

God bless thee! In thy new estate,
May young affections ever wait
On thee, and thy heart's chosen mate.

ROBERT BLAKE.¹

THE seventeenth century seems an inexhaustible field for the labours of the historian and biographer; and modern writers, like modern adventurers to the regions of California and Australia, resort thither in the certain hope they will find what will amply repay their toilsome researches. Few are disappointed who bring to their work such knowledge as enables them to find where the hidden treasures lie, and who possess the skill to separate the gold from the dross when the whole mass is brought to the surface and subjected to the refining process. It is to little purpose that one pores over dingy manuscripts, and brings up forgotten records from worm-eaten chests, and searches out ancient registers, and collects all sorts of materials from far-off places, without the ability to turn them to some good and profitable account; but there is slight chance of failure in regard to such a result with one, even of moderate capacity, who undertakes to deal with the period referred to, so full is it of adventure and stirring incident, and so suggestive of sound and moral reflection. The history of our country, from the rise to the fall of the Stuart dynasty, has, since the days of Clarendon, engaged the pen of the ablest writers, who, according to their political predilections, have discussed its events, till we seemed to have been put in possession of all the knowledge to be acquired concerning it: and yet there comes, every now and then, a volume throwing some new light on the vast and important transactions that then occurred, or giving us the details and the filling in of some individual portrait which we before knew only in its truthful and vigorous outlines. Mr. Dixon's work is of the latter class; he has taken infinite trouble to collect all the information upon his subject he could gather from every authentic source, and has presented a glowing picture of his hero, painted with a free and lively pencil, and in bright, but not exaggerated colours; though with an evident leaning towards the political party of which Blake was so noble an ornament. We use this term because we have ever placed this great naval commander in the same rank as Pym, Hampden, and some few other of the parliamentary chieftains who espoused the popular cause from a deep conviction of the necessity of so doing; but who would never have carried their hostility to a monarchical government as far as the fatal scaffold at Whitehall, could they have foreseen so unhappy a termination of the contest between king and people.

The life of an individual is oftentimes the history of a period, so closely are personal and national narratives interwoven with each other. This is especially the case with many of the men whom the civil war of the seventeenth century drew from their native obscurity, and placed in positions of high trust and influence; at one time in the senate-house enforcing principles with the power of the tongue, and at another carrying them out by the argument of the sword; at once the authors of the drama and the actors in it. Blake, however, had less to do with the former than the latter, in which, as is very generally known, he took a most prominent part. Sydney Smith facetiously remarked, in reference to a distinguished living politician, "that he considered himself equally able to command the Channel fleet, to lead a charge of cavalry, or to give judgment in a chancery suit," or something of the like import. But that which the modern statesman is presumed to have thought himself capable of doing, Blake actually performed, except the chancery suit; and even duties almost tantamount to this were occasionally discharged by him in the various capacities that at different times he was found employed in.

Robert Blake was born at Bridgwater, in Somersetshire, in 1599, his father, Humphrey Blake, was engaged in commercial pursuits in that town; but the merchant of those days was a different individual from the thriving and luxurious race who make up our mercantile community. The easy and quiet-loving citizen, who quits his counting-house in London regularly at four o'clock for his pleasant villa at Clapham or St. John's Wood, or the Liverpool merchant, who seeks his at Toxteth Park or Everton, or the trader of Bristol his amid the romantic scenery of Clifton, would feel little inclination to exchange his comforts for the hardships and dangers to which the merchants of the sixteenth century were subjected, as described by Mr. Dixon.

"When it is said that Humphrey Blake was a merchant trading with Spain, it is not to be inferred that his days were spent in the pacific routine of the deck and the exchange. The life of a trader was then a life of peril and adventure. He mostly manned his own ship and sailed with his argoes. Like later cruisers among the Pacific islands, his course and his destination was rarely known before he quitted port. Failing in one harbour to dispose of his cargo, he spread his canvass in search of better markets. Experience of strange lands and stranger people was the daily incident of this change of place; and he was compelled to hold his own, not merely against the duties, fines, and exactions of the more legitimate powers, but against the still more unscrupulous and formidable corsair. Piracy was not, in the sixteenth century, the despicable calling it is now: in the opinion of that age, a pirate was but a soldier of fortune on another element. France, Germany, and Italy were overrun with mercenary heroes, eager to sell their swords in any cause where good pay and a fair amount of profligacy were allowed; and hundreds of distressed English gentlemen, as soon as the civil wars were over, took to the sea for bread in a similar spirit. In some parts of Europe entire districts lived on the plunder of unprotected vessels, long after the close of these troubles; and many persons still living can remember a time when the daring valour of the Greek and Biscayan freebooters was the theme of winter tales and popular ballads. Nor were these unlicensed spoilers the worst enemies whom the peaceful merchant had to encounter at sea. The Moors of Africa had erected piracy into a national system. For ages the Salas rovers had been a terror to the south of Europe; and the Tunisian and the Algerine, equal to him in skill, daring, and fanaticism, had the advantage over him of better ports and larger privateers. No coast in Christendom was free from their incursions; but their favourite stations were the bays and harbours of Portugal and Spain, as in these ports they found it easy to attack and capture stragglers from the fleets of two worlds. To the ordinary motives of the pirate, adventure and greed of gold, the Moor added the fierce spurs of religious difference and hereditary hate. Europeans, it may be justly said, had forced the Moors into piracy as a measure of defence. Their expulsion from Granada in the fifteenth century roused the worst passions of their nature; and that band of armed priests, nestled behind the impregnable ramparts of Malta, and sworn to hold no truce with their race and faith,—a vow which they kept to the last letter, by frequent piratical descents on the coasts of Africa, marking their path along the shore with burning villages, slaughtered peasants and captive women and children, soon to be exposed by these Christian missionaries in the slave-markets of Venice, Seville and Genoa,—left them no other policy but that of revenge and retaliation. In their indiscriminating rage, the followers of Mohammed waged war against the commerce of all civilised countries; when the opportunity offered, they seized both fleets and cargoes; and, like the Knights of Malta, carried off their prisoners for sale to the bazaars of Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers.

(1) "Robert Blake, Admiral and General at Sea. Based on Family and State Papers." By Hephworth Dixon. Chapman & Hall. London.

"For protection against these formidable enemies, the merchant had to trust solely to his own bold heart and steady hand. His vessel, however small, carried some means of defence. The crew were well armed. Aids to escape were kept in readiness. From the British Channel to the Straits of Gibraltar the course of the Severn adventurer lay through continual perils. Every rock and inlet along the coast had to be carefully examined for concealed enemies before his little barque could venture on. The adventurer lived on deck, and eat, drank and slept with his mind on the alert and his brain ready for every emergency. On his return from a successful voyage, many were the tales of perilous encounters, chance-escapes and valorous deeds which he had to tell his friends and children on the dark winter nights:—and such stories were, no doubt, a part of the food on which the imagination of young Blake, silent and thoughtful from his childhood, was fed in the old mansion at Bridgwater."

But if the thoughts of the boy were at that time occupied with the romance of his father's adventures, the latter had resolved to place him in a position where there was little chance of his indulging them; and it seems more than probable that young Blake himself had other aspirations than those of a roving merchant. Subsequent events nevertheless proved the truth of Shakspeare's noble remark,

"There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

After being sent to the grammar school in his native place till about the age of sixteen, he, at his own desire, proceeded to Oxford, and matriculated at St. Alban's Hall, 1615, with Reynolds, afterwards Bishop of Worcester, and Earl, who subsequently became Bishop of Salisbury. Little is known of his college life, except that he applied himself to his various duties, while he took great delight in field sports, thus qualifying himself, mind and body, for the important positions it was his destiny to occupy. Finding after a short residence that St. Alban's Hall was too aristocratic a college to suit his tastes as well as his pecuniary means, he entered himself at Wadham, completed his terms there, and took his first degree. Desirous of obtaining a fellowship in order to relieve his father from some portion of the burdens which a very numerous family involved, he offered himself for one then vacant at Merton college. Blake was even at this period known to be imbued with Puritan sentiments, and Sir Henry Saville, Warden of Merton, was an ardent supporter of the king's (James I.) policy in spiritual matters. He rejected the low church candidate, little dreaming that in so doing he sent forth to the world "one of those great master spirits who were soon to overturn the government, humiliate his adored sovereign, and, in the ruin of the fallen house, elevate England, to the height of human grandeur." Blake, notwithstanding this disappointment, remained five years longer at Oxford, and took his degree of Master of Arts.

The death of his father, when Blake had reached his twenty-eighth year, brought the latter into possession of the family mansion, with an income of about two hundred a year; and this small sum enabled him to keep his widowed mother, and to accomplish the heavy and responsible task of rearing, educating, and placing out in honourable positions the whole of his seven brothers, and, it is believed, two, if not three sisters. But, while occupied with domestic affairs, he was not unobservant of public events, and already was looming in the horizon that small cloud, which, at no very far distant day, overspread and shadowed the land with a weary darkness.

If we considered our pages a fitting place for the discussion of such a subject, we should feel disposed to question the truth of his arguments upon the causes which led to the unhappy civil war. There were faults,—ay, and grievous faults too,—upon the side of the monarchy and its partisans, and heavy was the penalty paid for their transgressions. But there was also fierce and unscrupulous rancour on the part of their opponents; a vindictive and unholly disregard of high and chivalric principles of loyalty—a loyalty that, perhaps, required to be curbed—not crushed; and a fanaticism that preached "Zeal without truth, religion without virtue."

Blake had been returned by his fellow-townsmen of Bridgwater, as their representative in the short parliament which Charles I. summoned to procure supplies for carrying on the war against the Scots. Then it was, for the first time, that he met with Hampden, Cromwell, Sir Harry Vane, and the other leaders of the "reform party." This parliament, as is well known, was quickly dissolved, and writs were speedily issued for a new one, which was that famous in history as the "Long Parliament." Blake was not a member of this celebrated assembly till 1645, when he was returned for Taunton. On the raising of the royal standard at Nottingham, the signal for the commencement of hostilities between the contending parties, Blake, who had foreseen how the quarrels between Charles and his parliament were likely to issue, and had made active preparations for the contest, was one of the first to take the field with his troops in Somersetshire, and distinguished himself greatly in almost all the engagements that were then fought in the west; but especially at the siege and surrender of Bristol, and in his defence of Taunton and Lyme. The latter was a most gallant affair, and inasmuch as no detailed particulars of it had been published till Mr. Dixon's volume appeared, we extract a portion of his narrative, compiled from some old but authentic manuscripts now in the possession of a gentleman at Lyme. The quotation will also offer a favourable specimen of the author's free and spirited powers of description:—

"As the Prince," (Maurice, brother of the daring cavalier Rupert, and nephew of Charles,) "came down from the hills of Somerset, Blake counted his forces, and found the number did not exceed five hundred men. The town, though its spirit was good, afforded little aid, for its whole population fell short of a thousand souls; but with the assistance of Colonel Weir, Captain Pyne, and Governor Ceely, a body of volunteers, some of them from Charnmouth and other neighbouring villages, was drilled for service. Earthworks, hastily thrown up, connected the points of the defence from Davies' fort, on the High Cliff, along the slopes beyond the town to Holme Bush fields near the Cobb. Two large houses, standing on opposite sides of the valley, about a mile from the line—Colway House, an ancient residence of the Cobham family, and Hayo, a substantial farm, were occupied as outposts. Foraging parties were sent out in all directions, with orders to bring back fodder, cattle and other necessaries, for all of which receipts were duly given.

"Blake's comrades were still working at the rude defences when the glittering array of the royal army suddenly appeared above the brow of Uplyme Hill. The vast expanse of bright sea, the green slopes of that secluded valley, broken to the view by clumps of trees, orchards and corn-fields, and the white houses of the town as they lay, serene and picturesque, in the morning sun, touched some chords of sentiment even in the grim bosom of civil war, and the Cavalier host rent the air with a loud shout of surprise and admiration. It was not until evening that Maurice descended into the valley, drove the outposts from Hayo and Colway House, and summoned Blake and Ceely to surrender.

"The extreme weakness of the place was well known to the enemy; so that when the Prince found his summons answered with a haughty defiance, he impetuously called to his trumpeters to sound a general charge. The infantry sent a shower of hand-grenades into the town, and in the disorder caused by their explosion, a powerful squadron of horse rode down on the lines, expecting to carry them sword in hand at the first onset. But the tactics which had baffled the royalists at Prior's Hill prevailed again at Lyme; after a fierce struggle between pike and sabre, the horse, unable to force an entrance, drew off, and retired up the valley. The foot then advanced in deep columns to storm; again and again they advanced; but always to fall back with loss of men and character before that unwavering and deadly fire. Furious at this sudden check to his career of arms, Maurice rode down to the scene of confusion, rallied the broken ranks, and gave the word to charge once more; but the men refused to obey the word, until he wheeled round his cavalry and drove them on by a few pistol-shots in their rear. It was all in vain. Volleys of case-shot met them in front from an enemy protected by cover from their fire; and as their ranks thinned, the line staggered, broke, and the men turned and fled beyond hope of recall that day. The Prince then changed his plan; convinced by the firmness of the first day's resistance, that, contemptible as Lyme might seem to the King and his council, he must either sit down to the labours of a regular siege, or march away with his great army, leaving this vigilant enemy in his rear and with the stain of discomfort on his hitherto victorious banner. Between these two courses there was indeed no choice; so he drew off his forces to a short distance, took up his own residence at Colway House, and threw up a few works on which to plant his siege artillery. More than eight weeks that fine army lay on the slopes over Lyme, baffled by an enemy with only a handful of men, and mud-works for ramparts! At Oxford, the affair was an inexplicable marvel and mystery. Every hour the court expected to hear that the 'little vile fishing town,' as Clarendon contemptuously calls it, had fallen, and that Maurice had marched away to enterprises of greater moment; but every post brought word to the wondering council, that Colonel Blake still held out, and that his spirited defence was rousing and rallying the dispersed adherents of Parliament in those parts. While the western division of the royalists was wasting its time and strength in an obscure corner,—neither port, nor fortress, nor highway,—the most important towns and castles lay open to the enemy, and some of them actually fell into their hands. Lyme itself remained unshaken. Day after day, week after week, storm, stratagem, blockade, failed to make any apparent impression on the little garrison. Maurice felt the bitter humiliation of his position; unable to account to his uncle and his brother for the delay of its capture, he sacrificed the lives of his men like a wanton prodigal to secure success. How often would the thought occur to him—if Rupert had only hung that Captain Blake at Bristol! In London the press was filled with the wonders of this remarkable defence; and Roundhead writers used it as a set-off against their own prolonged failures at Latham House. Yet the Cavaliers fought before the breastworks at Lyme with the most resolute gallantry, and some of the best blood in the west of England flowed into those shallow trenches. After the siege was raised, and the royalists had time to count up and compare their losses, they found to their surprise and horror that more men of gentle blood had died under Blake's fire at Lyme, than had fallen in all the other sieges and skirmishes in the western counties since the opening of the war."

We have now made acquaintance with Blake through two important periods of his life—as the scholar and the military commander; his greatest, and we are not wrong in saying, his most honourable career has yet to be exhibited. The crown had fallen from the brow of Charles, and the mock trial at Westminster had been consummated by the executioner at Whitehall. Blake was no party to the latter proceeding. In common with the men of the wiser and more moderate party, he wished to see the king deposed and banished; for though at heart he was a sincere republican, he had no ambition to become a regicide. He deprecated even the appearance of illegality and violence; and when he found the party of which Cromwell was the presiding genius, bent on his trial and execution, he hesitated not to express his utter discontent with their proceedings, and under the influence of his humane convictions, declared openly that he would as freely venture his life to save the king as ever he had done to save the parliament. It was necessary, therefore, that Cromwell and his party, before proceeding to extremities against the monarch, should take some step to abridge the power of one holding such sentiments, and who also had the capacity for enforcing them; for he was already an object of suspicion and jealousy. Accordingly Cromwell disbanded those forces which, under Blake's command, had driven back the gallant cavaliers from the walls of Lyme and Taunton, accompanying the order, nevertheless, by "an expression of gratitude and thanks from the House for his eminent services, and by a donation of five hundred pounds;" a deceitful act, to hide the real motives for this procedure. Blake obeyed the orders of the parliament without a word of remonstrance, and his appointment soon afterwards to a naval command,—a measure which, it is supposed, had its origin in the desire of Cromwell to remove from the scene of his own intrigues an officer whose discernment, power, and incorruptible character, were likely to form serious obstacles in the way of his ambition,—opened up to the hero a new field of glory, and to the honour of his country a wreath that has not yet faded.

It was in 1649, when Blake was fifty years old, that, as Mr. Dixon informs us, "he set his foot on deck for the first time as a commander, and from that moment, to the hour of his death, no man in England ever thought of contending with him for the first place as a seaman. Envy, jealousy, and hatred, dogged the steps of every other officer in the fleet; but of him, both then and afterwards, every man spoke well." The civil wars being now over, although Prince Rupert seems for a time to have held a sort of corsair command on the seas, it was against the foreign enemies of his country that the valour and skill of Blake were directed. And while both had served him well in forwarding the interests of his party at home, in field and garrison, they were still more productive of success when engaged in upholding the interests of the nation; he had now no party to maintain but his country's, and he devoted himself with unflinching energy to her cause.

In spite of his Puritanical principles, there was a chivalrous feeling of honour in his nature, scarcely to be expected in one professing such sentiments, and which seemed rather to belong to the knights of old romance. Not very long after he had been in command an incident happened which signally developed this feeling. France had placed herself in an attitude of hostility to this country, by favouring the designs of those who sought to injure the commonwealth; and Parliament, unable to find redress from the court of Versailles, had issued letters of marque against French vessels. Blake, who was returning from Toulon at this time, was aware of the fact, but some of the French naval commanders had not as yet heard of it. The English admiral on his voyage homeward captured four French prizes, one of them a fine frigate of forty guns, in a sort of sea tournament.

"Meeting the Frenchman in the Straits, Blake signalled for the captain to come on board his flag-ship; and he, considering the visit one of friendship and ceremony, there being no declared war between the two nations, readily answered the invitation. The Admiral, when he entered his cabin, told him he was a prisoner; and asked him if he would give up his sword. Astounded at such a demand, the Frenchman boldly answered—No! Blake felt that an advantage had been gained by a misconception, as the captain probably knew nothing of the Toulon affair, or of the English threat of reprisals; and scorning to make a brave officer the victim of a mere mistake, he told him he might go back to his ship, if he wished, and fight it out as long as he was able. The captain thanked him for this handsome offer, and retired. After two hours' hard fighting he struck his flag, and being brought once more on board the flag-ship, like a true French knight he made a low bow, kissed his sword affectionately, and delivered it to his conqueror."

We have had in the memory of the present generation a similar chivalrous encounter to this,—the action between the Shannon and the Chesapeake, in the harbour of Boston, United States.

Notwithstanding the onerous duties devolving upon Blake in his naval command, he was held, by those at home, in too high estimation to be restricted to the service in which he was more immediately engaged, although the jealousy of Cromwell had not entirely subsided. On his reaching home, soon after the event just described, the election of members for the Council of State being about to take place, he was nominated by parliament, in a full house, one of that supreme body. He already filled the posts of a Commissioner for sequestrating the estates of Somerset delinquents; a Commissioner for purging the ministry of improper persons; an office which some at the present day would think not altogether unnecessary, though rather unconstitutional; a Commissioner of the Admiralty and the Navy; a member of the House of Commons; and, as if these were not sufficient to occupy his head and his hands, as there seemed every probability of a rupture with Holland, he was appointed sole "General-at-sea," for the ensuing year, 1652, just two centuries back.

The Dutch war at length broke out, and Mr. Dixon describes with a vivid pen the various actions wherein his hero succeeded in snatching the laurels from a country which had previously held the supremacy of the European seas, and had been the great commercial carriers of the world. The victories gained by Blake, Penn, Lawson, and others, transferred the powers and honours possessed by Holland to our own country, and which we have retained, with the exception of our disasters under the effeminate reign of the second Charles, uninterruptedly to the present day; Nelson at Trafalgar put the finishing stroke to the work begun by the stern and indomitable followers of the Commonwealth. Instead, however, of referring to these transactions, which have become well-known matters of history, we extract from Mr. Dixon's volume a quotation that gives us a little insight into Blake's private life. He had been wounded in the great action fought with Van Tromp, off Portland, and though he still continued in command for some months afterwards, he was compelled by sickness and suffering to leave his vessel, and was carried ashore more dead than alive, leaving the admirals, Monk, Penn, and Lawson to carry out and complete his plan for the final reduction of Holland.

"During the remainder of the summer months of 1658, it is at least probable that Blake lay sick at Knoll, a country-house attached to an estate which he had purchased about two miles from Bridgwater. Fever, of a slow but obstinate character, arising in the first instance from his neglected wound, combined with other ailments, including dropsy and scurvy, then common to all men leading a seafaring life, to lay him for a while completely prostrate. But a land-diet, gentle exercise, and his native air gradually produced a change for the better in his condition. Knoll was at all times a favourite retreat. When absent from his political and professional duties, it was his delight to run down to Bridgwater for a few days or weeks, and with his chosen books and one or two devout and abstemious friends, to indulge in all the luxuries of seclusion. He was by nature self-absorbed and taciturn. A long walk, during which he appeared to his simple neighbours to be lost in profound thought, as if working out in his own mind the details of one of his great battles, or busy with some abstruse point of Puritan theology, usually occupied his morning. If accompanied by one of his brothers, or by some other intimate friend, he was still for the most part silent. Good-humoured always, and enjoying sarcasm when of a grave, high class, he yet never talked from the loquacious instinct, or encouraged others so to employ their time and talents in his presence. Even his lively and rattling brother Humphrey, his almost constant companion when on shore, caught, from long habit, the great man's contemplative and self-communing gait and manner; and when his friends rallied him on the subject in after-years, he used to say, that he had caught the trick of silence while walking by the Admiral's side in his long morning musings on Knoll hill. A plain dinner satisfied his wants. Religious conversation, reading and the details of business, generally filled up the evening until supper-time; after family prayers, always pronounced by the General himself, and a frugal supper, he would invariably call for his cup of sack and a dry crust of bread, and while he drank two or three hours of Canary, would smile and chat in his own dry manner with his friends and domestics, asking minute questions about their neighbours and acquaintances; or when scholars and clergymen shared his simple repast, affecting a droll anxiety, rich and pleasant in the conqueror of Tromp, to prove by the aptness and abundance of his quotations that, in becoming an admiral, he had not forfeited his claim to be considered a good classic."

The last public services of Blake's naval career were against the corsairs of Barbary and Spain, and the last of all was his releasing from the former a large body of Christian captives. But his health was fast failing him, and it was evident to all around that the destiny of the hero would soon be accomplished finally. The circumstances attending his death were of a nature to draw out Mr. Dixon's powers of narration, and he has described them with considerable pathos and dramatic effect. After alluding to the delivering of the captives from the Moorish corsairs, he says:—

"This crowning act of a virtuous and honourable life accomplished, the dying Admiral turned his thoughts anxiously towards the green hills of his native land. The letter of Cromwell, the thanks of Parliament, the jewelled ring sent to him by an admiring country,—all reached him together out at sea. These tokens of grateful remembrance caused him a profound emotion. Without after-thought, without selfish impulse, he had served the commonwealth, day and night, earnestly, anxiously and with rare devotion. England was grateful to her hero. With the letter of thanks from Cromwell, a new set of instructions arrived, which allowed him to return with part of his fleet, leaving a squadron of some fifteen or twenty frigates to ride before the Bay of Cadiz and intercept its traders; with their usual deference to his judgment and experience, the Protector and Board of Admiralty left the appointment to the command entirely with him; and as his gallant friend Stuyvesant was gone to England, where he received a knighthood and other well-won honours from the Government, he raised Captain Stoaks, the hero of Porto Ferrino and a commander of rare promise, to the responsible position of his Vice-admiral in the Spanish seas.

"Hoisting his pennon on his old flag-ship the St. George, Blake saw for the last time the spires and cupolas, the masts and towers, before which he had kept his long and victorious vigils. When he put in for fresh water at Cascaes road he was very weak. "I beseech God to strengthen him," was the fervent prayer of the English Resident at Lisbon, as he departed on the homeward voyage. While the ships rolled through the tempestuous waters of the Bay of Biscay, he grew every day worse and worse. Some gleams of the old spirit broke forth as they approached the latitude of England. He inquired often and anxiously if the white cliffs were yet in sight. He longed to behold once more the swelling downs, the free cities, the goodly churches of his native land. But he was now dying beyond all doubt. Many of his favourite officers silently and mournfully crowded round his bed, anxious to catch the last tones of a voice which had so often called them to glory and victory. Others stood at the poop and forecabin, eagerly examining every speck and line in the horizon, in hope of being first to catch the welcome glimpse of land. Though they were coming home crowned with laurels, gloom and pain were in every face. At last the Lizard was announced. Shortly afterwards the bold cliffs and bare hills of Cornwall loomed out grandly in the distance. But it was now too late for the dying hero. He had sent for the captains and other great officers of his fleet to bid them farewell; and while they were yet in his cabin, the undulating hills of Devonshire, glowing with the tints of early autumn, came full in view. As the ships rounded Rame Head, the spires and masts of Plymouth, the wooded heights of Mount Edgecombe, the low island of St. Nicholas, the rocky steeps at the Hoc, Mount Batten, the citadel, the many picturesque and familiar features of that magnificent harbour rose one by one to sight. But the eyes which had so yearned to behold this scene once more were at that very instant closing in death. Foremost of the victorious squadron, the St. George rode with its precious burden into the Sound; and just as it came into full view of the eager thousands crowding the beach, the pier-heads, the walls of the citadel, or darting in countless boats over the smooth waters between St. Nicholas and the docks, ready to catch the first glimpse of the hero of Santa Cruz, and salute him with a true English welcome,—he, in his silent cabin, in the midst of his lion-hearted comrades, now sobbing like little children, yielded up his soul to God."

Thus, like his great successor, the conqueror at Trafalgar, Blake was not permitted to enjoy in quietude the honours he had so nobly won; he rested from his labours, leaving others to reap their fruits, and his own great name as an example of devoted patriotism, moral excellence and dauntless courage. His love of country and duty before that of his own flesh and blood, had in it almost a Roman's stoicism, for when it had reached his ears that his favourite brother, Humphrey, had not done his part in an engagement in the Bay of Santa Cruz, as became an English officer, and finding that no one would proceed against him, (for Humphrey was a kind and liberal-hearted man, and a favourite in the fleet,) Blake himself ordered a court-martial to be summoned, saying:—"If none of you will accuse him, I must myself be his accuser." The sentence was against the prisoner, who was deprived of his command by the admiral, and never employed again. Nevertheless, "he left to that brother, thus sternly rebuked, the greater part of his property."

If civil wars and periods of great political excitement bring to the surface of society many of its darkest and most objectionable elements, so also they call up some noble and honourable spirits, to stand as guiding lights amid the convulsions of nations. And when the tumult of revolution has subsided, and men can take an unprejudiced view of the part such have played in the drama, their character shines forth in its reality and its truth. Blake was one, even in his own day, who seems never to have made a personal foe, and even those opposed to his political creed spake of what they deemed his errors more in sorrow than in anger. We, in our time, scarcely care to know whether he were Cavalier or Roundhead; it is sufficient for us that he conquered the enemies of England, and shadowed forth her future naval greatness. He could not have found a more able biographer than Mr. Dixon has proved himself, while expatiating on the merits of his hero, but we must take exception to some of the remarks scattered through the volume with reference to those who retained their loyalty to the king, even under the most adverse circumstances. It is natural for an author to entertain a strong feeling in favour of the individual whose history he is writing: and, if a politician, to the party to which he belonged; otherwise, it is possible, such a person would not have been selected for especial notice. But this ought not to blind the writer to the merits and virtues of others on the opposite side, nor cause him to stigmatize that as a crime in one which is noble in an adversary. There are passages in the work before us, to which we could readily point as evidencing such partiality—always objectionable in the historian or biographer, who should hold the balance with an equal hand, and not sacrifice truth, even in small matters, to political bias.

SCRAPS.

SYMPATHY FOR POETS.—An old man with no friend but his money—a fair child holding the hand of a Magdalen—a delicate bride given over to a coarse-minded bridegroom—were sights to be troubled at seeing. We should bleed at heart to see either of them. But there is something even more touching to us than these—something, too, which is the subject of heartless and habitual mockery by critics—the first timid offerings to fame of the youthful and sanguine poet. We declare that we never open a letter from one of this class, never read a preface to the first book of one of them, never arrest our critical eye upon a blemish in the immature page, without having the sensation of a tear coined in our heart—never without a passionate though inarticulate "God help you!" We know so well the rasping world in which they are to jostle, with their "fibre of sarcenet!" We know so well the injustices, the rebuffs, the sneers, the insensibilities, from without, the impatiences, the resentments, the choked impulses and smothered heart-boundings, within. And yet it is not these outward penances, and inward scorpions, that cause us the most regret in the fate of the poet. Out of these is born the inspired expression of his anguish—like the plaint of the singing-bird from the heated needle which blinds him. We mourn more over his salutary imperviousness to counsel—over his haste to print, his slowness to correct—over his belief that the airy bridges he builds over the chasms in his logic and rhythm are passable, by avoidsupois on foot, as well as by Poesy on Pegasus. That the world is not as much enchanted—(that we ourselves are not as much touched and delighted)—with the halting flights of new poets as with the broken and short venturings in air of new-fledged birds—proves over again that the world we live in were a good enough Eden if human nature were as lovable as the rest. We wish it were not so. We wish it were natural to admire anything human-made, that has not cost pain and trial. But, since we do not, and cannot, it is a pity, we say again, that beginners in poetry are offended with kind counsel. Of the great many books and manuscript poems we receive, there is never one from a young poet which we do not long, in all kindness, to send back to him to be re-studied, re-written, and made, in finish, more worthy of the conception. To praise it in print only puts his industry to sleep, and makes him dream he has achieved what is yet far beyond him. We ask the young poets who read this, where would be the kindness in such a case?

WHICH IS THE HAPPIEST SEASON?—At a festal party of old and young, the question was asked—"Which season of life is the most happy?" After being freely discussed by the guests, it was referred for answer to the host, upon whom was the burden of fourscore years. He asked if they had noticed a grove of trees before the dwelling, and said—"When the spring comes, and in the soft air the buds are breaking on the trees, and they are covered with blossoms, I think, How beautiful is spring! And when the summer comes, and covers the trees with its heavy foliage, and singing birds are among the branches, I think, How beautiful is summer! When the autumn loads them with golden fruit, and their leaves bear the gorgeous tint of frost, I think, How beautiful is autumn! And when it is sear winter, and there is neither foliage nor fruit, then I look up through the leafless branches, as I never could until now, and see the stars shine."

Chronicle of Ethelfled.¹

BOOK SIXTH.

WHEN I, Ethelfled, consider in my mind how short a thing is life, it meseemeth we need not to be in so great a hurry as we often are to get over the intermediate points between one desired period of it and another. Here had I been impatient enough, I trow, to find myself abbess of Shaftesbury; and now that I was elected abbess of Warcham I found myself taken by surprise. Therefore it was that for several days I shut myself up in strict retreat, bearing in mind that great responsibilities require great preparations, even though habitual preparedness be not wanting. There must be solemn intercourse with ourselves and with our Maker, with which our nearest, dearest friends intermeddle not. In this my retreat, strange unaccustomed feelings arose, such as I had not known when I took the white and black veils: and I found my thoughts and desires taking quite a new bent, and the movements of my will tending quite another way; until, I suppose, my whole internal being underwent some change, the character and amount of which I was not fully sensible of at the time; nor, I think, have ever been, till now that I come to look back.

From this season I had no more dreams and visions and contentions with enemies unspeakable: I found I was awake, and felt I must be doing.

It was dinner time, and on a fast day, when I left my retreat and took the abbess's place at table. Every eye was fixed on me. It fell that day that our fish was not dressed with the usual care: howbeit, I made no comment, but ate thereof sparingly and without egg-sauce, to which the others helped themselves plentifully. The novice, whose turn it was to read, delivered to us the life of Egbert the priest, who lived upon bread and milk; and I was musing thereon after she had come to an end, without witting that all had finished, when suddenly becoming aware that from me was expected a benediction, I with some fervour ejaculated the choir's grace, "Thanks be to God for my good dinner." And immediately noting thereupon a general smile, if not on the lips yet in the eyes of all present, I looked at them stedfastly, and with great deliberateness and determination repeated, "Children, let us thank God for our good dinner!" and then pronounced the Latin benediction. Every eye sank before mine.

Then I went to the late abbess's cell, which I intended thenceforth to make mine own; and I directed that the feather-stuffed bed, with hryfte, bedrafes, hoppsocytan, and all that thereto belonged, should be carried into the infirmary for the use of the sick; contenting myself with mine old hard pallet, without either pallia or cortinas. Then I went into the holy mother's parlour, where there were many papers to be read and destroyed; and therein I found some things that liked me, and some that liked me not. While thus busied, with a fire of billets burning on the hearth, some one tapped at the door, and, at my bidding, came in and kneeled humbly on the ground. I said, "Rise, daughter;" and she got off her knees, and with many self-abasings drew nigh unto me and kissed the hem of my garment. I concluded some great matter was in hand; but it was to tell me of an intolerable odour in her cell, which had long, she thought, endangered her health; I told her she might exchange it for the cell I had just left; and so continued my affairs.

Next day this sister, whose name was Heaburgo,² presented herself anew, and with still multiplying genuflections, represented that in her new cell there was a draught, saving my holy presence, that was enough to blow her head off. I regarded her keenly; but, remembering to have heard her once complain of the tooth-ache, I told her that she might remove my bed into my old cell, and have the abbess's cell herself.

The nuns now thought they had only to ask and have; and sister Scelthryth³ next presented herself to inform me that she was quite losing her hand for pastry, and opined that we had better eat placentas daily than that she should lose her cunning. Also, to suggest that broths or soups should be served on Wednesdays and Fridays in addition to eggs, lentils, cheese, and buttermilk: and that we should have gaudy days on other festivals besides Easter and Whitsuntide. Unto this I Ethelfled would not incline mine ear, no, not for a moment; and thereafter I began to manifest unto them that gentleness was no proof of weakness. To their obedience I kept them up; and I also set myself, like Nehemiah son of Hachaliah, to rectify certain abuses. It had been well for me Ethelfled, had I only applied myself to essential reforms; howbeit, I was but young yet. I have beforetime said that the barbarous singing of the sisters had all along been very grievous unto me; being very little removed from the squealing of cats. I now took them seriously to task on this matter, and told them how detrimental it was to devotion: but my lecture was only received with sulky looks. Nevertheless, I was purposed to carry this matter through; and, being myself gifted with an harmonious voice and a competent knowledge of music, I made use of the first holiday to call the sisters together and give them a little instruction. Herein I Ethelfled was sore let, as well by their obstinacy as stupidity. Sister Scelthryth, in especial, upon my insisting on her bringing forth a note which I wist was within her compass, would sing flatter and flatter, and, at the last, let fly her voice with such desperation that it cracked, and produced such a miserable squeak, that sister Wynfreda, in despite of herself, burst forth into laughing. When was such indecorum heard of? All the rest, seeing my heightened colour, were sore ydrad, witting there was no other portion for sister Wynfreda than dry crusts and a dark cell: but it was

(2) The Anglo-Saxon nuns do not seem to have adopted new names on their profession. We read in Bede of Tordgith, Edith, Cœnberg, &c.

(3) Good-threather: a Saxon female name.

(1) Concluded from p. 278.

against sister Selethryth, not sister Wynfreda, that my wrath was enkindled; and upon my rebuking her very warmly for her misdeeds, she waxed so rebellious and violent, that for the sake of common order and discipline, I was constrained to put her in bonds. By force she was removed into a dark cell, she struggling all the way thither most outrageously, and smiling sister Emma on the eye. Bread and water was her diet, (it was cheesecake-day too!) our supper was eaten sadly, and I Ethelfled shut myself within my chamber to muse in bitterness of spirit on broken rule and despised authority. I was all weakness and ignorance, but I wist where was all wisdom and strength; and was seeking thereunto, when lo! I heard a horn wind outside the gate. Alfred the king had come down to consider the defences of the castle, and had ridden over to see how I fared, and give me greeting. Never was freondlic word more pleasant! I received him with tears in mine eyes: he marvelled thereat, and would wit why they were a-shedding. Thereupon we had a long colloquy, which was of the greatest moment to me in the conduct of mine after life. He thought me much less to be blamed than I thought myself; indeed, brake forth into laughing when he heard the origin of the offence; howbeit, he admitted the consequences were grievous, and must be remedied. To clear myself, albe he said I needed no clearing, I summoned sister Wynfreda, the novice, to do him to wit of all had happened. Her fears had blanched her clubby cheeks and yelosed her mouth as tight as a button; by reason of which, when she had departed, the king said, "Can that girl ever laugh? I could hardly take her own word for it." Afterwards, I summoned sister Emma, whose blackened eye constrained him to wrestle with himself sorely. Thereafter, the culprit herself was brought into his presence, trembling like an aspen leaf; so as that her guards were little wanted. The king looked as grave as though he were in the witema-genot. Quoth he, "I had no knowledge until just now how hard a woman could hit . . . thou must have mistaken thy vocation, and shouldst rather have helped me fight the Danes. Wonderlike it is to me Alfred, that any born a woman should within her heart find it to give reason of disquiet to one so young, so gentle, and so worthy of all honour as this holy mother. I Alfred, cnyng, have known her ever since she was a child, and know no one, a woman born, so worthy to be loved, save her own sister, my wife. Believe me, ye are favoured among women to have such a mother for your abudisse, whose singular genius and acquired learning (nay, I Ethelfled must not trust myself to recal all this . . .) and who is not only holy, but highborn, not only learned, but ranclike, who refused wonderlike good offers of marriage that she might wholly give herself to heaven, and whose fame for sanctity and book-lero is beginning to be noised abroad in foreign parts. To conclude, I Alfred, king, am fully persuaded in my own mind that if ye will but give yourselves wholly and with one heart unto the direction of your holy mother, there is little question of your sisterhood becoming the most famous, not alone in England, but in Christendom, to say nothing of the more eminent among you being canonized hereafter. And to further and promote this most desired end, it needeth nought but that ye should observe implicit obedience, unlimited good humour, holy temperance, continual quietness, steady industry, sincere piety, and diligent heed unto your copy-books.¹ You, prisoner at the door, commonly known as Selethryth, or the good threatener, I have desired your holy mother, who is long-suffering and soon pacified, to overlook this once your unpardonable offence, on condition of sincere penitence and a week's entire silence. And now let us to prayers."

The king went with us to vespers, and sang loudly and cheerily: I did my best to imitate his example; the poor sisters sang like mice in a cheese, but more tuneably than aforetime; and the service was very refreshing and composing to us all. Then the king ordered his horse to be brought, saying, "I shall not now insist on the board and lodging for three days, you owe me for that parcel of land."² And he vouchsafed to taste our pacentas; and as he departed, said, so that I only could hear, "Farewell, Ethelfleda: I shall now return to Winchester, and tell Ethelswitha I left your face two inches shorter than I found it. My good little abbes! you have been early set in authority over an intractable community; but be brave, be constant, be prayerful, and all will be well."

Thereon the king departed, leaving a freshness and gladness behind him like as we find in the green woods, and fresh air, and sunshine. Methought it much kindness for him to speak so well of me in hearing of my nuns; and from this time there was nothing among them but cheerfulness and obedience. Shortly there arrived from the king a present of wax tablets and poyntels,³ for the use of the sisters who would apply themselves to write; but I grieve to say, that after much trouble, there was not one among them that attained unto the pen of a ready writer. This is, no question, a gift from above: it comes not to all: therefore I was fain to let them apply themselves unto that for which they truly seemed to have capacity, to wit, their needles, rather than to labour painfully at that for which they had no true vocation.

As about this time, departed he'g Neot, and went to glory. Verily he was a rihlwise and saintly man, if ever there was one. He was born to kingly rule, and might have worn a crown; howbeit, he would not, lest the world should be too great a snare unto him. Yet, and if all our good men were to shut themselves up, what manner of rulers should we have? Howbeit, Neot ruled the ruler, ever and anon, even after his death, as will be related hereafter. He took the cowl at Glastonbury; seven times visited Rome, and, in conclusion, getymbrade a monastery. One feature of his was notable: he would try to single out the best qualities of his brethren, and unite them all in himself: as, the holiness of one, the patience of another; howbeit, he might have found them all in our Lord.

(1) i.e. Waxed tablets.

(2) A common condition under the Saxon kings, when the abbey were the only places of reception for travellers.

(3) Iron pens.

But now come I to our great and dreadful peril. The Danes, under Guthrum, who had abode in Cambridge by the space of twelve months, now prepared themselves for action, as the manner of their nation is, by lashing up their passions with dreadful howlings, clashing their swords, clanging their shields, and prancing hither and thither like so many mad creatures. It might very well have been foreboded that this would take place, so soon as the fighting season commenced: howbeit, we English, according to our wont, had despised the danger while it was a little way off, and sat by our hearths, roasting apples and drinking hot ale all the winter. And if any one ventured to remark, "The Danes are coming!" the only answer he had for his pains was, "Oh, they are, are they?—Only let them, I say!" And so we went on in this ungody state of security, (for why should God help those who were so little troubled to help themselves?) And the king, now and then, thought he should do something, but wist not how he should do it: and so it came to pass, the Danes entered into their ships and set sail for Wareham!

I remember it was St. Matthias's Eve . . . I was looking forth of my lattice at the two days old moon, and the great star Jupiter a shining above him,¹ as it were a stone's cast . . . when I became ware of a fierce red light suddenly up-burning from some distant village. Anon, a herdsman's horn windeth clamorously at our gate; and the portress tells me a poor swain craveth immediate speech of me; so I descend unto him, forboding evil. He was a rough, simple serf, all apant with haste; and thus unto me he spake:—

"At sunset drave I my flocks to fold. I tarried on the top of the cliff, and looked across the sea. Then saw I what seemed a little white cloud, no bigger than my hand, a rising from the sea. Presently seven sail were shining in the sun. At length, I counted thirty. Then fled I to give alarm; but my knees trembled, and my tongue clave to the roof of my mouth. The swains gathered to look out, but what could they do? Some fled inland to spread the wall, some to drive off their ceap,² some to carry their wives and their children to the castle. Meantime landed the Danes. They swarmed like bees; they ascended the cliffs like grasshoppers; they brake not their ranks, they went forward every man on his ways, with his shield over his head. Like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble was the hum of their voices. They enclosed and drave before them not a handful of sheep or kine, but whole herds and flocks, to feed thereof. By reason of their numbers the land gathered blackness. They burned our thorp, and all the souls that were therein. Next, they will come to the castle and the abbey. And now, holy mother, take thought what you shall do; for who shall deliver you out of their hands?"

(1) The Saxon moon was masculine.

(2) Cattle. Hence our milk-maids still summon their cows by calling "Cup! cup!"

I said, "Go, and send me Eadwulf, my land bailiff. And let all that are in distress, and all that are homeless, and all that are frightened, come within our precincts as fast as they can; and we will do our best for one another." Then I gave him a thyrmas,³ and a drink of warm ale, for his soul was fainting within him. And his spirit returned unto him, and he went forth; and the bell rang us to night prayer.

So soon as the keys were laid on the altar, and the nuns were all in their cells, I gat me into the chapel, and lay down on my face before the altar, and prayed hard, and wept sore. And I said, Ah, Lord God, have mercy on us; have mercy on thy people England, and show this time what is the difference between a people that prayeth and a people that prayeth not! Come among us, and with great might succour us, because there is none that fighteth for us but only thou, oh Lord! Wherefore should the Danes say, Where is now their God?

Before glomung,⁴ the next morning, the poor people came flocking unto us, some with a few sheep and cattle, some with only a pig or an ass, or a couple of hens, some with only the clothes on their backs, to take shelter within the precincts. Not that there was much safety to be expected within them; for our house, as I have elsewhere said, was chiefly getymbrade, and at the mercy of the first brand; but it made a sort of rallying point; the castle being already over-full: and some of the dwellers in lone forest hoots and shepherds' huts had a notion, false enough, that the pagans would reverence holy ground; others, more justly, thought God would care for his own, and be our buckler of defence: others had pity for us, and resolved to make common cause and fight for us, along with their own wives and children. And thus it fell, that the space enclosed with palisades round about our house, which might be as it were an half-acre, that a yoke of oxen might plough, was presently brim-full of women, children, and confused live stock; while, without the stakes, on the only side that had no natural defence from the confluence of the two rivers, the men drew up, undisciplined and ill-armed enough, but staunch to a man, and ready to die at their posts ere any evil should happen unto us. But what were they against so many? And how wist I that the Lord's purpose would be to deliver us out of the hands of the heathen, any more than he had delivered any of the monasteries all along the eastern coast? I thought of Croyland; and how the grey-haired abbot was slain before the altar, the prior in the vestry, the sub-prior in the refectory: only a little child survived to tell the tale. I thought of Peterborough, with its abbey and its library, the glory of the age, for fifteen days a burning: the abbot and monks all slain. I thought of the nuns of Ely, who disfigured their faces, that they might astonish the Danes, who, indeed, fled away to a man; but not before they had set fire to the monastery and burned every soul alive. And now, here were these very Danes, headed by the self-same chiefs, Guthrum, Amund, and Oskitil,

(3) A fourpenny piece.

(4) Dawn: glomung.

masters and adepts in cruelty and rapine, within our sight and even our hearing; for we could catch the faint rumour as of the yelling of a pack of fox-hounds in some far-off upland, and now and then a huntsman's whoop, and a long, shrilling cry. And this set all the blood-hounds and wolf-hounds within our precincts, baying ready to split their throats, and straining against their leashes; and the oxen lowing, and the porkers grunting, and the sheep bleating, and the infants wailing, and the mothers weeping and wishing there had been room for them in the castle. These latter I gave in charge to the nuns, to foster and comfort, and thereby divert their thoughts from their own strait a little; for, in sooth, they were sore bested; and many a white and many a black veil was quivering with fears that could not be stayed. I bade them be much in prayer: for myself, I stood on the wall, right over the gate, and prayed at my post; receiving news, ever and anon, from some fresh scout; and now and then intermitting my prayer for the help of God, with a passing wish for a little more help of man. For I could not help noting, with some bitterness of heart, that not a fighting man had come to our aid but such as were under my own jurisdiction; all the rest having doubtless mustered at the castle, which truly could make a better defence, but which therefore was all the less in need of them. Such are men, whom we women so often love more than we love God. But mark the issue! The castle fell! The Danes slew all the souls that were therein; they thereby obtained the command of the whole country round about; and the scouts brought news, that, after carousing for a while, and emptying the castle larders and butteries, they were purposing to march upon us. Now arose one universal wail,—who can wonder thereat? Even Eadwulf turned red, and then white. . . . I have always forgotten to find a convenient place for saying, that my foster-father, having been sent on a special message to me just at the time our land-steward died, I had, to Eadwulf's great advantage and mine own, made him his successor. We now stood together on the wall: anon we see a great dust, and the glitter of spears and bossy shields. Presently the pagans were lost in a thicket. We were all praying hard, within and without the house; but it seemed the will of God we should be lost. Still I bare in mind that it was as easy to him to save by few as by many; the last moment, as the first: by a rumour among the mulberry-trees, or by the breaking of a few earthen pitchers.¹ And I thought, Is his arm shortened, that it cannot save? May it not be his good pleasure to help us? But my senses were so quickened by the immediate presence of danger, that I think I could have heard a cock crow, or have seen a sunbeam light a weathercock twenty miles off. I heard Eadwulf mutter between his teeth, "I can die for her, but that won't save her!" . . . and he looked down the wall, and then quickly at me, as much as to say, "Shall we cast ourselves down headlong together?" But this was a suggestion of the evil one, for there were others within the house as defenceless as myself, and depending on me for protection; and I looked stedfastly away from him with mine eyes towards the wood, whence I expected each moment to see issuing the Danes. I heard him give a great sigh; but the next moment, he uttered a loud cry, and, plucking me by the sleeve, pointed towards the Trent. Shading our eyes with our hands from the rays of the declining sun, we could make out a distant troop of horsemen advancing upon us from that direction, just as the first glimmer of spears showed the Danes emerging from the wood. We seemed hemmed in on either side! I cried aloud, "Heaven, help us!"—but the same moment, Eadwulf, his face all a-blaze, shouts, "Praise the Lord, 'tis the king!" And so it was; and so Heaven did help us.

(1) Judges vii. 20.

I, Ethelfled, can never dwell on that rescue without wet eyes.² From what a strait did the king that day work deliverance for me and the poor sisters! . . . Ew! how he and his men laid it on, and drove the villain pagans right into and across the Frome! At his feet they dropped, they fell; where they dropped down, there they lay dead. The lean wolf and the hungry vulture rejoiced. It was a great, a deadly slaughter; yea, they took much prey. The king was a mighty wind, that dispersed the clouds like mist: they rolled from the side of the hills, and the valleys laughed and sang. Now his sword leaped out of his scabbard! he loved to defend the weak. The field was strewed for miles with spears and cloven shields. He chased them back to the towers that rose on the rocky banks. Even here his hand did not leave them, nor his right hand cease to hold them, till they swore on his holy ring, the ring of the holy cross. Then he left them cowed and astounded, and returned with his warriors by night. And we went forth and sang jubilate, and spread him a feast of our best.

* * * * *

But what cared those unrightwise pagans for swearing on his holy ring, yea, or on their own bracelets, which they held much more sacred, or for breaking the holy truth, which they held not sacred on any wise? Had they kept it, they would have belied their own nature, which was akin to all evil. They attacked an outlying party of the king's horsemen, the very same night, while we were making merg and giving of thanks within doors; and making off in the dark, they conveyed themselves to Exeter, whence the king in vain strove to dislodge them.

And now commenced the sorrowfullest season that England ever knew. Alas, my brother! would that I could have aided thee! or that the spirit of wisdom, and discretion, and strength, had been in thee, to know what to do, and to do it! Then, after the year of Seven Battles, thou wouldst not have been seven years a fugitive and a wanderer on the face of the earth, hunted like a partridge on the mountains, a steerless foolun, like David, the son of Jesse, in the wilderness; thy dwelling with the wild beasts of the field, and thy body wet with the dews of heaven, like unto the great king of Babylon. Oh! then was fulfilled the dark saying of Noot, that thou shouldst be humbled and brought low. Thy people willed not what had become of thee, and were as silly sheep lacking a shepherd, or as pigeons frightened from the corn. For their strength and their hope had perished from the Lord. His hand was not shortened, that it could not save; but our iniquities had separated between us and our God. Therefore he removed every stronghold as it were a tent that a man wrencheth up the pegs thereof; he tore up our homes as one easily draweth herbs out of the garden when the mould is wet with dew: he gave up the walls of our palaces into the hands of the enemy, and let our young men and maidens perish by the sword. We were a very scorn unto our foes, and a derision to those that were round about us. For this cause, our eyes ran down with water, and our cheeks were fouled with weeping. The sound of the harp and the rote was no more heard: the mirth of the land was gone. Easter was as sorrowful as Lent, and there was no merriment at Yule. The grape remained uncrushed: the ungathered apple dropped from the bough. The foxes might break the hedges, there was no man cared to snare them; the wolves might prowle round our folds, there was no man had spirit to slay them; the rooks might prey on the corn, there was no one minded to scare them. Men sat by the hearth and sighed; or spake short, like a savage growl. They longed to unite and make head: and their thought was, Where is the king?

(2) Asser merely says, "They left Cambridge for Wareham, where was a nunnery, between the Frome and Trent, secure on all sides but one. Here Alfred made them swear on the Christian relics," &c.

My father was still at Rome; so my mother took shelter with me. How sweet to have a refuge to offer my blessed mother! We were in a less defenceless state than when the Danes took us at unawares; for our poor house had been much repaired and strengthened by my direction; and whereas our palisades were better for keeping nuns in than for keeping pagans out, the king, ere he departed from our coasts, gave commandment that a good stone wall should be getymbrde about us, on our weakest side. Indeed, this made our dwelling less cheerful, but far more secure; and the king, to show how safe he held us to be, sent us sundry heavy chests, with cords well cnytted round them, containing I know not what, but, doubtless, plate and bags of treasure and goodly raiment; since we were to have them in strict charge, and they have never been claimed yet.

About this time, the following song was much in the mouths of the people:—

“What seekest thou in the brake? The blue eggs of the bulfinch.
 What seekest thou in the brake? The blue flowers of the speedwell.
 What seekest thou in the brake? The blue eyes of the king.
 What look ye for i’ th’ air? The path of a swallow.

What look ye for i’ th’ air? The rising of a lark.
 What look ye for i’ th’ air? The flight of a king’s arrow.

Never yet look’d I for an eagle in a marlo-plot,
 Nor for a curlew’s nest in a green shaw.
 But yet in a forest have I seen a burnt spot where a king hath dress’d his meat.”

Thus their very songs were sorrowings, and their speech lamentings. For ourselves, we were shut in so close, that we were sometimes a long while without hearing aught of what was befalling, save from pilgrims, wayfarers, and the like, whom we hospitably entreated.

One day, a stranger, ragged, and with bleeding feet, came to the gate to crave an alms, and whereas he was yet speaking, he fell straightway all along upon the earth, by reason of his strength failing him through travel and much fasting. We had him into the hospitium, and I washed his feet myself; and when his spirit returned unto him, I fed him with bread and wine. Then I sought of him news of the king; and thereupon, thus he spake:—

“I was sent by a chosen fow to seek the king. Him found I in Athelney. We would wit were he still alive, or must we choose us another king. Therefore disguised I myself, with clipped hair, like a serf’s, and I fouled my face and my hands, and went ragged and bare-foot. I tracked him into the remote west, into a land of marshes, and fens, and stagnant waters. But I found not the hare in his form, neither the fox in his cover. One day an arrow whistled past me, and a man rushed after a fawn. I saw him anon through the bushes, and thought it was the king. I followed by stealth on his track: he had the fawn on his shoulders, and he made his way through the briers, down to the edge of a lake. There he untied a shallop, and ferried himself across. Then I followed the banks of the lake, till at length I came to a ford; I got across to the island, which was all in a tangle of wood. Many animals of the harmless sort were in it: I came upon goats, kids, and hares. I disturbed sundry pheasants, and heard the whirr of partridges. Anon, I came to a glade, and saw a woman milking a goat. She was wonderlike to look on for beauty: I knew her to be the queen. She carried her creche within-doors, into a little wattled cot. Then stolo I up to the door, that was only sparred with a latch. I heard some one within reading; it seemed me, a godly book. The reader’s voice was so pleasant, I would fain have listed all night. Then I heard a young infant weeping, and the mother checked it and said, ‘You brat, if you wail so loudly, I will give you to the Danes!’ But she smothered its cries with kisses, and the reader went on with his book. Another man’s voice now sounded, and I heard him say, ‘My king! there is little meat on this fawn, now I have skinned it.’ Then he, I now knew for the king, made laughing answer, and said, ‘Then you and I, my thegn, must eat the less, for I swear I’ll hunt no more to-day.’ Methought he was then stepping forth, so I raised the latch and begged. Wonderlike looked masters and adepts in cruelty and rapine, within our sight and even our hearing; for we could catch the faint rumour as of the yelling of a pack of fox-hounds in some far-off upland, and now and then a huntsman's whoop, and a long, shrilling cry. And this set all the blood-hounds and wolf-hounds within our precincts, baying ready to split their throats, and straining against their leashes; and the oxen howling, and the porkers grunting, and the sheep bleating, and the infants wailing, and the mothers weeping and wishing there had been room for them in the castle. These latter I gave in charge to the nuns, to foster and comfort, and thereby divert their thoughts from their own strait a little; for, in sooth, they were sore bested; and many a white and many a black veil was quivering with fears that could not be stayed. I bade them be much in prayer: for myself, I stood on the wall, right over the gate, and prayed at my post; receiving news, ever and anon, from some fresh scout; and now and then intermitting my prayer for the help of God, with a passing wish for a little more help of man. For I could not help noting, with some bitterness of heart, that not a fighting man had come to our aid but such as were under my own jurisdiction; all the rest having doubtless mustered at the castle, which truly could make a better defence, but which therefore was all the less in need of them. Such are men, whom we women so often love more than we love God. But mark the issue! The castle fell! The Danes slew all the souls that were therein; they thereby obtained the command of the whole country round about; and the scouts brought news, that, after carousing for a while, and emptying the castle larders and butteries, they were purposing to march upon us. Now arose one universal wail,—who can wonder thereat? Even Eadwulf turned red, and then white. . . . I have always forgotten to find a convenient place for saying, that my foster-father, having been sent on a special message to me just at the time our land-steward died, I had, to Eadwulf's great advantage and mine own, made him his successor. We now stood together on the wall: anon we see a great dust, and the glitter of spears and bossy shields. Presently the pagans were lost in a thicket. We were all praying hard, within and without the house; but it seemed the will of God we should be lost. Still I bare in mind that it was as easy to him to save by few as by many; the last moment, as the first: by a rumour among the mulberry-trees, or by the breaking of a few earthen pitchers.¹ And I thought, Is his arm shortened, that it cannot save? May it not be his good pleasure to help us? But my senses were so quickened by the immediate presence of danger, that I think I could have heard a cock crow, or have seen a sunbeam light a weathercock twenty miles off. I heard Eadwulf mutter between his teeth, "I can die for her, but that won't save her!" . . . and he looked down the wall, and then quickly at me, as much as to say, "Shall we cast ourselves down head-long together?" But this was a suggestion of the evil one, for there were others within the house as defenceless as myself, and depending on me for protection; and I looked steadfastly away from him with mine eyes towards the wood, whence I expected each moment to see issuing the Danes. I heard him give a great sigh; but the next moment, he uttered a loud cry, and, plucking me by the sleeve, pointed towards the Trent. Shading our eyes with our hands from the rays of the declining sun, we could make out a distant troop of horsemen advancing upon us from that direction, just as the first glimmer of spears showed the Danes emerging from the wood. We seemed hemmed in on either side! I cried aloud, "Heaven, help us!"—but the same moment, Eadwulf, his face all a-blaze, shouts, "Praise the Lord, 'tis the king!" And so it was; and so Heaven did help us.

I, Ethelfled, can never dwell on that rescue without wet eyes.² From what a strait did the king that day work deliverance for me and the poor sisters! . . . Ew! how he and his men laid it on, and drove the villain pagans right into and across the Frome! At his feet they dropped, they fell; where they dropped down, there they lay dead. The lean wolf and the hungry vulture rejoiced. It was a great, a deadly slaughter; yea, they took much prey. The king was a mighty wind, that dispersed the clouds like mist: they rolled from the side of the hills, and the valleys laughed and sang. How his sword leaped out of his scabbard! he loved to defend the weak. The field was strawed for miles with spears and cloven shields. He chased them back to the towers that rose on the rocky banks. Even here his hand did not leave them, nor his right hand cease to hold them, till they swaro on his holy ring, the ring of the holy cross. Then he left them cowed and astonished, and returned with his warriors by night. And we went forth and sang jubilate, and spread him a feast of our best.

* * * *

But what cared those unrightwise pagans for swearing on his holy ring, yea, or on their own bracelets, which they held much more sacred, or for breaking the holy truth, which they held not sacred on any wise? Had they kept it, they would have belied their own nature, which was akin to all evil. They attacked an outlying party of the king's horsemen, the very same night, while we were making merry and giving of thanks within doors; and making off in the dark, they conveyed themselves to Exeter, whence the king in vain strove to dislodge them.

And now commenced the sorrowfullest season that England ever knew. Alas, my brother! would that I could have aided thee! or that the spirit of wisdom, and discretion, and strength, had been in thee, to know what to do, and to do it! Then, after the year of Seven Battles, thou wouldest not have been seven years a fugitive and a wanderer on the face of the earth, hunted like a partridge on the mountains, a

(2) Asser merely says, "They left Cambridge for Wareham, where was a nunnery, between the Frome and Trent, secure on all sides but one. Here Alfred made them swear on the Christian relics," &c.

(1) Judges vii. 20.

steorless feolun, like David, the son of Jesse, in the wilderness; thy dwelling with the wild beasts of the field, and thy body wet with the dews of heaven, like unto the great king of Babylon. Oh! then was fulfilled the dark saying of Neot, that thou shouldest be humbled and brought low. Thy people witted not what had become of thee, and were as silly sheep lacking a shepherd, or as pigeons frightened from the corn. For their strength and their hope had perished from the Lord. His hand was not shortened, that it could not save; but our iniquities had separated between us and our God. Therefore he removed every stronghold as it were a tent that a man wrencheth up the pegs thereof; he tore up our homes as one easily draweth herbs out of the garden when the mould is wet with dew: he gave up the walls of our palaces into the hands of the enemy, and let our young men and maidens perish by the sword. We were a very scorn unto our foes, and a derision to those that were round about us. For this cause, our eyes ran down with water, and our cheeks were fouled with weeping. The sound of the harp and the rote was no more heard: the mirth of the land was gone. Easter was as sorrowful as Lent, and there was no merriment at Yule. The grape remained uncrushed: the ungathered apple dropped from the bough. The foxes might break the hedges, there was no man cared to snare them; the wolves might prowl round our folds, there was no man had spirit to slay them; the rooks might prey on the corn, there was no one minded to scare them. Men sat by the hearth and sighed; or spake short, like a savage growl. They longed to unite and make head: and their thought was, Where is the king?

My father was still at Rome; so my mother took shelter with me. How sweet to have a refuge to offer my blessed mother! We were in a less defenceless state than when the Danes took us at unawares; for our poor house had been much repaired and strengthened by my direction; and whereas our palisades were better for keeping nuns in than for keeping pagans out, the king, ere he departed from our coasts, gave commandment that a good stone wall should be getymbrade about us, on our weakest side. Indeed, this made our dwelling less cheerful, but far more secure; and the king, to show how safe he held us to be, sent us sundry heavy chests, with cords well cnytted round them, containing I know not what, but, doubtless, plate and bags of treasure and goodly raiment; since we were to have them in strict charge, and they have never been claimed yet.

About this time, the following song was much in the mouths of the people:—

“What seekest thou in the brake? The blue eggs of the bulfinch.

What seekest thou in the brake? The blue flowers of the speedwell.

What seekest thou in the brake? The blue eyes of the king.

What look ye for i' th' air! The path of a swallow.

What look ye for i' th' air! The rising of a lark.
What look ye for i' th' air! The flight of a king's arrow.

Never yet look'd I for an eagle in a marlo-pit,
Nor for a curlew's nest in a green shaw.

But yet in a forest have I seen a burnat spot where a king hath dress'd his meat.”

Thus their very songs were sorrowings, and their speech lamentings. For ourselves, we were shut in so close, that we were sometimes a long while without hearing aught of what was befalling, save from pilgrims, wayfarers, and the like, whom we hospitably entreated.

One day, a stranger, ragged, and with bleeding feet, came to the gate to crave an alms, and whileas he was yet speaking, he fell straightway all along upon the earth, by reason of his strength failing him through travel and much fasting. We had him into the hospitium, and I washed his feet myself; and when his spirit returned unto him, I fed him with bread and wine. Then I sought of him news of the king; and thereupon, thus he spake:—

“I was sent by a chosen few to seek the king. Him found I in Athelney. We would wit were he still alive, or must we choose us another king. Therefore disguised I myself, with clipped hair, like a scrif's, and I souled my face and my hands, and went ragged and bare-foot. I tracked him into the remote west, into a land of marshes, and fens, and stagnant waters. But I found not the hare in his form, neither the fox in his cover. One day an arrow whistled past me, and a man rushed after a fawn. I saw him anon through the bushes, and thought it was the king. I followed by stealth on his track: he had the fawn on his shoulders, and he made his way through the briers, down to the edge of a lake. There he untied a shallop, and ferried himself across. Then I followed the banks of the lake, till at length I came to a ford; I got across to the island, which was all in a tangle of wood. Many animals of the harmless sort were in it: I came upon goats, kids, and hares. I disturbed sundry pheasants, and heard the whirr of partridges. Anon, I came to a glade, and see a woman milking a goat. She was wonderlike to look on for beauty: I knew her to be the queen. She carried her creche within-doors, into a little wattled cot. Then stole I up to the door, that was only sparred with a latch. I heard some one within side reading; it seemed me, a godly book. The reader's voice was so pleasant, I would fain have listed all night. Then I heard a young infant weeping, and the mother checked it and said, ‘You brat, if you wail so loudly, I will give you to the Danes!’ But she smothered its cries with kisses, and the reader went on with his book. Another man's voice now sounded, and I heard him say, ‘My king! there is little meat on this fawn, now I have skinned it.’ Then he, I now knew for the king, made laughing answer, and said, ‘Then you and I, my thegn, must eat the less, for I swear I'll hunt no more to-day.’ Methought he was then stepping forth, so I raised the latch and begged. Wonderlike looked they all; and said, 'What, are we found out here?' And the king held some parley with me; but I let him not wit who I was. I begged for a morsel of bread; and the king bade the thegn fetch a loaf. Quoth the thegn, 'We have but one left, and this we can scarcely spare.' Saith the king, 'This poor knave needs it most; I am minded that he shall have half. Oh that all the wants of my people could be in like manner supplied!' So he brake the loaf in twain . . . It was one of the loaves they call loudas. And I blessed him once and again. I was nigh saying something, but did not. 'My purpose thus far was fulfilled. I had learnt where abode the king. So I sped towards those who had sent me; but fell among thieves by the way. There was nothing they found to take from me, so they beat me and left me alone. But my strength was almost spent, and I think you have saved my life. I was bitter in heart when I found him with his fair wife and his friend in the hunter's booth. But my heart melted when he spake of his people, for I saw a tear in his eye: and methought something heavenlike within him was made known in his breaking of bread.'

Now, from what I afterwards learned, it appeared that this thegn, for he was no less, returned unto those who had sent him, and made known unto them where he had found the king. Whereon they resorted unto him in the Royal Island, or Isle of Nobles, as it was afterwards indifferently called, and plighting anew their fealty, aided him their best to construct a place of safety, whence they might issue continually to harass the Dane. Sometimes they gat the better, sometimes the worse: but, on any wise, they returned, untracked, to their stronghold, which beginning to be woited of by them that were faithful, their party waxed stronger and stronger. They made a rough bridge to the islet, on which they getymbrade two towers. Meantime, news was brought to the king of the movements of the Danes; but as the spies' reports agreed not always together, he wanted to have more certitude thereof.

One evening, when the days were lengthening, but still cold, I was sitting by the light of a fire of billets, when the portress ushered in, without a word, a tall, dark figure, clad in minstrel fashion, with a harp at his back, and holding by the hand a most sweet little child, some five years old, with fair hair falling all over her shoulders. I knew him at once for the king. After our first, gladlike greeting, he said, "I come, Ethelfleda, to put under your safeguard our little Ethelgiva, who is minded to be with you as long as you will keep her; and her mother's wish and mine is, that you make her as much like yourself as you can." Then he set down his harp and warmed his hands, and dried his hair, which was wet with spring rain; and he said, "The time is now come to do something, and I hope to find how to do it. I am bound for the Danish camp." I said, "Ah, my brother, go not alone amid those fell Danes!" and forbore not to weep. But he answered and said, "If thou wouldst have a thing half done, trust it to thy neighbour; if thou wouldst have it whole done, do it thyself. I am weary of my life, with doing nothing to purpose for my people. And now I will muster them at a set place, and lead them to victory or die. I have dreamed of holy Neot, who stood by me, and said, 'Up, why sleepest thou? behold, the set time is come.' So, fill me a cup of wine, my sister; and weep not to break my heart."

Then, to cheer me and make me of good courage, he told me how brave-hearted and helpful Ethelswitha had been; and for all the lowliness and incertitude of their living in Athelney, how pleasantlike it had been to harbour with her under the green boughs. "Only," quoth he, "I heard my people's cry in mine ears, day and night." And he told me what pains he had been at to find the place; and how he had carried Ethelswitha across to it on his shoulder.

"Before I found it," quoth he, "a man found me straying on the dun.¹ He asked me who I was, and what I sought. I told him I served the king, who had just been beaten, and I was looking for shelter. Thereon he took me home, to a herdsman's rustic cot. They gave me food and lodging. I abode with them certain days. When the swain, whose name was Denulf, had herded his swine, he came in and sate by the fire, and, with acorns for counters, made reckonings. Thereon I laughed, and told him he should be a clere: peradventure he had been born for a bishop." He said, 'Better be a herd that can herd his swine, than a king that cannot save his people. If a wolf attacks my pigs, I throw stones at him, and chase him away; which is more than king Alfred does with the Dane.' One sabbath morn, the man and his meowla would go forth, leaving certain cakes, well besewon and well gessyled, a baking on a pan over the fire; and the good wyf me spake, 'Thou's nawt to tend save thine arrow an' thy baw: see to't, lad, whenas t'one soid o't keaks is brownd, an' turn them to teother.' But wellaway, my thoughts to other matters fled, and the keaks were singed; and the wyf, coming back, stormed like a sea-king, and smote one of mine ears and then the other. And, quoth she, 'Could n't thee moind the keaks, lad? Beshrew thee for't! thou loikes to eat them vast cnow!'—I bare it meckly; only asking her whether she were of kin to Sclethryth the nun."

Then we discoursed of sundry matters pertaining unto the kingdom; and also unto this poor house. Then he took up his harp, and arose to depart; saying, "You shall soon hear good or ill tidings." I showed him the stone wall, and said, "Thou hast ensafed us now, brother!" He gave it an earnest look, and made answer, "Oh yes, you are now strong enough: it may hap that I shall send you the queen." And, looking round about him, and then at me, he said, "Thou'rt but young, yet—" gravelike: and, without another word, rode away. The place looked

(1) Down.

(2) The king afterwards encouraged him to apply to letters; and, finally, made him Bishop of Winchester.

dull, in the dusk; and, just then, he thought me a blot.¹

Or ere many suns had set, came the glad tidings that he had rallied his people in Selwood-forest. At the stone of Egbert they met: a stone to be much set by. The news of his taking arms spread like wildfire; the people flocked unto him with gladness. Nothing was to be heard but horns, trumpets, and the ringing of arms. Two days continued the mustering: on the third, the king led them forward. He inflamed their souls with his words: Who can speak like the king? They came at length on the foe, carousing and making merry. Then, who shall tell what ensued? They fought beneath the king's eye. First, the arrows flew like snow-flakes, then followed the lances; and, anon, each man was hewing at another with his sword. As a standard-bearer rushed past, the king, in his heat, cried, "See! Neot leads us!" and the cry ran from mouth to mouth. What remains to tell? The Danes were winnowed like chaff; the victory remained with the king.

It was a day to be much remembered. The king followed hard after them to their stronghold, and besieged them straitly. Men from all quarters continued to flock to his standard. The stronger waxed the king, the weaker waxed the Danes. Fourteen days they endured siege and great famine; then their souls were brought low, even the soul of Guthrum, and they sued for the king's mercy.

Then Alfred the king bare in mind his old saying, that he would sooner they were converted than conquered. And, having insisted on their entire submission to his will, whatsoever it should be, he put them under a brief course of preparation, and assembling them nigh unto Athelney, he caused them to be admitted into the church by the holy waters of baptism. He himself stood sponsor for Guthrum, who, with thirty chiefs, was baptized. It was a notable, a memorable day. For twelve days the feast arose.

I wot there was joy in heaven over that sight; in special, in the heart of holy Neot. The thing was done quickly. I had speell of one of the priests afterwards, who took part in preparing the candidates. "There was not time," quo' he, "for many subtleties . . . we just showed them how they might be saved by Christ. We hammered that well into them, and let the rest alone; for they were but poor, blind pagans." Thought I Ethelfled, ye might have done worse.

Now the rest of the acts of king Alfred, and how he settled his kingdom, and how all the Saxon kings made him head of all England, and the good deeds that he did, and the wise laws that he made, and the ships that he getymbrade; . . . is it not all set down by Asser? Also, how he established the Danes under Guthrum, in East Anglia, where they turned their swords into pruning-hooks, and cultivated the land, and would not countenance the fresh swarms of Danes that landed, and fought, and were beaten. Thereafter, the country had much prosperity. And Tine the Cornishman made this song, that was much sung by the people:—

"Oh, England, know thy blessings! See! the Lord hath given thee a good king. The ceap feed in the pastures; a little child may guard them. The girls may go to the wells: gold bracelets hang safe on the high-ways. The swains sow corn in the spring, for they look to thresh it in winter. Set up the Maypoles! set the cyder running! We are at peace and in safety; we, the happy ones! Dearest men, praise the Lord. The monks may now fish up their church-plate from the water-pits: also the nuns may sleep sweetly in their cells. The wolf gnaws his own fore-foot, for there are no dead bodies. Wisdom increaseth, wealth increaseth; let us glorify God. Oh England, know thy blessings!"

Howbeit, the Canaanite is still in the land. Of a verity, I thought when Guthrum was baptized, the kingdom of heaven was coming at last; but no, the set time was not come. Well, there is a Canaanite, too, in the little world of our own hearts, that will continue there so long as we are in the body: but it rests with ourselves whether to starve or to pamper him. What remaineth to say? Alfred the king was twenty and eight years old when he returned unto his kingdom. That was ten years ago; and here am I, still abdess of this poor house. Shaftesbury abbey is being getymbrade, but I doubt very much if I shall accept the mitre thereof: for I have become used to mine old quarters, though they are gloomy, and unto mine old nuns, though they are stupid. My rule has become popular, so that I have been constrained to refuse many postulants, in spite of the new wing. Among the fresh comers have been one or two hopeful ones; and one or two, that for conscience' sake I have been constrained to recommend to return unto the world. One of these was a girl whom I found dashing her head against a pillar, for that she said our rule was not hard enough. Afterwards she was a prey to unaccountable diseases, and one day fell to rolling herself very swiftly along the floor of the chapel, till she reached the shrine of our patroness; when, with a deep sigh, she exclaimed, "Now, praise to St. Audrey, I am cured!" Many would have made a miracle of it, which indeed was what she wanted; but I am, it may be, even too hard of belief in such events, unless undeniably authenticated; and as the girl proved a deceiver, I was glad the thing was done in a corner. Alfred the king is very fond of monasteries: per-adventure because he never lived in one himself. They are indeed necessary and expedient for the times; but if times are greatly bettered, it may be we shall learn to do without them. And as for safety!—only look at Winchester, and Croyland, and Ely. Ethelswitha, just as she was setting forth from our abbey-gate with her gay retinue, all pranked and glittering in the morning sun, cried, "Farewell, Ethelfled, I envy you your peaceful life:" but what witteth she, I aspire to know, of my joys or burthens? She sees me take my place now and then in the great council, and hears my good report of pilgrims and travellers, and has sate by while Eadwulf consulted me about eel dikes and salt pans, and what to sow, and what to mow, and so many ambra of malt, and so many fotha of firewood, and whether we shall send so many systers of honey to such a monastery in return for their hens, or whether we may look for salmon-trouts from such another in return for our eels; all of which Eadwulf loves to roll under his tongue in hearing of the queen . . . Ah, my sister, you see not the other half of the gate-post!

(1) A victim.

My little niece is the joy of my life! She is steadfastly minded to profess, and when she cometh to fit years, if she be still of the same mind, no doubt, the king will be consenting. She may be abbess of Shaftesbury instead of myself, if she will. The little lamb clave to me from the first, and would reverently lay her hand on my garment, as if it were almost too holy to be touched. And she would sing snatches of hymns in her sleep, and have dreams of heaven; and, if she awoke in the night, would slip out of bed, and down upon her knees, with her pretty hands held up, and there, maybe, drop asleep. Therefore, there went a saying forth, that she was too good to live. But, nevertheless, she is thriving and of good cheer unto this day.

Here endeth the Chronicle of Ethelred.

CHIKAGOU AND TONIKA.¹

BY MISS RACHEL G. HEYER.

CHAPTER III.

THE next morning found the two lovers more profoundly enamoured with each other than ever; because the night, if it had not blessed them with the refreshment of sleep, had afforded them leisure for reflection in which to contemplate the difficulties of their situation. For savage life has its code of morals and manners, as well as civilized; with this difference in the penalties of their infringement, that, while the latter visits the offender with disgrace, the other summarily dismisses him, by cutting off his head and sticking it upon a pole, as a terror to all other like-minded evil-doers. These difficulties acted upon the impatient ardour of the lovers, like—to use an old comparison—stones in the channel of a brook, which, without being able to arrest the course of the stream, serve to exasperate and break it into dissonant murmurs. Tonika, who was in a bewilderment of ecstasy and trouble, and who could hardly recover the exercise of her reason sufficiently to look upon the scenes of yesterday other than as the fragment of a delicious dream, no sooner encountered the young Michigan, than she commended him to the counsel of her brother. They both, indeed, had little hope of anything from this quarter; for the laws of the Natchez were like the laws of the Medes and Persians, that altered not. But, a very little spark of hope is enough to kindle up a whole flame of enterprise in a lover's bosom. So, after some few hours of fond talk with Tonika—which flew like momentary flashes of light across the heaven of their enjoyment—Chikagou found himself closeted, as they say at Washington, with the Brother of the Sun, in the royal apartments, and in the midst of interesting deliberations.

Without any finesse, or introductory discourse, to break the ice, not even so much as a remark upon the state of the weather, Chikagou proposed at once for the hand of the sister princess. The Great Chief was not astonished. How could he be astonished that anybody should be ambitious of so illustrious an alliance? Indeed, Chopart himself had made the very same offer; the wily Frenchman reflecting, that an Indian marriage could not legally affect a prior contract under the civil law. The Natchez chief, however, hated the French; and was, also, clear-sighted enough to foresee the dissolution of the government, in the event of such a union. He, therefore, refused peremptorily, and thought the matter ended. In this he misjudged the craft of his adversary.

He now represented to the present suitor, that Paatlako had been encouraged to expect the hand of Tonika. That it was true, the matter could not be fully determined upon until after the winter hunt; when, if he brought in the proper amount of deer and buffalo, and the required number of Arkansas' scalps, there could be no obstacle to their union.

Chikagou understood all this, and proposed to become a competitor.

But, another difficulty interposed:—would Chikagou, in that event, renounce his tribe and identify himself with the Natchez?

Chikagou hesitated; when the Great Chief added—or, would Chikagou unite his tribe to that of the Natchez? There was plenty of hunting-ground and good rich ground for maize, as well as plenty of fish for both. Besides, this union would strengthen both; and, perhaps, enable them to drive out the French.

Chikagou started at this suggestion. He was a fast friend of the French. But he said nothing.

The Great Chief, not noticing the gesture, now sunk his voice to a whisper, and informed him, that this with him was a fixed purpose, from which no difficulty or danger could turn him. That he had already consulted with the chiefs of several friendly tribes; and that, at the great hunt, there was to be a council held the coming winter, on the Alabama, to mature their arrangements.

While all this was being related, Chikagou was collecting his thoughts for a suitable reply. At length he said, he would see his braves and old men of the nation, and return an answer before the council met. The Great Chief understood this as showing a disposition to enter into his sanguinary scheme. In this particular he deceived himself; but Chikagou was in earnest about the removal of his tribe. This was a possible thing. He retired from the presence, in a brown study,—neither bowing nor walking backwards. Indian sovereigns don't require it. They are better gentlemen than their civilized brethren. They have craft, without hypocrisy.

(1) Concluded from p. 314.

Tonika had overheard the conversation. Seated near the entrance, she had thrown her whole soul into her ears; and, as they were quick and sensitive, as well as handsome, nothing was lost. When Chikagou came out, she took him by the hand, and, without uttering a single word, led him out into a grove near the village, which they had no sooner reached, than she fell into his arms and wept like a child. And then the passionate language that fell from their lips, it would not become the dignity of the historian to repeat. We leave it to be treasured by the sylvan deities, as too sacred for the scoffing lips of a profane world. They found some satisfaction in the reflection, that they knew all the difficulties of their situation; and this enabled them to determine upon a certain course of action. Chikagou was to return immediately and consult his tribe upon the subject of the proposed removal. This failing, he was to return and carry off Tonika. No matter where they went, so that they went together. In his absence, they were to correspond through the Jesuit missions. This was practicable and easy—for they were both Christians. This settled, they returned to the village; where Chikagou passed the day with Father Philibert, and chatted with the émigrés about their beloved France. He was to set out early in the morning; and, therefore, made his adieu to Tonika, late at night.

And where was the vigilant and uneasy Paatlako all this time? Ignorant of the departure of Chikagou, he had that morning stolen away to the tent of the medicine-man. Yes, Paatlako, the unbeliever, was resorting to the sorcery of Umqua to open to him the doors of the future, that he might enter into its secrets, and resolve his present fears. They who best know human nature, will not be surprised at this. Men may profess atheism with their lips; but in their hearts there lurks a yearning toward the unseen, which in moments of trouble appeals to the Great Spirit, or to the demons that take his place in the benighted mind. Man must embrace a rational faith, or become the slave of a blind superstition. It was so with Paatlako, who now stood in the hut of the medicine-man; the latter hanging over a burning pile of narcotic leaves and berries, and inhaling the smoke through his nostrils. This, which would have killed a white man, only intoxicated the savage. Presently he began to rock himself from side to side—then backward and forward—muttering his incantations in a low dreamy tone of voice. Then he broke forth: "The Michigian is gone—gone to the great waters of the Iroquois—gone—gone." Then a pause. "The daughter of the Natchez is weeping alone." Another pause. "Paatlako comforts her. Paatlako is happy." Here the old man sank down, overcome by the fumes of the burning narcotics. Paatlako rushed from the hut; and was surprised and delighted to find that the Michigian was indeed gone. It was some time, however, before he could encounter Tonika; and when he did so, he saw no traces of tears upon her cheeks. She was at once cheerful and gracious. This puzzled him. It excited his suspicions. He set himself to unravel the mystery.

It was some two or three weeks after this, that Captain Chopart had called a council of the officers and leading men of the grant at the Fort. When they were assembled, he opened his communication to them, by reminding them that the present grant which they had received from the royal bounty, not only covered the ground now occupied by them, but extended north and east far beyond the ground in possession of the Natchez Indians; and he remarked, that he looked upon it as the duty of the colony to extend their jurisdiction over these limits; to dispossess the savage, and bring it into cultivation.

But the truth is, the Captain was looking at a private interest, rather than a public one, in making these suggestions. He was expecting a ship-load of emigrants soon to arrive at New Orleans, to whom he had agreed to sell portions of the land in question on his own account. Besides, the almost daily sight of Tonika had so inflamed him, that he was fairly mad, par amours. He longed to bring together all the military strength he could collect in the valley of the Mississippi, and extirpate the savages. Thus his avarice and his passion would be gratified. Longrays, Noyers, Bailly, and others, a little more independent than the rest, opposed his design for a long time. It was, however, finally carried. But each one in turn shrunk from the disagreeable task of communicating the determination to the Great Chief. Chopart, therefore, resolved to go himself. With him, the word was father to the act. He broke up the council, and proceeded at once in search of the Natchez chief.

The Great Chief was sitting under the Company's tobacco shed, smoking his pipe, and talking with the people engaged in packing, when Captain Chopart found him. The Captain saluted him with a show of reverence; which the Chief returned by simply taking the pipe from his mouth, blowing a cloud, and saying quietly, "Captain!" The Captain related, at once, the issue of the morning's conference. His words fell upon the Indian's ear like the summons of fate. He had seen too much of the white man, not to know that where his avarice was concerned, nothing could frustrate him in his unscrupulous purpose. But he listened in perfect silence. Not a single muscle of his face—not even the trembling of an eyelid—betrayed the tumult of his stricken heart. When the Captain had ended his appalling recital, fortified by the sophistries usually employed on such occasions, the Chief calmly replied, in tolerably bad French,—

"Captain," he said, "I have heard your speech; and it has made my heart very sad. You say that your King has given you these lands. How can he give you my property? Is not that stealing, by your religion? But, you say, by the right of discovery. Captain, this country was never lost. Who discovered it, but he who made it, and gave it to my fathers?—the Great Spirit, whose habitation is yonder burning sun. So, you say, your religion and your great knowledge give you a claim to it. Why, if you were good and wise, would you not see it was unjust?"

This reply only put the choleric soldier into a passion. He was angry that the savage should reason so well; and anger is a most excellent argument in a bad cause. It saves a man a deal of wear and tear in conscience—for conscience, affrighted at the uproar, leaves the trembling and excited intellect, and takes refuge in the pocket; and stays there till the storm is over. He, therefore, answered that he did not come there to be catechised, but to demand his surrender of the grant; and that, if he did not consent to make it, he would bring the whole French force in the country to compel him.

"Captain," replied the great Chief, "what you say, you will do; be it good or bad. I know that. I bow my head; the poor Indian cannot fight the white man. But, Captain, you see here is my nation—this is our home—here is our temple—our fathers' graves—and all that the Indian holds dear!"

This was uttered with emotion. But it was not regarded. The Chief continued: "I will call a council of my braves. To-morrow you shall have our answer." Saying this, he strode away.

It did not take long to assemble the council; for the braves were all in the village. They were no sooner collected, than the Great Chief laid the matter before them. A profound silence followed the communication. It took them by surprise. At length Paatlako arose, and, with many apologies for his youth and inexperience, said, —

"My fathers, this is bad news, but it is what the Indian must always expect from the white man, and the white man's friend. The religion they would teach us, forbids us to cheat, to lie, to covet, or to steal. Is that the religion they live by? No! They want us to believe it, so that they may entrap and destroy us. They don't believe it, or they would live by it. No! They covet our land, our squaws, our tobacco, our corn. They want everything. And now they will turn us out of the home of our fathers; not because there is not land enough for all, but because they want more. Now, my fathers, there is to be a great talk at the hunt upon the Alabama. But the Frenchmen won't wait for that; therefore we must think of something to be done soon. Let us say to him, You shall have our land; but we must get in our corn first, and then we will go. Meanwhile, let us prepare! Let us buy muskets and powder; and, when the time comes, let us fall upon the French and take their scalps. Let us do it suddenly—and then take their fort, and make ourselves strong."

Paatlako spoke the mind of every chief in the council. They all pronounced the speech good. An old chief was deputed to carry the answer to Chopart: he was a wily and practised negotiator, and had often handled the wampum. The council then broke up.

CHAPTER IV.

THE negotiations with Captain Chopart were successful; that is, the Indians secured the requisite delay. But the Captain, not to be disappointed in his greedy expectations, imposed a tax, or rent, upon every lodge in the village. This made the savages laugh, and made them angry; it was so novel, and so annoying. To think of this perplexing improvement of civilized man being forced upon the free occupants of a free soil! To think of that perpetual recurrence of quarter-day, which divides the poor man's life into so many epochs of dreadful anxiety, and spreads a gloom over the whole of his mortal existence—to think of this being engrafted upon the wilderness, to mark the white man's approach, and to be added to those plagues of his commerce, disease and rum! Surely the French radical Prud'hon would be justified in declaring that, in this case, property was theft.

Meanwhile, the Indians were not idle. They had collected all the skins they could find in the village—even stripping themselves of many favourite articles of clothing—to make up a sufficient amount to send to New Orleans in exchange for muskets, powder, and ball. Two large canoes were soon despatched on this errand; which returned in about three weeks with a small supply of these products of civilization. The intercourse with the people of the grant was not interrupted; but conducted with the same appearance of cordiality as before; at the same time, each party secretly availing itself of every means to strengthen its position. We speak now of the principal men, and not of the mass of the people; for these were in entire ignorance of these machinations, and suspected no evil.

Chikagou had not yet returned. He had taken a long journey; for his tribe, living in the neighbourhood of Lake Michigan, was good fifteen hundred miles above Natchez. Paatlako was not altogether unmindful of this, and as the time wore away, he became daily more uneasy. Tonika's behaviour towards him, though frank and courteous, was too cold to encourage his hopes. The sharp-witted savage thought he saw that there was dwelling in her heart a beloved image toward which her thoughts ever returned, and that warmed her heart with an inward joy, not all to be mistaken for the effects of his presence. But yet, this long absence was beginning to trouble her. She had received several short messages from Chikagou, but they conveyed no information respecting the time of his return. Two months had now elapsed, when Father du Poisson, a Jesuit missionary, coming to the grant, put into her hand a note from her lover. It informed her that he had not been able to persuade his tribe to remove to the south. The old men, indeed, were willing, for they began to suffer from the rigour of that climate. But the young men resisted. They averred, and with truth, that the means of subsistence were more abundant and of better quality than could be found upon the lower Mississippi; and that, as for the winters, they furnished them with plenty of fur to trade with the Canadians. Chikagou had, therefore, no alternative but to fall back upon their first plan of an elopement. He would be at the appointed place, early in the evening of the last day of the moon. Tonika was by no means reluctant, and when the night came, she was at the rendezvous. Chikagou was soon by her side; they set out immediately, under cover of the night, for the north. But it was not his intention to return thither. Knowing that Paatlako and others would by daylight be on his trail, his design was to lay by during the day, and at night slip down the river to New Orleans. Tonika, being a princess, had been too much indulged—that is, too much nursed in the lap of civilization—to admit of such speed of travel as to elude her more vigorous pursuers, on so long a journey. Chikagou had left a canoe in charge of two braves, about fifteen miles above, towards which he now directed his steps.

